tain region in the south of that part of Palestine which lies to the east of Jordan, from the Dead Sea to the Atlantic Gulf; the land for the people, corresponding antithetically to the prominence given to the land in the foregoing (ch. xxxiv. 25 sq.).—Ver. 3. Ch. xxxiv. 10, xiii. 8, 20, xvi. 3, et pasnim.—Ch. xxv. 7, 13, vi. 14.—Ch. xxxiii. 28, 29.—Ver. 4. Exemplification. Thy cities and חָרָבָה ranked together; the latter not exactly: “destruction,” but rather: “destroyed,” heaps of ruins.—Ch. xii. 20, xiv. 16, 16.—Ver. 5. Enmity for ever, as in ch. xxv. 15, but more expressive here on account of the kinship between Edom and Israel (comp. Ps. cxxxvii. 7). Infinitive construction passing over to the verb fin. The enmity is an abiding one; the next word, נָנִי (Hiphil, imperf. ap.), is an expression of that enmity. Besides, in this as well as in the expression בְּנִי יִשְׂרָאֵל, the people already come distinctly out from the land. אֶרֶץ is:

oppression; hence: burden, calamity, misfortune, farther and sufficiently defined by what immediately follows (comp. ch. xxi. 30, 34 [25, 29]). Oppression of brethren calls at once for the exercise of compassion, which is best manifested where no one is innocent; when guilt makes the end, ancient enmity should not be let loose (Obad. 18).—Ver. 6. לָרֹם, is there an allusion

here to אֲדָמָה? a suggesting, although not an express naming of Edom? In this case could there be also an antithetic allusion to "Adam" (men) in ch. xxxiv. 31, and at the same time an allusion to Gen. xxv. 30!! At all events, the four-fold repetition of רֶם has some significance.

Edom shall, as it were, become entirely blood (ch. xvi. 38), and still farther, blood shall follow him, which might mean that he will leave behind him a track of blood, or, the effusion of blood will follow him; so that by this phrase, which is again repeated at the end of the verse, the words: blood will I make thee, are explained to mean: the effusion of blood, namely, of thy own blood, shall cleave fast to thy footsteps (comp. ver. 8). [HIVERN.: I will make the event authentic thy name, and blood-guiltiness shall pursue thee everywhere as a murderer, to cry for vengeance and to give thee up to punishment. EWALD, who reads מַעֲשֶׂה instead of מַעֲשֵׂה:

"because thy inclination is after blood, blood shall," etc.] אִם-לֹא רֶם scarcely implies an oath; affirmative, as HENGST.: "forsooth thou hast hated blood," inasmuch as the murderer hates the blood which he sheds, in which is the hated life of the murdered man; and although the significant play upon the word רֶם might include a reference to the blood-relationship of Edom and Israel (THEODORET), had not the Hebrew word for that been בֶּטֶר, it is simpler to adhere to the negation that Edom thus hated not bloodshed. ["The most peculiar part of the verse is the clause אִם-לֹא רֶם שִׁנְאָה, which not only our version, but also nearly all commentators, render: 'since thou hast not hated blood.' But no examples can be produced to justify such a rendering, and the remark of Hitzig, that as the words stand, they must be regarded as an affirmative protestation, is quite correct. Taking blood in the usual sense, I do not see why, in a passage so strongly epigrammatic and alliterary as this, the hatred of it might not be affirmed of Edom; for the grand point on which the desires of the Edomites were centred was life, life in themselves, as opposed to the bloody extermination they sought for Israel; the shedding of their blood was what they would on no account think of. I take the meaning to be, therefore: The preservation of thy life is what thou art intent on securing; the thought of blood being shed among thee is what thou art putting far from thee as an object of aversion; but God's purposes are contrary to thine, and what thou hatest He will send—blood shall pursue thee."—FAIRBAIRN'S Ezekiel.—W. F.]—Ver. 7. שִׁמְמָה instead of שִׁמְמָה, the same as שִׁמְמָה. The land is made so because the people fill it only as slain (ver. 8). There is no going to and fro, no traffic, ch. xxxiii. 28. [Sept. according to ch. xxv. 13.]—Ver. 8. Ch. xxxiii. 5 sq., xxxi. 12. Hence the desolation of death.—Ver. 9. עוֹלָם, שָׁם, a rejoinder to אֵיבָה עוֹלָם, ver 5. Instead of הִישָׁבְנָה, from יָשַׁב (KEIL), to be read with י quiescent, the Qeri has הִשָּׁבְנָה, from שָׁבַר, "not to return" to its original condition. HENGST.: "thy cities shall not sit," but lie prostrate (ch. xxvi. 20).

Ver. 10. יָעַךְ, parallel to ver. 5. The other side of Edom's guilt in respect to Israel. With significant allusion to their separation, Israel and Judah are called הַנְּזוּיִם. In speaking thus, Edom considered them as heathen nations, and not the people of Jehovah; or this is the prophet's representation. Hence הַנְּזוּיִם can mean nothing else than the land of Israel and the land of Judah, not Idumæa and the land of Judah (JEROME). Grotius sees here a reference to the Assyrian and also the Babylonian captivity. יִרְשָׁנָה, neuter (KEIL): the one land as well as the other (ROSENEM.); HITZIG: referring to the plur. fem. If we understand the clause יִהְיֶה שָׁם of Jehovah's presence in the temple, then for believers ideally, as it also in reality was in the kingdom of Israel, it comes into consideration for both kingdoms, and we may, with other expositors, make the suffix refer to Jerusalem. On this comp. ch. ix. 3, xi. 23. But certainly the divine presence in the temple was only the sensible symbol of Jehovah's governing agency among His people generally; hence, finally, the disregarding of Israel's divine election, the ignoring of this, was the mistake in the reckoning which Edom made. Better thus than to say that Edom insulted Jehovah by coveting His possession (HITZIG); or (as KEIL): "as if Jehovah were a feeble and unreal God, unable to protect His people;" but that which had been said in Israel, ch. viii. 12 (ch. ix. 9), in excuse for heathen superstition, the heathen unbelief of Edom repeats here with respect to Israel's eternal destiny, which rests on the ground of Jehovah's covenant revelation. It was practical atheism in both cases,—childish neglect of God in Israel, but active hostility to Him in Edom. Edom's reckoning took sin into account, calling to remembrance the injury done by Jacob, the father of Israel, to Esau, their ancestor; but took no account of grace, and never thought that "Jehovah" should come into consideration. [From ver. 12 שָׁם has been also interpreted as referring to Idumæa.]

Ver. 11. לִבְךָ, as in ver. 6. From the hating (infinitive) come anger and envy, expressing themselves not only in word (ver. 10), but also in deed (עֲשִׂיתָ). Jehovah acts according to Edom's doings.—The making known בָּמָה, not, as Hengst., among "the children of Israel," which is too remote (ver. 5), but among the two נְזוּיִם (ver.

10), just as תְּהִינָה there refers to the two lands coveted by Edom. The making known among Israel shall happen as well as the judgment on Edom—comp. ch. xxviii. 25 (ch. xxvi. 20); not, however, as if both had like proportion (HENGST.), but because the making known is effected by the judgment. בְּאִשֶּׁר, as Him who, etc.—Ver. 12.

Thus Edom shall know by experience that Jehovah does not leave unpunished such a saying as Edom has said. After speaking of doings in ver. 11, there is now a return to the sayings (ver. 10). He has heard all. The mountains of Israel, preparing for ch. xxxvi. 1, come forth in antithesis to the mountain range of Seir. Qeri שְׂמַמָּה, simplifying, but needlessly, for the abrupt and significant שְׂמַמָּה (ver. 15), 3 perf fem. sing., may refer to the land or be understood of what is meant; or we may with Rosenm. read: שְׂמַמָּה.

“a waste,” ch. xxxiii. 28. The following plural brings in the people.—Ch. xxxiv. 5, 8, 10.—Ver. 13. Thus their sayings were not only insults to

Israel (עַל־הָרִי יִשׁ), land and people, but at the same time boastings with their mouth heaped up against Jehovah (עָלַי), who was there (ver. 10), wherewith they already, as it were, took joyful possession of the land. They exulted over Jehovah with haughty words and much speaking. But now—Ver. 14—He who hitherto has heard all these boastings speaks and acts (‘אָשָׁא).

According as the one happens, so shall the other happen to thee. [EWALD: “I will make thee a sport (a comedy) to the whole earth,” etc. HITZIG: While all the world rejoices even over thy desolation (!).] However natural it is at כָּל־הָאָרֶץ to think of the “whole earth,” such a thought is very foreign to the connection. Hävernicks, on the other hand, insists on the necessary harmony with the following verse, according to which the interpretation must be: as all Edom exulted, so also should all Edom be subjected to punishment. The curious explanation, to take כָּן here as an adverb of time (so also Hitzig), and in ver. 15 as a word of comparison, readily suggests itself. But better (KIMCHI), the one כָּן illustrates the other; hence כָּן expressly in ver. 15, as also the infinitive שְׂמַמָּה here points to שְׂמַחְתָּךְ in ver. 15.

To rejoice and desolation must correspond to one another, while the latter, however, must be the punishment. For and instead of joy of the whole land, desolation now. The כָּן at the end of the verse already intimates what land is meant. There is not a word said in the whole chapter of the “earth”; it is always land as opposed to land, the mountain range of Seir to the mountains of Israel (ver. 12). Hengst. best shows what the “whole earth” introduces into the clear text: “The glorious salvation which comes to Zion is a subject of rejoicing for the whole earth, because it gives testimony to the glory of God, who can only bless His people, so that in them all the nations of the earth shall be blessed, Deut. xxxii. 43 sq.; Isa. xlii. 10 sq.; Ps. xcvi. 1, xlviii. 3; Lam. ii. 15.” [KLIEF.: “But when all that bears the name of Edom shall, through the judgment of God, be subjected to devastation, then the whole earth shall rejoice, as Edom rejoiced when Jerusalem fell.” Where is such an extravagant idea even hinted at in the text? Ch. xxxvi. 2, 5 speaks only of Edom's exultation. Hence Keil thus applies בְּשִׂמְחָה: “When joy shall be prepared for all the world (all mankind!), then shall,” etc.]—Ver. 15. That the rejoicing of Edom, which is to be requited to him, had respect to the inheritance, etc., that is, the land given to the family of Israel as distinguished from Esau-Edom (Gen. xxvii. 4, xxviii. 4), is now brought in at the close; and as thereby בְּשִׂמְחָה in ver. 14 is explained, so the motive for שְׂמַמָּה is given by אֲשֶׁר־שְׂמַמָּה. In accordance with this, בְּן־אֶנְשֵׁי־לָקֶה repeats שְׂמַמָּה

אֶנְשֵׁי־לָקֶה (ver. 14), and consequently is not to be interpreted, with Hitzig: so will I make others rejoice over thy desolation. שְׂמַמָּה תְּהִיָּה, which forms the complement to בְּן־אֶנְ, is the second, not the third person. The following feminine suffix indicates the land, so that with כָּל־הָאָרֶץ the meaning also of כָּל־הָאָרֶץ (ver. 14) is quite clear. Mount Seir, and all Edom, the whole of it, is set in contrast to the inheritance of the house of Israel.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. As the ideas by which the national life of Israel was upheld express themselves in a great variety and fullness of forms of worship, as to places, times, materials, and persons, so also in the course of the divine history of Israel, individuals and whole tribes and nations became symbolized into spiritual, and also unspiritual, very expressive types of character, which may serve as studies for the minister of the gospel.

2. The symbolical or typical signification of Esau-Edom, while treated more historically in ch. xxv. (p. 246), comes out with perfect clearness when we take also Heb. xii. into consideration. Whether he is called (Heb. xii. 16) τίσις in the literal sense, with reference to Gen. xxvi. 34 sq., or in a figurative and spiritual sense, so that the expression is synonymous with βίβλος, at all events the picture given of Edom in Ezekiel corresponds to the latter sense of the word. To Edom, Judah and Israel (divide et impera in his thoughts) are merely nations and lands. Anything higher, as that Jehovah was there, enters not into his thoughts. It is the ordinary profane kind of a materialism, which takes its stand on natural rights, and does not want to know of grace and election, and so repays Jacob's sin with abiding enmity, and actually carries out as Edom (Ezek. xxxv. 5) what Esau only threatened (Gen. xxvii. 41); as, on the other hand, the carnal appetite (σάρκοις μῆτις) is still exhibited in ver. 12 of our chapter (לֹא־כָלָה).

3. In this sense the elder son Esau forms the Sadducean parallel to the Pharisaic elder son, Luke xv. 25 sq.

4. There is also in Ezekiel an ἐξιδουμαϊσμός, namely, rejection which is complete desolation. As Esau receives not the blessing which he wished to inherit, so the inheritance of the house of Israel does not fall to Edom to devour, however often and widely he opened his mouth to snatch it (ver. 13). The anger and jealousy of Edom are as vain (ver. 11) as the tears of Esau (Heb. xii. 17). Instead of μίσσησις, Edom exhibits perpetual enmity and his hatred.

5. Israel has now, on the contrary, eaten up Edom, incorporated it into itself by circumcision. Thus the two who were separated, finally come together. But the contest, which began even in their mother's womb, continues to the end. Jacob-Israel subdued the elder brother, but in this way the family of the Idumæan Herod obtained the Jewish sovereignty, and the persecution of the true Israel (Matt. ii. 13 sq.) was carried out to the full by the Edomite spirit of murder which took possession of the people (Matt. xxvii. 25). Because the Herodians favoured and imported Roman heathenism, the circus, wild-beast fights, etc., the conceptions of Edom and Rome run into each other in the later Jewish writers.

HOMILETIC HINTS.

Ver. 1 sq. After the blessing upon His people, and their revival and prosperity, comes now the contrast, namely, the curse upon the ungodly, and their desolation and miserable end.—“For who else are the Idumæans but Esau, who always persecutes Israel (Gal. iv. 20)? That rises up our hope when we are tried in the present. For if Christ is our Redeemer, He has redeemed us completely, and we have not to fear the ungodly. If suffering is a means to conduct us to the height of salvation, then the temporal prosperity of the wicked only increases the cause of their destruction; and one day there comes a change of affairs, when we experience the goodness of God, and they His deserved wrath” (HEIM-HOFFMANN).—“He who has God against him has also God's word against him” (RICHT.).—“The word of the Lord is a veritable treasury, out of which continually come forth things new and old. It leads into the past and the future, and would gladly have all applied to the present” (BERL. BIB.).

Ver. 3 sq. The hand of God is the solemn mark of interrogation over every earthly height to which we look up, whether things or persons.—“When punishments break in and are already taking their course, in this God as it were stretches out His hand. Now, since His hand is not shortened to help His children, so also it is not too weak to punish His enemies, Isa. lix. 1” (STARKE).—Desolateness is the lot of the wicked, for the world passes away with all its pleasure for man; but this comes in all its force only to him who was at home there, and set his confidence thereon.

Ver. 4. “When godliness goes out of cities, confusion and devastation enter in” (STARCK).—We can never sufficiently recognise that God alone is the Eternal.

Ver. 5. Where enmity leads to: it perpetuates itself by degrees in the heart, it is not afraid even to use the sword; first the malice of the tongue, and then the violence of malice.—Therefore always become reconciled at once and completely, that no roots may remain in the heart which may shoot up afterwards.—The prayer of an implacable man is certain not to be heard.—Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors.—“Woe unto you who are glad at evil to your neighbour and rejoice over his misfortune, Matt. v. 25” (TÜB. BIB.). “God makes finally an end of sin even when the sinner will not cease, and thus many a one has been hurried away by death in the midst of a course of sin. Hence all are not godly who cease to sin. When one has no longer the power, then he must cease, when otherwise he would be still very willing. In old age, in sickness, in imprisonment, in poverty, much must be dispensed with because hands and feet are bound, when in other circumstances there would be no want of will; in the will, however, above all consists the sin” (BERL. BIB.).

Ver. 6. God's judgment for blood over Edom an instructive example, a disclosure for warning.—Blood a peculiar sap.—The Lord an avenger of blood.—The track of blood behind so many celebrated figures in history, behind so many so-called great exploits.—The shedding of blood a characteristic symptom of the world, a mark of the spirit that rules in the world, and of the wickedness in which it lies.—Ver. 7 sq. Trade and intercourse cease where God sends His judgments.—“The Lord destroys nations that delight in war” (TÜB. BIB.).—Ver. 9. “Sin is not to become eternalized, therefore eternal punishment” (STARCK).—“God's aim is the acknowledgment in all things of His sole and supreme dominion” (STARKE).—Where sinners have dwelt, there punishment finally bears sway; not only Edom, but also Judæa serves as a visible example of this.—Ver. 10. Bear always in mind that God still is there!—Every sin against man is always at the same time sinning against God: unbelief, practical blasphemy.—Bloodthirstiness and covetousness two satanic sisters.—Disdain of others a non-recognition of God, who has bestowed something on every one.—The world's delight in blood, and also its contempt of believers, a proof how little the world knows what still holds together the earth under their feet.—The meek, however, shall, according to Matt. v., inherit the land.—“Most men speak and act as if God could neither hear nor see” (STARCK).—Ver. 11 sq. Wrath and jealousy, when proceeding from hatred, do not escape the divine judgment.—God beholds Himself in His people.—The revelation of God to His own is also at last the judgment over the world.—The omniscient and omnipresent, the incorruptible eye- and ear-witness.—Thirst for fresh territory an Edomitish characteristic.—The hatred against the sacred things of humanity now become the fashion.—Ver. 14 sq. Only the children of God shall inherit, although it doth not yet appear what we shall be, etc.—“The acceptable year of Jehovah is inseparably and necessarily connected with a day of vengeance of our God, Isa. lxi. 2. No true grace without justice. The theocracy must, accordingly, pass through the fire of affliction and become purified (ch. xxxiv.); for the same reason the heathenism whose iniquity is full must show that it has fallen under the divine justice. For grace is not toleration of the bad” (HÄVERNICK).

CHAPTER XXXVI.

- 1 And thou, son of man, prophesy to the mountains of Israel, and say,
 2 Mountains of Israel, hear the word of Jehovah. Thus saith the Lord
 Jehovah, Because the enemy says over you, Aha! and the everlasting 3 heights have become a possession for us; Therefore prophesy and say, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, Because, because "make desolate" ^[is said to you], and they snap after you round about, that ye may be ^[become] a possession to the remnant of the heathen, and ye are lifted up on the lip of the tongue and 4 are become a people's talk ^[a calumny]; Therefore, mountains of Israel, hear the word of the Lord Jehovah. Thus saith the Lord Jehovah to the mountains and to the hills, to the ravines and to the valleys, to the desolate ruins and to the forsaken cities, which have become a prey ^[booty] and a derision to 5 the remnant of the heathen who are round about; Therefore, thus saith the Lord Jehovah, Surely in the fire of My jealousy I have spoken regarding the remnant of the heathen and regarding the whole of Edom, who gave themselves My land for a possession, in joy of the whole heart, in contempt of 6 soul, on account of its pasturage, for a prey. Therefore prophesy concerning the land of Israel, and say to the mountains and to the hills, to the ravines and to the valleys, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, Behold, I, I have spoken in My jealousy and in My fury, because ye have borne the reproach of the 7 heathen; Therefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah, I, I have lifted up My hand; surely the heathen that are round about you, they shall bear their 8 shame. And ye mountains of Israel shall give your foliage and bear your 9 fruit to My people Israel; for they draw near to come. For, behold, I come 10 to you, and turn Myself to you, and ye are tilled and down. And I multiply upon you men, the whole house of Israel, all of it; and the cities are 11 inhabited and the ruins built. And I multiply upon you man and beast, and they multiply themselves and are fruitful, and I settle you ^{[make you in-} ^{habited]} as at your origin, yea, I do you good more than in your beginnings, 12 and ye know that I am Jehovah. And I make men walk over you, My people Israel, and they shall possess thee, and thou art to them for an in-13 heritance, and thou shalt no more make them childless. Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, Because they say to you, A devourer of men art thou, and hast made 14 thy people childless; Therefore shalt thou no more devour men, and no more 15 make thy people stumble,—sentence of the Lord Jehovah. And I will no more let be heard against ^[over] thee the reproach of the heathen, and thou shalt no more bear the contumely ^[mockery, scorn] of the nations, and shalt no 16 more make thy people stumble,—sentence of the Lord Jehovah. And the 17 word of Jehovah came to me, saying, Son of man, the house of Israel were dwelling on their land, and they defiled it by their way and by their works, as the uncleanness of the monthly separation was their way before Me.
 18 And I poured out My fury upon them on account of the blood which they 19 shed upon the land, and by their foul idols defiled they it. And I dispersed them among the heathen, and they were scattered in the lands; according to 20 their way and according to their works have I judged them. And it came to the heathen whither they came, and they profaned the name of My holiness, since it was said of them, Jehovah's people are these, and out of His land 21 have they gone forth. And I felt pity for the name of My holiness, which they, the house of Israel, profaned among the heathen whither they came.
 22 Therefore say to the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, Not for your sakes act I, O house of Israel, but on account of the name of My 23 holiness, which ye profaned among the heathen whither ye came. And I sanctify My name, the great, the profaned among the heathen, which ye profaned in their midst, and the heathen know that I am Jehovah,—sentence of the Lord Jehovah,—when I sanctify Myself on ^[in] you before their ^[your] eyes.
 24 And I take you out of the heathen, and gather you out of all lands, and

25 bring you into your land. And I sprinkle upon you clean water, and ye become clean from all your defilements [uncleanlinesses, ver. 17 .q.], and from all your 26 foul idols will I cleanse you. And I give you a new heart, and a new spirit will I put within you, and I take away the heart of stone out of your 27 flesh and give you a heart of flesh. And My Spirit will I put within you, and cause that ye shall walk in My statutes, and keep and do My judgments.
28 And ye dwell in the land which I have given to your fathers, and are to Me
29 a people, and I will be to you a God. And [yea] I help you from all your defilements, and I call to the corn and multiply it, and will not send upon 30 you hunger. And I multiply the fruit of the tree, and the produce of the field, that ye may no longer have to bear the reproach of hunger among the 31 heathen. And ye remember your evil ways, and your doings that were not good, and loathe your own faces for your iniquities and for your abomina-
32 tions. Not for your sakes act I,—sentence of the Lord Jehovah,—be it known to you; be ashamed, yea, shame yourselves away from your ways, O house 33 of Israel. Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, In the day of My cleansing you from all your iniquities, I make the cities inhabited, and the ruins shall be 34 built. And the desolated [devastated] land shall be cultivated, instead of being 35 a waste in the eyes of every passer-by. And they say, This land, the desolated, is become as the garden of Eden, and the ruined and desolated and 36 demolished cities are securely inhabited. And the heathen that are left round about you know that I, Jehovah, built the demolished [cities], and 37 planted the desolated [land]; I, Jehovah, spoke and did. Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, I will still in regard to this let Myself be inquired of by the house of Israel to do it for them; I will multiply them in men as a flock.
38 As a flock of sacred rites, as the flock of Jerusalem in her festal seasons, so shall the ruined cities be full of flocks of men, and they know that I am Jehovah.

["In this chapter we have a continuation of the present great theme of the prophet—Israel's prospective revival and prosperity as the Lord's covenant-people. But it treats of this under different aspects. In the first section (vers. 1-15) the prophet unfolds the essential distinction between Israel and Edom with the other nations of heathendom, in that the former had, what the others had not, an interest in the power and faithfulness of God, in consequence of which Israel's heritage must revive and flourish, and the hopes of the heathen concerning it must be disappointed. In the next section (vers. 16-21) the reason is given why the Lord had for a time acted toward His land and people as if their connection with Him was an evil rather than a blessing; it is traced up to the incorrigible wickedness of the people, and the necessity of God's vindicating the cause of His holiness by exercising upon them the severity of His displeasure. Then in another section (vers. 22-33) the purpose of the Lord for their future good is unfolded—His purpose for His own name's sake to revive His cause among His people, and that in the most effectual manner, by first renewing their hearts to holiness, and then by restoring them to a flourishing condition outwardly. And in a short concluding section (vers. 34-38) the general result is summed up, and the impressions noticed which the whole was fitted to produce upon the minds of others."—FAIRBAIRN'S Ezekiel, p. 386. —W. F.]

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

Vers. 1-15. The Mountains of Israel.

After that ch. xxxv., which is connected with the one that follows as antithesis and thesis, has already (ver. 12) introduced the mountains of Israel, parallel to Mount Seir (again ch. xxxv. 15 for the last time), and reminding us of ch. vi. (comp. also ch. xxxiii. 28), as that to which the prophecy before us is directly addressed, they now form the immediate theme of the divine sayings.

Ver. 1. הָאֵל, see on ch. vi. 2. Here, too, by the mountains of Israel it is not the land that is characterized after its most prominent part, but, as ver. 2 will immediately show, the mountains come into consideration according to their religious signification for Israel.—Ver. 2. The phrase: thus saith the Lord Jehovah, which, when one cannot put one's self in the position of those concerned, is repeated to weariness in our chapter, belongs to its peculiarities. It is intended not only to contradict the saying of the adversary, but still more to contravene what the poor doubting heart itself says, when looking at that which the eyes see; at the same time the divine comfort appears in presence of this visibility as a comfort solely in word, as correspondingly in the closing part of the chapter the name of the Lord will come forth above all.—The enemy is, as the word implies, he who turns himself against any one, in the connection here Edom (ch. xxxv. 10), but in the signification developed ch. xxxv.; hence, as we go on farther, illustrated also by the heathen round about (ver. 5; ch. xxv. 3, 8, 12).—Comp. on ch. xxv. 3. That the everlasting heights refer primarily to the temple is clear; at the same time, however, Zion will have to be viewed as the seat of the everlasting royal dominion. "An allusion to the inmost and most tender feelings of Israel" (SCHMIEDER). [Hävernick refers to Gen. xlix. 26 (Deut. xxxiii. 15), according to which the mountains are held to stand in relation to the promises of Israel as imperishable memorials of the patriarch's blessing. HENGST.: The natural mountains as a figure of the unchangeable grandeur of which Israel boasted, because it had in the Eternal its protector and the guarantee of its own perpetuity (Ps. cxxv. 2).]—Ch. xxxv. 10.—Ver. 3. Ewald directs attention to the first five repetitions of therefore, because the grounds against these enemies always press on anew before the discourse becomes calmer, and will have it observed that, as in ch. v. 12 sq., sacred numbers (ch. iii. 5) fit into one another, and that in various ways, as for most certain assurance; there is a threefold address to the mountains; and the assignment of reasons has five steps in its process.—Ch. xxi. 14, xxxiii. —וְיָרֵן, see ch. xiii. 10.—שִׁפּוֹת (Ewald, for the inf. Kal of שָׁפַת transitive: "to devastate." [Ewald: "they snap and puff at you round about." Hitzig: "they puff and snap after you," under a mistaken comparison of Isa. xlii. 14 from נָשַׁם.] Now if it cannot be rendered: "they devastate you" (KEIL), and will scarcely be rendered, with Hengst.: "ye are devastated," then perhaps the most obvious thing is, in accordance with ch. xxxv. 12, 14 sq., to think of the standing: "make desolate," "desolation"! They appear to the enemy round about as a morsel ready for swallowing, that they are already a possession for the remnant of the heathen, as מִפְּרִי is more definitely explained to be. The presupposition in שִׁפּוֹת (what remains after defeat) is the judgment inflicted by the Chaldeans. As with a little brotherly love the injury received would have kept them back, so with their enmity against Israel it goaded them on to commit still farther injury to indemnify themselves on Israel.—וַיַּעֲלֶה, according to Rosenm., imperf. Niph. from עָלָה (to be lifted or taken up); according to Ewald, intransitive imperf. Kal from עָלָה (Aramaic, "to press in,"

"to go in"); according to Hitzig, 2d plur. Kal from עָלָה, for וַיַּעֲלֶה ("ye are gone up"). The lip as instrument, the tongue as originator; the former having as its parallel calumny, and the latter, people; so that שִׁפּוֹת is not = talk, and לִשָּׁן not a personification for talkers, as Klief. thinks, yet it need not be tautology (Gesen.), or לִשָּׁן = speech, people (HÄVERN.).—Ver. 4. (Ch. vi. 3. ("The mountains are for the land what the heads of the tribes are for the people, as it were the elders, the venerable fathers of the land, to whom the word of the Lord which is applicable to the whole land is announced," SCHMIEDER.) The mention of particulars is meant to point to the eye which observes all, the divine care which beholds each and all, over which only a human eye weeps, or on the contrary rejoices. As a prey points back to the beginning of ver. 3, so a derision points to its close.—Ver. 5. The fire of my jealousy reminds of ch. xxxv. 11.—Ch. xxxv. 15.—Ch. xxv. and xxxv. also testify that Jehovah has spoken in this manner.—Comp. ch. xxv. 6, 5, although the application here is somewhat different. Ewald: "in mortal contempt." Hitzig: "contempt from the soul" (?).—מִן־יָשָׁרָה, according to Gesenius, an Aramaic infinitive from יָשַׁר, "in order to empty it (the uninhabited land) for a prey." But what would be still there to empty? Ewald's translation: "in order to drive it out for pillage," is quite as unsuitable. Hitzig does better, taking it as a substantive, but wrongly in the sense of "produce," and according to a peculiar construction translating: "in order to plunder (לָבֵן) its produce." HENGST. (COCC.): "that its environs should be a prey to them." But which environs?

Ausf.-Lehrb. 8th ed. p. 611), according to Gesenius, properly nom. verbale, but here only of the land! Hence he is obliged to substitute the capital as the centre! The signification pasturage would at least be simpler; and the emptied land is in keeping with this, and is consequently a desirable prey. [Many interpret also: "on account of the expulsion of the land" (land for people), ch. xxxi. 11, whereby it (now again the land) has become a prey.]—Ver. 6.

עַל-אֶרְצָהּ, hence as the native home of Israel, with precursory reference to the return of the people, ver. 8 sq., 28 sq.—Partly a repetition of ver. 4.—Ver. 5. The reproach is to be understood of words (invectives, vers. 3, 4) as well as of deeds.—Ver. 7. Ch. xx. 5. The attitude of swearing, yet not that alone, but also a sign of the intended action.—The roles shall change. Ver. 6, ch. xvi. 52. Upon the heathen the reproach shall abide, but not upon the land which they have thus reproached to its inhabitants!—Ver. 8. The honour to be restored to the land is represented as the causing of it to yield leaves and fruit; Hengst. thinks: leaves and branches as food for cattle, while the fruit is for man.—קָרְבוּ לְבָנָא can only be the individuals concerned of the people. "Of the seventy years of Jeremiah, twenty had already elapsed (ch. xxxiii. 21)" (HÄVERN.).—Ver. 9. Because hitherto (as late as ch. xxxiv. 10) employed in a hostile sense, an explanation follows the הִנְנִי אֵל (Deut.

xi. 12). The sowing shows that the work of cultivation is the subject spoken of, hence already with reference to men.—Ver. 10. Then farther in correspondence with the cultivation of the land is the peopling of it.—כָּל-בְּרִית בְּלָהָ.

antithesis to ch. xxxv. 15.—Ver. 4.—Ver. 11. To the men also cattle.—Gen. i. 23. "A new creation-blessing, as it were" (HÄVERN.). The more than indicates the figurative in the manner of expression (Deut. xxx. 5), as does also the fact that the mountains are addressed.—Ver. 12 rounds off as commerce (וְהוֹלִכְתִּי) what has been said of the peopling, after there has previously been a rural population with tilling of fields and rearing of cattle, and a town population with building of ruins; and the mention is made of the abiding, enduring possession of the land (לְנִחְלָה, as inheritance).—וְדָ, what must be meant is the land, mountains and all; masc., which אָרֶץ (ver. 5) may be also, as afterwards

fem. gen.—The make childless, said of the land, may also be referred to the wild beasts introduced in consequence of its desolation (ch. v. 17, xiv. 15).—Ver. 13. What is here said has in reality as little to do with Num. xiii. 32 (observe, however, the statement of motive there) as with 2 Kings ii. 24 (a mere particular case). The promised land was neither in itself of such a kind (Deut. viii. 7 sq., xi. 10 sq.), nor, without giving a forced meaning, can we, with Hengst., understand a reference to its position between Asiatic and African powers; but what is here said to the mountains of Israel (as previously, ver. 12, of the land) is directed against the reproach, the scorn of the heathen (ver. 15), who would draw an inference from the desolation of the capital against its holy character as this land of divine promise. The reference here made to Num. xiii. can only be this, that what the adversaries say appears as a repetition of the unbelieving speech of those spies (אֶרֶץ אֲכֵלֶת יְהוֹשִׁבִי), with which they brought out דִּבַּת הָאָרֶץ (comp. here ver. 3);

hence here somewhat in the sense of: Israel should have stayed away from it, not have come into the land, not have trod on the trap (bird-lime) of the promise. [EWALD: "an exterminator of men art thou, and an unnatural mother of thy people wast thou." HÄVERN.: "a swallower of men," and "making nations (Israel and Judah) childless." Hitzig observes: שָׁבֵל is said of a mother—to bring children dead into the world, or to kill them afterwards. But is it, then, the children of the land, and not rather of the inhabitants, that are here spoken of?] The land is desolation, fit now only for pasture (ver. 5), thinks and says the surrounding heathen world. In opposition to this there was forcibly set forth the cultivation of the land already and the peopling of it with men, to whom the cattle (ver. 11) were only an adjunct; also the rebuilding of the ruins, in view, however, of the cities being again inhabited (ver. 10). But the sight of the desolation of the land took this general form in the mind and the mouth of the heathen, that this promised land consumes those who receive it, and especially that it can be no possession for their children, and consequently no inheritance. Comp. on this what was said in reference to the wilderness, Num. xiv. 16; Deut. ix. 28; Exod. xxxii. 12 sq. (Ezek. xx.). To this repeated reproaching, which is at the same time a reproaching of the name of Jehovah as the promiser of the land,—especially, however, to the second part of it (vers. 12, 13), the making childless, a statement immediately, ver. 12, explained perfectly by: and thou art to them for an inheritance,—ver. 14 forms a parallel, with repetition only of the phrase: to devour men. The alliterative (כָּשֵׁל, Piel instead of שָׁבֵל), "making to stumble (to fall)," of the Kethib is significant, for thus is brought to view what the heathen standpoint of reproach so entirely overlooked, what, when the promised land had to be spoken of, should have been said of its abundance and beauty, namely, that thereby, by the misuse of its resources, it had been the occasion of Israel's sin and downfall; and thus also a preparation is already made for speaking of, first, the profaning, and then the sanctifying of the name of Jehovah treated of in the course of the chapter. (KEIL: "if the consuming of the population stands connected with the stumbling, then the people are devoured by the consequences of their sins, that is, by judicial punishments, sterility, pestilence, and war," etc.) And inasmuch as Israel is now to possess the land abidingly, hence in his descendants, שָׁבֵל, "to make childless," is accordingly not repeated. This decides as completely as possible against the Qeri תִּשְׁבֵּלְךָ (also against Hitzig); while, moreover, כָּשֵׁל is repeated in ver. 15 without Qeri in the Hiphil. [Hengst.

understands the stumbling in the sense of the Qeri, and evidently under the influence of Hitzig's absurd objection, as signifying "to make unfortunate"!—Ver. 15. According to another translation: "and I will no longer make thee hear" (KEIL).—Vers. 6, 3, 4.

Vers. 16–38. Profanation of the Name of Jehovah by Israel (vers. 16–21), and Sanctification of it by Jehovah Himself (vers. 22–38).

Ver. 16. A new word of God, but, as we have seen, prepared for by what has preceded (vers. 14, 15).—Ver. 17 begins with a retrospect into the moral history of the house of Israel, for which comp. Lev. xviii. 28; Num. xxxv. 34; Jer. ii. 7.—Their way, their walk, as the expression their works explains (ch. xiv. 22, 23), and כְּטִמְאָתָא renders still more clear. נִדְּחָה (from נָדַח) is: "rejection" = abhorrence, abomination, ch. vii. 19 sq.; then: separation = purification, especially the monthly purification of a woman by separation, issue of blood (Lev. xv.). Gesen., on the other hand, explains the word by "uncleanness," i.e. an unclean issue of blood. Comp. besides Isa. lxiv. 5 [6]. Yet not, however, as the "most loathsome uncleanness" (KEIL)—it is in reality the natural peculiarity of woman—but the comparison appears to be used on account of the blood, as ver. 18 makes obvious. Concerning the tenses comp. Hitzig. In ver. 17 a habitual state in the past, on which the action in ver. 18 breaks in. Ch. vii. 8.—Ch. xxii. 3, 6, xxxiii. 25.—Comp. on ch. vi. 4 (ch. viii. 10). "Murder and idolatry, with reference to the first commandment of the first table and the first of the second" (HENGST.).—Ver. 19. Ch. xxii. 15.—Ch. vii. 3, 8.—Ver. 20. The singular is interpreted by Hengst. of the fate spoken of in ver. 19, namely, the news (!) of it, although he goes on giving the following turn: the news came at the same time with themselves; they were the embodied intelligence. Keil understands it more simply as meaning the house of Israel. Hitzig, like the ancient versions, reads the plural, which, however, should be doubly avoided. That they themselves came to the heathen is repeatedly expressed in what follows, and that for the very purpose of explaining the fact therewith connected, the actual profanation of the name of the Lord by Israel's presence there. As in their own land, so also outside of it. The name of My holiness is not simply: the holy name of Jehovah, but the name in which His holiness is manifest, so that by it man names His holiness, and hence the Holy God Himself. The profanation is traced home to the Jews as originators, as occasion of the saying which follows; and hence it is said indefinitely בְּאֵמֶר לָהֶם, so that the heathen, who certainly also desecrated the name of Jehovah in their mouth, are yet not looked upon as the desecrators of the name of His holiness, but the Jews [HENGST.: "not by their doing, Rom. ii. 24, but by their suffering, because they had brought on the fate by their active desecration"], who, moreover, unrepentingly remained silent concerning their sin and guilt. They just came where they came; and with their impenitence gave there the impression merely of wretched, unfortunate, deceived, betrayed beings, in whom the blame was not to be sought, but in their God, who was powerless in comparison with the gods of the heathen, or unfaithful to His chosen people.—עַם has also been interpreted interrogatively by various expositors.—אֵיךְ is as much as to say: and they have run away out of Jehovah's land which He had promised to them, where He dwelt among them; so that their having gone might be ironically held as a voluntary departure.—Ver. 21.

הִקְלַח is: to draw one's self together, to bend over (עָל) any one, to incline one's self to him; hence: to compassionate him. [HÄVERN. wrongly: "and I spared for My holy name's sake" (Sept.). The Vulgate is confused. ROSENEM.: "I will take care for it, so that it shall not come to harm." In this striking expression also lies something more active than: "to have compassion" (KILIER.), or as HENGST.: "I had pity for My," sq.] What follows shows what is contained in this prophetic preterite.

Ver. 22. There is first the announcement, which is at the same time an explanation of the divine pity, as His pitying of Himself in harmony with His holiness, in short, as a holy love,—an explanation which cuts off everything possible with men. The self-existent majesty of the Holy One of Israel, who stands in need of no one, says: לֹא לְמַעַנְכֶם (Deut. ix. 6). Neither in Israel's virtue, nor yet in his misery, is there now any ground for Jehovah to act. Israel has no qualification whatever.—אֲנִי עֹשֶׂה, namely, what I do,—thus spoken absolutely, denoting the pure action, just as is specially suitable here.

He does it, however, for glory and honour to הוֹדוֹ, dat. comm.) His name.—Ver. 23. The "acting" of Jehovah is expressed and here announced as a sanctifying, i.e. of My holiness as expressed in My name, securing due weight to it, so that it shall not simply be named as name, but evidently experienced as fact. In its being the name of His holiness lies the necessity, when the people who can thus name God do not sanctify it, but on the contrary only contribute everywhere to its profanation, that then Jehovah should take it upon hand the sanctification of His name and thereby of Himself (בְּהַקְדִּישִׁי).—הַנִּדְּחָה, together with the following הַמְחַלֵּל, makes observable the infinite

grandeur as well as the omnipotence which are able to secure due regard for themselves (Josh. vii. 9; Mal. i. 11). That we might well expect: "before their (instead of: before your) eyes," which reading is almost universally preferred, Hengst. also acknowledges, but finds, however, the thought of the manifest salvation better expressed in those immediately concerned. These, however, are not the Jews, because they have beheld the misery (Job xix. 27), but the heathen as spectators of the profanation of the divine name by the Jews (ch. xx. 41, xxviii. 25). The Jews' part in the matter is sufficiently expressed by בְּכֶם (in your persons).

["The expression: 'when I sanctify Myself in you before your eyes,' for which many critical authorities, both ancient and modern, would substitute 'before their eyes,' namely, those of the heathen—this expression creates no difficulty to a person who enters thoroughly into the import of the passage. For it points to the fact that Israel, as well as the heathen, needed the manifestation in question of Jehovah's righteousness. It must be done first before the eyes of the people, who by their depravity had lost sight of God's real character; and then what was seen by them experimentally would also be seen reflectively by the heathen who dwelt around. This twofold perception of God's character is also brought out in other passages of our prophet; as in ch. xx. 41, 42: 'And I will be sanctified in you before the eyes of the heathen, and ye shall know that I am Jehovah.'—FAIRBAIRN'S Ezekiel.—W. F.]

Ver. 24. The first thing in this self-sanctification of Jehovah is an act of power, which puts an end to the outward occasion for the saying in ver. 20, and to the actual profanation of the name of His holiness among the heathen (ch. xi. 17, xx. 34, 41).—Ver. 25. The next thing, to which the first only subserves, is the raising up of Israel inwardly to a holy nation, so that כֹּהֲנִים (ver. 23)

signifies: in them, as well as: on them; this, too, is a forthputting, yea, the most mighty forthputting of power, because wrought in the core of the national life. In ver. 24, Israel's justification before the heathen; in ver. 25, Israel's sanctification in himself as also among the heathen.—The "sprinkling," as it will be in respect to a nation the only imaginable method of lustration, so, moreover, from the clean water מֵי־טָהוֹרִים

cannot be = נָדָה (מי) it cannot in the least point to the rite with the ashes, Num. xix. (HENGST.); it would be preferable, with Hävern., to think of Num. viii. 7 sq., but מֵי הַטָּהוֹרִים there also is something different from what clean water expresses here. The latter is meant expressly to symbolize the idea of purification, and specially from all etc., the פְּחוּתֵיכֶם of the people, which, if not directly explained, is yet illustrated by נָדָה; the "sprinkling," again (comp. Exod.

xxiv.), is doubtless meant to signify an act of consecration. Because sacrificial blood is not mentioned here, but such emphasis is laid on clean water, the best known means of purification, and also the most suitable for stains which show outwardly, we are as little at liberty to import without farther mediation—as Hengst. attempts under citation of Isa. liii. 11, lii. 15—New Testament ideas into our chapter as into ch. xi. 19 sq. (see Comm. there). Neither does Ps. li. coincide with our passage. The immediate sense of our verse is: That Jehovah leads back Israel from exile into their own land, and consecrates them there to be a people, since the punishment, so characteristic for the sin that occasioned it, is shown to be removed by the bringing of them again into their own land; the forgiveness of sin thereby already proclaimed at once evinces and manifests itself as purification of the people, and the people (as in point of fact took place after the exile) put from them their old life, especially their idolatry (ch. xi. 18, xviii. 31). Certainly not without some ground has Abarbanel referred back to the comparison of the issue of blood used in ver. 17.—As to how ver. 26 is to be understood, comp. on ch. xi. 19. Instead of the new heart here, לֵב אָחָד is mentioned there, and only the "new spirit" is spoken of; while here both heart and spirit (as ch. xviii. 31) appear as new, whereby the religious moral regeneration of the nation, a national restoration, is placed in prospect. "It is very consonant to the priestly character to portray the new community as a truly spiritually purified band of Levites or priests, Isa. lxi. 6" (HÄVERN. ?).—Ver. 27. Since Jehovah's Spirit is put בְּקִרְבָּנְכֶם, and thus is brought to pass that Israel's conformity to law in walk and honesty of dealing return again, therefore the "new spirit" of ver. 26 is primarily to be understood as a divine spiritual impulse back to the law of Jehovah (ch. xi. 20).—Ver. 28. By the dwelling in the land, etc. (the "renewal of old gifts"), we are reminded of the close of ch. xxxiv. [Kliefoth here looks forward as far as the "last times," since God will gather out of the whole world His people, who are still scattered in a quite different manner and far wider in the world, and will place them in the heavenly Canaan, free them absolutely from sin (ver. 25), and as absolutely renew them inwardly (ver. 26), and by both acts as absolutely sanctify them (ver. 27).] Comp. Lev. xxv. 18, xxvi. 12.

Ver. 29. הוֹשָׁעֵתִי is by anticipation understood Messianically (Matt. i. 21) by those resolved to find the New Testament ordo salutis in Ezekiel, interpreted of the divine protection (ch. xxxiv. 22), or, by way of distinction from ver. 25, referred to the consequences of the defilements of Israel. The expression rather sums up the foregoing, which regarded the people, while now, subjoined to ver. 28, a transition is made to the land. Idolatry disappears, and the promises concerning the land are fulfilled, ch. xxxiv. 29. (The opposite, although in the same figure, we find in 2 Kings viii. 1).—Ver. 30. Ch. xxxiv. 27, 29.—Ver. 31. Ch. xx. 43; comp. on ch. vi. 9. The anti-heathen abhorrence and loathing became national, and still speaks out of its distorted pietism in Pharisaism. If the gospel order of salvation were to be sought in ver. 25 sq., then we would rather expect to find here joy in the Holy Ghost (Lev. xxvi. 40).—Ver. 32. Comp. on ver. 22.—That this acting of Jehovah, irrespective of them, is still so particularly placed before and inculcated on them, is, however, by no means designed to leave the Jews undisturbed, as if they might simply wait for the things which would come upon them and happen to them; but as the love of God, without worthiness deserving it, certainly excludes any merit on the part of man, yet should so much the more awaken to reception and love in return, so there is attached to the promise here the imperative, repeated with additional emphasis, in relation to the family, the household of Israel.

Ver. 33. Ver. 25.—Hitzig translates הוֹשָׁעֵתִי: "then I again erect the cities," make them to sit instead of lying, since he denies that it ever (Isa. liv. 3) signifies: "to make inhabited." So also Hengstenberg always: "sit," in contrast to: lie prostrate, and here: "cause to sit." Gesenius, Ewald, etc., on the other hand, support the causative signification, as: to cause that one sit, dwell therein, to make inhabited. KEIL: make stocked with inhabitants.—Ver. 34. Ver. 9.—Ch.

xxxv. 3, vi. 14.—Ch. v. 14.—Ver. 35. וְאֵלֶּיךָ are those individualized from כָּל־עֹזְבֶיךָ, ver. 34.

(הִלָּךְ only here, = הִלָּקָה, but probably fem.)

Observe the antithesis to ch. xxxv. 12, 9, and the probable allusion in Eden to Edom (ch. xxxi. 8, 9; Gen. xiii. 10; Isa. li. 3; Joel ii. 3). From this allegorical way of speaking, Hengstenberg justly rejects the idea of "the restoration of Canaan to a really paradisaic glory."—EWALD: "flourish, well fortified." HENGST.: "sit fortified;" whereas a city whose wall is broken lies on the ground. According to another translation, said of the inhabitants, who feel themselves secure, protected therein as in fortresses. (Comp. on ch. xxxviii. 11.)—Ver. 36. The heathen brought in as left ("the remnant of the heathen," ver. 3) are, on the contrary, made known only by the judgments that have passed over them, but by no restitution. Comp. ch. xvii. 24.—Ver. 37.

Ch. xiv. 3 (1 Sam. xxviii. 6, 7). On לְעֵשׂ לָהֶם.

32, 22).—The land—well, we are again in it, but where are the people? This question Jehovah will answer by actual (לְעֹשׂוֹת) increase (ver. 10 sq.), in that He will show them as a flock (ch. xxxiv. ; Micah ii. 12). [While Hitzig takes אֲדָם as in apposition to אֲתָם (them, the men, as a flock), Kliefoth translates incorrectly: "that they became the flock of mankind."] Hävernick cites Bochart for the particularly great increase of flocks of sheep. (Comp. also ch. xxxiv. 31.) But what Ver. 38 says on this is more significant. According to Hengstenberg, formal mention is made of the festivals in general, but the connection (as Mark xv. 6) points to the great accumulation of sheep at the passover (2 Chron. xxxv. 7), with which the abundance in men of restored Israel is compared. (Thus the Chaldee.) Hengstenberg translates: "as consecrated flocks of sheep" (the people of the saints of the Lord), and seeks the fulfilment in the Church of Christ rather than in the times between the exile and Christ.—קִרְשִׁים, that is, of hallowed ones, in this sense: of sacrificial beasts (Rom. xii. 1); whereby the reference to the consecration of the people (ver. 25) gains confirmation. The people is embraced in its chief points of worship, Deut. xvi. 16.

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. The comparison of our chapter with ch. vi. indicates that, in considering the "mountains of Israel," especially when they are by the best interpreter, the "enemy," sneeringly termed the "everlasting heights," we are not to direct our attention to the mountainous character of the Holy Land. Palestine is a hilly country, which leans upon the towering heights of Lebanon and Hermon; but this conformation did not so much qualify it for its significance in the Old World, so that we might at once recur to that, as its position on the boundaries of Asia, Africa, and Europe, and again its peculiar isolation, while occupying such a position in the centre of the Old World. In considering this position of the land, its littleness, ridiculed as is well known by Cicero, and from which the Roman statesman would infer the little god of the Jews, has as little, or rather as much, to say as the grain of mustard seed in the parable, Matt. xiii. The focus of the concave mirror is, in like manner, merely a point. The outward littleness of the Holy Land only compels us to one thing, and that is, to keep always in view its spiritual significance. As, then, for such a view, its separation from the other countries, and again, at the same time, its position in the midst of them (ch. v. 5) (the former, that amid the universal blowing of the world and the nations there might be a protecting hand before the light; the latter, that when the light burst forth, its brilliancy might easily shine in all directions), claim our attention much more than its mountainous character,—so under the "everlasting heights," the "mountains of Israel," Zion, as seat of the Davidic-Messianic kingdom (Ps. ii.), and the temple-mountain, in so far as Israel worshipped what it knew (John iv.), and the עֲרֻשָׁה in עַד־וְעַד־וְעַד־וְעַד, must come into consideration (ch. xxxiv. 26; Isa. ii. 2; Micah iv. 1); however beautifully that reads which has been said by Schmiedeknecht, accordant, no doubt, with "natural human feeling," while citing Ps. xc. 2 and Job xv. 7, and referring to the "ways and manners of mountaineers," and the thread of "remembrances," especially Israel's (Gen. xxii. ; 1 Kings xviii.).

2. The antithesis of Seir places before our eyes the rugged mountain height and the rude mountain strength, that is, exactly the things which have no value for enduring victory, for abiding blessing in the higher order of things.

3. The combating of the allegorizing method of explanation—for example, by J. A. Crusius, from whom Rosenmüller quotes when commenting on our chapter—is unquestionably in the right against the arbitrary extravagances and exaggerations of Cocceus and his followers; but where the Bible language in general is symbolical, with the prophets, above all, a symbolical way of speaking will be conceded. A natural or historical substratum on which the symbolical is based is supposed with the symbolical itself. Consequently, all that is here said in Ezekiel has a fulfilment in the time after the exile. On the other hand, modern apocalypticism, by its converting the letter of prophecy into future revelations of any and every kind, sets itself against the apocalyptic mode of expression, the characteristic of which is certainly not literality. The national physiognomy of Israel, as Genesis traces it back to Adam, the father of all men, indicates a reference to humanity as a whole. This reference prevails in Noah's prophetic discourse, Gen. ix., when Japhet is destined to dwell in the tents of Shem, and Canaan, the son of Ham, to be a servant in the house. The Holy Land fits in with Abraham to this symbolism of the nation, and Abraham is to be a blessing (as is said in Gen. xii. : "to all the families of the earth, Adamah"), through his seed, which is Christ, as the apostle says in Gal. iii. Hence humanity in Christ will also be the theological point of view in the case of the land of Israel. So long as He who is εἰς εὐαγγέλιον (Rom. x. 4) was not born in the land of promise, the land remained, in respect to the realization of the blessing of Abraham to the race of Adam, a prophetic symbol of the earth, just as the nation was symbolico-prophetic for the nations of mankind.

The land of Israel is also requis (from requis), and, like the legal nationality of Israel, has its final fulfilment in Christ. As His beatitudes (Matt. v.) assign to His people the kingdom of heaven, so also do they the inheritance of the land. Hitherto out of Israel shines humanity, and representatively for it the Son of man, the true Israel. The Christian interpretation of the people of Israel as the Church, the kingdom of God, the kingdom of heaven, embraces now also the Holy Land in the signification of the land of glory, paradise, and Eden. From the standpoint of the fulfilling of Israel as to its universal human signification by Christ, the Old Testament outward expression of the letter, that is, what is said propædæutically and pedagogically in accordance with the economy of the Old Covenant, in the style of the people and the land, may remain in its full force; but what is given with the idea of Israel, namely, that the promises in question are to be fulfilled in a very different sense from the outward literal sense, that they are to be fulfilled "in spirit and in truth,"—this even the literal expression itself demands from its unmistakable depth of meaning, which often makes plainly ridiculous a merely literal interpretation, whether looking to the time after the exile, or to the very last time. All the prophets and the law prophesied until John, the baptizer of Christ (Matt. xi. 13; Luke xvi. 16). And what Christ said (John iv.) of worshipping at Jerusalem: "the hour cometh, and now is," bears witness to the Messianic (Christological) and in general the spiritual sense of the Old Testament letter; as the setting of it free from every temporary limitation as to place or nation bears witness to its sense for eternity, and to the spiritual interpretation as that which is at the same time interpretation "in truth," the true understanding, so that the Christian truth of the prophecies is also to be regarded as their true and full reality. The Jewish Christianity of individual expositors (e.g. of Baumgarten) is not the Old Testament Christianity of the prophets.

4. On ch. iii. 17 the characteristic individualization was noted as a mark of the time; but that which is peculiar to the Christological utterances of our prophet (Intro. § 9), his putting of the Christological thought, as ch. xl. sq., in the form of Palestinian worship, and so generally in the manner of the people and land of Israel, is always to be adhered to. Fundamentally, the latter form was only that of the law as early as Ex. xx. 12. But when the Son of man, of the seed of David according to the flesh, realized the kingdom of Israel as eternal—when, by the outpouring of the Holy Ghost, His gift of prophecy became the common property of mankind, then, as with the worshipping in spirit and in truth, the peculiar localization of the sanctuary and the priestly service, always accomplished for the time, ceased; Israel also could, in whatever part of the earth, consider themselves as in their own land, and so much the more as their true King had (John xviii.) witnessed the good confession of the supramundane nature of His kingdom before the representative of the Roman earthly world-power. For the Israel of fulfilment Canaan lay, in the first instance, in the world above with Christ, as the apostle Paul says in Phil. i. 23, where also paradise is (Luke xxiii. 43; 2 Cor. xii. 4); and in this world only, in the renewal of heaven and earth according to the Christian hope. So, likewise, the true, the fulfilled nationality of Israel is to be sought for in the Christian world, in humanity, according to the Spirit of Christ; now in measure, in fulness only hereafter, Rev. xxi. 3.

5. Schmieder sums up the moral guilt of Edom as threefold: (1) taking possession at his own hand; (2) doing this in a bad frame of mind, with malignant joy and scornful laughter; (3) doing this not to keep and cultivate the land (for which man was ordained of God in paradise), but to devastate and plunder it.

6. It belongs to the local colour of the land, that, when it is spoken of distinctively, its fruitfulness also is spoken of. Comp. for climate and nature of the soil, the well-known passages of Scripture. Writers in the first century still bear witness to what heathens and Jews of former times celebrated with one accord, the immense population of the land, corresponding to its great fertility. At present, indeed, Jerusalem, the largest city of Palestine, has scarcely more inhabitants than the smaller towns of Galilee had in the time of Josephus.

7. On the parallel minatory prophecy in ch. vi. it was observed (p. 94) how Israel's idolatrous self-righteousness is broken in pieces in every way by God's judgment. A parallel observation will correspond to the kernel and inmost contents of our chapter, namely, that divine grace alone will restore Israel, land and people—the latter especially, in the way of Jehovah's sanctifying His own name. In this, Israel's misery is as little the motive as any righteousness on the side of Israel. What befalls the heathen, indeed, with respect to Israel, happens to them because they have insulted in His people the name of Jehovah revealed in Israel. Hence the fundamental reference which Jehovah takes is finally Himself. Israel, as has been repeatedly said, four times in succession (in the cosmic number, vers. 20–23), gave by their exile, and hence by their misery, occasion for the profanation of the name of Jehovah. Their misery made the heathen sin against Jehovah; thus it was viewed, but by no means as cause of the divine pity. What is said of pity is Jehovah's pity for His own name, ver. 21. The divine love appears not as compassion in relation to misery, but the misery itself appears as sin, so that the reference is taken simply to sin; the divine love appears purely as grace.

8. Hävernick emphasizes this, that "the holiness of God forms the centre of the discourse before us;" but he makes too little account of the holiness of Jehovah, when he makes no more of it than "the relation therein established of God to the evil." So also it is not acutely thought, when, in explanation of vers. 1–15, that "the punitive judgment threatened against the heathen must have its ultimate explanation" from the holiness of God, Hävernick places the essence of heathenism in assailing the holiness of God. It must be observed, however, that heathenism knows nothing of God's holiness. The name of Jehovah's holiness, as the expression, chosen three times in succession (according to the number of the godhead, vers. 20, 21, 22), and which is not to be resolved into the "holy name of Jehovah," significantly runs, is even as "name" (as Beck justly observes) "the expression with living power of the divine presence in revelation," so that by the name of Jehovah's holiness this revelation of God as adapted exclusively to Israel is set forth; hence, as to the "transgressions of the heathen," no direct relation of them to the holiness of God is expressed, but a misapprehension of the revelation of the holy in Israel, consequently a relation to Israel as the people of Jehovah. The holiness of God has, however, so much the more significance in our chapter, as the setting of it forth in Israel is thoroughly in accordance with what is thus emphasized, that what Jehovah does (vers. 22, 32) He does for His own sake. For God's holiness is "the real intrinsic ideality of God, His harmoniousness of essence, as it manifests itself also in this, that He makes Himself known in a church of His pure divine consciousness, and preserves and perfects this church in the ideality of its pure essence, until by it the world is restored to perfection in the real ideality, the personal harmoniousness of essence" (P. LANGE, Poe. Dogm. p. 95). By setting forth the holiness of God, as is done in our chapter, Ezekiel puts himself in harmony with Isaiah (p. 41).

9. Lange observes on the holiness of God, that the concept of it is "mediated to us through the Old Testament almost more than any other concept;" "the leading thought of the Hebrew view of the world is holiness; the קדוש, or קדוש ייחוד, is He who is pure in essence, true to Himself, corresponding to His name." Lange finds the "mythologico-typical reflection" of holiness in ideality, the "leading thought of the Hellenic view of the world," just as he calls "the Greek culture the mythologico-typical counterpart of the theocracy."

10. Because love, which is God, is holy, breaking of the law, and still more the dishonouring of divine benefits, as in ver. 16 sq., can expect no support or indulgence in Him, the righteous God, the "Founder and Guardian of right" (LANGE). Since He as the "Holy One," who is the absolute opposite of the evil, can originate nothing evil, so contrariety to Him as such, and especially misuse of His gifts, here of the land, can find no encouragement with the "Holy One of Israel," the Giver of righteous recompense. Since the native land of a people, especially like Israel, may be misused as the dos mai non esse in relation to heaven or higher interests than the earth, the corresponding righteous opposition and reaction of the holiness of God will be either deterioration of such a land (failure of crops and the like), or expulsion of the people from it, or both. So, too, the earth must finally pass away for mankind, although for the people of God there is hope of a "new earth." The latter gives proof of God's truth and faithfulness, which, keeping promise, provides for the need of finite spirits not only a corporeity, but also a locality in harmony therewith, according to the purpose of His wise and holy will; and perhaps this is typified also in Israel's possession of the land in the signification of their native land. But with God not only is goodness accompanied by justice, as that according to which God gave Israel scope and opportunity to expel (exile) themselves from their land among the heathen—just as man can procure well for himself—and thus left as well as give their right to Israel, but divine justice as revelation of God's holiness is more than mere retribution; it becomes on and in the sinner self-sanctification of God.

11. As the Holy One, Jehovah is the God of Israel (Lev. xi. 44 sq.); and it is only in keeping with this relation that Israel, His people, have to appear before Him, not merely in symbolical but still more in legal moral purity of life, above all in that they keep themselves religiously pure from idols. It is not only this mutual relation that results to Israel from the fact that their God is the Holy One, but also that, so long as the relation of the Holy One to Israel has not ceased, in like manner the holiness of this people is not to be surrendered; hence that, as on them by exile and by restoration, so in them Jehovah will sanctify His name or Himself. "The command: Be ye holy, for I am holy, contains (says Hävernick) at the same time the promise of the realization of a holy kingdom of God as surely as God Himself is holy. But God reveals Himself as the Holy One not merely in condemning evil and destroying the offender, but also in the extirpation of evil and the transformation and renewal of the sinner by virtue of a new divine breath of life, the spiritual creation of God in man."

12. Sanctification implies in general that something is removed from its common worldly relations. Since this does not usually take place without reference to sinful concomitants, the symbolical act of washing readily connects itself with sanctification; but it is by no means to have a merely negative interpretation, as "annulling of the false profane world-relation of the object" (LANGE), especially when, as here in Ezekiel, no mention is made of the positive symbol of anointing; which, moreover, does not symbolize induction into the service of the Lord, the "restoration of the true religious world-relation," but the divine equipment for the service of the Lord. Even in itself, and still more from its thus standing alone, washing will represent purification, which is consecration.

13. Jehovah sanctifies Himself on Israel before the eyes of the rest of the world (ver. 23), in that by taking and gathering Israel out of all nations and countries He actually places them again as His people in the land of promise (ver. 24). Jehovah sanctifies Himself in Israel, hence in Israel's own consciousness, by making them experience, as a fresh national dedication, a moral and religious purification. The expressions employed are to be interpreted as referring to the nation as such, and not to single individuals; we have not so much to understand spiritual states of mind as to think of national regeneration. But if what has been already remarked on ch. xi. suffices as to the letter for our chapter also and ch. xviii., the sprinkling of the clean water in ver. 25 symbolizes the national moral and religious cleansing of Israel, and the "new heart" in ver. 26 is nothing else than a "heart of flesh" instead of a "heart of stone" in the flesh; yet in ver. 27 the Spirit of Jehovah (רוח), which the "new spirit" within Israel is interpreted to mean, points beyond ch. xi. 19 (ch. xviii. 31); the Holy One of Israel appears as the spirit of Israel, just as "God as Spirit of the Church and indweller in the human heart is pre-eminently the Holy One" (NITZSCH). And although ver. 25 sq. in relation to ver. 8 sq. may be taken as complement of the promise given there, or even as the condition for the promised inheritance continuing to the children, and hence parallel thereto (ver. 24 carrying out the declaration: "for they draw near to come," ver. 8), yet we are not hindered from making the Messianic salvation of the people, as the true and full sanctification of Jehovah in as well as on them, shine forth behind all this (p. 24), and the "clean water" of ver. 25 approximates to the Holy Ghost (Joel ii. 28 sq.). Comp. Umbreit.

14. "The true essence of the Messianic time," says Hävernick, "its very kernel, from which all its other blessings flow, and its entire glory unfolds itself, is the purification of the people. At the time of Christ this idea was deeply rooted in the national consciousness, and John the Baptist unquestionably adapted to it his rite of lustration, the βαπτισμα τῆς πίστεως."

15. Jesus could (John iii. 5) refer to ver. 25 sq. of our chapter, namely, that water and spirit are requisite for regeneration for the kingdom of God, which truth the master in Israel (ver. 10) should have known. "For Ezekiel teaches here in clear words that Israel had to receive another and new heart and spirit—that it had to be sprinkled with clean water by the Spirit of God. Thus should a master in Israel have known regarding water and spirit in this relation" (COCOBIUS).

16. "Striking is the word of the prophet, and pointing exactly to the times of Christian fulfilment,—the people of the new planting shall never again experience the reproach of hunger among the heathen. A deep saying, when we divest it of its allegorical covering, and understand by it the eternal appeasing of hunger of spirit. It was indeed a reproach to Israel, that, nourished as they were by the divine food of life in the words of Moses and the prophets, they went after the imaginary gods of the heathen, and, being carried away into the countries of strangers, were obliged to suffer hunger in a dry land," etc. (UMBREIT).

HOMILETIC HINTS.

Ver. 1 sq. The mountains of Israel not only figures, but also places of the promises to Israel.—Word and name of the Lord; the former the revelation of His will, the latter the revelation of His nature.—Ver. 2. "Thus they mocked at the promises of God, as if their eternity were now come to an end" (BERL. BIB.).—The scorn of the world an old experience.—"Thus were the prophets and Christ reproached, and the Lord said that men would speak all manner of evil against His disciples, Matt. v. 11, and Paul, that we should be a spectacle to the world, 1 Cor. iv. 9" (HEIM-HOFFMANN).—"All things may and shall work for good to Christians, Rom. viii. 28" (CR.).—The wicked also shall have an eternity, but of what kind? Just the eternity into the possession of which they have put themselves, according as their works deserve, as death is the wages of sin.—Ver. 3 sq. God knows, sees, and hears the misery of His children; that must comfort them, therefore they cannot despair.—"How ready men often are not only to count up the sufferings of others, but also in their talk to exaggerate them still more!" (STARCK).—Ver. 5 sq. What God calls His cannot be lost for ever. He is jealous with but also for His possession.—God lets His people be stricken only by whom He will; one cannot simply open the mouth and devour them at pleasure.—Ver. 8 sq. "Thus shall the ruined churches bring fruit, wine, and bread, that is, the mysteries of doctrine, to the profit of the people, that they may no longer be rude and ignorant, but a people taught of God. Therefore the spiritual husbandmen, vine-dressers, till and sow diligently. With the plough of fear they turn up the soil of the heart, in which they sow the new word of the gospel, whereby the forsaken churches become planted anew; and these are the mountains which the Lord addresses" (HEIM-HOFFMANN).—"When He appeared in the holy land who could say of Himself, 'Come unto Me, ye who labour and are heavy laden,' He far outshone Solomon in all his glory" (HENGST.).—"The wicked have no cause to rejoice over the chastisement of God's children, Jer. xlviii. 27" (STARCK).—"The affairs of the people of God are never in so bad a state that God should be unable to set them right again; nay, experience has taught that the Church after persecution only increases so much the more" (O.).—"They are far wrong who consider a great increase of men as a curse, because it gives rise to want and distress. God can nourish many as well as few, and we should live moderately, avoid endeavouring to surpass others in expenditure, and seek for concord in families, etc." (LUTHER).—Ver. 12 sq. "The promised good is always to be understood with the condition that men repent, Mal. iii. 7" (STARCK).—"The self-evident condition is, that they do not fill up the measure of their sins anew. There is no charter of immunity against Ye would not" (HENGST.).—"How often is the country or a district made to bear the blame when there comes a pestilence among men or cattle, when, however, it should be known that sin gaining the upper hand provoked God's wrath thereto" (O.).—"As already observed by Jerome, the Jews refer this to a kingdom of a thousand years, when Jerusalem shall be built and the temple of the latter chapters of our prophet erected; while in the opinion of others, the fulfilment took place under Zerubbabel, which cannot possibly be the case, as also Jerome grants, and then compares the Christian Chiliasts with the Jewish dreamers of their millennium. Hence we must abide by the spiritual interpretation regarding these blessings promised to the people, to which we are directed besides by Christ and the apostles" (LUTHER).

Ver. 16 sq. "Man's previous course of action is the cause of God's subsequent course of action, Jer. ii. 19" (STARCK).—"The goodness of God invites us to repentance, but not to evil-doing and pride" (STARCK).—"We shall have to give account not only because of the evil which we have done, but also for the good things which we have had.—The earth should not be full of wickedness and folly, but full of the knowledge of the Lord and of love unfeigned.—"The world is perfect throughout where man does not come in to disturb it."—In our impure acting our impure nature also always comes forth. Storms clear the air, an observation which bears application in regard to the judgments of God.—Ver. 19. The scattering power of sin; in truth, it scatters the souls of men into the whole world, and that is already their judgment which sinners have to experience.—Ver. 20. With the sinner goes also his curse, his other shadow.—Our misfortunes and mistakes are very often God's sentence on our transgressions, which, indeed, are best known to Him and ourselves.—How much blasphemy against God and offence against the truth do not those very persons occasion who are called to make God's word and name honoured, acknowledged, and exalted above the world!—To have regard to the enemy,—a point to be well attended to for the walk of the friends of God in this world.—“Thus this chapter teaches us how the first petition of the Lord's prayer should be understood. The name of the Lord, to wit, is hallowed as well by the prosperity of the elect, which may obtain even under the cross, as by their purification from sin” (RICHTER).—A bad life ought not to put good doctrine in question.—Ver. 21 sq. God His own justification in this world (Theodicy).—“God sanctifies His name among men by benefits as well as by judgments and punishments” (STARCK).—“So saints are accustomed to pray who put no trust in their own merit, but humbly entreat God to look to His own name, that it may be praised and sanctified. But Christ is the holy name of God, for whose sake God is gracious to us; whoever calls upon the name of the Lord shall be saved” (HEIM-HOFFMANN).

Ver. 24. We shall come home out of this world.—Gathering even in the midst of the scattering of this world is of the grace of God.—Ver. 25 sq. “It is God alone who can truly convert us to Himself, and purify our hearts by His almighty Spirit, Jer. xxxi. 18” (TÜB. BIB.).—“Without true purification from sin no one can come into real union and communion with God, Isa. i. 16 sq.” (STARCK).—“No unclean person shall enter into the New Jerusalem, Rev. xxii., hence our cleansing has to take place in this life” (STARCK).—“Purification must precede the filling of men with the new spirit. David in the first place supplicates God to wash him quite clean from his guilt, and then prays for the creation in him of a clean heart and of a new steadfast spirit, Ps. li.” (UMBREIT).—“The prophets frequently reproach the Jews, as a stiff-necked people, that they will not hearken to the word of the Lord. Here, on the contrary, a heart and spirit which shall be new is promised to them, that they may not henceforth live after their former custom, but begin a new manner of life, so that the old and disobedient heart of stone may become the new but pliant and submissive heart” (LUTHER).—“The heart of stone does not bear bending according to God's will, whereas the heart of flesh is soft, and of such a texture that God can impress into its understanding a living knowledge, into its will a voluntary obedience, and into the inclinations a holy order” (STARCK).—“Our heart and inward parts are designed to be occupied as an abode by God Himself, John xiv. 23” (STARCK).—For the furniture with which God is accustomed to furnish His abode in man, see Gal. v. 22.—“Of flesh and fleshly (carnal) are two different things; the former may be dealt with, the latter becomes always harder” (STARCK).—“The new birth does not consist in annihilating the man, nor in the entire removal of sinful corruption and of the old Adamic disposition, but in the creation of an entirely new disposition and nature, 2 Cor. v. 17; Gal. vi. 15; Ephes. iv. 24” (STARCK).—“God gives the Holy Ghost and all the riches of grace not for gold, but He gives all things without price to all who ask Him for them, Isa. lv.” (CR.).—Ver. 27. “The Holy Ghost is not inactive in the regenerate, but active and powerful, Rom. viii. 15 sq.” (STARCK).—First the inward and then the outward change is God's order, while we men always proceed in the reverse order.—“What good, however, a man does is not his, but God's work in him, Phil. ii. 13” (STARCK).

Ver. 28 sq. To the heavenly among men there is no lack even on earth; to him who has what alone is worth having nothing shall be wanting.—So long as Christ was not born in the land of promise, the land of promise had to be also the home of Israel. Since the time that Christ is in heaven, only heaven can be the true home of the true Israel.—“The regenerate man stands in the covenant of grace with God” (STARCK).—Ver. 30. God will not only finally redeem us from all distress of body and soul, but will also free us from all reproach; so, then, we do not in vain believe in a resurrection of the body and an eternal life.—Ver. 31. In conversion man regains his memory.—A man can be of good courage when he loathes himself.—Loathing is not a sign of sickness only, but in matters spiritual it is a sign of convalescence.—The loathing of oneself, the requital of self-complacency.—Our life must become sorrow to us, otherwise sorrow will not become life to us.—Ver. 32 sq. Grace works shame, and so much the more as it makes the wilderness a paradise, the beggar a king, and the sinner a priest.—“Blessed shame” (SCHMIEDER).—We boast of nothing in Christ, and we boast of all things.—Ver. 35 sq. The last sentence of the world on the people of God will be its own self-condemnation, just as it will be our justification. It will not be in vain that we have comforted ourselves with God in this world.—Our help stands in the name of the Lord.—The comfort of the Church, that God is Builder and Planter.—“Yea, this is the honour of the holy name of God. He, the Creator, who created what was not, is also the Restorer, who creates anew that which was ruined and laid waste by the guilt of disobedient creatures” (SCHMIEDER).—Ver. 37 sq. “But the men of this flock shall also be as the sheep, that is, no wild beasts shall be among them; hence it follows that God will purify His Church from these noxious animals” (COCC.).

3. THE VISION OF THE RESURRECTION AND RE-QUICKENING OF THE DEAD BONES, AND THE SYMBOLICAL ACTION WITH THE ONE STICK OUT OF THE TWO STICKS, ALONG WITH THE INTERPRETATION (CH. XXXVII.).

- 1 The hand of Jehovah was upon me, and [as] Jehovah took me out in the Spirit and made me rest [brought me, set me down] in the midst of the
- 2 valley, and it was full of bones. And He led me over by them round about, and behold, [there were] very many on the surface of the valley, and behold,

3 [they were] very dry. And He said to me, Son of man, will these bones
 4 live [become alive]? And I said, Lord Jehovah, Thou knowest. And He said to me, Prophecy over these bones, and say to them, Ye dry bones, hear the 5 word of Jehovah, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah to these bones, Behold, I 6 bring spirit into you, and ye live. And I give sinews on you, and make flesh to come up over you, and cover you with skin, and give breath in you, and 7 ye live, and know that I am Jehovah. And I prophesied as I was commanded; and there came a voice as I prophesied, and behold, a rustling, and 8 the bones drew near, bone to his bone. And I looked, and behold, sinews and flesh came up on them, and skin covered them from above, yet breath 9 [was] not in them. And He said to me, Prophecy to the Spirit; prophecy, son of man, and say to the Spirit, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, Come from the four winds, thou Spirit, and breathe into these slain, that they may live 10 [become alive]. And I prophesied as He commanded me, and the Spirit came into them, and they lived [became alive], and stood upon their feet a very great 11 army. And He said to me, Son of man, these bones [are] the whole house of Israel; Behold, they say, our bones were dried and our hope perished, for us, 12 we are undone. Therefore prophecy, and say to them, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, Behold, I open your graves, and lead you up out of your graves, 13 My people, and bring you to the land of Israel. And ye know that I am Jehovah, when I open your graves and lead you up out of your graves, My 14 people; And I give My Spirit in you, and ye live, and I bring you to rest upon your land, and ye know that I, Jehovah, spoke and did—sentence of 15, 16 Jehovah. And the word of Jehovah came to me, saying, And thou, son of man, take to thee a stick, and write on it, For Judah and for the sons of Israel, his associates; and take another stick, and write on it, For Joseph, the 17 stick of Ephraim, and of the whole house of Israel, his associates. And bring them near the one to the other for thee into one stick, that they may be 18 [become] one in thy hand. And when the sons of thy people shall speak to 19 thee, saying, Wilt thou not show us what these [sticks] are to thee? Then say to them, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, Behold, I take the stick of Joseph, which is in the hand of Ephraim, and the tribes of Israel his associates, and put them on it, that is, the stick of Judah, and make them one stick, that 20 they may be one in My hand. And the sticks on which thou shalt write are 21 in thy hand before their eyes. And say to them, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, Behold, I take the sons of Israel out from among the heathen, whither they went, and gather them from round about, and bring them to 22 their land. And I make them one people in the land, on the mountains of Israel, and one king shall be king to them all; and they [there] shall no more be two peoples, and they shall never again be divided into two kingdoms.
 23 And they shall no more defile themselves with their foul idols, and with their detestable things, and with all their transgressions; and I help them from all their dwelling-places where they have sinned, and cleanse them, and they 24 shall be My people, and I will be their God. And My servant David shall be king over them, and one shepherd shall be to them all; and they shall 25 walk in My judgments, and shall keep My statutes, and do them. And they dwell upon the land which I gave to My servant Jacob, in which your fathers dwelt, and they dwell on it, they and their sons, and their sons' sons, for ever, 26 and David My servant [is] prince to them for ever. And I make for them a covenant of peace, an everlasting covenant [covenant of eternity] shall be with them; and I give them and multiply them, and give My sanctuary in their 27 midst for ever. And My dwelling is over them, and I am their God and 28 they shall be My people. And the heathen know that I, Jehovah, sanctify Israel, in that My sanctuary is in their midst for ever.

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

The two sections of the chapter, vers. 1-14 and vers. 15-28, are already distinguished by the introductory formula (vers. 1, 15); still more decidedly by their difference of form,—first a vision, and then a symbolic action; as also by their contents, which, however, with all their diversity, show the most intimate connection—what in the first section is prophesied of the whole of Israel is in the second ratified by promise in relation to the parts. [HENGST.: “the restoration of Israel as a covenant-people, and the restoration of Israel as a brotherhood.”] The re-quickening and reunion of Israel. The interpretation is connected with both prophetic sections of our chapter, appended (vers. 11-14) to the first, while in the second it is given along with the prophecy. The connection with ch. xxx. is apparent from the close of that chapter, ver. 24 sq.

Ver. 1. הָיָה, comp. ch. i. 3 (וְהָיָה עָלַי) and ch. xxxiii. 22 (וְהָיָה אֵלַי). Although not the stronger introductory formula (as in ch. viii. 1), yet the description given of Ezekiel's condition is sufficient simply to set aside a mere “product of poetical intuition” (HITZIG). “The abrupt commencement without and” is, according to Hengstenberg, meant to point out that “the fact here related is extraordinary, and out of connection with the usual prophetic activity.” [“As the subject itself is a quite unusual one, so also the description is such as Ezekiel never elsewhere draws. Such a never-seen sight is seen by itself in a moment of higher inspiration, or never,” EWALD.] As the Vulgate, so also Hitzig, ainst the accent: “in the Spirit of Jehovah;” but הָיָה is subject, and בְּרוּחַ simply: ἐν πνεύματι (Matt. xxii. 43), in contrast to ἐν σαρκί (2 Cor. xii. 2), to which it is easy to supply אֵלַי (ch. xi. 24), which (as Keil justly observes) was omitted because of the הָיָה (comp. ch. viii. 3). Ecstatic state in which he was inwardly transported from the things around him.—The valley can only be the one mentioned in ch. iii. 22, when we consider that those who speak in ver. 11 were settled there in the neighbourhood, and consequently could be represented as the bones in the valley. At all events, it is not a valley in general, but a certain valley; and if nothing else, that (וְהָיָה) which was full of bones. Hengstenberg points out the contrast to the mountain (ch. xvii. 22), the “lowness of condition”! HITZIG: “The valley is fitted to represent a huge grave;” but the thought is less of graves than of their opposite (עַל־בֵּינֵי, ver. 2), namely, that the slain

(ver. 9) have remained unburied, their bones bleach and dry there.—The bones are men's bones (Isa. lxvi. 14); in the connection here: the remains of the slain, abundance of which might be in the disturbed districts of Judah; according to the Talmudists: slain Ephraimites, 1 Chron. vii. 20 sq. Looking from the midst of the valley, he could warrant that it was full of bones.—Ver. 2. עָלֵיהֶם, over by them, or “over past them;”

hence not: “over,” to tread them with the feet, or to hover over them, but: round about, so that he might be able to view them exactly, as the repeated הָיָה, as the result of such inspection, brings to view the very many and their being very dry, neither sap nor strength in them. Comp. moreover, ch. vi. [Ewald refers for “the rapid narration, with its constant fall into the present,” to his Grammar, § 342 b.]

The question in Ver. 3 is fitted to bring the prophet, and, through him, his hearers and readers, to the consciousness of the impossibility presented to human eyes (son of man); and considering the words uttered by Israel (ver. 11), its intention doubtless is to bring out the despair of the people, in order to make room in their hearts for the prophecy of salvation (ver. 12). Ezekiel's answer refers the matter to God (Rev. vii. 14), for with God there is no impossibility, unless He wills it, and that God alone can know. Comp. on this point Isa. xxvi. 19.—Ver. 4. When Ezekiel is summoned to prophesy over the bones, their future, asked (ver. 3) by Jehovah in relation to them, comes to view as an affair of Jehovah's, of His counsel, will, and purpose; they may therefore be addressed (אֲלֵיהֶם אָמַן), however dry they are. Grotius observes: so much the more as the prisoners in the exile are to be understood.—The word of Jehovah (ch. xxxvi. 1, 4) mediates the salvation, the life to be prophesied. Hence not see, for then death, and nothing but death, will come to view. In Ezekiel's vision all depends on “hearing;” recognise God's word, and trust to it (John iv. 48, xx. 19). This, at the same time, legitimates as divine the word of Ezekiel's prophetic announcement. The tenor, however, of the divine word—Jehovah announces what will take place, what He purposes to do (Amos iii. 7)—follows in Ver. 5. What is said to them is, from the certainty of its being accomplished, in reality said of them, as הָנֵחָ already formally points to the accomplishment. — רָחֵם,

although followed by הַיִּיחִים of the effect generally on the whole, is yet not exactly הַיִּיחִים

of Gen. vi. 17, or 'חֲשִׁמְתֵּר' of Gen. vii. 22, "breath"; for it is just that which is in a living being that is here left out of view, and, in contrast to that which is dried up, above all, simply the creative divine power, hence spirit quite objectively and generally is contemplated. ("The Spirit of God is the principle of all real life in the creaturely existence," HÄV.) That we have here another order (HENGST.) than in the execution (ver. 7 sq.) is not the case, for the more detailed description which follows immediately in ver. 6 presents the same order as the execution follows.

The Spirit also does not press forward at the beginning as the (HITZIG) chief thing, without which the rest, the merely bodily resurrection, is of no importance (HENGST.), but as הַיִּיחִים implies: "to live" in general, without separation for the present into political and spiritual, so רָחֵם introduces the divine causality simply as first, as conditio sine qua non. The more special is expressed—Ver. 6—by a parallel הַיִּיחִים; and afterwards by הַיִּיחִים, the "binding matter," the sine qua non, and by the making of "flesh to come up," and by the קָרָם (a word only found in Ezekiel), with akim, the outward form of life is completed, from which the spirit which enlivens the flesh is distinguished, but is as yet to be considered as natural, now as breath, the individual life, in consequence of which it certainly can be said: 'רָחֵם. But the spiritual element, although intimated in this, is first expressly stated in the interpretation (ver. 14), with reference back to ch. xxxvi. 27.

The prophecy, in accordance with the command given to Ezekiel (ver. 4), is not limited (as HENGST.) in Ver. 7 to the summons to the bones to "hear," sq., but comprehends also what Jehovah says to these bones in vers. 5, 6; for that He is the speaker makes the saying a prophecy, although to prophecy in general may be said to mean the same as: "to speak in the Spirit."—The voice which came was audible; its simplest interpretation is in accordance with ch. i. 25. The prophet was to prophesy; what Jehovah purposed to say to the bones (vers. 4-6), the prophet now prophesies; and since he prophesies according to the command, Thus saith Jehovah, that which was prophesied to the bones is from God, and the voice is to be understood as Jehovah's, from which the New Testament representation is perhaps coloured (John v. 28), and neither a "noise" nor "sound" in general—anything like a thunder-clap would be out of place in this sublime and orderly connection—nor in particular:

"the sound of a trumpet." Keil's position, that it cannot be supposed that God should bind His voice of power to the prophecy of the prophet, has in reality no significance. On the other hand, he is right in referring רָחֵם (ch. iii. 12, xii. 18);

to the noise by which the effect of the word of Jehovah announced itself to the bones, now coming together in consequence thereof. [Hävernicks makes the "sound" pass into a "mighty peal." Hitzig, in order to have the "fitting impulse" from the ground, translates: "earthquake" (Matt. xxvii. 51), under reference to ch. xxxviii. 19.] God's voice of power is followed by a rustling, caused by the bones coming rustling up from the surface of the valley. Thereafter (consecutive)

"the bones come together," which may be thus distinguished from what follows, that it refers to whatever belongs to one body, while

הַיִּיחִים specializes a single bone in relation to another, e.g. the upper to the lower part of the arm (on the form הַיִּיחִים, see EWALD, Gr. p. 505).

[“This may also be interpreted of the first movements of the scattered Israelites in the various settlements in Chaldea, and their assembling for quiet consultation, where the members of the people met again in secret,” SCHMIEDER.]—Ver. 8, as was promised in ver. 6. [“May be interpreted of Israel's first growth in hope, conscious strength, and vigour,” SCHMIEDER.] The remark that yet breath was not in them may serve formally for the dramatic colouring of the event in the representation; as to actual fact, it sets forth the creative power of God in the action, which is in this way twofold. That thereby is shown that "the restoration is first pre-eminently an external, political one" (HENGST.), is not of necessity contained in the text, but the original creation of man, as related in Gen. ii. 7, forms a pattern for the text. (John vii. 39 makes the deepest application of the 'רָחֵם.—Correspondingly, therefore, Ezekiel has in Ver. 9 to prophesy once more,—this time to the Spirit (ver. 5), that is, not to the "breath," for that is רָחֵם only in a living person, as we have already said, and still less to the "wind," which is the sensuous natural symbol of the Spirit. And from what follows it is still clearer that the "outpouring of the Spirit" cannot be spoken of here, but what is spoken of is the universal spirituality which pervades all creation. Hence the Spirit is to come from the four winds; not without reference, moreover, to ch. v. 10, 12, xii. 14, xvii. 21 (Matt. xxiv. 31; Rev. vii. 1). הַיִּיחִים makes clear the distinction between רָחֵם and הַיִּיחִים. Our passage has nothing to do with the "breathing on" in John xx. 22, and just as little is "the fulness and force of the Spirit's operations, Acts ii. 2" (HENGST.), indicated by the "wind from the four winds." הַיִּיחִים makes a very plain allusion to

Gen. ii. 7. [“The quickening Spirit of God awakens the resolution to return to God's covenant and to the land of their fathers,” SCHMIEDER.]—Slain: killed, not deceased (Doct. Reflect. 5). The colouring is taken from those condemned and executed by the Chaldeans (ver. 11). Regarding וְיָחִי, comp. on ver. 5.—Ver. 10. Exchanging Hithp. וְהִנֵּבְאֵתִי (Ewald, Gr. p. 331) for Niphal of ver. 7, and וְיָחִי Piel in place of Pual in ver. 7.—Ver. 9, 5. Vers. 11–14. The Divine Interpretation of the Vision.

The process in the vision vers. 1–10 is symbolical, as shown by the phrase in ver. 11: these bones are, etc., which refers to the whole vision as it treated of the bones. Hence the bones, which lay there very dry, but at Jehovah's word became alive, which were very many (ver. 2), a very great army (ver. 10), bear the sense of and signify the whole house of Israel; and this already prepares for the second section of our chapter. According to Hitzig, Judah and Israel combined denote the State broken up by the war, and also the generation cut off by it; against which view we observe that the dead cannot be “saying” here any more than the bones, but, as in ch. xi. 15 sq., the Israel in exile must be contemplated, who now indeed compared themselves to the dead, but to whom, on the contrary, life is immediately (ver. 12) to be proclaimed and promised. In what they say (comp. ch. xxxiii. 10) is contained the so frequently overlooked tertium comparationis, and the cause for the vision in vers. 1–10. Hence the divine interpretation does not primarily start from the outward condition of the people in general, and still less from that of a part of them, the dead of Israel, but from what the despair of those in exile says, hence from the frame of mind which thus found voice: our bones are dried, etc. The relation of יָבֵשׁוּת and יָבֵשׁוּת (ver. 2) to each other is evident.—נִנְרָנִי, properly: “cut off,” separated, shut out from God's help (Ps. lxxviii. 6 [5], xxxi. 23 [22]; Isa. liii. 8).—לָנִי, according to Gesenius, a superfluous nominal dative, as much as to say: We are undone. HITZIG: Reduced to ourselves. [DELITZSCH: It is over with us. HENGST.: We are cut off for us, referring the “for us” to the sadness of the fact for those concerned.] The language which they employ corresponds thoroughly to the question in ver. 3. That which, believing themselves abandoned, without any hope (ch. xix. 5) of again rising up to be a nation, they say of themselves, Ezekiel beheld in the valley,—merely very dry bones. So much the more, and the more literally, can what was done with these bones, a procedure which the prophet had to prophesy, and was afterwards permitted to behold, avail as a promise to them.—Ver. 12 therefore parallel to ver. 4 sq., but still keeping primarily in view the despairing speech of the exiles: וְהִנֵּבְאֵתִי וְאִמְרַתִּי, not yet, however, וְהִנֵּבְאֵתִי וְאִמְרַתִּי (ver. 5), as ver. 14 hereafter, but first: behold, I open your graves, meaning thereby the abodes of the exile, since the Jews who were in exile considered themselves like dead men. The accommodating interpretation changes the valley with the many bones on its surface into many graves, which have “to be opened,” etc. My people, here and in the following a very comforting title. Israel, however, ought always to be so, and therefore also to have constantly been so. Consequently we have at the same time prominence given to the contrast between Israel's destiny and its deadly despair, and hence a notification of its unbelief and offences in general.—What in the vision the clothing with sinews, flesh, and skin was in relation to the bones (ver. 6 sq.), could in the interpretation applying to the living be regarded as political restoration, as this has to begin with leading out of Babylon and bringing back to Canaan.—Ver. 13. וְיָחִי reminds of וְיָחִי in ver. 6.—Ver. 14 takes up וְיָחִי בְּכֶם וְיָחִי of ver. 6 and the rest of the vision, pointing, however, by וְיָחִי to ch. xxxvi. 27, as by וְיָחִי to וְיָחִי in the following, for which comp. ch. xxviii. 26, xxxiv. The inspiriting and quickening for a home system which is to have permanence, and especially in the case of a people like Israel, will of necessity be spiritual and religious.—Isa. xiv. 1.—Ch. xvii. 24, xxii. 14, xxxvi. 36

Vers. 15–18. The Reunion of Israel and Judah.

After the vision thus interpreted, there follows in Ver. 16—accompanied by an interpretation—a symbolic action, the outward reality of which there is no difficulty in admitting. Both the contents (comp. ver. 11) and the transition with וְיָחִי connect what follows with the first section of the chapter, of which it forms the continuation and completion. Israel again become a nation, must, overcoming the separation which had taken place, also again become one nation. What follows draws the consequence from what has preceded.—וְיָחִי, “board” (tablet), or “staff,” or simply “wood,” stick.—For the “writing,” comp. Num. xvii.—The sons of Israel, his associates (while the text reads the singular for “association”), are, according to Hengstenberg, a “small” part of Benjamin, Simeon, and Levi, and the members of the kingdom of the ten tribes who had attached themselves to Judah; according to Keil: the “greater” part of Benjamin and Simeon, the tribe of Levi, and the pious Israelites who had at various times immigrated into Judah from the kingdom of the ten tribes, 2 Chron. xi. 13 sq., xv. 9, xxx. 11, 18, xxxi. 1.—Joseph is placed first, as Hengstenberg says, because Ephraim's equality with Judah rests upon him in consequence of the blessing of Jacob; more simply, because it is the genealogical title of the patriarch. That the stick of Ephraim (comp. ver. 19), which has been looked on as a later interpolation, is subjoined, is an addition taken from historical reality, for Ephraim was the head of the kingdom of the ten tribes.—

Ver. 17. וְיָחִי אֶתְּמַר אֶתְּמַר reminds of וְיָחִי in ver. 7.—וְיָחִי וְיָחִי וְיָחִי illustrates וְיָחִי, corresponding to the symbolic action—here in the hand of Ezekiel, as hereafter in his word. In order to make them appear as one stick, they must have been adapted for that, and could scarcely have been "staves."

Ver. 18. Comp. ch. xxiv. 19. The purpose of the symbolic action, what it was meant to incite, on which account it is to be conceived of as externally real (ver. 20).—What (are) these sticks to thee? that is: what is their signification?—Ver. 19, the interpretation. Where ver. 16 has the stick of Ephraim, we have now the stick of Joseph, which first of all implies exactly the same as the stick described "for Joseph." In what respect it is designated the stick of Ephraim is then made plain by the words: which is in the hand of Ephraim (the expression בִּידֵי עֲפְרַיִם doubtless suggested by בִּידֵיךָ, ver. 17); and thereby, at the same time, the transition is made from the sign to the thing signified, for to be in the hand = to be in the possession, in the power, hence it denotes the supremacy of this tribe. Hence, too, instead of וְכָל-בֵּית יִשְׂרָאֵל, more expressly לְשִׁבְטֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל ("staves," "sticks," as "tribes").

—If the noun is anticipated by עָלַי, it would certainly be better to read, with Hitzig, אֵל, than אָתָּה: "to it, to the stick of Judah." It lies away, however, from לָקַח, as Keil connects, to combine אֲוֹתָם, namely, the tribes, after they have been put on the stick of Joseph (עָלַי), by אָתָּה with the stick of Judah; besides, one does not see why the tribes already joined to Joseph should still have to be united with him. The "taking" is ended with the tribes of Israel, his associates; the "giving" relates to those (אֲוֹתָם)

taken together (יְ), that is, Joseph-Ephraim and his tribes, for the purpose of union (תְּשִׁיתֶם לְעֵץ) with Judah, and it is only to this that עָלַי can refer. Hengstenberg explains אָתָּה: "the stick of Judah, I mean," "to indicate that Judah is the proper stem of the people of God." The interpretation still keeps a firm hold of the symbolic action (לָקַח אֶחָד בְּרִידֵי), and יִשְׂרָאֵל אֶחָד evidently expresses an antithesis to Ephraim's hand, —the union by and in God, as opposed to the separation by and in Ephraim (comp. Isa. xl. 13).

Ver. 20. The symbolic sign which the prophet is to perform (ver. 16) is expressly designed for the eyes of those concerned, and, with the repetition of the thing to be done, at the same time mediates the connection with what follows.—Ver. 21 sq. treats of the effecting of the reunion of the nation, after first glancing back to ver. 12 sq. Comp. ch. xxxvi. 24, xi. 17, xx. 34, 41, xxxiv. 13.—Ver. 22. תְּשִׁיתִי אֲוֹתָם לְנֹף אֶחָד is the תְּשִׁיתֶם לְעֵץ אֶחָד of ver. 19. The now plainly expressed signification of the stick.—Ch. xxxiv. 13 14.—The one nation will be one kingdom. Comp. vers. 24, 25; comp. Hos. iii. 5. [According to Hävernicks, the unity of the kingdom testifies to its truth, that it represents Jehovah.] Qeri יְהוָה, but נֹף might also serve as subject to יְהוָה. Strong and effective negation of the old, that has passed away for ever.—Since sin, and especially idolatry, had contributed to the separation spoken of, the discourse turns to that, ver. 23. Comp. ch. xiv. 11, xxxvi. 25, v. 11. —מִשְׁבְּחֵיהֶם ought not, after ch. vi. 6, 14, to cause so much difficulty to expositors. The worship of idols, which is the subject of discourse, is just localized "transgression." The relief consists in this, that idolatry disappears, ch. xxxvi. 29. To think with Hengstenberg of the places of abode in the exile, so that the earlier sins in Canaan did not come into account—that they, as it were, left their sins behind them in the foreign land, etc., neither suits the present connection,—is a thought here postponed, as Hitzig justly observes,—nor harmonizes with ver. 12 sq., according to which the exile, on the contrary, localizes the wages of sin, i.e. death. Alteration of the text is equally unnecessary, just as Keil's "preserving from," and Kliefoth's idea of leading out into the glorified Canaan, are imported into the text. Comp. besides, ch. xxxiv. 13.—Ch. xxxvi. 25, xxxiii. 28, xxxiv. 24. The closing statement, recurring in ver. 27, only in reverse order, seems to interrupt the consecution of the verses, so that the prophecy forms itself into two sections—vers. 21-23 and vers. 24-27—with one conclusion. What the first section contains more as to the thing done and generally, is given in the second Messianically and as to the individual, for the full completion of the thought.

Ver. 24. See on ch. xxxiv. 23.—Ver. 22.—Ch. xi. 20, xxxvi. 27.—Ver. 25. Ch. xxxvi. 28, xxviii. 25, xxxiv. 24.—עֲרֵעֹלָם, so that the terminus ad quem is "concealed," cannot be seen; hence for an interminable future, is to be understood Messianically, that is, in Christ, as shown by the immediately following לְעוֹלָם, and all that comes after. As we find expressed here without interruption (this is the peculiarity of the whole prophecy here, in distinction to that repeated from ch. xxxiv. and xxxvi.) the unity of the nation, its continued possession of Canaan, and that very plainly of the earthly Canaan, so just as plainly is all conceived of under the dominion of the King Messiah. Israel's nationality in Canaan is bound up (ver. 22) with this one kingdom. As to the moral and spiritual condition of the people, their position towards God (ver. 23), ver. 24 connects likewise with the one shepherd, the King David = Messiah, the "walking in, sq., "keeping," and "doing." And in the same connection occurs Ver. 26 (likewise לְעוֹלָם, and also עוֹלָם בְּרִית עוֹלָם), for which comp. ch. xxxiv.

25 (Isa. lv. 3; Jer. xxxii. 40). As shown by comparing ch. xxxiv. 25, and confirmed by the connection with vers. 21-23, especially ver. 23, as that is the peculiar, the leading idea of the divine covenant, to which the לָקַח corresponds, and by the whole mode of expression here, including the repeated "giving," the making of the covenant proceeds from God in the most manifest exhibition of grace. The fact that בְּרִית שְׁלוֹם is alike explained and completed by בְּרִית עוֹלָם, expresses the Messianic character of this covenant; for the terminus ad quem (עוֹלָם) of Israel, still hid to appearance, is just the Messiah. In the "salvation" (שְׁלוֹם), when it embraces time and eternity, eternity in time, alongside of the ideal reference in the whole, the real side in the particular cannot be wanting; hence what is the daily bread for a nation, namely, putting them in the position of increase, cannot be wanting; therefore: And I give them [KEIL: to be a nation] and multiply them, ch. xxxvi. 10, 11, 37. But with the giving of the sanctuary of Jehovah in their midst for ever, another Messianic type, now in close preparation for ch. xl. sq., is presented to us in the text, in addition to the one king and shepherd for all, the servant of Jehovah, David. Comp. on ch. xi. 16. The reference to Lev. xxvi. 9, 11 is shown by the harmony of the prophecy with the promise given by Moses. And although the מִשְׁכָּן there in ver. 11 (as שֶׁבֶן is said of the symbol of Jehovah's presence in the wilderness) does not so much signify the outward building, and in Ezekiel too (ver. 27) it is regarded as עֲלֵיהֶם, yet בְּתוֹכָם, which stands beside מִקְדָּשׁ, points to the midst of the people; comp. Ex. xxv. 8. Hitzig is right in this, and also as to what distinguishes this passage from ch. xi. 16. But he overlooks the express reference to each other of לְעוֹלָם בְּתוֹכָם לְעוֹלָם and מִקְדָּשׁ אֶת־יִשְׂרָאֵל, ver. 28. There is, at all events, expressed a visible national unity in Canaan as formerly, one political government, which, however, as mediated by the one King Messiah, exhibits itself as a national life purified from idolatry and conformed to law, hence moral, so also an outward serving of God by Israel is here prophesied, the sanctuary of Jehovah in the midst of Israel—that this cannot be Zerubbabel's temple is triumphantly proved to the Jews by Keil, from the fact conceded by themselves, that the Shechinah was wanting to it;—but the heathen see therein (בְּהִיוֹתָ, ver. 28) something yet different, namely, the continuing (particip.) sanctification of Israel by God, hence religious-moral conditions. [Not merely gratiosa Dei habitatio in cordibus eorum, as PISCATOR.] We remember here, where what is prophesied of the sanctuary is so evidently connected with the promised servant David as king and prince, that the kingship is specially prominent in Ezekiel's figure of the Messiah (Introd. § 9); and besides this, the passage here shows that, as likewise observed in the Introduction, § 9, with Ezekiel the main point of view continues to be the Messianic nation, the Messianic salvation of the nation. And so the phrase: My sanctuary in their midst for ever, לְעוֹלָם explaining itself in מִקְדָּשׁ (ver. 28), appears essentially as prophesied of the future church of salvation, the realized kingdom of priests (Introd. § 9). (Comp. Zech. ii. 14 [10]; John i. 14; Rev. xxi. 3, vii. 15; 1 Cor. iii. 16, vi. 19; 2 Cor. vi. 16.) ["This promise has, at all events, come to be gloriously fulfilled in the election which forms the stem of the Christian Church. It is again taken up in the saying of Christ: 'Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world,'" HENGST.]

At this point of the understanding of our prophecy—and herein its most important advance, in distinction to ch. xi. 16, is perhaps announced—the certainly not unintentional exchange of: My sanctuary in their midst, of ver. 26, for: My dwelling over them, in ver. 27, must decidedly be taken more spiritually than is done when Hengstenberg refers it to the "protecting power" which is afforded in the house of God (Ps. lxxviii. 29 [30]), or Keil, to the "position of the temple towering up over the city." Hitzig comes nearer the truth when he directs attention to God's dwelling in heaven, directly (?) over the temple of Jerusalem (Isa. xxxiii. 5; Ps. xix. 9, civ. 8; 1 Kings viii. 33, 34; Gen. xxviii. 17; Ps. vii. 7 [8]). The sanctification of Israel before the world, as connected with the Kingship of the Messiah, and the establishing of the eternal sanctuary of God in Israel's midst, as effected by the founding of the Church of Christ, serve for illustration and fulfilment of the עֲלֵיהֶם in Ezekiel here, as is very clear from Acts ch. ii., to which is prefixed a repeated (comp. Luke xxiv. 50 sq.) and circumstantial account of the exaltation of the Son of man, ch. i.—Ver. 23. Ch. xi. 20; Gen. xvii. 7.—Ch. xxxiv. 30.—Ver. 28 (ch. xxxv. 23, 36). Although the mention of the heathen is still confined to the "knowing" of the sanctification of Israel, yet such knowledge cannot remain without result, without fruit; comp. Isa. xlv. 5.—"Indication of the participation of the heathen in the promised salvation" (HENGST.).—Ch. xx. 12. "To sanctify" is to purge from sin as well as to consecrate, hence embracing forgiveness of sin, and quickening. The former must become clear to the heathen from the latter, and so much the clearer as they have seen the judgment of God executed on His people—have even executed it themselves. Comp. for the harmony with the promises in the Pentateuch, Ex. xxxi. 13; Lev. xxii. 32.

ADDITIONAL NOTE ON CH. XXXVII.

["In closing this section, we present a brief outline of the view that has been taken of the prophecies contained in the three closely related chapters, xxxiv., xxxvi., xxxvii., and which in substance applies equally to many other portions of the prophetic Scriptures. 1. They were originally given to revive and animate the hearts of God's covenant-people, by holding out to them the assured prospect of a reversion from the present evil, and their still certain destination in God's purpose to the highest and most honourable place on the earth. 2. It was the duty of those to whom such prophecies were delivered at once to believe the word spoken to them, and apply themselves in earnest to do what was needed to secure its accomplishment; and had they only done this, a far larger measure of the promised good would have been reaped than they actually experienced: this later prospect of blessing, like the earlier, given before entering Canaan, greatly failed through their own sinful unbelief. 3. But there being manifestly ideal features introduced into the delineation, especially the good spoken of being so peculiarly connected with the rule and presidency of David, clearly betokens a kind and degree of blessing which could not have been completely fulfilled under the Old Covenant, nor intended to be altogether fulfilled any time according to the letter. It shows the prophecies in question to be, like several of an earlier kind in Ezekiel, descriptions of the future under the form and image of the past—not as if the past were actually to return again, but that its general spirit and character were to revive. 4. The new things thus to be looked for in the future could only meet with their full and adequate accomplishment in Christ, who is certainly the David of the promise. They are consequently of a higher and more comprehensive nature than any that could be enjoyed under the Old Covenant, when the kingdom of God was so straitened in its dimensions, and so outward and earthly in its visible constitution. But still they were of necessity described under the hue and aspect of the things belonging to the Old Covenant—as if it were these only returning again, or these with certain alterations and improvements, such as might give the future a pre-eminence in glory over the past. For only by means of what belonged to existing or previous dispensations of God could the prophet have given any detailed exhibition of what might be expected under another and higher dispensation. The details of the future must have been cast into the mould of things already perceived or known. 5. Therefore, in forming one's conceptions now of the real import of such prophecies—now that the transition has been made into the new and higher dispensation—we must throw ourselves back upon the narrower and more imperfect relations amid which they were written, and thence judge of what is still to come. Thus, as the David of the promise is Christ, so the covenant-people are no longer the Jews distinctively, but the faithful in Christ; and the territory of blessing no longer Canaan, but the region of which Christ is king and lord. What was spoken immediately of the one class of personages and relations, may most fully be applied to the other; and by such a method of interpretation alone do we get a uniform and consistent principle to carry us through the whole. While those, on the other hand, who would find a literal Israel, and a non-literal David, or a literal restoration in Christian times, and a non-literal tabernacle and ritual of worship, arbitrarily confound together things dissimilar and incongruous, and render certainty of interpretation absolutely impossible. 6. Sixthly, the view thus given is confirmed by the reproduction of some of these prophecies in the field of the New Testament Church, set free, as was to be expected, from the outward distinctions and limits of the Old. Thus, in particular, the resurrection-scene of this 37th chapter substantially recurs in the 20th chapter of Revelation, and is followed precisely as here by the attack from the embattled forces of Gog and Magog; while not a word is said which would confine the things spoken to the land of Canaan, or the literal Israel; it is the Church and people of Christ at large that are discoursed of. We say nothing respecting the probable time and nature of the events there referred to, but simply point to the identity in character of what is written with the prophecies before us. In those visions of the Apocalypse, the inspired evangelist stretches out the hand to Ezekiel, and shows how the word spoken so long before by that servant of God, freed from the peculiarities of its Jewish form, is to find its application to the Christian Church. The shell has gone, but the substance remains. 7. We may add, lastly, that the common interpretation, which understands Christ by David, and takes all the rest literally, must inevitably tend to justify the Jew in his unbelief. For he naturally says, Your Messiah has not done the thing you yourselves hold must be done—to fulfil the prophecy; He has not set up His throne in Canaan, and gathered Israel there, and re-established the old worship in its purity; this was the very purpose for which He was to appear, and we must wait till He comes to do it. On the basis of the literal interpretation, there seems no satisfactory answer to this; and it is well known that since it has become prevalent, many Jews believe that Christians are coming over to their view of the matter. We are not surprised to hear, as we have heard, of converted Jews declaring that such a mode of interpretation would carry them back to Judaism.”—FAIRBAIRN'S Ezekiel, pp. 412-414.—W. F.]

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. What has Jehovah caused, vers. 1-10, to be prophesied for comfort to His people (vers. 12, 13)? The resurrection of the dead in the literal sense Kliefoth still maintains, a view which is the older ecclesiastical one, shared by Jews and Christians, so that Jerome, when expressing a different opinion regarding famosam hanc visionem, omnium ecclesiarum Christi lectione celebratam, thought it necessary to state that he did not therefore by any means wish to deny the doctrine of the resurrection. How little the connection in Ezekiel says in favour of the dogma of the general resurrection of the dead is best seen from the artificial way in which ver. 11 sq. is disposed of. Kliefoth interprets the prophesied bringing of Israel into their own land (as already, ch. xxxvi. 28) of the “final introduction of the people of God into the eternal Canaan,” and the quickening in ver. 14, of “inward renewal by the Spirit of God;” an interpretation which he has also put upon ch. xxxvi. 25 sq. From similar perplexity, ver. 11 has been combined with the “first resurrection” of Rev. xx., and the bringing of Israel into their own land understood in accordance with Matt. v. 5. Hengstenberg, holding that “all the other comforting words of the prophet relate to things of this world,” insists upon this connection in general, and singles out in particular ch. xxxvi. 8, “which was soon to take its beginning,” and the connection of ver. 15 sq. and the vision. If the relation is this, that the house of Israel of the vision, reanimated by the Spirit of God, is “the whole” (ver. 11), and hence is to experience the reunion symbolized (ver. 15 sq.), then this union, which cannot be sought for among “the last things,” will also not suppose the re-quickening of Israel past. But in addition to the contradiction between the wider and the narrower connection, comes also the contrariety of the picture drawn here to the doctrine laid down in 1 Cor. xv. ; those who rise again in Ezekiel's vision simply return into earthly existence, with skin and flesh and bones. If the doctrine of the general resurrection is maintained in ver. 1 sq., then ver. 11 sq. must more or less, as also Kliefoth gives to understand, be denied to be "in the proper sense an interpretation and explanation of the significant occurrence:" we must content ourselves with an application for an express purpose, namely, in order to comfort and raise up the hope of Israel with the prospect in question (see above, ver. 1). Against this Hengstenberg, appealing at the same time to analogies in Daniel, Zechariah, and Ezekiel himself, justly observes: "Whosoever feels himself constrained to take vers. 11-14 not as an interpretation, even thereby expresses judgment concerning his view of vers. 1-10." Ver. 11 begins expressly with an explanation of the signification of "these bones," which formed the subject of discourse, vers. 1-10.

2. A question which, unless one dismisses entirely the doctrine of the resurrectio mortuorum from the text before us, comes into consideration is, whether this dogma already existed in the time of Ezekiel? Hengstenberg, for example, denies indeed the express application of the doctrine to our passage, but makes the dogma serve as "figure." Hence he must answer the question put in the affirmative. It is a necessary supposition, not only—as already Tertullian, de resurr. carnis, points out to the Gnostics, and Jerome expresses himself—that the typical application of the resurrection of the dead by Ezekiel implies the actual taking place of that resurrection, and consequently its truth must be beyond doubt, but also that the doctrine of the resurrection was already at that time a common property of religious popular knowledge in Israel, if it could thus be figuratively applied in Ezekiel. Hengstenberg (Christology, vol. iii. p. 51, Clark's trans.) cites Pareau's Comment. de Immortal. p. 109, and refers to Isa. xxv. 8, xxvi. 19; Dan. xii. 2. The raising of the dead (1 Kings xvii. 22; 2 Kings iv. 35, xiii. 21) can, as isolated cases, prove nothing in its behalf; and passages like Deut. xxxii. 39, 1 Sam. ii. 6, attest only the omnipotence of the living God. Comp. HÄVERNICK. Vorles. über die Theol. des A. T. p. 109, and his Comment. p. 581; OEHLER, V. T. sententia de rebus p. mort. fut. p. 37 sq., 42 sq. Furthermore, ver. 8 of our vision, where the prophet leaves to the Lord the answering of the question put to him, says nothing in favour of the consciousness of the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead. If there was such a consciousness, we should certainly expect a corresponding answer from the prophet. Comp. John xi. 23, 24. (Hävernicks: "If the prophet could have supposed such a general belief, he would necessarily (?) have appealed to it in order to establish thereon the restoration of the people, etc. But in such a hopeless case as ver. 11 the prophet cannot make suppositions, nor will he; he will just build anew—establish firmly a new hope in the heart.")

3. Hengstenberg says: "The prophet, however, does not merely set out from this doctrine and use it as a means of representation; his primarily figurative representation, and the historical confirmation which it received, must also have served to awaken powerfully the belief in the resurrection. If God proves Himself the master of death in the figurative sense, if He redeems His people from outward and the spiritual misery into which they had fallen during the exile, how should the death of the body set a limit to His grace!" And again: "The salvation announced here under the figure of the resurrection is completed in the resurrection; comp. 1 Cor. xv. 19."

4. But the text protests also against this merely typical acceptance of the doctrine of the resurrection. There are indeed (ver. 2) "very many," according to ver. 10 "a very great army," sufficient to suggest all the dead, at any rate sufficient for the interpretation in ver. 11 of the "whole" house of Israel. They are, however, not the bones of deceased men, but of slain men, as expressly stated in ver. 9. The open surface of the valley, moreover, hardly corresponds to the situation of the resurrection of the dead; the graves in the interpretation, still closed and yet to be opened, would be more suitable. Finally, the twofold transaction in regard to the re-quickening in the vision (ver. 7 sq., ver. 9 sq.) can hardly set before the eye the representation of the awakening of the dead; but as the direct design of the vision is to make prominent the creative in what is prophesied, the thing that is possible with God alone (ver. 3), so the first and the second act, especially the observation after the first in ver. 8, that "yet breath was not in them," serves from the outset to make prominent the point of the interpretation, namely, God's putting His Spirit in them, ver. 14.

5. Hitzig's view of the vision takes more account of the noteworthy circumstance that it treats of slain men. But how? He makes (as already in ch. xxxiv., King David) the Israelites slain in the destruction of the two kingdoms be called upon by the prophet to rise again. Thus the vision is a vision of a partial resurrection. There was already a similar opinion among the Talmudists (Sanhedr. xcii. 2)—comp. on ver. 1; and it is also maintained that such a resurrection did actually take place, and even that those who rose again begot offspring in Canaan; thus one Talmudist expressly declares his descent from one of them.¹ To say nothing of the strangeness of such a view,—for which certainly the "supernatural character of the Hebrew system" offers, as Hitzig must grant, no sufficient support,—"the idea itself of the resurrection" proves nothing, but it must be maintained in ch. xxxiv. 23, 24, xxxvii. 24, 25, in order that it may be referred to for the vision before us; moreover, as to the context, such a resurrection prophecy does not fit in excellently before and after, as Hitzig supposes. For the multiplication of the people promised in ch. xxxvi. 37, 38 (comp. ch. xxxvi. 10) surely points to something else than specially a multiplication by resurrection of the slain; and the combination of the vision in the chapter here with ch. xxxviii., however ingenious and plausible, is by no means the necessary combination imperatively required by the text. Comp. the exegesis in loc.

¹ It may be remarked in passing, that Hävernicks misapprehends the dealings between Pharisees and Sadducees in the Talmud regarding the resurrection, for the Sadducees there do not, when appealing to Ezek. xxxviii., claim the figurative as the received explanation of our passage, but only suppose in the passage not the resurrectio futuræ ævæ, but on the contrary a merely particular, and not the general resurrection.

6. Thus the dogma of the resurrection of the dead, as well as the announcement of a "first resurrection" of Israel, or of his slain, literally understood, must be dismissed from our chapter. So also the parabolical application of that dogma is not the sense of the text. If the view is put forward that the whole is figurative, then a mere poetical figure excogitated by Ezekiel cannot certainly be harmonized with the express character of vers. 1-10; comp. on ver. 1. We have before us a divine vision, which the Lord in express revelation gave His prophet to behold. Hence there must be more to find in this vision than the clothing of an idea, "well conceived and carried out with dramatic effect" (PHILIPPS.). The objection raised by Hävernicks against the view of only outward liberation of the people and the flourishing of the State anew already under Zerubbabel (GROTIUS, VATABLUS, AMMON'S Bibl. Theol.), and also against Ewald's deeper penetration into the matter, the objection, namely, that it is not permissible to repeat this idea from ch. xxxvi., cannot be maintained. But we have first to deal with the form, and then we will have to remember that the conformation of the thought as contained in the vision cannot be suggested by what is known and suitable for restoration of any kind, as is coming to life again out of a state of death, but on the contrary will have to be accounted for on other grounds. The vision—and this is the reason why it proceeds in the form before us—is intended to afford to Israel a strong ground for what is already prophesied to him, a specially strong encouragement against his hopelessness. The ground on which what is promised to the people is based is the creative power of God (comp. on vers. 5 and 8). "God Himself appears to the prophet as the quickener of the bones," as Hävernicks justly observes. "A thoroughly real relation is treated of, namely, the relation of God to death." Then, as regards the encouragement to Israel on this ground, it must speak so much the more powerfully to their hearts, when, taking them at their word, it borrows from their despairing words the answer against all doubts. The vision (vers. 1-10) is such a thorough answer in a matter-of-fact form, because He who answers, the Promiser, is the Almighty God of Israel, who "speaks and does," ver. 14. Comp. how very near Calvin (Inst. ii. 10) came to this understanding. Only because Kliefoth is so confused in the exposition of our chapter does it appear that he could gather nothing from Hävernicks's remarks, which so often hit the sense, and who refers with far better right than the expositors of the literal resurrection of the dead to Deut. xxxii. 39; 1 Sam. ii. 6; Hos. xiii. 14, etc.

7. The vision of Ezekiel in our chapter takes, as has been said, the discouraged of the Israelites at their word. Already in ver. 3, where the question put to the prophet tends in this direction, the way is opened up for the after interpretation. At the very outset in ver. 2, where the bones filling the valley (ver. 1), which are very many, are described as "very dry," the whole house of Israel lies before us, namely, those who say, "Our bones were dried," as the interpretation (ver. 11) puts beyond all doubt. By their speaking thus—since their "perished hope" was Jerusalem and the people in the land of Judah—the exiles in their despondency compare themselves to those who had perished in their native land; and this explains the designation "slain" given in the vision, which takes them for what they give themselves out to be, as, on the other hand, from the close interweaving of vers. 1-10 and vers. 11-14, the interpretation speaks of their places of residence in exile as their "graves." At the same time, by the bones which He places before the prophet in the valley, the judgment formerly (comp. ch. vi.) threatened by Jehovah is conceded to have taken place. Since this judgment was executed as killing,¹ to which death what of Israel still exists has given itself up (ver. 11) with full sympathy, if there is still prospect of salvation after the judgment and arising out of the judgment, this salvation can only be life, God's act of salvation, and consequently nothing but re-quickening.² And because the slain, to whom Israel in exile compare themselves, are to be snupposed in Canaan, the bringing back of Israel to their own land is connected repeatedly (ver. 12 sq.) with the re-quickening of the nation. Thus the salvation to be prophesied is externally restoration of the nation—Israel is again in his own land. There is one element which the vision could not set forth (unless, perhaps, it is hinted at by the expression: "and stood upon their feet," ver. 10), but which the interpretation brings in felicitously through the dead bones of the vision, by the bringing of them "out of the graves." The vision has chiefly in view the inward side, namely, the quickening by the Spirit, in general the national life as such, although, as is clear from the interpretation (ver. 14), not without spiritual reference back to ch. xxxvi.; comp. the exposition.

8. "The faith of Israel in his redemption was to rest not so much on the belief in a resurrection of the dead, as on belief in God the Creator, who brings being out of nothing, who awakens life out of death, even in its most fearful form, the annihilation of all existence" (HÄVERN.). It may be said more generally regarding the significance of hope for faith, that hope demonstrates the blessedness of faith, yet is not the ground of its knowledge or certainty, but as certainly as I believe, so certainly shall I also behold—the future, which hope expectantly anticipates.

9. As has been above remarked, Rev. xx. was early introduced into the discussion. Kliefoth recently, while making "the resurrection of the dead generally, limited, however, to a single definitely bounded field of dead" (קצת), be-shown to the prophet (vers. 1-10), "because it is afterwards to be referred to the appointed resurrection of the people of God," borrows from Rev. xx. a very peculiar confirmation of this exposition of his. The ἀναστασις ἡ πρώτη in ver. 5 there, namely, is based on our passage, and the proof of this he makes to be that the souls of the πιστευουσάντων there (who are the יְהוֹנָדָה here) are seen, and that both here and there Gog and Magog follow on the resurrection. He who is constrained to recognise in the first section of our chapter the re-quickening of Israel as a nation, will not be thereby hindered from conceding that it will be followed by the re-quickening of all Israel, that is, as Paul expresses it in 1 Cor. xv. 23, of οἱ χριστοὶ ἐν τῇ παρουσίᾳ αὐτοῦ. If this ζωοποιήσις is likewise meant in Rev. xx. 4 (ἰζήσαν), then the reference of our passage to it can as little be denied as that the βασιλείου μιᾶς χριστοῦ may be prefigured in ver. 23 sq., the repeated ἰζήσῃ here can be interpreted by χίλις ἰστη there, the ἰσὶ μὴ πλάνησιν τὰ ἰσθῆ ἰσθῆ in Rev. xx. 3 compared with ver. 28 here, and that the πρῶτα, Rev. xx. 4, refers to ch. xxxviii. But the beheaded witnesses of the Apocalypse of John by no means harmonize with the slain of Ezekiel; and although Gog and Magog make their appearance in Rev. xx. 8 sq., as here in ch. xxxviii., yet already Rev. xix. 17 sq. makes reference to ch. xxxix. and xxxviii. in Ezekiel. Moreover, Rev. xx. 6 also can be compared to the so often used ἰζήσῃ of our chapter.

¹ "It is from the beginning a fundamental law for all human development, that death is decreed for the transgression of the divine commandment; holding good for the first instance for the individual life, but also for the national domain, where the law lays hold of Jehovah's Israel as an individual personality, and sets in view before it life and death, particularly the latter, for the decision of the nation from the beginning onward takes always more plainly the similitude of Adam's decision. Captivity, or the separation of Israel from their land, announced as the last and worst punishment, is, according to the law, to be conceived of as the death of the nation. This the Old Testament consciousness looks upon as death, for the individual is related to his body as the nation to its land, and the land separated from the nation is subjected to the most fearful desolation and devastation (ch. xxxi.), like the human body bereft of the soul. Or, as death dissolves into dust, so the captivity of Israel is its dissolution into the primal elements out of which it was at first formed, etc."—BAUMGART.

10. "Since God as the self-existent life in itself is Spirit, all life in its various grades and forms originates and subsists only through the Spirit, which proceeds from God; the possession of spirit forms the universal ground of life, connecting the whole creation with God" (BECK.).

11. We have here ἰγῆραι and ζωοποιῶν together, the full and entire conception of the sovereignty of the Father and of the working of the Son in the Holy Ghost; comp. John v. 21 sq.

12. In regard to the religious spirit which animated the returned exiles, reference has been rightly made to the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah, and also to the psalms belonging to this period.

13. The truth of the section vers. 1-14 is not so well expressed by saying with Ewald, "that the individual or the nation that does not despair of the Divine Spirit is never in any situation forsaken by that Spirit, but is always borne onward to new life," as by saying that it has its expression in the eternity of the Church of God. "We need not," says Hengstenberg, "extend our prophecy to the unbelieving Jewish people and their future conversion. As expressly stated in vers. 12, 13, it applies only to Israel as the people of God, and the dispensation of grace grows out of this relation."

14. "It is doubtless the power of his people which the prophet sees in this vision rising up to new life; it is the sons of Israel, held in captivity and scattered, who are destined to return to the soil of their beloved heritage. But on the ground of the deep word of typical representation we read the joyous announcement: I live, and ye shall live also" (UMBREIT).

15. The reunion of Israel and Judah has, in consequence of the pronounced heathenizing character (still continuing in the Samaritans) of the former (Doct. Refec. 4 on ch. xx.), a co-reference to the heathen; and this is more to be thought of than "the separation between believers and unbelievers," which Hengstenberg makes ensue "after the coming of Christ," as "a still worse" separation. Yea, the less Israel-Judah has become one in the Messiah, who is Christ, the more has the heathen world come into consideration for the fulfilling of the prophesied union, Rom. xi. 26: κ. οὕτω πᾶς Ἰσραὴλ.

16. As the exile of the Jews ceases in Christ, so the alienship of the heathen ends in Christ, Eph. ii.

17. "A continued separate existence of the ten tribes in some unknown region is a fable" (HENGST.).

18. Why could not the Jews, like other nations of the sinking world-dominion of Rome, preserve their nationality in a distinct state? Think of the Maccabees. Not only their exclusive national habits, but still more the Messianic hope in the heart of the nation, fitted the Jews for this above other nations. From within and from without everything was here conjoined for building up a strong and important nationality among the fluctuating nations and gods of the Old World. In both respects there was given with the return from exile a new tone to their history. (On the characteristic peculiarities of Israel, their particular national disposition, comp. the Doct. Refec. on ch. xxxiv.) Their greater zeal for the law of Jehovah, the more decided antithesis of the national life to the heathen world-form after the exile, has been often remarked on; and also that a more definite expectation of the Messiah is clear consciousness of the pious of the land, and not of the prophetic circle alone. The Jewish people have, in the great part of them scattered through all nations, served to prepare the heathen for Christianity. Consider the importance of Jewish Hellenism; think of the net of the proselytism "of the gate" drawn through the heathen world; and do not overlook the Septuagint. How much might their gathering together in Christ into a Christian people and state have contributed to the ingathering of the heathen! When the kingdom of priests which Israel should have been became contracted to the number twelve of the apostles (Matt. xix. 28), still the effect of this mission into the world is the fulness of the Gentiles. What the emphasizing of Judah (ver. 19) already signifies, is expressly uttered in a Messianic sense by the repeated naming of the "one king" (ver. 22) as David the servant of Jehovah (vers. 24, 25). Our promise can relate only to Christian Israel, for the Jewish nation either completed itself in the Messiah by receiving Christ, or deprived itself of Him, as may be read in John xix. 15. Then with the perishing of its spirit, its flesh also perished; what still remained in form of Israel was therefore broken up by the false Messiahs, the Romans, etc. It is a fundamental mistake still to seek at the present day to see in the Jews a nation, especially when the remains of nationality—the offspring of pride—which still manifested themselves in the Middle Ages in the individual members of the race, are being ever more and more spiritualized, or even materialized, by the spirit of indifference, into cosmopolitanism.

Because they are "My people" (vers. 12, 13), J-hovah makes the leading out of exile and the return to Canaan to be prophesied to them. In view of the Messiah, He promises them a united nationality (ver. 21 sq.), and the inhabiting of Canaan for ever, the peaceable possession of the land. The promise here has nothing to do with "individuals," and what Hengstenberg says of its conditionality in this respect is superfluous. After the people of Israel relinquished their claim to nationality in presence of the manifested Messiah, there can be no further talk of their conversion as a nation to Christ (KEIL); and so much the less as the kingdom of God over Israel as a nation has passed over for fulfilment to the idea of humanity given in Israel. In this last and at the same time highest respect, the unity and eternity, kingly and priestly, under the one shepherd, here prophesied, have in Christianity—alike as regards the kingship and as regards the sanctuary (ver. 26 sq.)—their universal and also their progressive realization (John x. 16; Rev. i. 6, xxi. 3, 22 sq., xxii. 3 sq.).

19. The literally verbal interpretation of our prophet has been repeatedly spoken against. For in whatever way the prophets may prophesy the glorious future of Israel, the popular form of their discourse, expressed in accordance with the times, must not keep out of view the eternal hope of Israel, the Spirit-anointed One. Since the beginning and the end of God's march in history through the world is man, is humanity, it must seem childish to believe that the "millennial kingdom" will be centralized at Jerusalem, that this will be its capital under the Jews brought back to Palestine, that the Lord will at His coming again dwell in a real temple, and that the law of Moses, and even the ceremonial and the civil law of Moses, will be the law of the kingdom, etc. This is "realistic" exposition indeed; and while people cross and bless themselves with it against "spiritualism," the thought never troubles them that they are borne along by the materialistic current of the age. The New Testament has not thus understood, not thus expounded the Old. Comp. moreover, the penetrating and partially conclusive arguments of Keil in loc. against the Chiliasm of the modern Apocalyptic. From God's covenant with Abraham onward, the development of Israel moves in the direction of the formation of a nation and the possession of a land, the land of Canaan. The prophets would have been unintelligible to Israel had they prophesied to it a future without regard to these two particulars. How far that which after the judgment of the exile was prophesied, as restitution of people, land, and cultus, had to serve the purpose of affording the historical nexus and point of departure for the Messiah—to what extent what was prophesied on these points would have political earthly reality, could be discerned from the very character of the coming Messianic kingdom. A kingdom which, according to the confession before Pilate, is not of this world, could not fail to show that the apparent sensuousness of the prophecies portraying the future of the people and land of Israel is in reality spiritual allegory. In the history of the nation, in its institutions, etc., the vessels were sufficiently well placed for types and symbols, in order in due time to change the water in them into the wine of Christ.

20. "The New Testament," says Hengstenberg, "knows nothing of a future possession of the land of Canaan." "If the fulfilment is sought in this, then the interruption of two thousand years is inconceivable, since a constant possession is here placed in prospect. With respect to the perpetual possession, we must rather look to Matt. xxiii. 37," etc. "For supplementing Ezekiel we have Zechariah, one of his immediate successors, who soon after the return from the exile predicts (ch. xi.) a desolation of the land in consequence of the rejection of the Good Shepherd."

21. The two powers which in the second section of our chapter (ver. 15 sq.) are destined to realize the idea of the symbolized unity of the nation, are the royal power (ver. 22) and the sanctuary (ver. 26). As these express that which from the commencement Israel was appointed to be (Ex. xix. 6), Israel's destiny as a nation, they are the two pillars of its unity. When the kingdom was divided, and the sanctuary was no longer the one sanctuary for all, then there came an end, first to Israel, and then to Judah. As without the raising up again of the kingdom of David, and without the restoration of the sanctuary of Jehovah, there can be no re-quickening, so there can be no reunion of Israel. That which the last destruction of the temple, on the one hand, gives to the Jews to ponder to this very hour, Pilate on the other, by his question (John xix. 15), laid on the consciences of their national representatives of that time, and in such a manner that we feel reminded of verses like ver. 22 and others here.

22. In relation to ch. xi. 16 it has to be observed, 1st, that where מֶלֶךְ occurs there we find here מְלִיכָה—in contrast to the temporary the completion appears in a permanent form; 2d, that where we have there מְלִיכָה לָהֶם, וְאֵיךְ לָהֶם מְלִיכָה; hence, instead of the "I, the temple" of the exile, which also appeared in Christ (John ii.), the perfect and also the final will be (Rev. xxi. 22)—as Paul says—"the temple of God are ye." As the latter will be an enduring, an eternal one, inasmuch as it forms the other side of the final tabernacle (Rev. xxi. 3), so it is explained in ver. 27 by this, that the presence of the Eternal, formerly represented by the angel of the covenant in the cloud, will now as our flesh be exalted to heaven, in consequence of which Christ "by His Holy Spirit pours out the heavenly gifts into us, His members, as He also protects and preserves us by His power against all enemies" (HEIDELB. CAT. Question 51).

HOMILETIC HINTS.

Ver. 1 sq. "The hope of the Israelites lay quite prostrate; but the hope of the people of God shall never cease, because God will assuredly reveal and glorify His grace on us. Therefore God by His word always furnishes fresh courage in every affliction," etc. (DIEDRICH).—"This valley is found indeed everywhere. In other words, is there not plenty of dead bones? The best thing is, that God still cares even for such"

(BERL. BIB.).—Ver. 2. "When our state seems to us so extremely miserable that none of God's promises will apply to it, then we should remember these bones" (STARCK).—The Church of Christ, too, may at times look like such a field of the dead.—"What else are we, too, through our corrupt nature, than dry bones, empty and alienated from the life of God and from the righteousness of Jesus Christ, until the Lord gives us His Spirit of life?" (BERL. BIB.).—"It is the Lord who makes the dead to live, who visits His people in grace and raises them again from the dust, who redeems us by His Spirit from spiritual bondage, yea, who will also in the last days awaken the dead," etc. (TÜB. BIB.).—Ver. 3. "God asks counsel of us, that we may learn to acknowledge our ignorance, John vi. 6, 7" (CR.).—"Would that all theologians had thus confessed their ignorance, and not sought to cover it with a semblance of knowledge!" (SCHMIEDER.).—"It is God Himself who gives in us the first presentiments of regeneration and resurrection" (DIEDRICH).—Not only, however, in that which is impossible with men, but in all things should we look to God.—The recourse of faith when assailed to the divine omnipotence.—"Since God is omniscient and omnipotent, the resurrection of the dead is possible; but since He has also promised it, and cannot break His word, it is also certain, John v. 25" (STARCK).—Vers. 1-3. Faith in the field of the dead world and of the dead church; what it sees (death, and with men the impossibility of life); on what it trusts (on the Lord alone).

Ver. 4 sq. "As God here addresses the bones by the prophet, so He also by the gospel speaks to the dead in sin. He says, namely, that He can quicken from death in sin; and commands the dead to hear, and to arise from the dead, or to repent, that is, to believe that they are dead in sins, and in want of divine illumination and sanctification, and to lift up their eyes to the truth which is in Christ," etc.; Rom. iv. 17; John v. 28, 29; Eph. v. 14 (COCO.).—"Even the dead must hear the word of God from the lips of men; the man of God speaks to them" (DIEDRICH).—We are in our whole life and in death directed above all to the word of the Lord—entirely to the Lord who is the Word, John i.—"The wretched state of sin dominant in a man cannot be more forcibly typified than by the state of the dead, 1 Tim. v. 6" (LANGE).—"From this we may draw an important lesson both for ourselves and others, namely, that however worn out, however unconscious and dead to our condition we may be, yet God is able to redeem us from it, and to impart a life so much the greater the less hope of life there is apparent. This makes the soul still hope against all hope, Rom. iv. 18. The worse and the more hopeless the prospect around the soul, the more is it aware that it is well with it, and that God is able of stones to raise up children to Abraham, Matt. iii. 9. Although the soul esteems all as lost, yet it troubles not itself about that, and does not say, I am lost and shall never come back, which is the language of self-love," etc. (BERL. BIB.).—"Without God there is only death, whether natural or spiritual, whereas God's Spirit is able to quicken all and everything" (STARCK).—"We have, however, chiefly to see to it that we ourselves are alive, and so, above all, may have part in the first resurrection. For blessed and holy," etc. (BERL. BIB.).—Vers. 4, 5. The word of God over the dead bones, how it is spirit, and promises life.—Ver. 6. In the resurrection of the dead it will not, however, be as the hymn says: "Then shall this very skin, as I believe, surround me."—"As this spiritual resurrection here is a gradual process, so also in conversion and renewal, the man proceeds from glory to glory, until he stands fast in the Lord, and in the power of His might, in order to walk henceforth in the ways of the Lord" (STARCK).—Ver. 7 sq.: When it is prophesied according to God's word, there are still always voices, noise, movement, and things that belong to one another come together.—"If the voice of the Holy Ghost is heard in the heart, then there is a movement of the heart, and blessed is he who obeys the impulse" (STARCK).—The wonderful experiences on the field of the dead in the churches.—But what do bones, sinews, flesh, and skin, all brought together and fitted to one another, avail without the spirit? This remark applies not so much to the confessions of the churches, as to the attempts at revival through constitutions and liturgies. Certainly the coming together of members of each body—if the passage is made to apply to "reunion" (as by Richter)—is God's work; but not when the bodies, taken from different bodies, are as a matter of compulsion bound together promiscuously. The spirit, and not the uniform, is that which truly unifies; and the consciences of men are not to be dealt with as the regimental tailor deals with soldiers. The fact that an "army" is spoken of, ver. 10, cannot certainly give the tone to our view of the Church of Christ.—Pure doctrine is not skin and bones, flesh and sinews, but spirit, which has and brings life. But those who teach their own wisdom and holiness still seek life where it cannot be found.—Ver. 9. Thou mayest prophesy to the wind, provided thou prophesiest only God's word: "Thus saith the Lord," and not: Thus must ye do.—Ver. 10. Richter suggests of this "very great army," that, consisting of those drawn "from restored Israel," it "will serve for the spiritual conquest of all the Gentile nations, and especially for the gaining over of the Mohammedans to the kingdom of Christ."—"All (!) Scripture announces that the children of Israel, once converted, will be full of zeal to subject to the gentle rule of Jesus Christ and His grace those nations which will not be extirpated as anti-Christian (!) by divine justice. These dry bones, still scattered at present upon the earth, shall be changed into preachers and apostles," etc. (Where is it said that the "army" has to conquer the world!)—"One needs no power or army when there is nothing to fight with and conquer, and no enemy to overcome. But this conversion of the world will first take place in the kingdom of the Lord when, Rev. xx., the devil shall be bound in the bottomless pit, etc. The spirit of grace and of supplication will, however, make them invincible; and the blood of the New Covenant, which their fathers shed with blind fury, will so inspire them, that they would, if necessary, drink even the cup which their Saviour drank (Matt. xx. 22). By the confession of their sin, above all, will they work to procure entrance for His name and His mysteries into the remotest lands, etc. In this the natural ability, warmth, and activity of this people will be exceedingly useful, especially, however, through the Spirit of God, Zech. ix. 15, 13, 14.—The Berleburg Bible subjoins to ver. 9 sq. the prayer: "Would that it might also please our great prophet Jesus Christ to prophesy with power, and by His intercession and mission compel the Spirit to come! Oh, what a great army will then come forth to do battle against the beast and the whore!"

Ver. 11 sq. These bones are, that is, signify, sq., and yet: "this bread is my body," etc., is held not to signify!—"We see the foolishness of our flesh when we are pressed by afflictions which go quite contrary to our expectations; we then either forget the divine promises, or accord to them scarcely a half faith" (LUTHER).—The language of unbelief makes the calamity great, and God's power to help little.—Ver. 12 sq. "But He opens the graves of despair, and makes the light of a better state arise to the house of Israel, to which all the elect belong. As the spirit of life is given to the bones from all the four corners of the world, so must the true Israelites be brought together by the same spirit out of the four corners of the world, from all places, to the unity of the faith, and these obtain the inheritance that passeth not away" (HEIM-HOFFMANN).—Ver. 14. Only let us not forget that heaven is our fatherland, and that we should delight to be with Christ.—"The Lord has always shown Himself such a God in His people. His people remain for ever, and have already often experienced resurrection" (DIEDRICH).

Ver. 15 sq. "How often does God repeat His promises! how many seals does He append to them! Is it not wonderful that men doubt not withstanding? Isa. xi. 12; Hos. i. 11" (STARKE).—(We may mention here the wooden alphabets of the ancient Britons, e.g. the runes written or engraved upon wood.)—Ver. 19 sq. "That was a type of the union of all believers in the whole world, Jews and Gentiles, through one spirit and faith, under one Head, King, and Saviour, the promised Messiah" (TOSSANUS).—"Thus the kingdom of Israel was to cease entirely, and not to rise up again" (STARKE).—"Unity is a mark of the Spirit" (HEIM-HOFFMANN).—Vers. 22, 23. The union which is not merely two sticks in one hand (above all in a secular hand): (1) That which is preceded by separation from the State, it is a purely ecclesiastical, and e.g. not a military one; (2) Where the unifying Head in everything is seen ever more and more to be Christ, and not the king, as bishop of the country; (3) Where the essential thing is: to be God's people, and not so much a German Established Church.—"The separation arose from the worship of idols, and the earthly-minded never ask after unity and purity of doctrine" (DIEDRICH).—Ver. 24. Comp. on ch. xxxiv.—The royal dominion of the Anointed One as the fulfilment of God's promises, as the pledge rich in promise of eternity.—"Of the kingdom of Christ there shall be no end" (STARCK).—Ver. 26 sq. "Jesus is the temple of the Godhead, through which we obtain what we ask" (HEIM-HOFFMANN).—The covenant of peace, an everlasting covenant and a holy covenant.—The everlasting priestly kingdom of the Messiah (Ps. cx. 4), the revelation for the heathen.

4. AGAINST GOG AND MAGOG FOR THE GLORIFICATION OF JEHOVAH IN THE WORLD
(CH. XXXVIII. AND XXXIX.).

CHAP. XXXVIII. 1, 2. And the word of Jehovah came to me, saying, Son of man, set thy face towards [against] Gog, of the land of Magog, the prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal, and prophecy concerning him. And say, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, Behold, I am against thee, Gog, prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal. 3 And I lead thee back, and give rings in thy jaws, and bring thee forth, and thy whole army, horses and riders, all of them perfectly clothed, a numerous assemblage, with long shield and short shield, all handling swords: Persia, Cush, and 4 Phut with them, all of them with shield and helmet: Gomer and all his squadrons; the house of Togarmah, the farthest north, and all his squadrons; many 5 nations with thee. Be prepared and hold prepared for thyself, thou and all thy 6 assemblages which assemble around thee, and be a guard unto them. After many days thou art visited; at the end of the years thou shalt come to a land recovered from the sword, gathered from many nations, upon the mountains of Israel, which were perpetually for devastation; and it was brought forth out 7 of the nations, and all of them dwell securely. And thou ascendest, as a tempest shalt thou come, like a cloud to cover the land shalt thou be, thou and all 8 thy squadrons, and many nations with thee. Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: And it comes to pass on that day, words shall ascend upon thy heart, and 9 thou devisest an evil device; And sayest, I will go up to a plain country, I will come upon those who are at rest [quiet], who dwell securely, all of them dwelling 10 where there is no wall, and they have no bars and gates. To take spoil and to seize prey, to draw back thy hand over (re-) inhabited ruins, and to a people gathered from the heathen, who acquire cattle and goods, dwelling upon 11 the navel of the earth. Sheba and Dedan, and the merchants of Tarshish, and all his [her] young lions, will say to thee, Comest thou to take spoil? hast thou assembled thy assemblages to seize prey? to lift silver and gold? to take cattle 14 and goods? to take great spoil?—Therefore prophesy, son of man, and say to Gog: Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, In that day when My people Israel dwell 15 securely, shalt thou not know [experience] it? And [yet] thou comest out of thy place, from the farthest north, thou and many nations with thee; all of them 16 riding upon horses, a great assemblage [community], and a numerous army; And goest up upon My people Israel, like a cloud to cover the land; in the end of the days it shall be, and [yet] I make thee come upon My land, that the heathen may know Me when I sanctify Myself on thee before their eyes, O Gog.

 17 Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Art thou he of whom I spoke in former days by the hand of My servants, the prophets of Israel, who in those days 18 prophesied for years that I would bring thee upon them? And it comes to pass on that day, on the day of the coming of Gog upon the land of Israel—19 sentence of the Lord Jehovah—My fury shall come up in My nose. And in My jealousy, in the fire of My wrath, do I speak, if there shall not be on that 20 day a great shaking over the land of Israel! And the fishes of the sea, and the fowl of heaven, and the beast of the field, and every creeping thing that creepeth upon the ground, and every man that is on the face of the earth shall tremble before My face; and the mountains are thrown down, and the cliffs 21 fall, and every wall shall fall to the earth. And I call the sword upon him at all My mountains—sentence of the Lord Jehovah—the sword of every one 22 shall be against his brother. And I carry on My plea with him in pestilence and in blood; and overflowing [gushing] rain and hailstones, fire and brimstone, will I rain upon him and upon his squadrons, and upon the many nations that 23 are with him. And I show Myself great, and sanctify Myself, and make Myself known before the eyes of many heathen nations, and they know that I am Jehovah.

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

Ver. 2. See ch. vi. 2. Magog is known from Gen. x. 2 (1 Chron. i. 5); he is one of the Japhetites. The article pointing to what is known, הַמָּגוֹג, shows that he, or rather the people denoted by him, is meant. Already Josephus, and doubtless in accordance with generally received tradition, recognises in them the Scythians. Comp. Háv. p. 599 sq., and also Gesen. Lex. When אֶרֶץ is expressly added, it is not neces-

land of Magog;” but אֶרֶץ הַמָּגוֹג is a brief expression for: in or of the land of Magog. As he is immediately entitled אֶרֶץ, it lies on the surface to see in הַמָּגוֹג the king of the land of the people of Magog. A Reubenite “Gog” is named in 1 Chron. v. 4.—It appears that we have before us rather an official than a personal name. A comparison of the word (in full הַמָּגוֹג, like the Arab. “yagug”) with גָּג, “roof,” the “top” of the altar, would countenance this, if the latter is to be derived from גָּג, גָּג, “to be high;” hence: the high, sublime, supreme. The Tartaric and Turkish “kak,” “chakan,” “khan,” has been thought of (a traveller calls a Tartar chief of the 13th century “Gog Khan”). [Coco.: “Gog denotes him who sets himself like the roof in the midst between heaven and earth, between God and men" (ch. xxviii. 14, 16).] The very probable formation of the name from "Magog" would confirm the interpretation and derivation which it implies, since the national character (for this people is to be conceived of as on the Caucasus, which Herodotus calls the greatest mountain range of the earth), and thus their nature and residence in the high north, might be very suitably outlined in the official name of their leader and representative. In form it would be as if we said, instead of the Chinese Emperor: the Chin of China. Rev. xx. 8 takes "Gog and Magog" from Ezekiel as title for "the nations which are in the four corners of the earth." That Gog represents Magog is the less surprising, because Magog on its side represents a whole complex of nations: Roah, Meahech, and Tubal. For the two latter see on ch. xxvii. 13, xxxii. 26; the former between the sources of the Phasis and Cyrus, below Colchia, the latter on the coast of the Euxine, west of Trapezus. It is not exactly said that "they dwelt in the neighbourhood of Magog" (KEIL), but that they are in a state of subjection, as vassals, to Gog; and this Hengstenberg, like Ewald, and ancient translators and expositors before them, find expressed by רש"י ראש, which they render:

"chief prince" (king of kings)—a combination which would be allowable (מלך ראש on coins) if it were meant to be the translation of מל, whence also it might be repeated unabbreviated in ver. 3; ch. xxxix. 1. (It cannot be translated appositionally: "the prince, the head of Meahech and Tubal.") But some who are of this opinion appeal more to the non-occurrence elsewhere (in Scripture or in Josephus) of a people Roah; while on the other side, reference has been made to the Byzantines of the tenth century, who mention α' Ρα, a barbarous people about the north of Taurus. An Arabian writer of the same age knew of the heathen nation "Rus," on the Volga itself. (Whether the inhabitants of "Rass," Koran xxv. 59, are to be cited, is very questionable.) Gesenius observes that it can scarcely be doubtful that the first trace of the Russians is here given. Comp. Hävernicks, p. 604. It is curious that Hengstenberg cannot bear to see the "poor Russians" ranged among the enemies of the kingdom of God. Hitzig points out that also in Gen. x. there is subjoined to Meahech and Tubal a third nation, Tiras, which von Hammer brings into connection with Roah, conjecturing their original abode to have been on the Araxes. The name (Ross, horse) seems to indicate an equestrian people, like the Scythians, under which name the Greeks very early comprehended all the nations of the north; especially as living from mare's milk, they are described (Ibad, xiii. 6, 6) as "mare-milkers." In the name Roxolani (Roxalani), whom Bochart combines, "ala" means the same as horse (HITZIG).—Ver. 3. Comp. xxvi. 3, xxviii. 22, xxix. 3, 10.

Ver. 4. Hitzig translates the Pilel שׁוֹכֵר, "allure," just as the Targ.: "decoy." [KEIL: in the sense of: to a dangerous undertaking. HÄVERN.: with force, as a will-less beast out of his land, away from his former path, and on to the way of destruction.] HITZIG: "The Scythian is in the outset thought of as a wild beast, which rushes aside from the path, and must first be brought back." But שׁוֹכֵר means properly: to cause one to return (a repeating and strengthening form), a meaning which Hengstenberg justly retains as the simplest and most natural. He interprets thus: in Gog, the earlier enemies of God's people, namely, the Chaldeans, reappear. For the signification of the word adopted by him he appeals to ver. 8 and ch. xxxix. 27, and compares also ver. 12, remarking at the same time, that in the appearance of Gog, ver. 17 and ch. xxxix. 8, the fulfilment of earlier prophecies is recognised in which Gog is not expressly contemplated. The giving of special prominence to the Chaldeans is not in accordance with Ezekiel's manner (see Introd. to ch. xxv.—xxxii., and on ch. xxi. 28 sq.). It is at all events more obvious, and permits us to retain exactly the proper signification of שׁוֹכֵר, to assume a reference to the inroad of the Scythians (B.C. 633) related by Herodotus (I. 103-6), the news of which induced Cyaxares to raise the siege of Nineveh. This effect, and still more the fact that the Scythians were a powerful army (as Herodotus says), which under the command of their king Madyas defeated the Medes, who thereby lost the dominion over Asia, of which the Scythians took entire possession, fitted these latter to be a serviceable form for our prophecy. It was a kind of collision of nations, like the later barbarian migrations. The polemic of Delitzsch (comp. Strauss on Zephaniah) against the "Scythian hypothesis," which Winer also calls most uncertain, is well founded as regards Zephaniah, Jeremiah, and Habakkuk. But if the Scythians, whose equestrian hordes, marching south through Syria in B.C. 626, overran Judea, neither plundered nor laid waste Palestine, etc. (Delitzsch, Habakkuk, p. xviii.), but "quietly went up again along the coast of the Mediterranean as they had come down as far as Philistia" (?), at any rate left behind them pre-eminently the impression of a quite sudden (that is the Apocalyptic feature, comp. Luke xvii. 24) and unexpected irruption, and not that of a definite judgment of God on Israel, like the Assyrians and Babylonians,—then the silence of the sacred record regarding this inroad of the Scythians, who (according to Herodotus) let themselves be turned away from Egypt by Psammetichus through means of presents and entreaties, is comprehensible, the question of ver. 17 made intelligible, and the compulsory bringing back in our verse explained. As they disappeared after they had shown themselves, to people's great surprise, so would they also have remained out of sight; but Jehovah will bring them back, according to His purpose and by His power, otherwise than they came the first time, and in a still different manner of appearing. For Kliefoth's observation regarding nations hitherto unhistoric, more properly nations not yet come into consideration for the kingdom of God, is applicable to the matter in hand. The prophecy points, as we shall see, far beyond the immediate historic present and its nations; and a complex of nations coming thus from the far north, such as the generic name "Scythians" (for: uncultivated barbarians) suggested, after the above-mentioned inroad into Media, etc., was excellently adapted for that purpose. Moreover, what is here said in order to give due prominence to the divine direction, and above all to the higher intention and guidance: And give, etc., and bring these forth, is accounted for in ver. 10 sq. from the natural will of the people in these respects. Their wild ungovernableness is evident from the figurative expression: give rings in thy jaws (for which comp. ch. xxix. 4), coming between שִׁנַּיִם וּפְתָיִם and הוֹצֵאתִי, and explaining both; even to the shambles (EWALD). The force which makes Gog return takes him from his own land.—סִבְכִּים וּפְתָיִם, comp. ch. xxvii. 14.

Here, at all events, horses and riders is a decidedly Scythian trait, for the richness in horses of these hordes, mostly equestrian tribes, was already known to Herodotus; while with the expression: all of them perfectly clothed (see ch. xxiii. 12), an Assyrian element is introduced, thus the figure of Gog is enlarged.—קָהָל רֶב־

(ch. xvii. 17) resumes בְּלִיָּהוּ, in order by the description of the armour (comp. ch. xxiii. 24) to suggest doubtless the Chaldeans. Hitzig rightly considers the large shield as respecting only an army of cavalry. We may suppose infantry, but it is better to suppose a description embracing all and sundry kinds (handling swords, etc.), for the Scythians are only the nucleus (צֶנָה נִכְנָה, loosely combined). To such a description correspond also—Ver. 5—Persia (ch. xxvii. 10), representing the far East, Cush (ch. xxx. 4 sq.), the remote south, and Phut (ch. xxx. 5, xxvii. 10), the south-west; thus, especially as the farthest north is expressly added in ver. 6, altogether (like Rev. xx. 8) שָׁמַיָּה וְאֶרֶץ מִצְרַיִם וְכָל־אֲרָצוֹת מִצְרַיִם—(Shield and helmet, as in ch. xxvii. 10).—Gomer, Gen. x. 2 (1 Chron. i. 5), the Cimmerians, already mentioned by Homer (Odyss. xi. 14 sq.), dwelling at the end of the earth and Okeanos, where the entrance to the lower world is,—wretched men, enveloped in cloud, darkness, and night, and never shone upon by Helios; afterwards placed on the west coast of Lower Italy, near Cumæ, and still later supposed to be on the northern shores of the Euxine, so that the entrance into the Palus Mæotis was called the Cimmerian Bosphorus; after this they were removed to the Rhipæan Mountains, into the neighbourhood of the Hyperboreans, and finally became identified with the German Cimbri and the Celtic Cymry. "The old sound of their name is still retained in the mouth of the inhabitants of Wales, who call themselves Cumri or Cymry, and their land Cymru" (DELITZSCH). May not the name be derived from χρυσός, corresponding to the cloudy, wintry nature of their territory? (Hesychius interprets χρυσός ἀχλὺς ἁμυγρὰ.) See DUNCKER, Gench. d. Alterth. i. p. 739 sq.—On וְכָל־אֲנָפִיָּה,

Isa. xxiv. 22, according to which parallel, תִּפְקֹד seems to signify: to "visit," and that in wrath, as the word (according to Delitzsch) does not occur in the sense of gracious visitation. Hitzig replies that it is not yet time to speak in the connection here of the infliction of punishment, and denies that תִּפְקֹד with accus. of the person signifies to visit in a bad sense. But the ambiguous expression only says even here that the judgment upon Gog will begin to be prepared, hence it is not immediate infliction of punishment; the sallying forth from his land, to which he will be moved, is his visitation referred to in the connection—תִּפְקֹד equivalent to שִׁנַּיִם וּפְתָיִם, ver. 4. The radical signification of the word in the Hebrew is: to seek = to examine, to inspect, to survey, from which "to visit" easily follows; hardly, however, as HITZIG: "thou shalt receive command," or as HÄVERN.: "thou art missed," that is, considered as a nation that has disappeared and perished; "then, however, thou burstest forth unexpectedly with so much the more formidable forces into the land of promise." Hävern. according to this takes בְּאַחֲרֵית הַשָּׁנִים as antithetical to מִיָּמִים רַבִּים, whereas the expiration of a long time is expressly supposed to be in the last time, which is the consummation not only of the kingdom of God, but of the world generally. Days and years interchange harmoniously; that which appears in the single event as many days is, for the Apocalyptic eye, which ranges over the whole, the summation for that which is still outstanding, that is, still in arrears, in years or time generally. Of the future in general, and hence of an indefinite time, nothing is accordingly said. HENGST.: the catastrophe belongs to a quite new order of things; both phrases denote the Messianic epoch. (But as to its final terminus, Rev. xx. 7 sq.—That now the land comes to view is for the purpose of joining on to ch. xxxvii., as the mountains of Israel point to ch. xxxvi. What is said of the land, שִׁנַּיִם וּפְתָיִם (part. p. Pil., comp. שִׁנַּיִם וּפְתָיִם, ver. 4), "made to return from the sword," that is, after war had raged over it (ch. vi. 5), applies in substance to the people of the land, as also 'מִקְצֵצֵת' (Pa. pass.)—comp. ch. xi. 17, xx. 34, 41, xxxvi. 24, xxxvii. 21—shows, and still more clearly 'הָשָׁבָה' as conclusion. [HITZIG: the turned away from the sword, not in the sense of: which has desisted from war, but: which expects no war, in careless security.] Keil connects 'הָרִי' with 'הָרָבָה'. Comp. ch. xxxvii. 22. The closer designation of them as perpetually, that is, continuing a long time for devastation (ch. v. 14), rather connects the mountains of Israel with the people assembled upon them, who possess and inhabit them. The time referred to during which they were laid waste is to be considered as previous to what was prophesied in ch. xxxvi. xxxvii.; moreover, the phrase: from many nations, does not necessarily point beyond the Babylonian exile, although the spiritual sense: that "the Son of God gathers, protects, and upholds for Himself an elect church, etc., out of the whole human race," readily results from it. Comp. on לְבָנָה, ch. xxviii. 26, xxxiv. 25, 27.—Ver. 9. וְעִלִּית, not a mere vox militaris (Isa. vii. 1; comp. Rev. xx. 9), but coloured by מְשֹׁאֵה, which signifies "subversion," destruction, as well the state (waste, desolation), as the cause which produces it; storm, as it may also denote the moment of devastation, the crash (שָׂאָה, שָׂאָה, "to come smashing down"). The continuation of the comparison by כְּעֵקֶן (ch. xxx. 18) makes the translation given too obvious for its needing to be interpreted, with Hengstenberg, "like ruin." ("Gog is, as it were, desolation incarnate.") ["The cavalry of the Tanjou frequently consisted of two or three hundred thousand men, formidable by the matchless dexterity with which they managed their bows and their horses, by their hardy patience in supporting the inclemency of the weather: unchecked by torrents or by precipices, by the deepest rivers or by the most lofty mountains, they spread themselves over the face of the country, and overthrew all who opposed them."—GIBBON.]—But that, notwithstanding this, only the "covering" is held up to view, limits essentially the evil significance of this expedition; it is in the first instance merely threatening.

Ver. 10 completes, through means of subjective morality, the representation given theocratically in principle from the divine purpose in ver. 4. For although a host not only so numerous, but also so tumultuous, wild, and disorderly, is a temptation, yet Gog too is put in the position with respect to the people and land of peace on the mountains of Israel, to settle down in this peace with his nations and participate in it, as the salvation from the Jews is announced to all the world, even to its remotest corners and ends. If, therefore, Gog's impetuosity and urgency to depart from his abodes is not thence explained, then behind the thoughts of his heart we will have to assume in addition (Rev. xx. 7 sq.) ἡ ἐκστασις and his ἀλλανταὶ καὶ ἰδρυαὶ, and to conceive of the relation to ver. 4 as of that of 1 Chron. xxi. 1 to 2 Sam. xxiv. 1, and generally to direct our view to the world of nations, which has remained unresponsive, notwithstanding that the gospel has been preached in the whole world εὐαγγέλιον. On the expression: on that day, comp. ch. xxix. 21.—וְעִלִּית illustrates וְעִלִּית in ver. 9.—רְבָרִים are not:

"things," but (as and sayest, ver. 11, immediately proves) in the first instance: words, which ascend upon the heart, after they were thoughts in the heart (and so proceed out of the heart, Mark vii. 21). וְהִשָּׁב, to settle something inwardly, to conceive in thought, to devise, especially in a bad sense, denotes the inward process which precedes and accompanies.—Ver. 11. The evil purpose is well characterized by the contrast to פְּחוֹת, אֶרֶץ פְּחוֹת, a plain country, which has no mountain fortresses, no walled cities; whereby is intended, not so much: which lies open on all sides (HITZIG), as: which offers no incentive for conquest; comp. Esth. ix. 19; Zech. ii. 4. In accordance with this, בְּצִירָתָהּ, in ch. xxxvi. 35, is to be understood of a high secure position. The whole description, and particularly what follows, is an idyl, which, rather than matter for dogmatism, has a symbolic character, and is especially designed to bring out the guilt of Gog through his device against such peace of God. Comp. in addition, Judg. xviii. 7; Jer. xlix. 31; Micah v. 10 sq.

Ver. 12. As such an attack is an evil device, so also is the intention of plundering. [Hengst. makes "the community of God to be depicted in its want of earthly defence or help, in this its disadvantage against the world, while God has reserved to Himself to be its defence." It is not, however, "the perception of this defenceless state which presents the occasion for the undertaking of the enemy;" this proceeds rather from the wanton self-sufficiency of carnal power and might.] וְהִשָּׁב, a fresh instance of what the heathen had done before, connects itself with the "and sayest" in ver. 11. In מְקִנָּה (see GEN. Lec.)

here, while in other passages the sense of the word is otherwise defined (Gen. xxi. 18, xxxvi. 6, xxxiv. 23), the possession of flocks by the patriarchs is referred to, and the synonym קִנְיָן is to be defined in accordance therewith; comp. on ver. 13. "Very beautifully does the Archaic expression delineate the revival of the patriarchal state, the resemblance which the future bears to the past" (HÄVERN.). [HITZIG: "attending to productive labour and commerce." EWALD: "who possess land and goods." Both translations obliterate the idyllic character of the description.] As מְבָרָךְ can be said of any height, curved elevation (Mount Tabor!), so it here signifies the same as τὰ ὕψηλα τῆς γῆς (Rev. xx. 9), the symbolical elevated plateau of the earth, in contradistinction to the four corners of the earth,—a position thus of prominent centrality (see HITZIG)—"the highlands of the Spirit," as Lange expresses it. Comp. on ch. v. 5. "The designation applies so much the more closely, because the land itself lies high, and, sloping both to the east and the west, exposes a navel to view" (HITZIG). Israel's peacefulness and significance—the Israel of the fulfilment in Christ—are meant to be counter-types to the restless and the essentially mean, to the rapacious, materialistic disposition of the Christless heathen world. גִּיגִי and בֶּן show what alone Gog wants with the Lord's people. Hävernick rightly remarks that "the inward significance" of the conflict is meant to be portrayed. "The heathen power has assembled its forces, as if about to fight with one of the greatest world-kings. According to mere human opinion, and in view of such disparity of outward power, the evil appears here to march to certain victory." Ought we not also to be able to infer from the representation given, that the community of God has at the time ceased to appear in "dominant churches," and has also dispensed with the support of the temporal arm in the way of state churches? It looks here quite like το μικρον κοσμου, Luke xii. 32, which possesses nothing except the αδελφου of the Father and the δυναμι του βασιλειου. Hävernick mentions in this connection the "true destination of the theocracy, as it is already set before us in the law," and then adds: "Israel was not intended to stand out among other nations as a politically great people in the outward sense; its weapons and honour were, in direct contrast to the powers of this world, to belong to an incomparably higher sphere." He nevertheless makes "the theocracy be an object of allurements for covetousness and plunder," in that he makes "the new nation rich in flocks and possessions," as already the Chaldee Paraphrast does,—an idea, however, which the text does not express, and which is not contained in קִטְוֹ. In that case one could not but choose to hear in Ver. 13 the "similar interest of avarice," the "participation in joy over such a robbing expedition;" against which Hitzig: "but why are traders named, and not rather arch-enemies, like Edom and Moab!" Sheba; see ch. xxvii. 22, 23. Dedan; ch. xxvii. 15, 20. The merchants of Tarshish; ch. xxvii. 21, 36, 12, 25. First of all, traffic which crosses sea and land presents a contrast to the settled system and peaceful procedure, vers. 11, 12. Then further, those named by means of the clause: וְכָל-כְּפִירָה (Hitzig: "its,"

the land of Tarshish's, "authorities;" KEIL: "the rapacious rulers of these commercial nations;" GROTIUS: "sea pirates"),—comp. ch. xix. 2, 3 (ch. xxxii. 2),—are placed alongside of the greedy and rapacious Gog. ("The magnates of Tarshish are designated as fierce lions on account of the heartless cruelty which goes hand in hand with the spirit of trade," HENGST.) The meaning, however, is not: "where there is spoil the traders gather," so that "the question, in the case of affirmation, implies a prospect of joyful participation" (HENGST.), for finally they figure as connoisseurs, as men skilled in robbery and plunder; and this not merely "for bringing out the evident desire of Gog's hordes" (KEIL)—for if it is "evident," what need is there of the "bringing out"?—but rather to place an almost ironical point of interrogation after the greed and rapacity of Gog in respect to the patriarchal possessions and goods mentioned in ver. 12; somewhat thus: what wilt thou get then? as if even for them who delight to rob and plunder for their living, the greatness of the attack bore no proportion to the smallness of the object! Moreover, what is put into their mouth is in keeping with this. In the first place, they simply take up Gog's intention (ver. 12), asking in his own words, Comest thou with this intention? are thine assemblages for this? Then, however, very characteristically, the merchants, the connoisseurs, immediately speak of "silver and gold" as that above all which should reward such an expedition as Gog's. This, however, is not mentioned in the description in ver. 12, so that the naming again of the מִקְנֵה וְקִנְיָן looks antithetical, and this the more as the questioners conclude: to take great spoil. To take cattle and goods of that kind must recommend itself poorly to hordes which have come from such a distance.

After those skilled in pillage have given their dictum by their question, Jehovah now says, Ver. 14, that Gog will find it just as those of kindred spirit to him have already said.—Therefore, because in fact it is as those say, the prophet also shall, on God's part, confirm it (הַנְּבִיאָה). The interrogatory: And say to Gog,

Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, In that day . . . shalt thou not know it? is parallel to the interrogating speakers in ver. 13 (יֹאמְרוּ לָךְ). It is so, and therefore will also be so when Gog shall be in a position to know it. [הָרָעָה has been most commonly, as already by the Chaldee Paraphrast, understood of knowing through punishment. Hävernick regards at least "the whole foregoing leading forth," as that "of the truth" of which "Gog shall have living experience."

Ewald and Hitzig read הָרָעָה (SEPT.): "wilt thou set thyself in motion?"—On that day, ver. 10.—Ver. 11.—Ver. 15. Although thou comest to this knowledge, nevertheless thou comest, etc., because (ver. 16) I make thee come according to My intention.—Comp. vers. 8, 6, 9.—Hiding horses, etc., comp. ch. xxiii. 6. It is related of the Scythians that they eat, drink, and sleep in the saddle. Dunccker remarks on Herodotus' expedition of the Scythians: "Only on the west shore of the Caspian Sea, only through the pass of Denbend was it possible that the numerous bands of cavalry (he supposes the Sarmatian tribes, which pressed forward towards the Caucasus, and that neighbouring hordes of the Scolots, from the Tanais (Don) to the Tyras (Dniester), joined in this movement) could take and open up for themselves the way to the south. It led into the heart of the Median territory."—Ch. xxvi. 7.—Ver. 16. Comp. ver. 9.—בְּאֶחָדָהּ

בְּאֶחָדָהּ combining the two designations of ver. 8.—לְמַעַן, the divine purpose at ver. 4, in distinction to Gog's purposes, ver. 12. That which was meant to end in a plundering expedition issues in the knowledge of Jehovah; while by the expression: when I sanctify Myself on thee, Gog is exhibited as a parallel and at the same time an antithesis to Israel,—a parallel as Jehovah has sanctified Himself in judgment, an antithesis as He has sanctified Himself in mercy in His people. ["Known as the Holy One, whose honour and estate no one is permitted to touch, even in His weak protegee," SCHMIEDER.] Comp. ch. xx. 41, xxviii. 22, xxxvi. 23.

The vocative הַאֲמִתִּי, ver. 16, prepares for הַאֲמִתִּי, Ver. 17. The interrogative form is not so much intended to make a stronger affirmation, as to call special attention to the former prophetic announcement. The affirmation to the question also does not lie in the last clause of the verse (כֵּייל), for this clause rather expresses the immediate contents of the earlier prophecy referred to,—what will come upon the community of God as end and consummation. That the prophets of Israel had already named Gog is directly excluded by the interrogation. If they mentioned names, these were rather other national forms, but behind all these there remained a point of interrogation; and for this reason, that especially accompanying all the prospects of grace for Israel, there remained in prospect a final judgment over his and God's enemies, over the world that withstands the kingdom of God (over the heathen world). This interrogative realizes itself here in Ezekiel by this Gog. Hence it is not only difficult to point out distinct sayings of the older prophets (EWALD: Isa. x. 6, xvii. 14; HENGST.: Joel iii. 3 [ii. 30] sq.; Isa. xxiv.-xxvii., xxxiv.; Deut. xxxii.; KEIL: Joel iii. 2, 11 sq.; Isa. xxv. 5, 10 sq., xxvi. 21; Jer. xxx. 23, 25), but also superfluous to do so, and above all to imagine "lost" passages (EWALD). The judgment of the world shall, according to the word of the prophets of Israel, be the transforming of the Church militant into the Church triumphant. ["The predictions of the earlier prophets are in so far alluded to as the victory of the kingdom of God over the heathen world, and the judgment of the Lord on it, are announced in them. It is only thus that the reference to the prophecies accords with the other contents of the section. The special announcements regarding the invasion and overthrow of Assyria and Babylon may also be included," HENGST.]—קִרְבָּנִים, what in relation to the speaker, or some one else referred to, belongs to ancient times.—בְּיָמֵי, Dan. ix. 10.—בְּיָמֵי reproduces בְּיָמֵי קִרְבָּנִים, in order to designate by the accusative of duration, שָׁנִים, "during years," the prophecy as one "going through the whole course of the times" (HENGST.). [Others, e.g. Hävernick, take it as an asyndeton. EWALD: "who prophesied in those days of years."]

Ver. 18 is, according to Hitzig, a quotation from the former prophecy, of which we do not see the necessity. Our verse brings to actual fulfilment what was prophesied by: that I would bring thee upon them (ver. 17).—On that day, more definitely: on the day of the coming of Gog, etc., upon the land of Israel, explains upon them (ver. 17).—Comp. moreover, Ps. xviii. 9, 16 (8, 15). בְּאַפִּי, not: "in my wrath," but the short breathing of the nose, anthropopathically as the gesture indicative of an angry man, or poetically, as in general also of the horse, lion, crocodile, etc. (אָפָה, from אָפָה, i.e. to breathe through the nose, to puff, נָפַח, נָפַח, through the mouth). Comp. ch. xxiv. 8.—Ver. 19. (Ch. v. 18, xxxvi. 6.) Comp. ch. xxi. 31, xxii. 21.—דִּבְרָתִי, prophetic perfect, not, as Hitzig, = דִּבְרָתִי in ver. 17, as repetition before introducing the expression left out in ver. 18, so that ver. 18 continues itself with ver. 19b.

Forced and artificial.—By אֶם-לֹא, דִּבְרָתִי becomes an oath: surely. The "shaking" is not merely a shaking of the earth, because the land of Israel is immediately mentioned. For this reference is made obvious by the locality of the judgment, and besides, רָעַשׁ takes place over (עַל) the ground and soil of Israel, just as Hupf.

on Ps. xviii. directs attention to the shaking of the earth by thunder, and the violence of Eastern tempests. What is meant by רָעַשׁ is explained in Ver. 20; and at the same time the "greatness" of the shaking: וְרָעַשׁוּ כְּפָנֵי. That the mountains, etc., are thrown down (ch. xxx. 4), is only one element in the whole, which, as a whole, is described as a cosmic catastrophe, sympathized in by every menschen (comp. Zeph. i. 3; Jer. iv. 25; Gen. vii. 21), like a world's overthrow. הַמִּדְבָּרוֹת, according to Gesenius, particularly:

"stair-like rocks" (like מַגְלָס), from דָּרַג, from which Meier deduces the signification: rift, fissure. Proceeding from the Arabic, מִדְרָגָה might denote something to be ascended, a height.—Every wall that is to fall includes natural walls, as well as those made by man.

Ver. 21. עָלָיו, because the judgment of the fury and jealousy of Jehovah is aimed at Gog and his bands.—The sword, thus his own weapon (ver.

4).—לְכָל, etc., HITZIG distributive: on all, sq.;

KEIL: towards all, sq., indicating the direction. This, which is certainly not "forced into the connection" (HITZIG), is explained from ver. 9 (16) from the cloud covering the land. Gog's bands are in all directions, therefore also the sword is in all directions (ch. xxxix. 4).—My mountains, the Lord says, casting a glance at His people there (ver. 8). [Hitzig grounds it on Zech. xiv. 4 sq. (?)]. For what purpose the sword is called for is indeed self-evident; but here one assails the other therewith in discord (contrast to the assembling at first, ver. 7), probably as usual at the dividing of the booty made. Comp. Zech. xiv. 13. Previous types, Judg. vii. 22; 2 Chron. xx. 23. In the first instance Jehovah merely "calls."—Ver. 22. He grasps it still more personally as a judge: נִשְׁפָּטְתִּי, ch. xvii. 20. The colouring for the farther description reminds us of the plagues of Egypt, whence Hengstenberg makes them be "partly taken, and from the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah," Gen. xix. 24. Comp. also ch. xxviii. 23, and on ch. xiii. 11, 13 (Josh. x. 11). Ver. 23 proves that it is an intervention of Jehovah Himself, His fighting for His people, who are small compared with the greatness of Gog (ver. 15). — הַתְּהוֹמֹתַי is to be understood from the contrast to the greatness of Gog. Comp. on ch. xxxvi. 23. On הַתְּהוֹמֹתַי , comp. on ver. 16. — וְהַגּוֹיִם , comp. ch. xxxv. 11 (ch. xxxix. 7, xx. 5, 9). — The many heathen nations, corresponding antithetically to the repeatedly-mentioned "many nations" (according to ver. 22). — Comp. ver. 16.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

- 1 And thou, Son of man, prophesy against Gog, and say, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah, Behold, I am against thee, Gog, prince of Rosh, Meshech, and
- 2 Tubal; And I lead thee back, and drive thee on, and make thee come up from
- 3 the farthest north, and make thee come to the mountains of Israel. And I dash thy bow out of thy left hand, and will make thy arrows fall out of thy right hand.
- 4 On the mountains of Israel shalt thou fall, thou and all thy squadrons, and the nations that are with thee; to birds of prey of every kind, and to the beasts
- 5 of the field I give thee for food. Upon the face [face] of the field shalt thou
- 6 fall, for I have spoken it: sentence of the Lord Jehovah.—And I send fire into Magog and into [among] those that dwell securely in the isles, and they
- 7 know that I am Jehovah. And the name of My holiness will I make known in the midst of My people Israel, and I will not let the name of My holiness
- 8 be profaned any more; and the heathen nations know that I am Jehovah, holy in Israel. Behold it came and was done,—sentence of the Lord Jehovah,
- 9 —this is the day of which I spoke. And the inhabitants of the cities of Israel go out and set on fire and burn the armour, short shield and long
- 10 shield, the bow and the arrows, and the hand-cane and the spear, and they keep a fire burning with them seven years. And they shall not carry [re-ch]
- 11 wood from the field, nor cut it out of the forests, for they shall keep a fire burning with the armour; and they spoil their spoilers and plunder their
- 12 plunderers: sentence of the Lord Jehovah. And it comes to pass on that day, that I will give to Gog a place of burial in Israel, the valley of the
- 13 passers-through east of the sea, and it stops the passers-through; and there they bury Gog and all his tumult, and they call it the valley of the tumult of
- 14 Gog. And the house of Israel are seven months burying them, in order to cleanse the land. And the whole people of the land bury them, and it is to
- 15 them for a name, on the day of My glorifying Myself: sentence of the Lord Jehovah.—And they shall sever out [appoint] set men, who pass through in the
- 16 land, who bury with the passers-through those that remain on the face of the land, to cleanse it; after the end of seven months they shall hold a search.
- 17 And the passers-through in the land pass through, and he [one of them] sees a human skeleton, and sets up by it a mark, until the buriers bury it [the
- 18 skeleton] in the valley of the tumult of Gog. And also the name of a city [is, shall be] "Hamonah" [tumult]. And they cleanse the land. And thou, Son
- 19 of man, thus saith the Lord Jehovah, Say to birds of every kind, and to every beast of the field, Assemble and come, gather around over My sacrifice which I kill for you, a great sacrifice on the mountains of Israel, and ye
- 20 eat flesh and drink blood! Flesh of mighty men [heroes] shall ye eat, and blood of princes of the earth shall ye drink; rams, lambs, and he-goats, bul-
- 21 locks, fatlings of Bashan all of them. And ye eat fat to the full, and drink blood to drunkenness from My sacrifice which I have killed for you. And ye become full at My table, with horse and chariot, mighty man and every
- 22 kind of soldier: sentence of the Lord Jehovah. And I give My glory [honour] among the heathen, and all the heathen see My judgment [justice] which I have executed, and My hand which I have laid upon them. And the house
- 23 of Israel know that I am Jehovah, their God, from this day and henceforth. And the heathen know that the house of Israel wandered out [were carried away
- 24 captive] for their iniquity, because they were unfaithful to Me; and I hid My face from them, and gave them into the hand of their oppressors, and they all fell by the sword. According to their uncleanness and according to their

- 25 transgressions have I done unto them, and I hid My face from them. Therefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah, Now will I turn the calamity of Jacob, and I have mercy on the whole house of Israel, and I am jealous for the name
26 of My holiness. And they bear their reproach, and all their unfaithfulness which they have unfaithfully done towards Me, when they dwell securely
27 upon their land, and there is none that makes them afraid; When I bring them back from the nations, and gather them out of the lands of their enemies, and sanctify Myself on them before the eyes of many heathen.
28 And they know that I, Jehovah, am their God, in that I led them captive to the heathen, and have gathered [gather] them to their own land, and I will
29 leave no more of them there; And I will no more hide My face from them, because I poured out My Spirit upon the house of Israel: sentence of the Lord Jehovah.

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

The further execution of the divine judgment, already announced at the close of ch. xxxviii., begins in ver. 1 with a repetition from ch. xxxviii., 2, 3, of the most formal address to Gog.—Ver. 2, comp. on ch. xxxviii. 4. If הַעֲלִיתִי, etc., did not immediately follow,—and it could not follow after the execution of the judgment on Gog,—and if הַעֲלִיתִי did not stand between מִבְּרִיחַ and הַעֲלִיתִי, whereby a signification not so very far removed from this connection is suggested, then we might listen to Hengstenberg's translation (J. KIMCHI): “and I six thee,”—by which he understands the infliction on Gog of the six plagues of ch. xxxviii. 22. Others, too, appealing to ch. xlv. 13 (שֵׁשֶׁתִּים), have interpreted from שֵׁשֶׁת: I leave a sixth part of thee. But the position of the word (which is Ezekiel's own) here assigns to it most fittingly an intensifying sense, such as: drive, or the like (see Häyörn. in loc.). Meier holds the Piel שִׁשַׁתִּי to be an abbreviated form = שֵׁשֶׁתִּים. Gesenius (שִׁשַׁתִּי) translates: “and lead thee forth." It is said that the signification: "to walk along," "to march," is admissible from the Ethiopic, hence here conjugated only transitively. Following the Chaldee ("I lead thee astray"), Ewald renders it: "and entice thee away and keep thee in leading-strings," which Hitzig finds good (!). RASHI: "deceive thee."—Ch. xxxviii. 9, 16.—Ch. xxxviii. 6, 15.—Ch. xxxviii. 16, 8.—Ver. 3. The left hand holds the bow, the right bends it and fits on the arrow. It does not even come to an attack, because, ch. xxxviii. 21 sq., a sword, etc. consumes Gog.—Ver. 4. אֶפְרַיִם of ver. 3 leads to תְּפֹל here.—On עַל הָרִי, comp. ch. xxxviii. 6, 9, 22.—עֵיטִי is: "animal of prey," therefore more exactly described here by צֶפֶר, "bird generally."—Comp. ch. xvii. 23. HENGST.: "as many as have wings."—Ch. xxix. 5.—Ver. 5. On account of the previous "beast of the field," the "mountains of Israel" are changed for the face of the field.—Ch. xlii. 34, xli. 5.

Ver. 6. If we are not to extend the judgment "also over the land of Gog and all (?) the heathen who dwell securely" (KEIL, which, however, is plainly expressed both by בְּמִנוֹחַ and by וּבְרָשָׁבִי

לְכָתֹב, then we must, with Hensgt., take הָאִיִּים for "states and countries in general," "islands in the sea of the world," and understand the "security" to be such as "induces them to the expedition against the people of God" (!!); or we must, with Rosenm. at נְבִלְשָׁנִי, etc., think of ch. xxxviii. 13. But the fire does not necessarily compel us to agree with either of these, for it does not stand here as in ch. xxxviii. 22, but apart by itself, so that we have to compare here, e.g. ch. v. 4, and the many similar passages in which it occurs as a symbol of the divine vengeance. Our chapter, while it carries into further detail, also supplements the picture given in ch. xxxviii. Thus the judgment extends from the mountains of Israel, as also עֲלֵהֶם expresses, "to Magog," the people concerned, in among them at home; while their collective character (comp. ch. xxxviii. 2) is then again depicted by the expression: those that dwell securely in the isles. Gog's expedition is made by land, but has its sympathisers in islands and coast lands as well as at home—in fact, over sea and land (לְכָתֹב appears to be retaliation, with a reference to ch. xxxviii. 8, 11, 14). The return to the point of departure of this extension of judgment, as indicated in ver. 7, by the expression: in the midst of my people Israel, forms no argument against the so plain contents of ver. 6; for not only has the proposed knowledge of Jehovah (ver. 6) to be more closely defined, but preparation has also to be made for the execution, ver. 9 sq.—Comp. on ch. xxxvi. 20 sq. (ch. xxxviii. 23). Hengst. translates thus: "and I will not any more profane,"

etc. אֶחָל is Hiphil. The revelation of holiness in Israel precludes further profanation of Jehovah in reference to Israel among the heathen; comp. in addition, ch. xxxvii. 28.

Ver. 8. The fulfilment is assured to the prophet with as much certainty as if it were already an accomplished fact. That which came and was done is made abundantly plain by the day, etc., for which comp. ch. xxxviii. 18, 19 (not ver. 17). —Ver. 9. Israel, for whom the Lord has put an end to the fearful assault in a manner still more fearful, now takes a walk, as it were, out to the place of judgment. Everything by which the enemy could terrify,—in general: armour, properly: what is joined together (נִשְׁקָה), as distinguished from specialties which follow—wooden helmet and breastplate, probably covered with leather; then (comp. ch. xxxviii. 4) short shield, etc., and

מַקֵּל, of uncertain derivation, "twig," "cane," "staff"—with יָד certainly not: "handstaff," or

"cudgel" (Num. xxii. 27), or "baton of the commander," but the riding-switch so suitable for bands of riders as here,—all these have so lost their terrors, that they now come into consideration only as firewood—for useful appliance, in direct contrast to the terror and injury they were meant to produce. For the weapons of the enemy are not here, as often elsewhere, burnt at once after the battle; and with this Hävernicks connects

Isa. ix. 4, and recognises in the destruction of the most diverse kinds of weapons, and the cleansing of the land in this (?) respect, the character of the Messianic times; while Hitzig brings out simply the thought that Israel under his protecting God, who has just now fought for His people, needs no weapons, but the inhabitants of the cities of Israel (יִשְׁבֵי עָרֵי, etc., antithetic to יִשְׁבֵי הָאִיִּים).

ver. 6) make fires of and burn the wood in question seven years long. Hitzig makes בָּעֵרָו inchoative ("to set on fire"), and הָעֵרָו "to make a fire." The undoubtedly symbolic character of the number seven (symbol of the divine covenant) illustrates at the same time the very dramatic character of the whole of the rest of the account. HENGST.: "the word on which faith has to live puts on, as it were, flesh and blood, to gain an influence over the fancy, in which frightful forms so readily take their seat. It would be against the evidence to attribute a real import to the specialties, which are so obviously only means of representation." "He who has seen the battle of nations at Leipzig," observes Schmieder, "has a weak copy of Ezekiel's sublime description of the days after the battle."—Ver. 10 strengthens what has been said positively by a corresponding negative description, and subjoins שָׁלֹו and בָּרָו—not,

however, in order to make the riches now, as the heaps of wood formerly, to fall into the hands of Israel, but simply to make manifest the retaliation (comp. ch. xxxviii. 12), and perhaps also to bring to remembrance the question (ch. xxxviii. 13), but how differently now over the dead bodies. For what the weapons as firewood for Israel, as well as the spoiling and robbing, declare is this, which consequently is meant as preparation for ver. 11, namely, that Gog and his bands are all dead corpses (Isa. xxxvii. 36); comp. besides, Jer. xxx. 16.

Ver. 11. What Jehovah gives to Gog in Israel, how different from that which he intended to take to himself in Israel! קָבֵר, not so much:

"a spot where he may be buried in Israel" (HITZIG), as: "a place where there is a grave in Israel," to wit, nothing else is for him in Israel; HÄVERNICK: "namely, a quite special one, like no other in Israel." Thus will God settle accounts with the predatory and rapacious גֹּג. [The Sept. doubtless read יָם הָעֵקְבִים—] Hitzig translates: "the valley of the opposite heights," formed by mountains standing over against one another (1 Sam. xvii. 3); he reads יַרְהֵקִים, and makes a very far-fetched reference to Zech. xiv. 4, 5! According to Hävernicks, the passage reminds of Joel iii. (the valley of Jehoshaphat), but the name belongs purely to the idea, to which it entirely corresponds, for a "valley of the passers-through" is not found elsewhere in the Old Testament; but the prophet himself gives a threefold explanation of the name—in ver. 11, as an annoyance, an object of horror for the passers-by; in ver. 14 reminding of the men that pass through the land to cleanse it; and thirdly, of the hostile bands that formerly passed through here. Only the latter reference can come into consideration if the traditional punctuation is to be retained, and the appellation: "valley of the passers-through," is, like the "valley of the multitude of Gog," to be considered as given as a memorial of what had taken place. The text, however, seems rather to suppose a valley which can be designated as that "of the passers-through," and, because it can be a valley for the passers-through, is fitted to be a burial-place for Gog and his followers; moreover, גִּי, "low ground," may remind us of עֵלָה, etc. in ch. xxxviii. 10, אֶעֱלֶה in ver. 11, etc., as a contrast thereto. Gog and his bands can be beheld in their Scythian prototypes (as described by Herodotus), as well as with reference to "passing through" (passing by), because their whole appearance was to be merely that of a passing thunder-cloud (ch. xxxviii. 9, 16); nothing was abiding except their grave. That which Jehovah will give to Gog as מְקוֹם־שֵׁם קָבֵר, is more exactly described by גִּי הָעֲבָרִים and "the valley of the passers-through," again, is the one fitted to be "the valley of the tumult of Gog." The situation of this is more exactly fixed, and consequently conceived of as an actual locality, by הָיָם הַקְרִימָה, which (קְרִימָה, stat. constr. prefixed as a preposition) can yield no other meaning than: east of the sea. But the context tells nothing about what sea is spoken of, although in other instances it always fixes the particular sea, and indicates when it does not expressly mention the nearest. Hence, and so also with גִּי הָעֲבָרִים, we are referred to the idea which upholds and animates the whole with its symbolic character. בְּיַרְאֵל excludes only the Red Sea. Ewald translates thus: "as a place where a grave in Israel is possible (!), the valley of the devourers opposite the sea, and which confines the breath of travellers;" and he understands thereby "the frightful, unhealthy valley opposite the Dead Sea (ch. xlvii. 8), which covers the proud of old, the Sodomites, and still has its name from them, and the smell of which, even far off, stops up the nose of travellers (Rev. xx. 10; comp. with ch. xiv. 10)." There can be no doubt that when expositors understand here the Dead Sea, its designation as הָיָם הַקְרִימָה is floating in their mind. Hitzig's objection, that the valley did not as yet, and never did, generally bear the name, is of no weight, when the only thing that comes into consideration is, whether Jehovah in the prophet can say of it עֲבָרִים. The introduction of "proud" is far-fetched, unfounded. Keil, who makes the valley to be "without a doubt the valley of the Jordan above the Dead Sea" (so also SCHMIEDER: "the valley of salt, on the extreme border of the land of Israel, near Mount Seir (comp. ch. xxxv. 2), reminds us of a defeat of the Edomites (comp. Ps. lx., David's psalm of victory), and of Chedorlaomer, Lot, and Abraham (Gen. xiv.); and the adjacent Dead Sea is the abiding type of all divine judgments"!), denies, under appeal to Gen. ii. 14, that קְרִימָה

terranean Sea is by no means excluded by the fact that "the whole land of Israel lay east of the Mediterranean," for קְרִימָה הָיָם can very well be made parallel with בְּיַרְאֵל, just to qualify the description, especially if we would reflect on the apocalyptic signification of the sea as the fluctuating life of nations! Keil's exposition of the הָעֲבָרִים, as referring to the "travellers (?) who pass through the land, or more particularly those who pass over from Peræa to Canaan," has no significance for the explanation from the type of the Scythians, or from Ezekiel's description of Gog's expedition (see above), and also very little significance in itself, as it is supported by no other passage of the Old Testament. What is affirmed by the expression regarding the valley: הָחֻסְמָת, etc., is made quite clear by the following phrase: וְקָבְרוּ שָׁם, etc., whether we assume a reference to ver. 14 sq., or infer from ver. 12 sq. who are the buriers as also the callers (וְקָבְרוּ), or simply render it: they bury and they call it. The עֲבָרִים are of course the same as those alluded to in גִּי הָעֲבָרִים. By the valley in question they (Gog and his bands) are hemmed, shut up, enclosed, bridled in, which is the meaning of חָסָם (Deut. xxv. 4); it is, as it were, their muzzle (מַחְסוֹם, Ps. xxxix. 2 [1]), after all their "words" which rose up, ch. xxxviii. 10. It cannot be a "blocking up of the way" that is spoken of, when it is plainly said: "the passers-through." Their grave in the valley is the stopping and finishing of them and their going up. A blocking up of the way for travellers can hardly be thought of, since—and perhaps not without significance, as we shall see—the following representation in ver. 14 sq. supposes an unhindered passing through in the land. [The Sept. dreamt of a walling round of the unclean place. Hitzig, indeed, does the same.] Hengstenberg, too, removes the valley, on account of its name, to "the great commercial and military road,"—the one, namely, "between Egypt and the Euphrates,"—and seeks to show from HERGT (Palästina, p. 77) that it is the valley of Megiddo, famed as a battlefield; the expression: "east of the sea," implies that "a well-known and celebrated valley pretty near the sea" must be meant, such as Megiddo, a narrow pass or region abounding in ravines, which hinder the passers-through. Such passes, he observes, are found there. In this "dangerous locality the prophet makes Gog be overtaken by the divine judgment." But where is that said in the text which simply makes Gog be buried there? In all probability, says Hengstenberg, Lejun (Legio), the later name of Megiddo, is derived from our passage, corresponding to the multitude here (tumult); and this is the more probable, as in ver. 16 the adjacent city also will receive the name "great multitude." Since the prophecy regarding Gog (he goes on to say) was during the Roman rule certainly applied pre-eminently to it, men eagerly anticipated the time when the great heathen grave at Megiddo should receive the Roman legions. Hengstenberg further observes: "From הַמֶּן (ver. 11) is formed the Kuamun of Judith vii. 3, to which the camp of Holofernes extends; and so also Kaumuna is, according to the Onom. of Eusebius, six Roman miles from Legio." Rashi, following the Chaldee paraphrase, places the valley to the east of the Sea of Tiberias (Lake of Gennesaret), and Basban (בִּית שָׁבַן, "house of rest"), as named by the Greeks Σουδαίος, has been said to favour this. This latter name is certainly inconceivable from "Succothpolis" (as Grimm on 1 Macc. v. 52 still maintains), yet it requires no settlement of Scythians in the seventh century B.C.; but from the population, in great part heathen, which settled there during the Babylonian exile, the name may have become current in the post-Maccabean age, while the exposition or application of our prophecy, particularly ver. 16, may also have had some influence in the matter (see Häv. p. 599 sq.). Comp. besides, ch. xxxi. 18, xxxii. 31; on הַמֶּן, ch. xxxii. 42. A kind of pendant to this, ch. xxvi. 13!

Ver. 12. Since קֶבֶר בְּיִשְׂרָאֵל (ver. 11) is the main element in the description, this קֶבֶר is repeated immediately, and again in Ver. 13. First, the house of Israel is mentioned, and then the whole people of the land; neither of these have needed to fight. Their enemies fell by Jehovah, who has left nothing for them to do but to bury. —According to this parallelism of the two verses, the clause: in order to cleanse the land (the number seven, as in ver. 9), will have to be illustrated by the statement: and it is to them for a name; hence, that the cleansing of the land from the dead bodies, and the zeal displayed therein (ver. 14 sq.), will cause the people of the land to be named, to wit, a holy people, or will thereby make them a name. [Häv.: "As the people thoroughly separated from heathenism." HENGST.: "That the house of Israel should bury the foe, not the reverse, serves them for fame; which, however, has its root not in themselves, but in their God, who can deliver from death, and send destruction on their enemies."] Comp. moreover, ch. xxxiv. 29. As there: blessing instead of reproach, so here: holiness instead of the former uncleannesses of Israel. Those now cleanse the land with all diligence who formerly defiled it with all manner of abominations, etc. Perhaps there is also an allusion to the name Israel

(בֵּית יִשְׂרָאֵל, ver. 12), intimating that this people wrestles with God, and therefore prevails! יוֹם, on the day, accusative of the time of Jehovah's glorification of Himself by the overthrow of Gog, and, finally, by his grave in Israel.

Ver. 14. To be understood in the sacred interest of the cleansing of the land. — "Men of constant continuance" (תָּמִיד) are appointed to the office permanently, or at least for a lengthened period. There are two kinds of them: "the passers-through in the land" (antithetical to Gog's "passing through"), and those who bury with the "passers-through," i.e. as ver. 15 explains, with their help, and following the marks they set up.—הַנִּפְתָּרִים (Niphal particip. from יָתַר) are those who, notwithstanding the seven months' burying, still remain on the face of the land, forgotten, neglected corpses or skeletons. Therefore, after the expiration of the seven months, the appointed men that have been spoken of enter on their office.—Ver. 15. It can hardly be without intention that the קֶבֶר is thus repeated, and so strongly emphasized: וְעָבְרוּ הַעֹבְרִים. These

"passers-through" for the purpose of burying are set in characteristic contrast to the "passers-through" who passed through the land.—וְהָאֵהָ, etc. explains, by way of example, the task of the "passers-through." After seven months it must indeed be עָצֵם יָצִיק—עָצֵם is a guide-post of stone—

here as a mark for the buriers proper. But all comes finally into the one great grave of Gog.—Ver. 16. The great burying still perpetuates itself in the name of a city: הַמֶּנָּה, an echo of הַמֶּן.

Thus what has taken place lives on with posterity. Comp. besides on ver. 11. [SCHMIEDER: "There could not be an inhabited city in this valley of the dead; it must be a city which consists not of houses but of graves."] The cleansing of the land, however, remains the chief thing; hence it is again added by way of conclusion.

Ver. 17, linking on to ver. 4, does not bring forward a parallel to the burying of Gog and his bands. We have rather to think of something that came in immediately after Gog's fall on the mountains of Israel. A further carrying out of the statement: "to birds of prey," etc. in ver. 4. But Gog's grave in Israel is the divine monument, the actual token, that Jehovah is the Holy One in Israel (ver. 7); and this result, this old truth, Israel at the same time proves on his part with all zeal, through the repeated and finally emphasized burying in order to cleanse the land. Now, as the skeletons are buried in that valley, so, on the other hand, the flesh of them is immediately devoured on the mountains of Israel by the birds and beasts of prey. Not only is Israel to prove itself a holy nation, a nation of priests, but Jehovah will forthwith, on the fall of Gog, make known His holiness in the land, in the midst of Israel (ch. xxxvii. 26 sq.); and נִבְחִי, etc., the likewise repeatedly-mentioned "sacrifice," will have to be taken in connection with this. It has been commonly observed that Ezekiel had in view only Jer. xvi. 10; Isa. xxxiv. 6; but comp. also Zeph. i. 7. Jehovah as Sacrificer. That "the Lord takes for Himself the sacrifice refused to Him," whereby the idea of the cherem, the contrast of the sacrifice, is introduced, has been dragged into the text by Hengstenberg. The sacrifice (זֶבַח) is, however, expressly declared to be the "sacrifice which I have killed for you" (ver. 19). In this way the idea of sacrifice is essentially resolved into that of the sacrificial feast connected with the זֶבַח (ch. xxix. 5, xxxi.

13, xxxii. 4 sq.; Rev. xix. 17). Jehovah as Host, who sends forth the invitation by the prophets. There is no want of food or of drink. Ver. 18 makes prominent, in this respect, נְבוֹרִים (ch. xxxii. 12, 27), captains, and נְיָאֵי הָאָרֶץ (princes of the earth); comp. Rev. xix. 18; and also in the following figurative expression: פָּרִים (bulls), strengthened by מִרְאֵי בָשָׁן בָּלֶם (fatlings of Bashan all of them).

(since Bashan, renowned for its fat meadows, is often applied in the prophets to proud, despotic, wanton enemies of God and His people; comp. also Ps. xxii. 13 [12]), enlarges upon those set forth at the beginning. There is, besides, a comparison with the small cattle fit for sacrifice, on which Schmieder observes: "for food to the beasts, as the flesh of the sacrificial animals for the priests."—Ver. 19 (ch. xvi. 28, xxiii. 33) describes a lavish sacrificial banquet. לֶשְׁכָּנָה, continued still more definitely by וְלִשְׁכָּנָה, etc., in Ver. 20.—

Jehovah's table is the battlefield.—If רֶכֶב along-side of כוֹס is "chariot," then, of course, the fighters in chariots are meant. Hitzig will not admit the supposition of chariots of war in respect to the Scythians. Hence others think of "cavalry" (GESEN.) or "cart-horses."—בָּבוֹר, from ver. 18, whoever has proved himself brave, like the captains, as distinguished from whom מִלְחָמָה, the equipped and practised men of war individually.

Ver. 21. On בָּבוֹרִי (My glory), comp. pp. 40, 52. Even until the final judgment over the world—yea, how significantly here!—does the leading thought of Ezekiel's prophecy sound forth perceptibly; in respect to the heathen, explained by the clause: and all the heathen see, etc., it lies before their eyes (ch. xxxviii. 23); comp. Rev. xvi. 7. יָדִי is inferred from עֵינֵיהֶם.—Ver.

22. The converse relation, to wit, to Israel. In this relation the text notes the knowledge of Jehovah as Israel's God, the God of them who belong to Israel (אֱלֹהֵיהֶם, וְיָדְעוּ), and that by

His having manifested Himself as such in the final judgment and thenceforth; hence an abiding relation that can no more be disturbed. The יָדְעוּ (ver. 22) now leads over in Ver. 23 to a corresponding knowledge, in addition to the יָדְעוּ, ver. 21, on the part of the heathen also. From the end Jehovah directs their regard back to their oppression of Israel, by carrying them away captive. The heathen now know that their power over Israel was Israel's guilt, defined more particularly as מַעַל, etc. (comp. on ch. xiv. 13), their unfaithfulness to Jehovah, in consequence of which Jehovah hid His face from them (Deut. xxxi. 17), and abandoned them (comp. ch. xvi. 27). בָּלֶם, in general, exceptis excipiendis.—Ver.

24 (ch. xxxvi. 17 sq., xiv. 11). Comp. ch. vii. 27.

Hengstenberg sees in vers. 25-29 a "close of the whole system of prophecies of a predominantly comforting character, from ch. xxxiii. 21 (?) onward, as the prophet had already closed complete sections with a like finale." After the heathen are pointed back to the past, the application is made with לָכֵן, therefore (because Jehovah has dealt with them as in ver. 24), to the present (עַתָּה) of Israel.—Comp. on ch. xvi. 53.—Jacob corresponding as much to "misery" as Israel to "pity;" a significant alternation. Comp. ch. xxxvi. 5, 6, 21 sq.; comp. first on ver. 7.—Ver. 26. וְנָשָׂו, etc. [HENGST.: "they take upon them, sq."] is to be read: נִשְׂאוּ. Comp. ch. xvi. 54.

Jehovah's jealousy for His holy name (ver. 25) shows itself among Israel subjectively in, as well as objectively on them. Because their guilt against Jehovah (ver. 23 sq.) shall be known, as by the heathen so by themselves, and fully only by themselves, they bear their misery as their reproach (בְּלִמְחָם); hence to reproach is added unfaithfulness, etc. (ver. 23). Only they appear miserable (ver. 21); only Jehovah appears glorious. Where deserved punishment comes over them, righteousness appears before Jehovah: they exhibit themselves as worthy of reproach, obliged to reproach themselves because of their faithlessness; Jehovah manifests Himself as holy, but, at the same time, as their God (ver. 22), faithful in pity as in judgment, who will turn aside their misery (ver. 25). Their reproach and all their unfaithfulness must burden them so much the more from the very fact that they dwell securely, etc. Comp. on ch. xxviii. 25, 26, xxxiv. 28. This humbling grace is the objective practical proof of Jehovah's jealousy over them, which Ver. 27, stretching back beyond ver. 26, and casting a glance at their desire during the present state of exile, follows out farther. [Hitzig, who reads וְנָשָׂו, translates: "and they shall forget their reproach," which they have hitherto borne. It has also been proposed to translate: they shall "take away," i.e. expiate, etc. Ewald would admit the rendering: "they bear," if we were to read מִכָּל for כָּל; and so he too translates: "that they may forget their shame," etc., and assumes a play of words, because "in fact the whole is a play of words upon the Chaldeans."—בְּשִׁבְתָּם has been understood by others, e.g. Grotius: "when they dwell."]

For the rest, comp. as to ver. 27, ch. xxxviii. 8, xxxvii. 21, xxxvi. 23 sq., xx. 41.—Ver. 28 (ver. 22).—Ewald wrests בְּהִנְלֹתִי, etc. into its direct opposite, for, reading מִן instead of מֵ, he now finds the sense to be: "in that I caused them to return from among the heathen." The context certainly does not compel him to this. On the contrary, it suggests the significant parallel: אֵל, אֵל.—Ch. xxii. 21.—אֲחִיר, comp. ch. vi. 8,

xii. 16. Hengstenberg observes on this: "after the fall of the Chaldean monarchy, access to their native land was free to all Israel, and those who voluntarily remained yet had in Canaan their home, and in the temple at Jerusalem their spiritual dwelling-place."—Ver. 29. Comp. vers. 23, 24. A promise of never-failing grace on account of (מֵאֵשׁ, "because") God's having poured out His Spirit, where formerly His "fury," e.g.

ch. xiv. 19, xxii. 22; comp. on ch. xxxvi. 27; but here more significant, as perhaps הָיָה indicates. Ewald remarks on the "ebullient language," although he expounds the outpouring of the Spirit to this effect: that Israel, "just because including in it from of old the Divine Spirit, is the indefeasible foundation of the true Church." Comp. Isa. xxxii. 15, 16, xlv. 3; Joel ii. 28 (ch. iii. 1 sq.). SCHMIEDER: "Spoken in anticipation of the time which the Lord promises. And the Lord, through Jesus after His glorification, actually poured out the Spirit in Jerusalem, according to His promise. But the house of Israel would not; and is the spiritual Israel of Christendom more thankful to God?"

ADDITIONAL NOTE ON CH. XXXVIII., XXXIX.

[Ezekiel's object in the chapters before us was, "through the Spirit, to present a picture of what might be expected in the last scenes of the world's history; and according to the native bent and constitution of his mind, the picture must be lifelike. Not only must it be formed of the materials of existing relations, but it must be formed into a perspective with manifold and intricate details; yet so constructed and arranged, that while nothing but the most superficial eye could look for a literal realization, the great truths and prospects embodied in it should be patent to the view of all. What, then, are these? Let it be remembered at what point it is in Ezekiel's prospective exhibitions that this prophecy is brought in. He has already represented the covenant-people as recovered from all their existing troubles, and made victorious over all their surrounding enemies. The best in the past has again revived in their experience, freed even from its former imperfections, and secured against its ever-recurring evils. For the new David, the all-perfect and continually-abiding Shepherd, presides over them, and at once prevents the outbreaking of internal disorders, and shields them from the attacks of hostile neighbours. All around, therefore, is peace and quietness; the old enemies vanish from the field; Israel dwells securely in his habitation. But let it not be supposed that the conflict is over, and that the victory is finally won. It is a world-wide dominion which this David is destined to wield, and the kingdom of righteousness and peace established at the centre must expand and grow till it embrace the entire circumference of the globe. But will Satan yield his empire without a struggle? Will he not rather, when he sees the kingdom of God taking firmer root and rising to a higher elevation, seek to effect its dismemberment or its downfall, by stirring up in hostile array against it the multitudinous and gigantic forces that lie scattered in the extremities of the earth? Assuredly he will do so; and God also will direct events into this channel, in order to break effectually the power of the adversary, and secure the diffusion of Jehovah's truth and the glory of His name to the remotest regions. A conflict, therefore, must ensue between the embattled forces of heathenism, gathered out of their far-distant territories, and the nation that holds the truth of God. But the issue is certain. For God's people being now holiness to Him, He cannot but fight with them and give success to their endeavours. So that the arm of heathenism shall be completely broken. Its mightiest efforts only end in the more signal display of its own weakness, as compared with the truth and cause of God; and the name of God as the Holy One of Israel is magnified and feared to the utmost bounds of the earth.

"Such is the general course and issue of things as marked out in this prophecy, under the form and aspect of what belonged to the Old Covenant, and its relation to the world as then existing. But stripping the vision of this merely temporary and imperfect exterior, since now the higher objects and relations of the New Covenant have come, we find in the prophecy the following series of important and salutary truths. 1. In the first place, while the appearance of the new David to take the rule and presidency over God's heritage would have the effect of setting His people free from the old troubles and dangers which had hitherto assailed them, and laying sure and broad the foundations of their peace, it should be very far from securing them against all future conflicts with evil. It would rather tend to call up other adversaries, and enlarge the field of conflict, so as to make it embrace the most distant and barbarous regions of the earth. For the whole earth is Christ's heritage, and sooner or later it must come to an issue between the adherents of His cause and the children of error and corruption. Though the latter might have no thought of interfering with the affairs of Christ's kingdom, and would rather wish to pursue their own courses undisturbed (see on xxxviii. 4), yet the Lord will not permit them to do so. He must bring the light of heaven into contact with their darkness; so as to necessitate a trial of strength between the powers of evil working in them, and the truth and grace of God as displayed in the kingdom of Christ. 2. From the very nature of the case, this trial would fall to be made on a very large scale, and with most gigantic resources; for the battlefield now is the world to its farthest extremities, and the question to be practically determined is, whether God's truth or man's sin is to have possession of the field. So that all preceding contests should appear small, and vanish out of sight, in comparison of this last great struggle, in which the world's destiny was to be decided for good or evil. Hence it seemed, in the distance, as if not thousands, as formerly, but myriads upon myriads, numbers without number, were to stand here in battle array. 3. Though the odds in this conflict could not but appear beforehand very great against the people and cause of Christ, yet the result should be entirely on their side; and simply because with them is the truth and the might of Jehovah. Had it been only carnal resources that were to be brought into play on either side, victory must inevitably have been with those whose numbers were so overwhelmingly great. But these being only flesh, and not spirit, they must fall before the omnipotent energy of the living God, who can make His people more than conquerors over all that is against them. And so in this mighty conflict, in which all that the powers of darkness could muster from the world was to stand, as it were, front to front with the people of God, there were to be found remaining only, on the part of the adversaries, the signs of defeat and ruin. 4.

Lastly, as all originated in the claim of Messiah and His truth to the entire possession of the world, so the whole is represented as ending in the complete establishment of the claim. The kingdom through every region of the earth becomes the Lord's. He is now universally known and sanctified as the God of truth and holiness. It is understood at last, that it was His zeal for the interests of righteousness which led Him to chastise in former times His own professing people; and that the same now has induced Him to render them triumphant over every form and agency of evil. And now, all counter rule and authority being put down, all disturbing elements finally hushed to rest, the prospect stretches out before the Church of eternal peace and blessedness, in what have at length become the new heavens and the new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.

"It may still, perhaps, seem strange to some, if this be the real meaning and import of the vision, that the prophet should have presented it under the aspect of a single individual gathering immense forces from particular regions, and at the head of these fighting in single conflict, and falling on the land of Israel. They may feel it difficult to believe that a form so concrete and fully developed should have been adopted, if nothing more local and specific had been intended. But let such persons look back to other portions of this book, especially to what is written of the king of Tyre in ch. xxviii. (which in form, perhaps, most nearly resembles the prophecy before us), and judge from the shape and aspect there given to the past, whether it is not in perfect accordance with the ascertained characteristics of Ezekiel's style to find him giving here such a detailed and fleshly appearance to the future. There Tyre is not only viewed as personified in her political head, but that head is represented as passing through all the experiences of the best and highest of humanity. It is, as we showed, a historical parable, in which every feature is admirably chosen, and pregnant with meaning, but all of an ideal and not a literal or prosaic kind. And what is the present vision, as now explained, but a prophetic parable, in which, again, every trait in the delineation is full of important meaning, only couched in the language of a symbolical representation? Surely we must concede to the prophet, what we would never think of withholding from a mere literary author, that he has a right to employ his own method; and that the surest way of ascertaining this is to compare one part of his writings with another, so as to make the better known reflect light upon the less known—the delineations of the past upon the visions of the future.

"At the same time, let us not be understood as declaring for certain that the delineation in this prophecy must have nothing to do with any particular crisis or decisive moment in the Church's history. It is perfectly possible that in this case, as in most others, there may be a culminating point, at which the spiritual controversy is to rise to a gigantic magnitude, and virtually range on either side all that is good and all that is evil in the world. It may be so; I see nothing against such a supposition in the nature of the prophecy; but I must add, I see nothing conclusively for it. For when we look back to the other prophecy just referred to, we find the work of judgment represented as taking effect upon Tyre, precisely as if it were one individual that was concerned, and one brief period of his history; while still we know blow after blow was required, and even age after age, to carry forward and consummate the process. Perfectly similar, too, was the case of Babylon, as described in the thirteenth and fourteenth chapters of Isaiah; it seems as if almost one act were to do the whole, yet how many instruments had a hand in it, and over how many centuries was the work of destruction spread! We see no necessity in the form of the representation, or in the nature of things, why it should be otherwise here; none, at least, why a different mode of reaching the result should be expected as certain. We believe that as the judgment of Tyre began when the first breach was made in the walls by Nebuchadnezzar, and as the judgment of Babylon began when the Medes and Persians entered her two-leaved gates, so the controversy with Gog and his heathenish forces has been proceeding since Christ, the new David, came to lay the everlasting foundations of His kingdom, and asserted His claim to the dominion of the earth as His purchased possession. Every stroke that has been dealt since against the idolatry and corruption of the world is a part of that great conflict which the prophet in vision saw collected as into a single locality, and accomplished in a moment of time. He would thus more clearly assure us of the certainty of the result. And though, from the vast extent of the field, and the many imperfections that still cleave to the Church, there may be much delay and many partial reverses experienced in the process; though there may, too, at particular times, be more desperate struggles than usual between the powers of evil in the world and the confessors of the truth, when the controversy assumes a gigantic aspect, yet the prophecy is at all times proceeding onwards in its accomplishment. Let the Church therefore do her part, and be faithful to her calling. Let her grasp with a firm hand the banner of truth, and in all lands display it in the name of her risen Lord. And whichever way He may choose to finish and consummate the process,—whether by giving fresh impulses to the hearts of His people, and more signally blessing the work of their hands, or by shining forth in visible manifestations of His power and glory, such as may at once and for ever shame into confusion the adversaries of His cause and kingdom,—leaving this to Himself, to whom it properly belongs, let the blessed hope of a triumphant issue animate every Christian bosom, and nerve every Christian arm to maintain the conflict, and do all that zeal and love can accomplish to hasten forward the final result."—FAIRBAIRN'S Ezekiel, pp. 425-430.—W. F.]

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. With our two chapters the prophecy of Ezekiel passes over to the apocalyptic (comp. Introd. pp. 19, 20. Comp. in general what is said by Lange in the introduction to the Revelation of St. John, p. 2 sq.). Characteristic apocalyptic features as to form and contents are perceptible, just as the very circumstance that the New Testament Apocalypse begins with the transition of ch. xxxvii. to ch. xxxviii., to borrow important (eschatological) elements for its closing visions, must suggest something apocalyptic. The prophetic element, the element of doctrine and of application, still pervades ch. xxxviii., xxxix., but this element will subside, ch. xl. sq.; and our chapters, too, present to us and delineate a tableau of unity,—the impressive picture of a national expedition, a migration of nations, a battle of nations, and still more of God. Although contained in the word of prophecy ("Thus saith the Lord"), yet the description of the march of the army (ch. xxxviii.), and of its fearful overthrow in Israel (ch. xxxix.), assumes, as elsewhere, the appearance of a vision. Scene succeeds scene. The style is typical to such a degree, that what of historical from the past or present may here form the basis, assumes at once the form of pure symbols, whose idea stretches far beyond the Old Testament theocracy, and on to the end of time. The consummation of Israel shows itself as the consummation of the world. The contrast of the world to Israel is in our chapters not so much the traditional one of the heathen as opposed to the people of God, as course callousness, resembling insensibility, in relation to the peace in which the royal priesthood, the people of the possession of an eternal covenant of Jehovah (ch. xxxvii. 26), delight themselves. Compare the impressions and utterances of Balaam in Num. xxiii. 9, 10, so very different from ch. xxxviii. 11 sq.! On the other hand, the impelling force to the savage irruption into the quietness of such a people in the land is appropriately conceived, viz. on the one part, as divine compulsion of the Judge overruling to the end in view, it is high as heaven (but comp. ch. xxxviii. 4 with xxxviii. 10 sq.); on the other part, as demoniac selfishness and worldly-mindedness, it is deep as hell. Considering the apocalyptic character of our two chapters, with which the remainder of the book of Ezekiel announces itself, the suddenness of Gog's appearance on the scene and also of his overthrow is worthy of observation, reminding us of the ἡ ἔκστασις (Luke xviii. 8), and of the oft-repeated ἡ ἔκστασις of the Revelation of St. John, and also of the final completeness of the judgment and its execution.

2. Hengstenberg has very justly observed: "We have here a good preparation for the exposition of the vision of the new temple." But what he pronounces a specialty of Ezekiel,—how "wide a space" is given by him to "painting," how "attentive" he is "to fill the imagination with holy figures,"—depends rather on the apocalyptic character of the prophecy regarding Gog. Moreover, to confront the imagination of timidity with the imagination of faith, to pour forth light and comfort in opposition to thoughts despairing of the future, is precisely a mark of all apocalypse proper. Lange says beautifully and strikingly of apocalypses in this respect: "As they have proceeded from the divine quieting and comforting of a longing of the hearts of elect prophets, which flamed aloft in times of great oppression of the kingdom of God, so they are also designed to direct and guide, to comfort and calm, in the first place, the servants of God, and through them the Church, in times of similar and fresh oppression in the future—nay, even to change for them all tokens of terror into tokens of hope and promise."

3. In Hengstenberg's interpretation, at all events, not only does the "so-called biblical realism" entirely disappear, to which, as he says, it so often happens to take the garb for the man, but, as the exposition has already incidentally indicated, the nations named in ch. xxxviii., although in themselves historical, appear in the connection here as elements of an idea which is summed up in the symbolic Gog of the land of Magog, namely, as the last outbreak of enmity against the kingdom of God. This symbolized idea is at all events also historical—nay, even world-historical in the highest sense, or pertaining to the universal judgment. The world's history is theocratically determined by it, determined by the kingdom of God finally developing itself into the consummation of humanity and the world. But Magog, Gomer, Meshech, Tubal, Sheba, Dedan, and Phut are as such no longer historically to be found. Of Cush Hengstenberg asserts: that it is "a Christian people, and such a one as, according to recent experience, will scarcely again attain to world-wide influence."

4. As Grotius and others, e.g. Jahn (Introd. ii.), interpret of the days of the Maccabees and Antiochus Epiphanes, so Luther found in our chapters the Turk, who, even in the hymns and prayers of the Church, was for a long time firmly held to be, together with the Pope, the chief enemy of German Christianity. While individual Jewish expositors apply what is said sometimes to Rome, and sometimes interpret it of the Crusades, yet we find also in Shabb. cxviii. 1; Berach. vii. 2; the Jerusalem Targum on Num. xi. 25; Deut. xxxiv. 2, Gog shifted into the times previous to the Messiah, and the battle, in which the Messiah annihilates Gog, discoursed of. Likewise, in reference to the Messianic kingdom, the Sibylline books speak of Gog and Magog, placing him in the farthest south of Egypt (see Hävernick, p. 602). In the notices which the Koran makes of Dzu-Ikarnayn, i.e. Alexander the Great and his adventurous warlike expeditions (Sur. 18 and 21), Yagug and Magug are designated as mischief-makers on earth, and enclosed by an iron wall; which, however, will be at last turned to dust, whereupon Gog and Magog break forth, and the universal judgment ensues. (SPRENGER: Das Leben und die Lehre des Mohammed, ii. p. 474 sq.) "The fear of these northern nations," says W. Menzel, "is very ancient, and has been justified by the Scythian, and afterwards by the Hunnish-Mongolian warlike expeditions, which have already often overrun both Europe and Asia; and this Oriental popular tradition coincides (!) with the widespread German tradition of the armies of Charlemagne or Barbarossa sleeping in the mountain, which will burst forth at the end of the world, and conquer a new golden age."

5. Hävernick adduces the following reasons for the interpretation of the time as the time of the completion of the kingdom of God. (1.) The names, which do not so much indicate single nations then existing, as that we have to do with a "view of future new relations only starting from the present." "Whatever far remote, more or less known, national names can be named, the prophet collects here; and specially important is the free formation of the name Gog." (2.) The connection with ch. xxxvi., xxxvii. represents the way prepared for the glorification and completion of the theocracy; the judgment over Edom (ch. xxxv.) is regarded as having taken place, in which old hereditary enemy, the enemies hitherto of the covenant-people appear judged in their immediate neighbourhood. It still remains, however, "to marshal the entire (?) world-power in its sinful insurrection against God (?), and thus to perfect the salvation," just as this idea lies at the foundation of the fourth, the Roman empire, prophesied by Daniel, the contemporary of Ezekiel (EUSEB. Demonstr. Ev. ix. 3). (3.) The prophetic denunciation of heathen nations always regards them as representatives and supporters of definite ideas,—in Edom the hitherto antitheocratic tendency, in our prophecy the idea of future enmity as experienced by Israel in the completion of its salvation. (4.) The fulfilment is, in ch. xxxviii. 8, 16, expressly placed in the latter days. (5.) The announcements of former prophets, referred to in ch. xxxviii. 17, point to the judgment of the last day, just as also the prophet's picture is made to conform with those models. (6.) Lastly, the resumption of the subject in Rev. xx.—It tells particularly for the apocalyptic character of the representation given by Gog, that it is pervaded not only by reminiscences of Assyrians and Chaldeans—of Edom only locally, indeed ("on the mountains of Israel," comp. on this point ch. xxxv. with ch. xxxvi.)—but also by presentiments of much later heathen powers. For it is quite in the apocalyptic way and manner always to present to us types stamped anew from history as it gravitates towards the end of the world.

6. In the Introduction, p. 19, the importance of Ezekiel's position in the midst of the Babylonian world, and with that his acquaintance with foreign nations and their relations, have been adverted to. In Babylon, if anywhere, there was a standing-place for surveying the rolling waves of the sea of nations. The prediction regarding Gog, peculiar to our prophet, will have to be conceived of as to its human side from his peculiar abode on such a watch-tower in the midst of the heathen. Philippon justly observes: "We must remember that Ezekiel was placed in the midst of the inner-Asiatic world, and hence had opportunity of observing the great movements therein. Here, in the bosom of the national movements of Asia, it must have been clear to the prophet that these movements were far from having reached their end, that the dynasties would still change often, and that these concussions could not fail to affect also the countries on the Mediterranean." At all events, although our prophecy is not the result of the incidental observations, the far-sighted political reflections, etc., of a gifted man, yet, as the magnificent architecture of Nebuchadnezzar might furnish Ezekiel with views for ch. xl. sq., so the fluctuating sea of nations, which he saw and heard of in Babylonia, may perhaps have furnished him with the colours in which he paints the figure of Gog and his bands.

7. Our prophecy has been explained from the very natural question after ch. xxxvii.—will this peace of Israel continue always undisturbed? will the relations of the rest of the world take such a shape that Israel can remain in peace? So Philippon. "The dogmatic idea of the prophecy," says Hengstenberg, "is very simple: the community of God, renewed by His grace, will victoriously resist all the assaults of the world. This idea the prophet has here clothed with flesh and blood," etc. The prophecy, then, is more or less a parable. We come back to this. "The starting-point," continues Hengstenberg, "is the fear which penetrates the sick heart. What avails it, is the question that met the prophet, even if we recover, according to thy announcement, from the present catastrophe? The predominance of the heathen still remains. Soon shall we sink under another attack into permanent ruin. Against such desponding thoughts the prophet here offers comfort. He unites all the battles which the restored community has in future still to endure into one great battle, and makes this be decided by one glorious victory of the Lord and His people." The latter is as arbitrary as what has been said regarding the idea of the prophecy is general and superficial. Hävernick, connecting with ch. xxxvii., says: "How powerful that protection is which the Lord accords to the new glorified theocracy, is shown by its new relation to the heathen world and its power. The holy people are truly an unassailable, inviolable possession of their God. As such, Israel in its glory is the grandest, the most thorough victory over the heathen world. Hence the future of Israel stands in the most striking contrast to its present. While heathendom is now an instrument in the hand of Jehovah for the chastisement and purification of Israel, then comes the time when Israel's destiny is fulfilled, namely, to execute the final judgment on heathendom. In it is then revealed the completion of the victory of the kingdom of God over the heathen world-power." However much of what has been said is right and proper, yet the reason assigned by Hävernick for "this fundamental idea" is not quite satisfactory as he puts it, namely, that "God Himself occasions the battle (the last rallying of the power of heathendom to annihilate the kingdom of God), that His judgment may in it be revealed." God, however, will judge only that which, whether in self-righteousness (Pharisaism), or in worldliness (Sadducism), has, by the rejection of His counsel of salvation in Christ, shown itself ripe for judgment. In connection with this subjective ripeness for judgment, we are reminded of the deceiving by Satan, Rev. xx. World, or heathendom without further qualification, is not the idea of this so individual prophecy regarding Gog. Lange is entirely in the right when he doubts (Poe. Dogm. p. 1280) whether Gog and Magog represent generally all the future enemies of the kingdom of God; and he gives the hint to the understanding of the chapters before us when he declares: "We must, however, think chiefly of the obscure residue of nations which has not come under the full operation of the kingdom of Christ, of barbarous and haughty tribes."

8. For the explanation of the prophecy before us we have not to search after questions of this or that kind put by Israel, which the prophet was bound to answer, as, indeed, nothing like this is intimated in the text (comp. in opposition on ch. xxxvii.); but Jehovah, in ch. xxxviii. and xxxix., simply sets the end clearly and truly before His people, at that time in Israel, and in this sense we have here ἀποκαλύψις before us. If we want an inscription on the double picture in Ezekiel, ch. xxxviii. and xxxix., there is no more appropriate one than the saying of Christ in Matt. xvi. 18: καὶ πάλαι ἔδωκ' ἐν κατασκευαῖσιν αὐτοῦ—

saying not understood in its apocalyptic significance. If we have to understand ch. xxxvii. in Christ, how much more free from doubt will the proper understanding be when the subject is again referred to in such a manner at the end of ch. xxxix. And so Gog, etc. cannot mean heathenism, or heathenism in the last effects which it may produce, but must mean the obdurate world as opposed to Christianity, the world which has remained farthest away from the spirit and frame of Christianity as we find it described in Ezekiel; the most remote north as opposed to the central in this world (ch. xxxviii. 6, 15; comp. on ver. 12). That which has been maintained regarding the final stiffening down of our planet into ice, has its apocalyptic truth rather in respect of the definitive position of the human heart to Christianity, as possibly our Lord also intimates when He says, Matt. xxiv. 12: δια το σκληρύνειν τινος ἀνθρώπου ψυχὴν γίνεται ἡ ἀνάστα των πολλών. To a finally developed egoism and worldliness, to a materialism ripe for judgment which can no longer think of anything except plunder and robbery, the μαμωνας της ἀδικίας, as opposed to the ideal powers which go to make up Christianity (righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, Rom. xiv. 17), the community of God, the Lord's people, appear—and this Ezekiel plainly pictures out (comp. ch. xxxviii. 12 with ver. 11)—in its meaning and essence a high-flown ideal, which men, after having at least ceased to persecute it, partly because they purely ignore it, and partly because they expect with scientific certitude its collapse, its death, after the manner of the old heathen religions (the πυλαι ἄδου), will have to take down from its height and simply crush with force. This, according to ch. xxxviii., is the position of the world in the time of Gog. If the "millennial kingdom" is to approximate to the picture with which ch. xxxvii. closes, the conception of it will necessarily be very different from what the imagination of many apocalypticists, still adhering to the old Jewish sensuous tradition, dreams it to be. But even in the locus classicus of the millennium, Rev. xx., the putting of Satan in chains is mentioned as the main point for the symbolical thousand years. The binding of him is the necessary preliminary of the millennial kingdom. If he is not to deceive the nations during this time, but after this does so again, then it is clear, even from that to which he afterwards deceives them, that his confinement is above all the cessation of war with violence, of violent combating of the community of God, just as also the immediately following vision of the witnesses unto blood (Rev. xx. 4) seems particularly to point in the same direction. Regarding the "fair reality of the kingdom in its glorious manifestation," the ἰζηνα, certainly distinct from the ἀνιζηνα (ver. 5), only tells us forcibly thus much in relation to a certain number, that they, given over, indeed, to death by the world, are in reality alive (comp. also John xi. 25 sq. with Rev. xx. 6); the "thrones," however, and the "judgment," already express virtually the "reigning as kings," which is only more exactly defined by the expression: "with Christ," and that as a reigning in heaven without any express reference to earth, to which the only reference mentioned is the binding of Satan. But this heavenly vision (ver. 4 sq.) is assuredly meant for comfort, as is the certainty of final victory (comp. moreover, μικρον χρόνον, ver.

3), when Gog and Magog (Rev. xx. 8) march to battle upon the centre of the earth (ver. 9).

9. The misconceptions of the traditional exegesis in respect of the chapters before us, and the corresponding passages in the Revelation of John, thus relate on the one hand to the appearance of Gog, and on the other to the position and state of the true Israel, the Church of Christ, in the last days. With respect to the latter, we have remarked on the idyllic picture in ch. xxxviii.; comp. also the exposition. Rev. xx. 9, by means of το πλάτος της γης (ch. xxxviii. 12) belonging here, points with παριμβολη των ἁγίων and σελις ἡ ἀγαπημένη rather to ch. xl.-xlviii. (at least more to them than to Zech. xiii. 7, 8), if these two Old Testament theocratic designations of Israel are not meant simply to denote the Church, the people of God, without any special reference. Yet, considering the reciprocal action between the unseen world and the seen, especially in the last days, when the transformation of the world is at hand and everything is prepared for it, any reflex whatever of the Church triumphant in heaven will unquestionably affect its earthly compeer, the Church on earth, during the thousand years. If it holds true for this time also that ἄμυν γὰρ το σολιτῆμα ἐν οὐρανῷ ὑπαρχει, ἐξ οὗ sq., according to Phil. iii. 20 sq., then something corresponding in the Church on earth of the last days must run parallel to the life, the enthronement, the reigning with Christ of them who have overcome,—a "time of great peace and festivity," as Lange expresses it, an ideality of life, shining so much the more brightly as the rest of mankind are under the sway of materialism, have become the slaves of enjoyment, and serve Mammon; and if the judgment on the world will be realized in presence of the latter-day community, yet on the other hand a time of final, and perhaps "most successful activity" previous to that may be reckoned upon; comp. in our prophet ch. xxxvii. 28, xxxvi. 36. As the Chaldean world-power of Ezekiel's time, with its "many nations" (ἔθνη), out of which, in the first place,

Israel is gathered, ch. xxxviii. 38 (ver. 12, ἔθνη), is reproduced as Βαβυλων (Rev. xiv. 8, xvii. 5, xviii. 2), so also, as in Ezekiel from the passages cited, not only will "many nations" (Ezek. xxxviii. 16, 23) besides Gog and Magog have to be supposed in the Revelation of John, but the binding also of Satan, "that he should deceive the nations no more" (Rev. xx. 3), suggests the operation of the community of God upon them to bring them to the knowledge of Him. Nay, since Gog, brought up by Jehovah, like Balaam formerly, is in a position to view the people of peace assembled and encamped upon their hills—this view, which can scarcely entice a nation supposed to be rude and barbarous but still simple, may symbolize to us a virtual mission, the latest missionary activity which the community of God on earth, as such, puts forth; so that, alongside of the temptation which leads to being deceived by Satan through the besetting sin of Gog (ch. xxxviii. 10 sq.), who is perfectly conscious of what his heart purposes and expresses in vers. 11, 12, we not only hear the ironical incitements of ver. 13, but above all the aspect of the community of God, virtually giving testimony everywhere of salvation and peace upon this earth, as it lives securely solely by faith in its King, without worldly protection or power, is to be looked upon as a last dispensation and expression of God's long-suffering and grace in relation to Gog, which he in his ripeness for judgment despises (comp. the exposition). That Gog's purpose and expedition are to be aimed directly against God is a feature at least foreign to Gog as drawn by Ezekiel, and has to be inferred even in Rev. xx. 9; for the final attack is rather directly against the people of the Lord, and only indirectly against Himself, who, however, manifests Himself from heaven in behalf of His people.

10. Although the Reformation regained the knowledge of the truth, both as respects the supreme authority, the word of God, and the foundation laid, namely, Christ, yet church life as church life was not reformed, but only the Cæsar Pope succeeded to the Pope Pope. The episcopal power was given over to the hands of the State, and thereby the Church only sank into a new servitude, which was a purely secular one. This may well be called the "Babylonish captivity" of the community of God. Pietism, however much it emphasized life in opposition to creed, furnished the theory for this, since its method is solely to influence and form the individual. Thus the Reformation made no breach with Byzantinism—it may be said that that was not the antithesis of the Reformers; but they left it possible for the State also to become evangelical. As since the Reformation—i.e. the attempt of ecclesiastical reconstruction upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, in which Christ is the corner-stone—the modern sovereign-powers have come forward politically, as Ranke says, so since then, under the title of the gospel, a State-churchism has been more and more developed, which, when compared with the fundamental declaration of Christ regarding His kingdom (John xviii. 36), is no less a caricature of the holy than is the Church-state. If the whore become wife (Rev. xvii.), who formerly rode upon the beast, is finally to be destroyed by the beast, perhaps we are near to this point of time. The complete apocalyptic history of Antichristianism, however (Rev. xiii.), sets also in prospect the case that the spirit of a fallen Christianity, the false prophet, can be active, in the service of the political world-power, to bring about something of the form of a universal world-church, with legally social exclusiveness. The judgment of Antichristianism, as of pseudo-Christianity (Rev. xix. 17 sq.), appears in relation to their adherents as a spiritual, moral destruction, namely, by the sword of Him who sits upon the white horse, and which goes out from His mouth; so that the Antichristian world, slain as with a sword by the word of Christ, which should have reacted them to life, now affords room for the enjoyment of peace and dominion to the quiet community of the latter days. If the description of the closing battle against Christ in the Apocalypse of John, borrowed from Ezek. xxxix. sq., consciously conforms itself to the description given there, that will intimate that it has an affinity with Gog's final war against the Christian Church, that what begins with the Head has to be completed with the members, but that the victory of the King with His army contains in it the assurance of victory for His people to the end. But does not the very fact that rude force like that of Gog and his bands will bring about the conclusion of the development of Christian salvation for this world, also imply the corresponding recompense for the being sunk in materialism, in the common mock-reality of earthly things? And how, then, accordingly do the first heavens and the first earth pass away? It may farther be worth observing, for the social form of the world during the time previous to Gog's making his appearance, that after the judgment in Rev. xix. 17 sq. no "kings of the earth" figure any more, that the Revelation of John significantly renews "Gog and Magog" solely as national titles. The "social democracy" threatened for the future discuss only materialistic themes, just as the science destitute of philosophy labours in a similar sphere. But the victory of Christianity, the absolutely religious truth, will always be on this earth only a spiritual victory. The victory that overcame the world is our faith, 1 John v. 4. Comp. besides, John xviii. 36, which is called, in 1 Tim. vi. 13, the παλι ἡμετέρας τῆς αἰτίας (ver. 12). The idea of a preliminary transformation of the world, even when put into a more real shape, as a mediating transition-period, conformable to the laws of life and to the development of life, remains, however, affected with a certain show, a mere display, the necessity of which is so much the more difficult to see, as Gog, notwithstanding, again comes up over it; and it would be much more in accordance with the moralo-theocratic law of the ripening of mankind for final judgment, that this ripening for judgment should fill up its measure on the quiet community of God, which presents in opposition to the materialistic world and its spirit of the times nothing but its unique ideality in Christ and with Christ—this indeed in a purity and sanctity unsullied by any secularity and worldliness. Comp. ch. xxxvi. 38, xxxvii. 28, and the burying of Gog's dead recorded afterwards, ch. xxxix., in a way that tells for such a character. The church-idyl of Ezekiel in the chapters before us may be compared with the apostolic church of primitive Christianity. The first period and the last, when thus laid together, form a circle.

11. "Neither as to letter or spirit was this prophecy-fulfilled under the Old Covenant, and, moreover, many single passages of it are incapable of being understood in the literal sense. For example, when at the end of ch. xxxix. the Israelites are to be brought back from the lands of their enemies without a single one of them remaining behind, and that God poured out His Spirit on the house of Israel. As the kingdom promised in ch. xxxvi. is in this world, indeed, but not of this world, so the resurrection of the dead in ch. xxxvii. places itself under the saying of Christ, John v. 25," etc. (COCCEIUS).

12. "The enemies of the Old Covenant were curbed; and those of the New, who will once more rise up against the kingdom of the Messiah, are, to the terror of the world, overthrown on the day of judgment, and the New Covenant solemnizes its final victory" (UMBRIT).

13. The appearance of Gog shall be liable to no contingency, and its necessity for the consummation of things is apparent, ch. xxxviii. 4, 8, 16, etc. That even evil intent only serves the cause of God's kingdom is a fundamental view of Holy Scripture.

14. From the symbolical style and character which pervades the chapters before us, a geographical inquiry respecting the burial-place of Gog (ch. xxxix.) will be of little use. All the more

however, may such thoughts suggest themselves as the contrast generally of the low ground, where Gog's lofty purpose makes a grave for himself, with his going up on the mountains of Israel, and then also the contrast of these heights with their security and his grave, which secures against him, confines him. Gog's grave in Israel, lying east of the sea, makes significant allusion to the sea, the apocalyptic term for the birthplace and cradle of the heathen nations; who, moreover, ought not to have found downfall and destruction in Israel, but, on the contrary, sunrise, to which they are described as coming virtually out of darkness and the shadow of death, from the farthest north. That Gog finds his grave in Israel is so much the more striking as Israel himself comes out of his grave in ch. xxxvii.

15. But still more significant is the closing verse of ch. xxxix., which refers back to ch. xxxvii. and xxxvi. What Israel is to be or to signify according to his idea, he becomes only through divine sanctification in the Spirit, whose final and full impartation, in contradistinction to all occasional and partial givings, is made plain, as pouring out upon the house of Israel. "As the outpouring of the Spirit, according to the earlier announcements of the prophet himself and his predecessors, bears an essentially Messianic character, and is connected with the coming of the Good Shepherd of David's line, on whom (Isa. xi. 1) the whole fulness of the Spirit rests" (HENGST.), so the predictions of the chapters before us point to the course in the world of the Christian Church, which was founded by the outpouring of the Divine Spirit, and may live in the certainty that not one soul destined to be gathered into it shall remain behind in the world, as its faith, its confession, is to rely with confidence on a grace which is eternal.

'On Ch. xxxviii.

Ver. 1 sq. "The prophet evidently speaks of the last times. A good part of his sayings are riddles, which the fulfilment alone must solve and explain" (BERL. BIB.).—"The enemies of the Church are great, strong, and many; but however great their strength may be, it can effect nothing against the community of the Lord, for the Lord is its protection, 2 Chron. xxxii. 7, 8" (TÜB. BIB.).—"The Christian Church never remains unmolested, but is always persecuted by internal and external enemies, or otherwise plagued with crosses, tribulations, and adversities of all kinds, 2 Tim. iii. 12; 1 Cor. xi. 19" (W.).—"The adversity which befalls the Church of God does not befall her accidentally, but according to the divine counsel and will, Rev. ii. 9, 10" (STARKE).—"Gog is so briefly mentioned in Rev. xx. according to the economy of Holy Scripture, because here so fully" (RICHTER).—"Gog is not the Antichrist (the beast), nor yet the pseudo-Christ (the false prophet), but the anti-Israel of the latter days. The last attack on the community of God, in contempt of its mission of peace and salvation, from self-confidence and worldliness.—Ver. 3. "He will, however, be of kindred disposition with Antichrist, a circumstance which is to be observed, and which at the same time explains why the Lord is so angry at him" (BERL. BIB.).

—Ver. 4. "He means to march against Jehovah, but in reality Jehovah has him in tow: he must march whither He wills to his own destruction, as Pharaoh of old did not set aside the purposes of the God of Israel when he refused to let His people go, but acted so because Jehovah Himself had hardened his heart in order to hurl him to destruction" (HENGST.).—Ver. 5 sq. "It is, however, of little moment to know whether the present nations and which of them are to be understood under those designations; for those ancient nations no longer exist separately, and the Holy Spirit intended to designate under this name generally only such peoples and nations as in the latter days lie outside of the sphere of the civilisation of the Church of Christ" (HEIM-HOFFMANN).—Ver. 7. The equipment even of His enemies is subject to God's word.—"The ungodly are bound with and to one another by the cord of malice" (STARCK).—Ver. 8. A glance into the latter days of the Church of God and of the world.—"Gog meant to visit the people of God, but in reality he is himself visited. It is very consolatory to the Church, that God not merely conquers her enemies, but that even their hostile undertaking is under His guidance, that they move neither hand nor foot except at His command" (HENGST.).—"Thus God visits in grace and also in wrath" (STARCK).—"The Church is thus described: from her persecutions, according to her calling, as the fulfilment of Israel, from her devastation by Antichrist, because of her separation from the world, according to her rest in God" (COCO.).—Ver. 9. In the world we have anguish to the end; before we expect it, a tempest arises, and heaven and earth appear to be hid from our eyes. Our security is peace with God: Christians wish, indeed, peace with all men, but the world keeps no peace with them. Such is its turbulence that it has no rest, such its darkness that it would like to shut out all light; even God is not to be our lamp.—"If great armies resemble clouds, how soon can a wind disperse them! 2 Kings xix. 35" (STARCK).

Ver. 10. "Thus God is a heart-searcher, He knows the evil purpose in the man himself"—(STARCK).—Ver. 11. What a confession from the mouth of an enemy! for the Church and against himself.—Ver. 12. How good it is to possess the goods which cannot be stolen,—the joy, for example, which no one shall take from us!—To the end the world seeks only the temporal, the earthly.—Ver. 14. It is bad when we observe only when it is too late.—Ver. 15 sq. That is already the victory when God says, It is My people that ye seek to injure.—"Yea, all things revolve around the community of God on earth; hell must assail it, and yet suffer shipwreck on the faith of the true confessors. Therefore we ought simply to keep God's word pure, and not to care about the great multitude" (DIEDRICH).—Ver. 17. Everything has been told before; they who hold to the word have to fear no surprises.—Ver. 18 sq. "Fury is the glow which bursts forth in the breathing of wrath. The wrath of God is the holy jealousy with which He, for the protection of His kingdom, the kingdom of peace, dashes down the wicked; and this wrath of eternal protecting love is fearful" (SCHMIEDER).

Quando Juxta est venturus, Cuncta stricte discussurus.*

"Even the saints will tremble, but with adoration and hope. Comp. Pa. xlvii." (SCHMIEDER).—Ver. 21. Even the sword is the Lord's servant, which He needs only to call for and it comes at His word.—How one may become the sword of another!—"When God determines to inflict His judgments, the best friends must become the worst enemies, that one may receive from the other the merited reward, Judg. vii. 22" (STARKE).—Ver. 23. The conclusion is, that the result of everything is to magnify and sanctify God. We ought, therefore, to begin all our affairs with God.

On Ch. xxxix.

Ver. 1 sq. God does not mislay the address of His enemies. As Jerusalem, so also Gog and his company stand always before Him.—Him whom God makes to go up, He is also able in due time to make come down.—Ver. 4 sq. "By the mountains of Israel, where Gog is to be slain, we must not understand the mountains near Jerusalem, but the Christian churches in various lands; he shall fall under the Christians" (HEIM-HOFF.).—Ver. 6. The fire of God upon sympathies with evil.—The far-reaching effect of divine judgment.—Ver. 9 sq. "We are from this that outward force, whether rude or refined, does not furnish the measure for great and little with regard to religion" (LUTHER).—God prepares a way of escape for His own people from even the most terrible terrors.—All things must serve the God of love.—The fire of Christianity at last comes over all the weapons of this world. They then warn instead of injuring.—"These weapons are an appropriate figure of earthly things, of which the enemies of the kingdom of God boast as of their weapons" (STARKE).—If God is our shield, then it is seen what becomes of all the shields of men, long and short. Let not yourself be covered and screened by the world! Happy is he who enjoys and confides in the protection of God.—See there what is the value of human armour, what trust is to be put in it, what fear we are to have or rather not to have for it.—The world with its pomp and power after all exists only to furnish fuel for the children of God.—Thus the godly man finally gains the upper hand, however long and strongly the ungodly have behaved proudly.—Ver. 11. Like Gog, many a one finds his grave where he least expected it.—Gog thought of obtaining prey, but by no means a grave.—The grave, a quiet answer to so many loud questions, the echo to so many and various forms of: I will!—Here the proudest and most foaming waves will subside.—Masters cease at the brink of the grave; the continuation follows—that is to say, rottenness, horror, judgment of survivors on the dead, to say nothing of the judgment of God, who has from the beginning had the same decision regarding them.

Ver. 12 sq. The burial of the world, daily to carry out denial of self and the world.—"Men often take great pains to put away bodily uncleanness: would that they were equally careful to purge themselves from all pollution of spirit! 2 Cor. v. 17, 18" (STARKE).—"Teacher and point out what sin and uncleanness is to be found in a church and in every individual member of it. Oh that so many would not so much forget their office! Isa. lviii. 1" (STARKE).—Ver. 16 sq. The world, the city of the dead, Hamonah.—What a stillness of death after the bustle of so many departing things and departed men!—"The enemies of the Church leave after their death a shameful name behind them, Acts xii." (O.)

Ver. 17 sq. "A communion; the communicants are here the wild beasts and birds" (HENGST.).—The fearful irony of the service of the sanctuary on every worldly interest, even the highest.—What an end, after such a beginning! The beginning was, Israel should fall a prey to Gog; now the end is, that Gog lies there a prey to the very beasts of the field.—Ver. 21. "Let us not be blind and stupid spectators of the acts of God, but let us lift up our hearts, and celebrate the goodness and power of God" (STARKE).—The punishing hand of God on others is, in a certain sense, laid on us also; He takes hold of us when He crushes others.—Ver. 22. God for us and with us, God our God! the blessed knowledge in Israel henceforth and for ever, Ps. cxlv. 15.—The doxology of the Lord's Prayer.—Ver. 23 sq. Our transgressions, the key to our frequently so dark experience on earth.—Our acts of unfaithfulness bring us into manifold miseries, but God is faithful.—By the punishment of God's people the world shall know the misery of sin as well as the righteousness—so much the more threatening for it—of the Holy One of Israel.—"The beginning is made with the house of God, the end with the world" (HÄV.).—The apostasy in Christendom makes the world apparently so powerful.—Ver. 25 sq. "After chastisement, believers again find grace—not, however, because of their goodness, but for the sake of Christ, Ps. cvi. 47" (W.).—The jealousy of God in His compassion.—"When sin is rightly acknowledged, it brings men to shame and repentance, Luke xviii. 13" (STARKE).—The knowledge of sin makes heavy-laden sinners; but grace experienced humbles still more than punishment can do.—The security of the humbled; the security of those who think that they stand; the security of the children of this world.—We men are well able to bring ourselves into distress and sorrow of heart, but only God's love is able to bring us out again.—"There is, however, no sorrow which God could not prevent" (STARKE).—The salvation of Israel, a sermon to the heathen of God's compassion and holiness alike. Hallowed be Thy name, and Thy kingdom come, stand side by side in the Lord's Prayer.—Ver. 28. Not one of the elect shall remain behind in the world.—Ver. 29. Grace as eternal grace and grace for me is the seal of the Holy Spirit.—Thus believers are kept by the power of God to a salvation which is ready to be revealed in the last time, 1 Pet. i. 5.—Israel, the true, the people of the Spirit.—The outpouring of the Spirit of Jehovah is the end of all the ways which He has gone with Israel in anger and compassion, and the consummation of Israel in the Christian Church.

5. THE CLOSING VISION : OF THE GLORY OF JEHOVAH'S KINGDOM (Ch. xl.-xlviii.).

(1.) The Temple and its Service (Ch. xl.-xlv.).

CHAP. XL. 1. In the five and twentieth year of our captivity, in the beginning of the year, on the tenth of the month, in the fourteenth year after the city was smitten, in the selfsame day, the hand of Jehovah was upon me [came over me],

2 and He brought me thither : In visions of God brought He me to the land of Israel, and made me rest [set me down] beside [on] a very high mountain, and

3 on [over] it [was, rise up] a city-like building to the south. And He brought me thither, and, behold, a man whose appearance was as the appearance of brass, and a line of flax in his hand, and a measuring rod ; and he stood in the gate.

4 And the man said to me, Son of man, behold with thine eyes, and hear with thine ears, and apply thine heart to all that I show thee, for in order to let thee see it wert [art] thou brought hither ; declare all that thou seest to the

5 house of Israel. And behold a wall outside the house round about, and in the man's hand the measuring rod of six cubits by [measured by] the cubit and an handbreadth ; and he measured the breadth of the building one rod, and the

6 height one rod. And he came to the gate which looketh towards the east, and went up on its steps, and measured the threshold of the gate—one rod

7 broad, even one threshold one rod broad : And the chamber [the guardroom] one rod long and one rod broad ; and between the chambers five cubits ; and

8 the threshold of the gate beside the porch of the gate within, one rod. And

9 he measured the porch of the gate within, one rod. And he measured the porch of the gate, eight cubits ; and its pillars [literally, its pillar, i.e. one by one], two

10 cubits ; and the porch of the gate [was, or, thus was the porch of the gate] within. And the chambers of the gate towards the east [literally, the way of the east] were three

11 on this side, and three on that ; the three of them of one measure ; and the pillars on this side and on that were of one measure. And he measured the

12 breadth of the opening of the gate, ten cubits ; the length [height] of the gate, thirteen cubits. And a barrier was before the chambers [guardrooms], one cubit

13 [on this side], and one cubit the barrier on that side ; and the chamber six cubits on this side, and six cubits on that. And he measured the gate from the roof

14 of the chamber to its roof, the breadth five and twenty cubits, opening against opening [door against door]. And he made the pillars (ver. 9) sixty cubits, and at

15 the pillars [literally, at the pillar] was the court round and round the gate. And from the front of the entrance-gate to the front of the porch of the inner gate,

16 fifty cubits. And closed windows were in the chambers [guardrooms] and in their pillars within the gate round and round, and likewise in the wall-projections, and there were windows round and round inward ; and on the pillars [literally, the pillar],

17 palms. And he brought me to the outer court, and behold apartments [cells] and a stone pavement [Mosaic], made for the court round about ; thirty apart-

18 ments by the pavement. And the pavement was by the side of the gates,

19 exactly the length of the gates, [namely] the lower pavement. And he measured the breadth from the front of the gate of the lower [pavement] to the front

20 of the inner court from without, a hundred cubits ; the east and the north. And the gate which was towards the north on the outer court he measured

21 in its length and its breadth. And its chambers [guardrooms], three on this side and three on that, and its pillars and its wall-projections ; it was after the measure of the first [former] gate, fifty cubits its length, and the breadth five

22 and twenty cubits. And its windows and its wall-projections and its palms were after the measure of the gate that is towards the east, and they shall ascend [one goes up on them] by seven steps, and its wall-projections are before them.

23 And [there was] a gate to the inner court opposite that to the north and to the 24 east ; and he measured from gate to gate a hundred cubits. And he brought me towards the south, and behold a gate towards the south, and he measured

25 its pillars and its wall-projections by those measures. And there were windows to it and to its wall-projections round about, like those windows ; fifty 26 cubits the length, and the breadth five and twenty cubits. And its ascent had seven steps, and its wall-projections before them ; and there were palms 27 to it, one on this side and one on that at its pillars. And there was a gate to the inner court towards the south, and he measured from that gate to the gate 28 towards the south, a hundred cubits. And he brought me to the inner court into the south gate [through the south gate], and he measured the south gate after 29 those measures ; And its chambers and its pillars and its wall-projections after those measures. And its windows [were] to it and to its wall-projections 30 round about ; fifty cubits the length, and the breadth five and twenty cubits.

 And wall-projections round about, the length five and twenty cubits, and the 31 breadth five cubits. And its wall-projections were towards the outer court ;
 32 and palms on its pillars, and eight steps [were] its steps. And he brought me to the inner court towards the east, and measured the gate after those mea-33 sures ; And its chambers and its pillars and its wall-projections after those measures. And [there were] windows to it and to its wall-projections round 34 about ; fifty cubits the length, and the breadth five and twenty cubits. And its wall-projections [were] towards the outer court, and palms on its pillars on 35 this side and on that, and its steps eight steps. And he brought me to the 36 north gate, and measured after those measures ; Its chambers, its pillars, and its wall-projections and windows [were] round about, fifty cubits the length, 37 and the breadth five and twenty cubits. And its pillars were towards the outer court, and palms on its pillars on this side and on that, and its steps 38 eight steps. And a cell and its opening was by the pillars at the gates ; there 39 shall they wash the burnt-offering. And in the porch of the gate were two tables on this side and two tables on that side, to slay in relation to them [or, on them] the burnt-offering and the sin-offering and the trespass-offering.
 40 And at the side without for him that goeth up, at the extreme of the gate towards the north, were two tables ; and at the other side, which [belongeth] to 41 the porch of the gate, two tables. Four tables on this side and four tables on that, by the side of the gate ; eight tables, on them will they slaughter.
 42 And four tables at the ascent [for the burnt-offering] of hewn stone, the length a cubit and a half, and the breadth a cubit and a half, and the height one cubit ;
 on them will they lay the instruments with which they will slay the burnt-43 offering and the slain-offering. And the double staples of a handbreadth were fastened on the house round and round [on the walls around the temple] ; and on the 44 tables is the flesh of the offering. And outside at the inner gate were cells for the singers in the inner court which was at the side of the north gate, and their 45 front towards the south ; a part at the side of the east gate, fronting towards the north. And he said to me, This cell, whose front is towards the south, is 46 for the priests that wait upon the charge [service] of the house ; And the cell whose front is towards the north, for the priests that wait upon the charge of the altars ; these are the sons of Zadok, who of the sons of Levi draw near to 47 Jehovah to minister to Him. And he measured the court ; the length a hundred cubits and the breadth a hundred cubits, forming a square ; and the altar 48 was before the house. And he brought me to the porch of the house, and measured the pillar of the porch, five cubits on this side and five cubits on that ; and the breadth of the gate, three cubits on this side and three cubits 49 on that. The length of the porch was twenty cubits, and the breadth eleven cubits, and [that] at the steps by which they will go up to it ; and there were posts by the pillars, one on this side and one on that.

HAFENREFFER, Templ. Ez., Tübing. 1613.—Great diligence and acute combination distinguish KLIEFORTH, whose second part treats entirely of the following chapters in 390 pages.—OEDER, in his Freye Untersuch. über einige BB. des Alten Testaments, Halle 1771, and L. VOGEL, the editor of this treatise, and CORRODI also in the anonymous treatise, Beleuchtung d. jüd. und chr. Bibelkunons, have criticised away the following nine chapters from our prophet, and capriciously attributed them to a Samaritan or a very late returned Jew; for what they have adduced upon

"grounds" has been already refuted by J. D. MICHAELIS, EICHORN, BERTHOLDT, and JAHN.

Vers. 1-4. Exordium—Introductory.

As in ch. i., with which the divine mission of our prophet opens, so also in ch. xl. here, an exordium, stating the point of time, the condition of Ezekiel, the locality, as well as the first and immediate view which he got, introduces us to what follows.

Ver. 1. By the first date given: in the five and twentieth year of our (Introd. § 3) captivity, the reference back to ch. i. (comp. ver. 2) is still more express. According to Bunsen and Duncker, 573 B.C. According to Schmieder, 574. According to Hitzig, 575. As to sense and meaning, this reference back to ch. i. implies on the one hand, that the glory of Jehovah solemnizes its consummation in the glory of His kingdom (Introd. § 5), and on the other, that the divine mission of Ezekiel has now come to the close which befits its commencement. Ezekiel's prophecy, ch. xxix. 17 sq., is chronologically his last (comp. on it). "The prophet has introduced it as an appendix to an earlier prophecy, in order to conclude with this great vision of restoration, in contrast to the great opening vision of destruction" (HENGST.). According to J. H. Michaelis, we have to remember in regard to the twenty-fifth year in Ezekiel here, that the Babylonish captivity of the Jews began in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, when Daniel and his companions were carried away, so that there were in all thirty-two years of exile to take into account. — Hitzig interprets רֵאשׁ הַחֹדֶשׁ

the phrase: on the tenth of the month, as explanatory, since he (as also Jewish tradition) takes it to be a year of jubilee (Lev. xxv. 9). The previous year must have been a sabbatic year; such a year ended in the autumn of 575, and may have been a 49th year. The significant element in this coincidence (on a day of atonement commencing a year of jubilee) would, moreover, still continue even if we should not be able, like Kliefoth, to speak of an "absolutely eschatological vision." Rüdke observes: "God let the prophet see the temple and the future freedom of Israel on the day of jubilee, because then servants become free, and on the day of atonement, because then the sins of Israel are forgiven." If what is intended is the beginning of the civil year and the month Tisri, then, in order to that, this much later alteration of the beginning of the Hebrew year—the old Mosaic reckoning constantly prevails still in the post-exile Old Testament writings—must be proved to have been already in practice in Ezekiel's time; to say nothing of the fact that such a departure from the law in our prophet, with his specially priestly and other peculiarities of mind and spirit, is scarcely suitable, at least without more definite indication, even to the character of our chapter. For this reason Hävernick, with the majority of expositors, holds to the commencement of the ecclesiastical year, and thus to the month Nisan, making the phrase: רֵאשׁ הַחֹדֶשׁ.

not found elsewhere in the Old Testament, look back to Ex. xii. 2 as a brief mode of expression for the full form there, and connecting the mention of the tenth day directly with Ex. xii. 3 (on which day the lambs for the passover were set apart, SCHMIEDER). "It is the period when the preparation begins for the solemnization of the feast of the passover. To the prophet, inspired by the Spirit of God, the future shapes itself as the consummated glorification of the past, of the first history of development of the people of God" (HÄV.). "The month did not need to be stated more exactly; from the words: In the beginning of the year, it was self-evident that the first month only could be intended. That the day is significant for the thing is confirmed by the emphatic form: On the selfsame day. On the day when of old the passover was instituted in Egypt, and the people were brought as it were into the sacred precincts of the approaching redemption, the day on which the coming sealing afresh of God's redeeming grace had thus for centuries been solemnly announced, along with the increased pain just on account of the cessation of these festivals, hope also must have arisen more strongly than at any other time, since God had given in the redemption of the olden time a pledge to His people. The day occurs elsewhere also as significant, e.g. the leading across Jordan, Josh. iv. 19, etc. On the same day was the entrance of Christ into Jerusalem, the inauguration of His kingdom. The day was thus as significant here as the day of His resurrection in Rev. i. 10. How even in later times the popular hope of deliverance was connected with the passover appears from the release at the feast of a prisoner, who, in the eyes of the Jews, represented the people enslaved by the Romans" (HENGST.). Next to the captivity, the circumstance that the city was smitten, which points back to ch. xxxiii. 21, forms the second element in fixing the date. It is a verbal reference to prepare us for understanding how the renewed divine mission of the prophet, in view of that accomplished act of judgment, would now, for the first time, fully open his mouth for the prophecy of God's compassions on His people. At all events, the capture of Jerusalem was the consummation of the misery of the Old Testament covenant-people, but with it was presented also the exactly corresponding background for the consummation of Jehovah's glory in His kingdom in the world. And so, in this respect also, Ezekiel cannot, in conformity with his continuous mission as prophet of Jehovah's glory in the exile, withdraw more fully from the theatre of his activity. What the prophet had been obliged to announce regarding the wrath and judgment of God on Israel throughout ch. ii.-xxiv., has been all fulfilled.—God has made a tabula rasa; but the strictly fulfilled threatening presents itself also as guarantee for the realization of the promise already wrapt up in it, which, in the transition portion of our book (ch. xxv.-xxxii., see Introd. § 5), prepared for itself a background in the kingdoms of this world, in order with ch. xxxiii. to set forth in prospect with increasing clearness and energy the purification, sanctification, restoration, and final victory of the new Israel, the Israel after the Spirit, over the world. What had been there prophesied in isolated instances of the future salvation becomes now collected into a united whole, so that to all appearance, as if a separate book by itself began with ch. xl., our opening verses only confirm more expressly that which already results from a reconsideration of the previous chapters. "Even in the first prophecy, in the rainbow which surrounds the appearance of the offended Deity," says Hengstenberg, "lies the germ of this last prophecy;" and Hitzig says: "Not only ch. xxxiii.-xxxix., the previous section" (to which specially our prophecy forms the conclusion), "but Ezekiel's prophecy in general, advances here also to internal completion."—In the selfsame day; comp. ch. xxiv. 2.—Comp. ch. i. 3, xxxiii. 22, xxxvii. 1. "Not merely a divine word, but he shall experience something" (KLIEF.).—Not directly, but certainly indirectly, there is also a reference to ch. viii. sq.; for although thither is explained from what precedes as the site of the smitten city, yet Jerusalem comes immediately—just as in ch. viii. sq.—into consideration principally as regards the temple. [Hävernick finds in the thither the direction of the longing expressed.]—Ver. 2. In visions of God; comp. on ch. i. 1. The state of Ezekiel.—Ch. xxxvii. 1.—Now comes the locality of the vision,—in general: the land of Israel, and then, in what follows, the first and immediate view in particular. Against Kliefoth's observation, correct in itself, that וְהָיָה and וְהָיָה stand for each other in Ezekiel, we remark that here, however, occurring as they do close together, they can hardly be otherwise than distinct. Ezekiel is, in the Spirit, set down at all events at the foot or the side of a mountain, which to him, looking up in vision, appears very high. Had Ezekiel been "upon" it, he could have spoken more fitly of its size or breadth than of its height. First of all, the mountain, since it has to be taken in contrast with the smitten city, refers neither to Moriah nor Zion in particular, but symbolizes generally the loftily situated Jerusalem (comp. ch. xvii. 22, 23); but that it appears very high points, above all, to a glorious restoration, and indicates spiritual elevation, for which comp. Isa. ii. 2 (where the exaltation is immediately explained from the consciousness, the religious movement of the nations, and as no merely outward one); Zech. xiv. 9, 10, 16; Mic. iv. 1 (Rev. xxi. 10). This establishes in the outset the ideality of the further views vouchsafed to Ezekiel. Where the first vision (ch. i.) "exhibits in prospect anger and judgment," the last exhibits in prospect "the healing of the wounds." There the prophet went against the dream of a God gracious to (self-righteous) sinners, and an immediately approaching future of salvation; here at the end, after that announcement has been made, he deals a last powerful blow against the second dangerous enemy of God's people, that has now come into the foreground,—the despair, which as effectually as the former false security leads away from treading the God-ordained path of repentance" (HENGST.). That, however, which is made prominent for Jerusalem in general, and described as a city-like building, is, according to what follows, the temple. [Hävernicks makes the prophet see from the mount of the temple, as the building in the south, the New Jerusalem (Heb. xii. 22), situated south of the mountain where the prophet stood, and consequently makes sanctuary and city to be at once announced as the two (†) main parts of the vision. According to Abarbanel, Ezekiel saw even the builders in the south building the city. Hengstenberg finds in מִצָּד the substitute for the smitten city (ver. 1), and the temple here, as also in Heb. xii., included in the city in the wider sense. The reverse is the correct view, as even Hengstenberg himself goes on to call the temple "the proper essence of the city," "the spiritual dwelling-place of the whole people." His reference to ch. viii. concerning the central position of the temple is good.] Apart from the fact, observed also by Keil against Kliefoth, that the city is not thus described in ch. xlv. 6, xlviii. 15 sq., 30 sq., everything is made clear by the distinction between מִצָּד and מִצָּד; to the prophet set down at the mountain, from Babylon, and hence coming from the north, the building on the mountain appears מִצָּד, that is, looking from the south (as in ch. xxi. 2 sq., Judea in general), which the אֲרָמִית of the Sept. (אַרְמִי) renders quite correctly.

Ver. 3. And He brought, etc. Resumption from ver. 1, after that the parenthesis ver. 2 has treated of the locality in general, and the first immediate view in particular. Now comes the vision proper: And behold. The description: a man, the less excludes the angel of the Lord, the known mediator of divine revelations, whom even Hitzig accepts here, "since He is called 'Jehovah' in ch. xlii. 2, 5," as the comparison of his appearance: as the appearance of brass (see on ch. i. 5), seems to point to ch. i. (ver. 7), and the line of flax to ch. ix. 2. Comp. generally what has been said on ch. ix. 2; also Zech. ii. 1 sq. (Matt. xvi. 18; Heb. xi. 16). The brass suggests to Hengstenberg: "solidity, durability, power of resistance," which is so comforting to the Church of God, because its earthly representatives rather resemble soft wax. Hitzig, like the Sept., makes it denote a "brilliant appearance;" Kliefoth: "an ordinary angelus interpres" (Rev. xxi. 9). The brass not only removes the appearance from the human sphere, but also gives in the outset an idea of firmness, hence certainty, for everything which it will determine. For that the man has to measure is shown by his equipment, as that in its completeness denotes, according to Hengstenberg: "building activity in general, in contrast to the instruments of destruction (ch. ix. 1);" according to Hävernicks (BÖTTCHER), that it is: "for the greater and the lesser measurements,—the line of flax more for the site; the measuring rod more for the masonry;" according to KLEF.: "that he has much to measure of various descriptions." HENGST., referring to Rev. xxi. 15, calls attention to the measuring rod as distinguished from a line of flax.—He stood in the (at the) gate. HITZIG, correctly: "waiting for the new-comer." Which gate, namely, of that which looked as a city-like building (ver. 2), therefore which temple-gate it was, is not particularized here. But as Ezekiel comes from the north, the first that met him was probably the north gate, from which the man escorts him to the east gate (ver. 6).—Ver. 4. The supposition is (ver. 2), that the building is already erected; hence: behold with thine eyes. That he should "hear with his ears" gives promise of oral explanation also, as, for example, ver. 45 sq. But because the expression of the building as to its proportions will be made known to the prophet specially by measuring, Ezekiel has "to apply his heart to all" that he will in this way obtain a sight of (all that I show thee), for through him Israel is to obtain knowledge of it (comp. Ex. xxv. 9).

Ver. 5. The Enclosing Wall.

As חֹמֶת ("checking," "keeping off"), the wall is a barrier against what might come from without (מִחוּץ). It runs right round the house, and will thus in relation to it, that is, to the temple generally, symbolize the warding off of the profane, the unclean, the false; and not so much protection. Comp. ch. xlii. 20, and Pa. xv. The height, at least, to be mentioned immediately, is nothing particular in the way of protection. [HÄV.: "In the former sanctuary such an enclosing wall appeared more arbitrary, a construction called forth by external circumstances. Here the wall is an essential constituent part. The Babylonian temples, too, had their surrounding walls, but here is certainly a contrast to the colossal structures of the Babylonians. The wall on the east side in the later temple, begun by Solomon, was 300 cubits high at the lowest parts."] [The wall "bears the square form, as broad as it is high; but this being only twelve feet at the utmost, it was manifestly not designed to present, by its altitude, an imposing aspect, or by its strength to constitute a bulwark of safety. In these respects it could not for a moment be compared with many of the moral erections which existed in antiquity. But as the boundary-line between the sacred and the profane, which, being drawn by the hand of God, must therefore remain free from all interference on the part of man, it is precisely such as might have been expected."—FAIRBAIRN'S Ezekiel.—W. F.] But the measuring begins with it, and so the measuring rod is here fixed at 6 cubits—the cubit, however, with the addition of a handbreadth (ch. xliii. 13), hence 6 cubits and 6 handbreadths = 1 rod. The measure is accordingly greater than that of the usual rod of 6 cubits. Comp. 2 Chron. iii. 3, and Deut. iii. 11. A cubit measure found in the ruins of Memphis shows both measures, one of 6 and one of 7 handbreadths. See a lengthened disquisition on Jewish measurement by J. D. Michaelis on our passage, p. 112 sq. [HENGST.: In the case of Solomon's temple the former cubit, because then current, was the measure, hence it was the more needful to give the relation of the one to the other here. The greater cubit, which meets us first in Ezekiel, was probably borrowed in the exile from the Chaldeans. Keil assumes a shortening of the common cubit from the old Mosaic sacred cubit, which, he says, still formed the measure for Solomon's temple, and will do so for the new temple likewise.] From this statement of a greater measure, we may presume that what is to be measured is uncommon, magnificent, surpassing that which actually exists.—Inasmuch as by measuring the dimension is made known as distinguished from the mere mass, we may say with Bähr that law and proportion, hence order, consequently the spiritual, the divine ideality, are displayed. This is what is expressed generally in the numbers occurring here. But the very preponderance of the number six, in itself non-significant, forbids us to attach to them special significance. In this respect, also, Hengstenberg's observation, that in order to get the significant number seven, it is necessary to revert to the cubit, which after the prophet's explanation no longer comes into consideration, tells against Kliefoth. Moreover, מִדָּה comes from "extending," and serves here rather to elucidate in detail to the prophet that which he beholds as already completed work.— הַחֲזֵק is the mason-work of the wall, the equality of which in breadth and height corresponds strikingly to the purpose assigned to it—to separate.

Vers. 6-16. The East Gate.

After the wall now follows in Ver. 6 the most noteworthy part of it, the gates, of which, as being "the chief," as Hengstenberg supposes ("because of the rising sun"), the east gate is described. It lay opposite the entrance into the sanctuary, and hence was the one among the gates which could first come into consideration with reference to the house in the narrower sense, in respect to which it is also several times expressly defined in what follows. On the significance of the gates of Ezekiel's temple, comp. the Doctrinal Reflections on ch. xl.-xli. The steps, seven in number, according to vers. 22, 26 (SEPT.), are the first thing observed about the gate. Since the man arrives at it by them, they can hardly be conceived of otherwise than as before, and not running into the gate; they show, moreover, that the court to which the east gate leads lies higher by these seven steps. Thus the ascent, an exaltation (Col. iii.), is conjoined with the separating character of the wall.— פֶּתַח is a border or panel on the ground at the entrance, thus threshold; nothing can be made of "projecting lower cornice" (HITZIG). As the threshold enters into the gate a rod-breadth, which is the breadth of the wall, it fills up exactly the opening made by the gate in the wall.— אֶת הַפֶּתַח explains the threshold measured as "one" (HÄV.: only one, because so broad), that is, for the present, for a second follows in addition, ver. 7; hence אֶת הַפֶּתַח , in the sense of "first."

Ver. 7. וְהָיָה הַפֶּתַח placed here, at the entrance into the gate, so simply as to explain itself, is the chamber which is wont to be in this place, the guardroom for the gate-watch (ch. xli. 11). "An arrangement dating from David and Solomon; a sacred temple-guard was appointed to surround it" (HÄV.). [FAIRBAIRN: "Furnished, as the gates were, so amply with guard-chambers for those who should be charged with maintaining the sanctity of the house (ch. xli. 11, 14), they were formed more especially with a view to the holiness, which must be the all-pervading characteristic of the place. It was imprinting on the architecture of this portion of the buildings the solemn truth, 'that there shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth, neither worketh abomination, or maketh a lie' (Rev. xxi. 27).—a truth which, in past times, partly from defective arrangements, partly from the wilful disregard of such as existed, had been most grievously suffered to fall into abeyance. But henceforth it must be made known to all that holiness becometh God's house, and that they only who possess this shall be allowed to come and minister before Him."—W. F.] Since the gate extends from the wall into the court, and Ezekiel has first to pass through to the end, the first thing determined is as to the guardroom, of which, moreover, there were several (וְהָיָה הַפֶּתַח),—the "length" (from east to west), and with that also the breadth, and in this way the form, that of a square.—It is to be understood that the intervening spaces also (the distances from chamber to chamber) were measured as they went onward, and thus made clear to the prophet.—The conclusion is formed by the threshold of the gate, which, in distinction from the entrance one (ver. 6) of the same dimension, is named from the porch (מִן הַפֶּתַח or מִן הַמִּשְׁכָּה is vestibule or portico, often with pillars), into which the whole gate-building runs out, as the porch and thereby this threshold is fixed with מִן הַפֶּתַח to the temple, that is, westward. וְהָיָה הַפֶּתַח indicates that this threshold lay close to the porch, adjoined it.—Ver. 8. The porch, because it opens the way to the court, is a principal part of the gate, hence its lengthened description. The Sept. and Hitzig erase this verse on account of the dimension being different from that given in Ver. 9. Kliefoth finds given in ver. 8 the size of the porch in the light, the width of its inner space from east to west, namely, 6 cubits of Ezekiel's measure (ver. 5). The width was naturally the same as that of the gate. Consequently the measurement given in ver. 9 would be that of the porch in the wider sense, including the projecting side-walls upon it (2 cubits) and the אַלִּים fronting each other (ver. 10), and each 2 cubits thick. אַלִּים , mostly plural, signifies that which is "firm," "strong," which can be a prop, can afford support. The signification of the verb אַל , "to be in front," accepted by Kliefoth, is the derived one. The "Elim" (אַלִּים) undoubtedly project, as observed, but in reality they are pillar-like props attached to the walls, to form sides and supports for doors and windows. And the porch, etc., forming a conclusion; in connection with which Kliefoth directs attention to the מַחֲבֵלֹת , repeated for the third time, as marking the difference from the gates of the inner court (vers. 31, 34, 37).

Ver. 10. A return to the "guardrooms of the east gate" (ver. 7). They are six in number, three on one side fronting three on the other, and all of the same size. [KLIEFOTH: 2×3 watches at each of the three outer gates, and the same at the three inner gates, in all 3×12 ; "for God Himself will be the proper Guardian and Protector of this sanctuary of His people."]

—The one measure spoken of the אַלִּים on this occasion seems to refer to those mentioned in ver. 9. KLIEF.: "the gate-pillars of the porch." [Hengstenberg supposes "pillars" one cubit thick, as in ver. 9 (?), standing in front of the walls at both sides of the guardrooms; others otherwise.]—Ver. 11. The opening of the gate is its entire width, and along with the statement of its breadth there is given at the same time the still undetermined length of the two thresholds and the steps.—In distinction from the width, רָשָׁעַר (from רָשַׁעַר , to make fast, to close, and so meaning literally: "closed place" [Schloß]—cognate to סָחָר) as such signifies the ward, wherefore the gate too is very suitably treated of here in the midst of the more exact description of the guardrooms (vers. 10, 12). (Comp. ch. xliv. 1 sq.) Viewed with respect to its opening, it opens the way to the court; as a gate it is a silent but steadfast guardian (comp. on ver. 48).—As every other interpretation hitherto attempted leads only to quite uncertain suppositions not contained in the text (roofed and open spaces, courtyards, and the like), the length of 13 cubits here must mean the height. In itself, רָשָׁעַר signifies: what is extended in time and space, hence: what is long. When the breadth has been given already, the extension of the gate-barricade proper (the door) can scarcely be conceived of otherwise than in height (comp. on ver. 15), and the guardrooms supply all that is requisite to fix the length here. Length, therefore, does not in general stand for height; neither does the special application need to be explained from the circumstance that the door was lying when measured. ["To the last number of perfection, ten (עָשָׂר), implying that it takes into it the other numbers), is added the first number of perfection, three," HENGST.]—Ver. 12. In unison with the shutting character of the gate, the idea of the guardrooms is completed by the barrier (בָּרִיָּה) of one cubit in breadth before each of them. As is evident from what follows, a בָּרִיָּה has to be supplied between אַחֶרֶת and אַחֶרֶת . [KLIEF.: "And the barrier on this side was a cubit, but the guardroom was 6 cubits on this side and 6 cubits on that," that is to say: the guardroom formed a square of 6 cubits each side; but the barrier-space formed an oblong of 6 cubits in length before the guardroom, and 1 cubit in breadth; and the barrier-space was not taken from the space of the guardroom, which on the contrary remained a square of 6 cubits, but joined on before the guardroom.] The statement that that which was guardroom (הַחֲמִשָּׁה , collective, generic) occupied 6 cubits on either side, is here understood of the length, and hence is neither formally nor virtually (as KEIL) a repetition of ver. 7, but is made expressly for giving a clear notion of the barriers, namely, how they ran along the entire length of each guardroom. From this it follows that these guardrooms are niche-like cells, opening into the gate, and hence closed in by the barriers, and that when one cubit on each side is taken from the 10 cubits (ver. 11), the passage leading through is limited to 8 cubits. The barrier is hardly constructed in order that the watchman "stepping out may look around right and left, and while doing so be protected against the too near approach of the people, and hindrance by them" (HITZIG); it lessens the available space in the thoroughfare, and thereby facilitates the control on both sides, and it protects the guardroom, which without it would stand entirely open, from those who wished to press into the court in this way through the doors to be mentioned immediately. [HENGST.: "The arrangement supposes that there are impudent people among the entrants who wished to force an entrance not allowed to them; comp. Luke xiii. 24."]

Ver. 13. The entire breadth of the gate-buildings: 25 cubits, measured from the guardroom (הַחֲמִשָּׁה , as ver. 12), as this is what has just been spoken of, and the guardrooms represent the greatest breadth. Thus guardroom opposite guardroom, from roof to roof, from north to south, or vice versa, so that the whole breadth comes out. The explanation: $\text{פֶּתַח בְּנֵי פֶתַח}$, indicates an opening of the guardrooms out towards the court, for the barriers close them up towards the interior of the gate. This at the same time explains to us the measuring; for since there is only a barrier closing up on either side, there is a free view on both sides into the respec-

five guardrooms to their openings (under the end of each roof) into the court, so the man needs not go out (as KLIFF.) to determine the measure; moreover, And he measured will immediately (Ver. 14) pass over into: And he made! Accordingly, ver. 7 gave only the dimensions of the interior of the guardrooms in the light, whereas now the space of the outside walls (1½ cubits each, according to ver. 42) is included. [HITZIG: גג is not the cover of a chamber, but its ridge = גג.] The barriers may be imagined

as situated in the gateway, but also as in the guardrooms, of course without lessening their space. The object of the barriers recommends the first view.—In order to give the entire extension of the gate-buildings in this direction, we have in ver. 14 the statement of the height of the מזלות, the two wall-pillars (ver. 9) adjoining the porch. From their height as stated, Kliefoth explains the change of expression. [HENGST.: "The usual height of the gate-building might be gathered from the height of the gate-door, ver. 11."] That it is the length (height) of the gate-structure which is meant to be determined is shown by the description of these pillars. "They are as it were the head of the whole, that which the steeples are in our churches, towering up towards and pointing to heaven" (HENGST.). Kliefoth excellently observes: "They are 60 cubits high. If one had reflected that our church towers also have grown out of gate-pillars, that one can see not only by Egyptian obelisks and Turkish minarets, but also by our factory chimneys, which, moreover, are hollow, how pillars 60 cubits high can be erected on a base of 4 cubits square, and that finally the thing spoken of is a colossal building seen in vision, one would have felt no critical anxieties at this statement of height." On: he made, Hengstenberg says: "The prophet goes back to the time when he who here explains the building to him prepared it. In reality the meaning is: he had made."— מזלות collectively, and this the rather because the pillars are the highest parts of the gate-structure. It is quite clear from the description in ver. 9 that the court (חצר) was immediately adjoining; an inner court is out of the question. Accordingly, השער must be accusative; in relation to the gate, as to the gate,—ל with מזלות, in which the gate terminates in the court, precedes,—hence: the outer court of the temple surrounded the gate-structure round about, this structure was built in the court. When the relation to the court into which the gate extended has been thus considered, the entire length of the gate-structure can now—Ver. 15—be noted. For this purpose the gate on the side from which the measuring begins, that is, from the ascending steps of ver. 6, is designated as האיתון, which word is only here in the Qeri (Kethibh: האיתון). Either adjective or substantive, it is derived from אתה, "to come," and designates, as the point of departure, the entrance-gate to which one comes when one wishes to go to the temple. As the opposite standpoint, towards the court, פְּתִיחַת־הַשְּׁעָר, has been mentioned in ver. 11, the special designation of the gate was so much the more in place.—Although for fixing the terminus ad quem, עַל will have to be taken as versus, "towards," yet when, as here, it stands in conjunction with לְפָנָי, it has not its full force. There lies in it something like: "upon," "above," which seeks to assert itself; for in ver. 11 the height of the gate, and in ver. 13 the roofing of the gate-chambers, and in ver. 14 the summit of the entire gate-structure, came into consideration. ["From" and "to" are omitted, says Hengstenberg, because the relation is clear in itself.] The porch is known from ver. 7 sq., and thereby, as from the contrast to הַמִּזְבֵּחַ, the "inner" gate, the gate leading into the court, and hence to the interior of the temple; especially when the east gate is vis à vis the sanctuary proper.—For this the man needs only step forward on the seventh step, look up, and, passing through the gate-buildings, calculate his starting-point: first threshold, 6 cubits; three guardrooms with two intervening spaces, 28 cubits; second threshold, 6 cubits; porch, 6 cubits; projection of the side and gate-pillars, 4 cubits = 50 cubits. This length is the double of the breadth. ["When the Psalmist calls upon the gates of the temple or of the holy city to lift themselves up, to widen themselves, at the entering in of the ark of the covenant (Ps. xxiv.), the idea which underlies this song is here symbolically embodied and expressed."]

Ver. 16 appropriately closes the description with an explanation of the way in which the gate-structure was lighted; for it needs light for the inspection of the watchmen especially. Hence there were windows; first of all, in the guardrooms, namely, in their wall-pillars, by which they are distinguished from the מזלות in ver. 10 (מזלות, written defectively). Pillars projecting from the wall enclosed the windows of the guardrooms. That these windows were closed (1 Kings vi. 4) certainly does not mean that they were not to let the light pass through, but that they were only for light, and not to be opened for any other purpose; that they were windows meant "for a sacred purpose" (HIV.), and "not so much for looking through" (HITZIG). The being closed explains itself fully when we once consider that they, as also the doors of these chambers, led into the court, into which, therefore, no one was to press forward, either through the doors or by means of these windows, and then consider that their relation to the gateway given as within must put them on the same line with the other windows to be mentioned immediately, which came directly into the gateway, and had to be made "so" (כֵּן).

Although the windows of the guardrooms are for the use of the gate, yet the word within shows that the gate gets the light first of all from the guardrooms, which indeed are also open inward up to the barrier. But since the guardrooms on both sides of the gate come forward to the court, it can be said of their windows that they were round and round the gate, as was said of the court (ver. 14) in relation to the gate. [KLIEF.: "In the inside of the gate-structure round about" (?).] For the purpose, however, of giving more light to the gate-structure, there were such windows לְמִנְיָהוּ. Since nothing is nearer to the guardrooms than their partition-walls (ver. 7), we will have to think, in the first place, of them. מִנְיָהוּ is etymologically connected with מִנְיָהוּ and with מִנְיָהוּ, but is, however, as Klief. has satisfactorily shown, distinct from both. The signification: "projecting part," which Keil gives to the word, that is, what is on a solid wall for architectural ornament or necessity,—as for the windows in question, moulding, frieze, frame, and such like,—suits perfectly to the partition-walls with their windows, for these walls are, according to ver. 30, to be taken here too as 5 cubits broad, and thus were a projection on the gate-structure. [Klief. translates: "porch walls."] If, then, they projected likewise into the court on both sides, the "round and round" is as apposite and illustrative in respect to them as in respect to the guardrooms formerly. The carrying out of the parallel thus, the windows round and round, and the concluding expressly (inwards) with the lighting of the gateway, shows that that has been sufficiently cared for. [What Hengst. quotes from BALMER-RINCK about the pillars, by which "the windows are as it were latticed," would have been more suitable had it been said that the Elim were on the windows, and not the reverse, as here.] —Kliefoth, however, understands by the "Elammoth" or "Elammim" not only "the parapets and walls filling up the spaces between the guardrooms, but also the sides of the porch and the sides adjoining the second threshold" as pierced through with windows. The observation also is perhaps correct, as the measuring (ver. 13) from roof to roof of the guardrooms possibly shows already, that when the gate-structure thus has windows all over, it was roofed and covered.

Since מִנְיָהוּ in a collective sense may possibly include the just now mentioned "Elim" of the guardrooms, while in vers. 9 and 14, on the other hand, mention is specially made of the two high pillars at the porch, it will be a question whether we have, with Kliefoth, to imagine the whole of the "Elim" decorated with palm-leaf work. Hengst. (who insists on its "inseparable connection with the cherubim," of which we may remark there is here no mention) makes the palms "indicate that the gate leads to a building consecrated to the Lord of creation; it corresponds to the merely introductory character of the gate that the creation is here represented not by the animal kingdom, but by the lower region of the vegetable kingdom, of which the palm is king." HÄV.: "By this symbol nothing else is meant to be impressed upon the temple than the stamp of the noblest and grandest prosperity." More fully BÄHR (see der Salom. Tempel, p. 120 sq.): "Since all fulness, riches, and glory of vegetable life is comprehended in the palm, it above all is adapted for the habitation of Jehovah, which is called a habitation of glory; it stands, therefore, parallel to the cherub, nothing vegetable can so announce the glory of the Creator. By it the habitation of Jehovah is indicated as a perpetually flourishing habitation, abiding in vigorous strength, concealing in itself the fulness of life; it becomes the place of salvation, life, peace, and joy, a paradise of God. But since the sanctification of Israel is the end and aim of Jehovah's dwelling among them, these ideas are of an ethical character (Ps. i. 8, lii. 10 [8]; Jer. xvii. 8; Prov. xi. 28, 30; Ezek. xlvii. 12; Rev. xxii. 2; particularly Ps. xcii. 13 [12] sq.). The fact that the temple was adorned with these figures, while the tabernacle was destitute of them, has its ground in the Promised Land. Palestine is the native land of the palm, hence these armorial bearings and badges of the land and people of Israel on the coins of the age of the Maccabees, and on Phœnician coins, while on those of Titus we have a palm tree with Judea capta. In Solomon's temple, on the other hand, Judea victrix had been represented, for the temple was at once the monument of Israel's victory over its enemies and of Jehovah's covenant faithfulness, and a pledge of the firm possession of the land (comp. ch. xxxvii.). The palm, already pointing in this way to salvation, peace, joy, and rest, was very specially a symbol of that which had dawned for Israel with the period of the 'house' and its builder, the Prince of Peace. Thus there is a relation of Jehovah's habitation to the land, and of the land to the sanctuary; both relations are bound up with each other in the palm. The place of Jehovah's residence and revelation is a place of palms, thus the land of palms is a land of Jehovah's residence and revelation, a heavenly land." [KLIEF.: "The palm branches stand in close relation to the feast of tabernacles, and it is the eschatological signification of that feast which is designed to be stamped by this adorning with palms upon the edifice of the sanctuary" (?).] Comp. however, here, for the entrance into the temple of the New Jerusalem, the entry of the Messiah through the midst of palms, Matt. xxi. 8; Mark xi. 8.

[FAIRBAIRN: "Here also nothing was left to men's caprice or corrupt fancies, as had been the case of old" in the outer court of Solomon's temple. "A more perfect state of things was to be brought in; and even all in the outer court was to be regulated by God's hand, and bear the impress of His holiness. This, too, must be hallowed ground, fashioned and ruled in all its parts after the perfect measure of the divine mind and the just requirements of His service; therefore such was evidently the practical result aimed at,—let not the ungodly and profane any longer presume to tread such courts (Isa. i. 12), or desecrate them by the introduction of their own unwarranted inventions. Let all feel that in coming here they have to do with a God of purer eyes than to behold iniquity."—W. F.]

Vers. 17-19. The Outer Court.

It is necessary to pass over it to come to the other gates. Comp. ch. x. 5.—מִנְיָהוּ is properly: "appendage," and so: annexed building or side-room; specially used for small chambers at the sides, which served for keeping utensils and provisions, for the residence of the priests, and also for sacrificial feasts (1 Sam. ix. 22). Comp. Jer. xxxv

2. Hengst. describes well the use of the "Leashachoth:" a refuge from storm and rain, as the pavement preserved the feet from mud, but principally for rejoicing before the Lord, for the eating and drinking before Him (Deut. xii.; Luke xiii. 26), in which the necessitous also participated, the agapes of the Old Covenant. — רָצֵחָה, a stone-covered floor, literally: what is "made firm," pavement, stone-cover, like pavimentum, from pavire (פָּוִי), to ram tight. — שָׁלַף is particip.

masc. sing., referring, according to Hengst., to the chambers and the stone pavement as a whole in a neuter sense; according to Kliefoth, only to the stone pavement, which is feminine; but, as Keil justly observes, his grounds for this are not cogent. That both the chambers and the pavement were made for the court round about, brings them near to the wall, and makes them run along it round about the court, except its west side. Thirty such chambers are easily divided into ten in each of the three possible directions, although in ver. 18 only the stone pavement is expressly placed in relation to the three gates; for the "Leashachoth" are described as "beside" (not "upon") the stone pavement; according to Hengst.: opening on it, meaning probably that they bounded the pavement. Since these chambers may be supposed spacious, each like an annexe by itself, — whence also it may be seen how they presented themselves singly to the eye for numbering, — they might, reaching, as they did, nearly from gate to gate, have been like a connection between these. — Ver. 18. As the chambers were אֶל-הַדְּרָגָה, so the stone pavement was אֶל-בִּתְּחָה, by the "shoulder," that is, side of the gates, for the gates of the outer court are already looked on collectively; and this אֶל-בִּתְּחָה is more exactly explained by לְמַעַן אֶתְּחַבֵּר הַשְּׁעָרִים, meaning that the length of the gates fixed the breadth of the stone pavement. As the lower, it is to be distinguished from that situated higher, that is, the upper, inner court. — Ver. 19 measures the breadth of the outer court, starting from the east gate, the gate hitherto spoken of, and that, doubtless, from the front of its porch. — הַחֲתוּמָה refers neither to שַׁעַר nor to an omitted הַדְּרָגָה, but simply to the stone pavement of the outer court, called in ver. 18 הַחֲתוּמָה. — To the front, etc., this terminus ad quem is indicated by מִהֵנָּה in respect to the gates of the inner court, as they advance 50 cubits into the outer court; and here, in respect to the east gate of the inner court, to the front of the porch of this gate, where, accordingly, one stepped from without on to the inner court (vera. 23, 27). The man neither measured into the inner court nor yet up to its wall. The מִדָּה also, doubtless, belongs to the starting-point of the measuring, — 100 cubits + 2 gate lengths of 50 = 200 cubits. The breviloquent expression: "the east and the north," which latter points to what follows, would, when resolved, run as follows: Thus with respect to the east side, and the same with respect to the north side.

Vers. 20-23. The North Gate.

The length and breadth, only mentioned as measured in Ver. 20, are in Ver. 21 determined after the measure of the gate. הָיָה refers, according to Keil, to the north gate (ver. 20), but may be referred more exactly to the collectives רָחֵק, אֵלָיו, and אֵלָיו: all that was, etc. In citing particulars, the porch and thresholds are omitted. The number of the guardrooms is again given with more exactitude. — בְּאַמָּה, strictly: measured "by the cubit." — While brevity thus characterizes the repetition, with which the use of collectives harmonizes, Ver. 22 subjoins the number of the steps, applicable to the east gate also. In addition to the windows, the "Elammim" and the palms are again expressly mentioned, and what the אֵלֵי-הַמִּיִּם are is made plainer by their being indicated as before those who go up. הָיָה לְפָנֵיהֶם refers, not to מַעְלֵה, but to יָרֵד. The mention of the "Elammim" here, for the third time, is in order to supplement the description of the east gate, in which only those between the guardrooms had been thought of. Thus the entrance threshold, too, had "Elammim"; these, of course, being without windows, because filling the breadth of the wall (ver. 8), but furnished with projecting cornices. It lay vis à vis level with the last step. — Ver. 23. Now that the parts opposite have been spoken of, the not hitherto observed relation of the gate (of the inner court) to the gate (of the outer court) is given with reference to the two gates described northward and eastward.

Vers. 24-27. The South Gate.

Ver. 24. בְּמִדּוֹת הָאֵלֶּה, by those measures which were observed on the east and north gates; and also of which the dimension had not been stated in definite numbers, but yet had its measured definite magnitude. — The guardrooms are not mentioned here. — Ver. 25. That the windows here are described as: like those windows, shows how the בְּמִדּוֹת regarding them in ver. 22 is to be understood. — לָהֶן, referring to the gate-structure, is prefixed in order to be able to give as briefly as is done the length and breadth of the gate. — Ver. 26. לְפָנֵיהֶם, to be understood from ver. 22. — אֵלֵי-הָאֵלָיו refers to the two pillars at the porch.

Comp. on ver. 16. Hengst. supposes that by every pillar stood two artificial palms, which put it between them (!). — Ver. 27 to be understood from ver. 23. — Kliefoth calculates the entire extent of the temple building as a square of 500 cubits.

Vers. 28-37. The Gates of the Inner Court.

We already know that the inner court has, opposite the three gates of the outer court, likewise three gates. The measuring reached in ver. 27 to the south gate, which is therefore spoken of first in Ver. 28. וַיֵּצֵא: so that I found myself in the south gate; others translate: through, etc. The general statement retains the same dimensions as in the outer gates.—Ver. 29, befitting the brevity, almost entirely collectives.—Ver. 30 tells how many cubits the “Elammoth” claimed from the gates in length and, because round about, in breadth, thus advancing into the court. Twenty-five cubits’ length makes the half of the whole length of the gate. Keil accordingly includes in this latter: 10 cubits of the two partition-walls of the guardrooms, 12 for two threshold walls, and 2 cubits for the porch walls; the missing cubit forms mouldings. Hengst. does not allow the side walls of the porch to extend to the space before the terminating pillars, and deducts from the $10+12+6=28$ cubits, the special side walls of the guardrooms, 3 cubits thick on the whole, which, however, are to be reckoned into the 5 cubits of the space between the guardrooms, and into the 6 cubits of the threshold. So Kliefoth previously.—The 5 cubits’ breadth, which is likewise included in the entire breadth of 25 cubits, gives Hengst. occasion to remark that, since a bulwark of 5 cubits would have been useless, we may suppose two walls with a dark space within, the breadth of the guardrooms projecting $1\frac{1}{2}$ or $2\frac{1}{2}$ cubits before the side parapets. The statement in Ver. 31 that the side walls in the length and breadth mentioned, collectively וַיֵּצֵא, were directed towards the outer court, makes this inner gate, like the outer gates, seem built in the outer court, and, as its לֵא (ver. 9) is spoken of immediately, with the two gate pillars (ver. 37), hence towards the side of the porch, and thus in reverse relation to the outer gates, and consequently so that the one porch faced the other. So Kliefoth, who then places the steps here before the porch. But how can he (and Keil after him) say of the inner gates, that the “second threshold lay between the surrounding walls of the inner court, and the gate-structure extended thence into the outer court,” and yet maintain that the gate of the inner court lay “with its whole length” within the outer court? Reckoned from the “second threshold” that cannot be said; the porch only with the gate pillars was there. Hengst., on the other hand, makes the terminating point towards the inner court be the pillars with their palmas, between which one went forth into the inner court; and the commencement of the gateway which reached farthest into the outer court he makes to be the stair.—מַעְלֵה (HITZIG: singular; KEIL: plural of מַעְלֵה, “ascent”) instead of עֲלֹת in ver. 26, the “ascending steps which form the stair” (HITZIG). On the steps being eight, a number elsewhere without import, Hengst. says: “It is here to be regarded merely as an advance on the number at the outer court, a hint at the superior dignity of the inner court, which, with its altar of burnt-offering, rises still higher above the outer court than this does above the profane exterior.” [KLIEF.: “Eight is the number of the new beginning, and so the signature of the New Covenant, and of the res novissima in general; those who ascend to this priests’ court will be a new priestly race, when God has established a new beginning. The number eight does not occur in John’s vision of the New Jerusalem, because the new beginning is already given.”]

Ver. 32. The inner east gate.—Ver. 33 as ver. 29.—Ver. 34. Comp. ver. 31.—Ver. 35. The inner north gate.—Ver. 36. More abbreviated than ver. 33.—Ver. 37. וַיֵּצֵא instead of וַיֵּצֵא

in ver. 34. “To this” (the north gate), says Hengst., “the prophet is brought last, because to it alone (!) belonged the noteworthy things of the inner court, to be described in the following section,—the arrangements for the slaughter of the victims, and the preparation of their flesh.”

Vers. 38–47. The Inner Court in respect of certain Arrangements for the Temple Service.

The temple and its service is the theme of these closing chapters of our prophet. Hence it is easy to understand that what follows of the description of the inner court, which has hitherto been occupied with the consideration of the three gates, merely can be given in orderly connection. [FAIRBAIRN: “Everything connected even with the killing and preparing of victims must now be regulated by the word of God. Even there, all is to have an impress of sacredness, such as has not hitherto been found, in consequence of the higher elevation to which the divine kingdom was to attain.”—W. F.] —The opening of the annexe, the side-chamber

(ver. 17), is בְּמַיִלִים, that is, beside the two pillars of the court. Hengstenberg limits the plural הַשְּׁעָרִים (= “at the gates”), as a generic designation in distinction from the pillars in the interior, to the north gate. Böttcher likewise supposes two of such cells at the entrance to and two at the exit from this gate-structure, all of them on the side walls close by the thresholds. Keil finds with reason that הַשְּׁעָרִים indicates a cell with a door to each of the three interior gates, a view supported by the intended use: there shall they wash the burnt-offering (a thing belonging to the priests’ court). וַיִּרְחֹץ, Hiphil from רָחַץ, to “thrust out,” to “cast away,” the filth, hence: to wash. “The Old Testament and the Talmud recognise only the washing of the entrails and the legs of the victims for the burnt-offering (Lev. i. 9; 2 Chron. iv. 6)” (KEIL). This, however, does not hinder us from taking וַיִּרְחֹץ here in its character of fulness, which makes it the first in the list of offerings in ver. 39, not so much per synecdoche for the bloody offerings in general, as (like ver. 43, וַיִּקְרֹב more externally) bringing to view the idea of offering from its inmost and most fundamental conception. One cell at each gate is sufficient for the purpose (it is the last stage for the victim’s flesh before it is laid on the altar); but that there is such a cell at each gate is evident from the idea itself, which KLIEF. (who places the washing-cells in pairs, one on each side of each gate porch) thus expresses: “The alaying took place at the gate beside the porch, and no longer at the side of the altar of burnt-offering, as laid down in the law (Lev. i. 11); in the new temple the service will be so much more regular, zealous, and frequent; thither shall prince and people flow to bring their offerings; they will slay and (as there shall then be clean offerings) still more wash before all the gates." Hengstenberg, on the other hand, insists upon the direction in Lev. i. 11: "northward."—Passing over to the slaying, Ver. 39 speaks, according to HENGST., of the north gate (vers. 35, 40, 44) alone; but הַשְּׁעָרִים may comprehend collectively הַשְּׁעָרִים of the former verse, or (comp. on ver. 40) may mean a definite gate at which what holds good of all the gates is to be exemplified.—The four tables, two and two opposite on opposite sides, are in the porch, as the cells for washing beside the gate pillars are there also. שָׁחַט, "to slay," is either to be taken in a wider sense, comprehending the whole preparation of the flesh for the sacrifice, particularly the laying (comp. ver. 43) of the pieces of flesh on the tables, which, however, would be strangely expressed by שָׁחַט, or אֲלֵיהֶם only simply indicates that the slaying of the victim took place without, in the direction towards these tables, in relation to them.—In the enumeration of the offerings the expiatory sacrifices are fully represented, namely, by the sin-offering and the trespass-offering,—a hint for the understanding of Ezekiel's temple, for the idea of the expiatory sacrifice has in view the restoration of the state of grace, or reception into that state. Although the burnt-offering stands first, as hitherto it has been treated of as instar omnium, and hence the relation in the state of grace must come principally into consideration, yet we are not to imagine an absolute purity of the people from sin in the time of this temple.—Ver. 40 adds two pairs of tables to these inner tables. The first pair, as they are said to be placed at the side, in contrast to the porch, so in contrast to the interior of the gate-structure they are described as without; and this is so much the more expressive, as reference is to be made immediately to him that goeth up (לְעוֹלָה).

particip.). The figurative expression: אֶל-הַכֶּתֶף, which Kliefoth here and in ver. 18 presses far too much and unnecessarily, demands even as such a closer and proper definition, as here כְּחוּצָה (KEIL: "outside"). But the phrase: "him that goeth up," clearly shows that the steps (מַעְלֹת), and, since they lie before, with them הַשְּׁעָרִים (comp. ver. 11), are to be understood as belonging to the porch; and הַצִּפּוֹנָה (thus correctly Keil) clearly explains the כְּתֵף to be the north side of the gate; whence Kliefoth infers that הַשְּׁעָרִים in question is, just as in the case of the outer gates, the east gate. [Kliefoth, as others also, translates: "for him that goeth up to the gate-opening towards the north." HENGST.: "to the door of the north gate."]

HIRTIG: northward, that is, to the right hand. Böttcher takes לְעוֹלָה to mean: "at the stair."—

The two other tables (in confirmation of the exposition given) were at the "following" ("other") side, הַאֲחֵרָה, which designation forms a brief contrast to the הַצִּפּוֹנָה, as in like manner אֲחֵרָה comprises in brief the rest that has been said.—Ver. 41. A summing up to the number eight of the tables designated as within and without in vers. 39 and 40: because the latter four are tables set apart for slaying, אֲלֵיהֶם may be rendered: "on," or: "at them." Ver. 42 shows that the summing up with such indication of what is distinctive in the two latter pairs is made because there is still a third set of four tables to be mentioned. In accordance with the foregoing, one would expect here too a fixing of where they stood; hence עוֹלָה can hardly mean:

"burnt-offering," which is spoken of at the close, and much more completely.—They are stone tables (בְּזֵית), the "cutting" of the stones), formed of square blocks, as are also the stair steps. Hence those previously mentioned were doubtless of wood, particularly the second set, named as specially appointed for slaying, while this third set had to support heavy instruments. Finally, in addition and parallel to the burnt-offering, comes the alain-offering, which includes the sin-offering, trespass-offering, and thank-offering. [HENGST.: "There are twelve tables in all, according to the number of the tribes of Israel, Ezra vi. 17, viii. 35."—Ver. 43. הַשִּׁפְתִּים must be something definite, something well known, and at the same time (from the dual) double or biform. Gesen. has given up the meaning: stabula, "cattle-stalls," held by Hupf. on Ps. lxxviii. 14 [13], for that of "stakes" or "staples" standing out on the wall and bifurcated, to which they bound the beasts about to be slain. Meier, again, who rejects the idea of a fundamental signification: "to place," accepts the meaning: "to draw together," to separate, to make fast as such, and imagines: "enclosures of wicker-work for the cattle, of two rows, between which the herdsman used to rest." But what purpose do these serve here? KEIL therefore: "double staples," on which the slaughtered animals were hung for skinning. The article may denote the kind (of staple). (Others: "drinking troughs," or: conduits for conveying away the fluids.) But how does בְּבֵית harmonize? It only remains to make it a slip of the pen for בִּנְיָן, as the wall is called in ver. 5, or an abbreviation, or, like Keil, to think of בֵּינָה ("house" = building).

מִכְבֵּי is particip. Hoph. from כָּבַח. The description: round and round, would, moreover, answer well for the wall of the inner court, which surrounded the temple edifice on three sides; and the sacrificial victims may well be conceived of as bound to this wall. [KEIL: "On the three outskirts of the porch building."] Kliefoth (and so Hengstenberg) understands raised ledges

(border enclosures), with which the tables for laying the sacrificial flesh on were surrounded at the edge round about, so that the flesh lay securely between the ledges as between hurdles, and did not fall off; the ledges were opposite one another in pairs, hence the dual, a handbreadth high. But even with such an interpretation, כַּתְּמִית still causes a difficulty, for according to this, "in the house" must be taken as = in the interior of the porch (בְּתֵּיכָם, ver. 39), and that

about the table-tops," KLIEF.), be taken as a figurative expression for "within" the tables (how does round and round harmonize with this?), and thus either the porch or a table must be taken as a house! Only the transition to the last clause would be easy, and this doubtless has given occasion to this interpretation; but, on the other hand, the new element would be wanting which the double staples give in this so exact representation. The ellipsis: And on the tables, etc., states the purpose for which the tables in ver. 39 was intended, in distinction from that of the tables in vers. 40 and 42. Keil makes the statement refer to all the tables in vers. 39-42.—וְקִרְבָּן

("approaching," "presenting"), like "offering," from offerre, is the most general and comprehensive name for offerings. Mark vii. 11: Kapfen & levi's Opfer. Hengstenberg observes in addition: "The very going into details apparently so minute showed how clearly and sharply the prophet in faith beheld the non-existent as existent, and was well fitted to draw away the minds of the people from the fixed look at the smitten city. We must indeed always keep in view the object of the prophet, to set up an interim temple for the imagination (!), in which it might expatiate as long as the real temple, and with it the kingdom of God, actually lay in ruins."

Hitherto we have had arrangements for slaying and preparing the sacrificial victims (vers. 38-43) in reference to the inner court. With Ver. 44 we come to the personelle of the service.—Since we have been in the foregoing at the side of the porch of the inner gate, hence properly in the outer court, and only in relation to the inner court, the more exact description of: outside at the inner gate, by: in the inner court, is only correct. On the other hand, the cells for the singers at once present an insuperable difficulty for those who, like Keil, still draw sharply, and apply here, the Old Testament distinction "between the Levitical singers and the Aaronites who administer the priesthood" (against this sharp distinction comp. ver. 46). That Ezekiel selected certain descendants of Aaron—who, by the way, is not named in ver. 46, although Levi is—for the service of this sanctuary, is no reason why these should not come into consideration here primarily as singers, especially when we consider the idea thereby expressed, and so made impressive. Hengstenberg says excellently: "That the singers are here so prominent is explained by this, that in the state of exaltation of the community of God, more ample material will be given to them for new songs, so that in the worship of the new temple the singing must play a chief part, as, indeed, the multiplication of the singers and musicians under David stood in connection with the advance which, under him, the people of God had made. According to Ps. lxxxvii., when the future of salvation has come, the singers with the dancers say: All my springs are in Thee. The second part of Isaiah, and its lyric echo, Ps. xvi.-c., are full of the thought, that in the time of salvation all things shall sing and play. Even in the times soon after the return from the exile, singing revived in a degree that had not been since David. In a long series of psalms, from Ps. cvii. onward, the people thank God for the blessing of restoration. Hallelujah was the watchword." The difficulties connected with the locality of these cells for the singer-priests, which have induced even Keil to enter on the slippery path of text-revision, guided by the Septuagint,—of which, however, we must first have some authentic text, if, on its authority, anything is to be altered in the Masoretic text,—are sufficiently solved by Kliefoth. He observes on כַּתְּמִית, that, consequently, they "were not constructed in or on the gate building itself, like the cells in ver. 38." He rightly makes וְקִרְבָּן

refer to that part and space of the inner court which is contiguous to the side of the north gate, and hence not contiguous to the east gate. The description of the locality of the cells becomes perfect by this, that their front is stated to be towards the south, that is, nearer to the temple edifice than to the altar of burnt-offering, while the definition: "toward the north," approaches nearer to the altar of burnt-offering. KLIEFOTH: "The entrance of the temple lay to the south-west from the north gate; from it the priests had the temple in their view." HENGST.: "The chambers of the singers generally faced the south, where they (1 Chron. xvi. 37) chiefly had to perform."—As the number is indefinite at the beginning, and it is simply said in the plural, just as the priests, afterwards distinguished, are here comprehended in the singers, so the limitation in the second part of the verse, before the pendant in question fronting the north, is applicable also to that fronting the south, so that we really have to suppose likewise, in the first part of the verse, if not only one cell, yet only one range of cells (with several chambers). The masculine וְקִרְבָּן

can be understood of a part of the cells, and so the better corresponds to the previous plural, and especially to the וְקִרְבָּן. That it cannot mean

"another" range of cells is self-evident, against Kliefoth. Situated at the side of the east gate signifies: if one steps out of the east gate into the inner court, as the following shows, with the front towards the north. HENGST.: "There, in the court, stood the altar of burnt-offering, where the singers had to perform at the offering of the great national sacrifices, 1 Chron. xvi. 41." [KLIEF: On account of the "superintendence over the altar" (ver. 46), and the "overseeing of the east gate.""] Keil translates ver. 44: "And outside of the inner gate were two cells in the inner court, one at the shoulder of the north gate, with its front to the south, and one at the shoulder of the south gate, with the front to the north."

Vers. 45, 46. Explanation of the purpose for which the two ranges of cells were intended with respect to the persons performing service.—Ver.

45. Therefore שָׁמַר מְשָׁמְרָתוֹ—יִדְבֵּר אֵלָי means:

the waiting upon a business, to take care of an office, to attend to it. To make prominent the significance of temple and altar, the priestly service in respect to the house is kept separate from that with respect to the altar in ver. 46, yet so that the significant general character of those ministering according to ver. 44 is not thereby abolished.—The sons of Zadok are selected not as Aaronites in particular, but from among the sons of Levi (see the fuller treatment of this point on ch. xlv. 15).—הַקִּרְבָּיִם is the general expression for the priestly function in general, as is also שָׁמַר (Heb. vii. 19; James iv. 8).

Ver. 47. A finishing off with the inner court by stating its length and breadth as 100 cubits each, forming a square, at the same time already making mention of its proper furniture, namely, the altar before the house, the altar of burnt-offering. On this comp. on ch. xliii. 13 sq.

Vers. 48, 49. The Porch of the Temple.

The description is surprisingly short in comparison with that of the parts previously delineated, and likewise when we compare it with the description of Solomon's temple, in which reversely the courts are briefly treated of. Hengst. explains this latter circumstance from the familiarity of the people with the courts, while this had to be compensated for by a copious description of the part of the sanctuary inaccessible to them; and makes Ezekiel refer back to this description, and only in the case of the courts to enter more into detail in consideration of the people, and especially those of them to whom the courts might be wholly unknown.—Ver. 48 describes the porch before the holy place (1 Kings vi. 3), by giving the measurement of its two pillars, and the breadth of the gate. The expressions: on this side, and: on that, easily explain themselves as regards the corner pillar on each side, but not sufficiently in respect to the breadth of the gate. What is meant there by כָּפוֹ כָּפוֹ?

This statement cannot be occasioned merely by the pillar on this side and on that, but must have its cause in the construction of the gate, which then (comp. on ch. xl. 11) would be represented as a barricade with two halves, which had their hinges on the respectively contiguous corner pillars, so that from this construction the measure of each half of the gate is given by itself; so here and so there. The measurement of the gate given in the text comes out still more plainly if each half of the gate (probably lattice-work) shut up only a part, its own part, of the breadth of the porch; and since this made up only three cubits on either side, a breadth of five cubits remained open in the middle for looking in and walking in. This view of Kliefoth's (also Hengstenberg's) harmonizes exactly with the measurements which immediately follow; whereas Keil, with an entire breadth of sixteen cubits, has only six cubits left for the breadth of the gate. For Ver. 49, which measures twenty cubits for the length of the porch of the temple, that is, from east to west (comp. 1 Kings vi. 3), gives its breadth, hence from north to south, or vice versa, at eleven cubits, both measurements being taken in the light, and hence excluding the thickness of the walls. This interior breadth of the porch is shown to belong also to the outside by the statement: and that (also) at the steps, sq.; namely, the breadth was eleven cubits. The stair extended in equal breadth before the porch. In this way, as Kliefoth observes, the porch was wider by half a cubit on either side than the door leading from the porch into the holy place (ch. xli. 2), which door was thereby rendered as visible as its character of fixing the length of the porch demanded. [Hengst., referring to the ten cubits' breadth of the porch in Solomon's temple, supposes the eleventh cubit here to be occupied by the posts of the door on both sides.] From the height (six cubits), ch. xli. 8, Hengst. estimates the number of the steps, which is not given, to be "probably fourteen." Kliefoth and Hengstenberg compute the entire breadth of the portal, inclusive of the two corner pillars (5 + 5), to be twenty-one cubits. For enclosing the porch from the pillars to the east wall of the temple, we have to suppose, as with the gates of the court, side-walls ("Elammoth"), which Keil puts down at two and a half cubits each, so that the five cubits broad pillars would have only half their breadth on the inside of the porch. [Hengst., in opposition to most expositions of Solomon's temple, holds that the length of the porch of the temple given here "corresponds to that of the porch in Solomon's temple in 1 Kings vi. 3."] The height of the two corner pillars of the porch, which also is wanting in Ezekiel's vision, is supplied by Hengst., from 2 Chron. iii. 4 (JOSEPHUS, Arch. viii. 3. 2), as 5 cubits thick and 120 cubits high. The עַמֻּדִים, two in number, are set down as "at" or "beside" the corner pillars (the "Elim"), which remind us of "Jachin" and "Boaz" in Solomon's temple (1 Kings vii. 15 sq.), and, doubtless, for that very reason their position is not given more exactly. Kliefoth and Hitzig place them one at each side of the steps; and the same is done by Hengst., who says, regarding their import: taken away by the Chaldeans, Jer. lvi. 20 sq., they were "as it were the programme of the temple and of the kingdom of God represented by it; they represented what the people of God have in their God: Jachin ('He establishes me') and Boaz ('in Him strong'); made of brass, very thick, uniform to the top, they are a figure of the unchangeable stability and strength which was only in appearance practically disproved by the Chaldeans, etc.—The Septuagint is all confused in these verses; for example, its statement that the steps were ten rests on this, that it has transformed יָמֵן into the similar עֶזְרָה. Böttcher, Hitzig, and Maurer ground thereon their treatment of the text, and Hävernick is simply at a loss what to make of it.

CHAPTER XLI.

- 1 And he brought me to the temple, and measured the wall-pillars, six cubits broad on this side, and six cubits broad on that, the breadth of the tent [was that]. And the breadth of the entrance [the door] was ten cubits, and the sides of the entrance five cubits on this side and five cubits on that; and he measured its [the temple's] length, forty cubits, and the breadth, twenty cubits. And he went inward, and measured the wall-pillar of the entrance, two cubits; and the entrance, six cubits; and the breadth of the entrance, seven cubits.
- 4 And he measured its [the interior's] length, twenty cubits; and the breadth, twenty cubits, before the temple: and he said unto me, This is the most holy place.
- 5 And he measured the wall of the house, six cubits; and the breadth of the side building, four cubits round and round about the house [all around]. And of the side chambers [there were], chamber on chamber, three, and that thirty times; and they came into [on] the wall, which was to the house at the side chambers round and round, so that they are held fast, and [yet] they are not held fast in the wall of the house. And it became broader, and changed [and in so far it changed] still upwards in the case of the side chambers; for all the changing in the house [went on] still upwards round and round on the house; therefore was the breadth to the house upwards, and so the lower [story] will ascend to the upper by the middle. And I saw on the house a height round and round; the foundations of the side chambers were the full rod, six cubits according to that to the wrist. The breadth of the wall, which was for the side building without, was five cubits, and [five cubits] the place that was left free [with respect to] the house of the side chambers, which was annexed to the house. And between the chambers was a breadth of twenty cubits round about the house. And the opening of the side building was towards the free place, one opening towards the north, and one opening towards the south; and the breadth of the place [the space] left free was five cubits round and round.
- 12 And the building which was before the gizrah [off place] on the side towards the west [literally: towards the sea] had a breadth of seventy cubits; and the wall of the building was five cubits broad round and round, and its length was ninety cubits. And he measured the house, a hundred cubits long; and the gizrah, and the building, and its walls, a hundred cubits long. And the breadth of the front of the house, and of the gizrah towards the east, a hundred cubits.
- 15 And he measured [so measured he] the length of the building which was in front of the gizrah [namely] on its back part, and [that was] its galleries on this side and on that, a hundred cubits, and the inner temple and the porches of the court; The thresholds, and the closed windows, and the galleries round about on all three,—over against the threshold [was] a boarding of wood round and round,—and the ground up to the windows [measured he, or: had measures], and the windows [were] covered; Up above the opening and [that] to the inner house and outside, and on the whole wall round and round within and without [were] measures. And [there were] made cherubim and palms, [so that] a palm was between a cherub and a cherub, and on the cherub two faces. And the face of a man was towards the palm on this side, and the face of a lion towards the palm on that side; it was made on the whole house round and round. From the ground to above the opening were the cherubim and the palms made, and [this on the; or: so much of the, etc.; or: this is] the wall of the temple.
- 21 The post of the temple was square, and the front of the sanctuary; the view [was] as the view [had the same view]. The altar of wood was three cubits high, and its length two cubits; and it had its corners; and its length and its walls were of wood: and he said unto me, This is the table that is before Jehovah.
- 23, 24 And two doors were to the temple and to the sanctuary. And there were two leaves to the doors, two turning leaves, two to the one door, and two leaves to the other. And on them, on the doors of the temple, were made cherubim and palms, as they were made on the walls; and a wooden pediment was on the front of the porch without. And closed windows and palms were on this side and on that, on the sides of the porch; thus [as respects] the side chambers of the house, thus [as regards] the pediments.

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

Vers. 1-4. The Temple.

The edifice of the temple proper is now described in continuation of ch. xl. 48, 49. We proceed from the temple porch to the "house," as it is called there; to הֵיכָל, as it is named in Ver. 1. The idea of greatness, height, like הָיָה, "to be able," "to have the power of" (HUPF.: "to seize," be capable), lying at the root of this word, suggests a large and spacious edifice, in short, a palace, such as, doubtless, David had in his mind (2 Sam. vii. 2), and in agreement also with the character of Solomon's temple, as a palace of Jehovah (e.g. 1 Kings vii. 12). הֵיכָל does not need to be understood in the narrower sense of the holy place, any more than does הֹדֶשֶׁת, which designation, embracing both the holy and the most holy place (without the porch), simply subjoins the Mosaic element to the Solomonic.—The "Elim" (see ch. xl. 9) are two wall-pillars, one on each side, six cubits broad, so that by this statement of the breadth of the pillars, the breadth of the whole sanctuary is given as to its bounding points, extending from the extremity of the one to the extremity of the other. For—Ver. 2—there was still between them a door ten cubits broad, and on each side, literally: "shoulders," five cubits broad, making thus the inside breadth twenty cubits, the half of the length.—In Ver. 3 it is said that he went; not: he brought me, etc. For, as ver. 4 shows, the place in question was the most holy place, which the mere priest was not permitted to enter. Of the collective door-pillars, one is on the right and one on the left, on the wall between the two divisions of the sanctuary. On account of the following breadth of seven cubits, the six cubits have been taken to be the height of the door, or an additional cubit has been understood as the breadth of the door-posts.—Ver. 4. The measuring of the length leads into the interior, to its extreme point; hence the breadth is again in front, where the temple appears as a whole, as the palace of holiness.

Vers. 5-11. The Side Building.

In Ver. 5 the measuring turns to the outside. As the wall and the side building are spoken of, it is now said the house. The wall is the wall that begins with the pillars (ver. 1).—The thrice-repeated סָבִיב undoubtedly refers to the three sides, which come into consideration, the two lengthwise and the one at the back.—According to Ver. 6, the side building was a complex of ninety chambers or rooms in three stories, sacristies for the priests, and for the custody of the manifold sacred objects, clothes, utensils, etc. (הַצִּלְעוֹת, in ver. 5 collective, like יִצְעָק in 1 Kings vi. From צָלַע, "to turn," "to bend," it signifies: turning, bending, and thence: side, rib, etc. The הַצִּלְעוֹת in ver. 6 are single chambers which compose the צִלְעָא as a whole.) Chamber "on" chamber; לָ here = עַל, as is evident from what follows, and still more so from Solomon's temple, through which that becomes clear which otherwise might remain dark. The eye first looks upward, and in this direction there was chamber rising on chamber. (KEIL: on the north and south walls, twelve each; on the shorter west wall, six.)—As to the fastening of their floor-beams, these side chambers came "into the wall (the proper temple wall which ran around them inside);" the immediately following explanation shows that the בָּ implies such a connection with the wall in question that "into" rather implies: "on," or: "upon"; they were indeed caught and held fast (אָחֲזוּ) there, but not in the temple wall itself, for ledges ran round about the temple, upon but not into which the ends of the beams were put. (Comp. 1 Kings vi. 6, 10.)—Ver. 7 speaks impersonally (it), although, according to what precedes and what immediately follows, it is the house that will be thought of under reference to the side building.

The widening as it went upwards (לְמַעְלָה) related to the side chambers (לְצִלְעוֹת).

Its explanation is already given in ver. 6, namely, where the ledges let us suppose a gradual narrowing of the temple wall adapted to the three stories. As now said in ver. 7, it was still upwards and round about the house, thus not on the outer wall of the side building, so that this wall rose perpendicular without any ledges. Accordingly, the width of the side building and relatively of the side chambers necessarily increased as the temple wall grew narrower from story to story. This is the מִסְכַּב־רִבִּית (from סִבָּב, Niph.: וְנִסְבָּב); this widening was the changing, which could be said of the temple house (HENGST.: "and altered itself," "the alteration of the house"), יֵי expressing the

וְנִסְבָּב with so much the better reason as the מִסְכַּב was round and round on the house, and therefore רִבִּית־לִבִּית (עַל־בָּן), that is, this "width" increasing "with the ascent," this "changing" pertained in fact only to the house, with which the side building of three stories was connected on every possible side. [Keil translates: "and was surrounded," "the surrounding of the house," and understands by that very simply the side building; while Kliefoth understands a gallery-like "corridor" running round the house, by which one could get to the chambers of the upper story, and derives the widening above not from the temple wall, but from the corridors of the second and third stories; comp. the convincing refutation in Keil.]

—If the most generally accepted translation: "and so one ascends from the lower story to the upper by the middle," is held to say something not quite clear in itself, one must with Hengstenberg supply from 1 Kings vi. 8 the winding stair, for which room was got by the breadth increasing upwards; we do not need with Keil to suppose the stair on the outside, and to contend against its leading from the lower into the upper, and thence (!) into the middle story; it was self-evidently in the interior of the side building;—or by this translation of the close of the verse one can find the thought expressed that the priests did not step from the temple into the side chambers, but within the widening upwards which the house had through the side buildings. KEIL: "proportionately to the middle story"; the difference of gender decides nothing against הַתַּחְתּוֹנָה as subject to יַעֲלֶה, and וְכֵן indicates that the ascent took place in the way stated of the widening.

What Ezekiel sees—Ver. 8—was on the house, and hence still relates to the side building, without its being taken as = "house." [HENGST.: "the height round about," namely, of the side building, may be given.] What we may take as meant by the height (KEIL: = elevation) is probably told by מִסְכּוֹת (Qeri: מִסְכָּרוֹת). According to Keil, particip. dual of יָסַד; according to Gesenius, a substantive, signifying: the foundations of the side chambers, the basement of which, accordingly, a full rod high, reached to the house; and this harmonizes with the steps leading to the porch of the temple (ch. xl.

49); and so הָקִנָּה מֶלֶךְ (only here, elsewhere מֶלֶךְ, מֶלֶךְ) will hardly be added, "because the elevation above the ground might easily be supposed less" (HENGST.). On the contrary, the six cubits אַחֲזֵיהֶם has quite the appearance of a closer definition of that which Ezekiel calls the full rod, although whether from the elbow to the wrist, where hand and arm meet, or how, cannot be determined. J. D. Michaelis supposes short cubits. Such a more exact definition of the measure would be the more in place were it different from that of ch. xl. 5. [Hengstenberg and Kliefoth understand אַחֲזֵיהֶם of each of the three stories: "the foundations one full rod, six cubits its story." Irrespective of whether אַחֲזֵיהֶם can mean that, ו is wanting.]—In Ver. 9, besides the five cubits' breadth of the outer wall of the side building, the same extent (וְאֶחָדָה) is set apart for מִנְחָה (particip. Hoph. of נָחַ, left "over," "free," "empty"), that is, for the space not built upon (ver. 11). KLEIF.: par terre round about the first story of the side building, still to be distinguished from the wider unbuilt-on space which surrounded the temple in a width of twenty cubits.—בֵּית־הַיְיָ regards the side building connected with the temple in this relation separately as a "house," while the clause: אֲשֶׁר לְבֵית, still retains the fact that the house after all is the temple.—Ver. 10. "The cells" are described in ch. xlii. The breadth of twenty cubits bounds the three sides of the temple, north, south, and west. The brevilouquent expression: בֵּין, etc., Hengstenberg takes to mean: between the outer wall of the side building and the cells. כֵּיל: between the free space and the cells.—Ver. 11 shows that the side building opened with two doors towards the free space (HENGST.: "between the wall of the side building and the surrounding wall"). The five cubits round and round (in distinction from the two door-sides) are those already indicated in ver. 9.

Ver. 12. Now the side building which stands in connection with the house has been treated of, and its relation to the outside too shown, a building (as the wall was called in ch. xl. 5) comes to be spoken of which is said to be before the gizrah, from which appellation accordingly we have to find its situation and explanation. Since it is not spoken of so incidentally and epenthetically, as Kliefoth supposes, but next to the side building which belongs to the house its measurements also being given, it must be supposed to stand in some relation or another to the temple. And so it is called הַחֲדָרָה, by which is indicated something known, self-intelligible. חָרַץ means: "to separate," "to cut," and is here said of a space; and thus the gizrah is an off-place. The goat bears (Lev. xvi. 22) "upon him all their iniquities," אֶל-אֶרֶץ חֲדָרָה. HENGST.: "The place and the building thereon serve negatively the same purpose which the temple serves positively. If this is to retain its dignity and sanctity, a place must be assigned to which all uncleanness is removed. Already in Deut. xxiii. 13 sq. we find the order for setting apart such a place outside the camp, which corresponded to the temple (?) with its courts; and also the injunction that this place is to be kept clean, which is laid down as a religious duty." With this has been compared in Solomon's temple 2 Kings xxiii. 11; 1 Chron. xxvi. 16, 18 (the "refuse-gate"). See Lange on Kings, p. 262 sq. Nothing whatever is told us expressly regarding the purpose for which this place, situated behind the temple at the west, was intended, perhaps just because the name itself was quite enough. Where bloody sacrifices were brought, sacrificial feasts held, places for preparing them stood, and a numerous body of persons kept moving about, an off-place for the great quantity of all kinds of refuse was a self-evident necessity.—פָּתָח means the same thing, whether it be taken as defining more closely אֲשֶׁר-לְבֵית, or הַחֲדָרָה, for since the building stood with its east front towards the temple, the side towards the west can only denote its position in some other respect; that is, the position of the place generally. Keil's translation is not clear: "And the building in front of the separate place was on the side towards the west seventy cubits broad."—By the wall . . . round and round, the breadth of which is particularly noticed, is to be understood with Kliefoth the wall of the building. Thus "it extended westward to the outer enclosing wall of the court, and had (HENGST.) by a gate built in this its egress into the city." In Ver. 13 the length of the gizrah (inclusive of all) is placed parallel to the length of the temple, as in Ver. 14 the breadth by which the relation, although antithetical, of the gizrah to the temple becomes very clear. Deducting accordingly the $70 + 2 \times 5 = 80$ cubits (ver. 12), there remains of the 100 cubits a free space 20 cubits broad, doubtless 10 on the north and 10 on the south, for approaches to the gizrah building, whose length ran along the whole extent.

Ver. 15, summing up in accordance with ver. 12: $90 + 2 \times 5 = 100$, just like ver. 13, thus being a recapitulation, intimates by this the character of the notices that still follow, as supplementary additions to the preceding.—The measuring of this length proceeds in such a way that the measurer measured the building situated before the gizrah (according to ver. 12) in the direction towards the back part of the place. This is the meaning of the definition: אֲשֶׁר-עַל-אַחֲרֶיהָ, the feminine suffix referring to הַחֲדָרָה, the back part being the natural antithesis to אֶל-פָּנֵי; so that אֲשֶׁר may either signify "which," or it may also be referred to the length, which extended in front over the back part of the gizrah, if it is not with Keil to be referred to הַבִּנְיָן. This definition is intended, namely, to form the transition to supplementary statements as to the not yet mentioned אַחֲרֵיהָ (Qeri: אַחֲרֵיהָ). MEIER:

אַחֲרֵיהָ, from אָחַר, allied to אָחַז, "to go through" = עָרָה, whence אַחֲרֵיהָ, "walk," as gallery is properly derived from the German wallen = quellen (to issue forth). GESEN.: properly: "landing place," then a short piazza, from נָחַץ, "to break off." The signification: walks, galleries, for the word—occurring only here and in ch. xlii.—is certainly demanded by the latter passage. The analogy to the temple retained throughout speaks in favour of this, as does also the fact that the free space of ten cubits on each side (ver. 14, see exposition) is in this way satisfactorily disposed of. Keil makes the suffix look back to הַבִּנְיָן in

ver. 13. The repeated statement of the hundred cubits' length is intended to show that the galleries were as long as the building.—Since now the inner temple, i.e. that which stood in the inner court (KEIL), or because it is so called in distinction from the gizrah building and the courts (HENGST.), and finally the porches of the court, that is, the projections of the gates into the court generally or into the court in question, are mentioned, all that was hitherto measured is summarily repeated; in which manner Ver. 16 continues, to which Hengst. supplies: "and he measured" (ver. 15), while Keil takes them as nominatives absolute, and finds the predicate in מְרוֹת, ver. 17.—הַפְּסָיִם, mentioned in ch. xl. 6, 7,

according to Kliefoth: window sills (!).—The closed windows, see ch. xl. 16.—The galleries, see ver. 15. The definition: round about on all three (the gizrah, the temple, and the porches of the court, ver. 15), is either to be understood with respect to the description given in the foregoing of the parts designated by the article as known, and hence to be understood under limitation, or we must, for example, suppose galleries to the temple also, and likewise to the porches of the court; for which Hengst. cites John x. 23, and Josephus, Arch. xx. 9. 7. The recapitulatory character of these verses—meant, as they are, for a supplement—speaks in favour of the first view, that of Keil. But that which is to be supplied is in respect of the thresholds or sills (הַפְּסָיִם) collectively) over against them; and, taken strictly, it denotes the upper moulding of the door, or the door-case generally, on both sides (כְּכִיבֵי סָבִיב).

[HENGST.: the ground floor when one looked over the threshold; KEIL: the wooden case of the window openings.] שָׁחָק is: "to make thin," whence שָׁחָקִי, "thin, fine" wood. Hengst. discovers such wooden boarding also in the words: "and also from the ground to the windows," and places the windows up in the roof, as in the ark (Gen. vi. 16), for one reason, because of the adjoining house, which was probably as high as the temple. Kliefoth, on the other hand, places the windows immediately on the ground floor, and makes the earth of the foundation rise up to the windows (!). As what has been just said had respect to the thresholds, so what follows with הַמִּזְבֵּחַ is supplementary to the second thing

mentioned, the windows; beginning with this, that even the ground up to them, this distance, was a measured distance (ver. 17), which had not yet been said, after which the more intelligible expression: מִכְסוֹת (particip. Pual of פָּסַח), illustrates the above-mentioned הַמִּזְבֵּחַ. Finally, with respect to the walks which ran along the doors, and the wall rounding off the whole, Ver. 17 accordingly adds, that each and all was according to measure; the space above the door (collective), even into the inner house,—the temple in its entirety is spoken of as to its principal parts,—and outside, and the whole wall round about within and without were so. [HENGST.: "a house worthy of the God who has wisely arranged all things in His creation (Ps. civ. 24), and left nothing to caprice and chance."]

The expression: made, in Ver. 18, which is resumed in ver. 19, refers to sculpture or carved work; but comp. Lange on Kings, p. 67. On the cherubim, see the same work, p. 66, and in this Commentary on ch. i. 4-14, and Doct. Reflec. 10 on ch. ix.; on the palms, see on ch. xl. 16. HENGST.: "There are the carved works in the temple, the destruction of which by the Chaldeans is lamented in Ps. lxxiv. 6; and now they are there again." Comp. as to the significance of the grouping, Lange on Kings, p. 74 sq. Hengst. brings out the reference that the house is dedicated to the Lord of the whole terrestrial creation.—The arrangement was that a cherub and a palm, and again a cherub, always followed in order.—It is further observed, in distinction from chap. i., that the cherub had two faces, as expositors generally say, because only two could be visible, inasmuch as figures were treated of which could present only one side. On this Bähr observes: "But certainly the wings of the eagle and the feet of the bullock were not wanting." Two, however, is specially the number of creation (heaven and earth), of the creaturely contrast, which therefore everything made will have in itself, harmonized here by the palm as the third between cherub and cherub into the number of the divine life.—Ver. 19. The two faces were that of man and of the lion, which most aptly represents the wild animal named by way of eminence חֵיהָ (לֵוִי). The cherub turned the one face to the palm on this side, and the other to the palm on that, whereby the union of the two with the palm to form three was made very manifest.—Ver. 20 illustrates what ver. 19 intends by: on the whole house round and round; that it was from the ground or floor to the wall-work above the door, that is, to the roof, and this on the temple within to which the door led, of which, therefore, mention is made.—וְקִירֵי, local accusative or concluding formula.

But with Ver. 21 comes an additional supplement in relation to the door-post work on the temple, namely, that each pair of door-posts had the significant square form already met with in Solomon's temple, and first fully carried out in Ezekiel (see Lange on Kings, p. 73). In this way the revelation of Jehovah, the God of the world, in the world, in its cosmic relations, comes into prominence; KLIEF.: the number four is "the signature of the coming universality;" it will extend itself into all the world, and to it they shall enter in from all the world. (According to Klief. מִזְבֵּחַ is not stat. constr., but an unusual form for מִזְבֵּחַ, רִבְעָה, an adjective, literally: "post of the square." Keil remarks on the breviloquence.)—The sanctuary (הַמִּקְדָּשׁ) is the most holy place (ver.

23). The front, which it presented to the priest-prophet treading the holy place, had the view as the view just described, that is, the quadriform view of the door-posts. [HENGST.: "at the front was," etc., since the new view is compared with a former one which the prophet himself had had (ch. xliii. 3). KLIEF.: "And the superficies of the whole sanctuary was likewise square." The Targum and Rashi suppose a reference to the vision by the Chebar.]

Ver. 22 describes with similar brevity of diction the wooden altar of incense, in distinction from the brazen altar of burnt-offerings. The abrupt יָיִן forms also a contrast to the coating of gold in Solomon's temple ("just as there is a deep silence throughout in Ezekiel concerning gold, which plays so great a part in Solomon's temple," HENGST.). While observing that, "in the case of the floor also and the walls mention is made only of the wooden boarding," Hengst. refers to the "troublesome times in which temple and city should be built again," and compares Dan. ix. 25; Zech. iv. 10 (comp. Doct. Reflec. 8).—The height and length (which, considering its square form, gives at the same time its breadth)—not given in the case of Solomon's altar—may, however, be here borrowed from it (HENGST.). Keil includes in its corners the four horns found on Solomon's altar. But in what follows: and its length, etc., he sees in אֶרְצוֹ a mistake for אֶרְצוֹ, "its pedestal;" while Hengst. can find in it only the top of the altar. But why should we not suppose it to say plainly, because it came in the way here, that the altar in all its length and round and round was wood? Ezekiel says nothing of the candlestick, and the table for the shew-bread, and indeed nothing of a furnishing of the most holy place. Keil therefore interprets the explanation: this is the table, etc., from the Pentateuch designation of the offerings "as the bread of God." HENGST.: "because that which is set upon this altar—the incense denoting the prayers of the saints (Ps. cxli. 2; Rev. v. 8, viii. 3)—is regarded as a spiritual food which the people present to their Heavenly King. The altar appears as the table of the Lord also in ch. xlv. 16; the offering as food of God in Mal. i. 7. The loaves laid on the table of shew-bread denoted good works;" to which Hengst. compares Matt. xxi. 18 sq., the fruit of the fig-tree, that is, of the Jewish people, after which Jesus hungered. Compare also Bähr's (der Salom. Tempel, p. 185 sq.) objections to the view of Hengstenberg and Keil. After all, the express declaration: This is the table that, etc., has in it something surprising, which is rather strengthened than explained by ch. xlv. 16. Böttcher thinks that "the altar-table was meant to combine in one the old table of shew-bread and the altar of incense" (see Doct. Reflec. 8). For the rest, the expression: before Jehovah, is explained from the place where the altar of incense stood, immediately before the ark of the covenant, which was separated from it by the veil of the most holy place.

In Ver. 23 supplementary mention is made of two doors (1 Kings vi. 32, 33), to be explained, without doubt, by the altar of incense standing at the separating point of the two divisions of the temple, that is, one door belonging to the holy place, and one to the most holy place, both which—Ver. 24—had two leaves each. These two-leaved doors are, however, still more closely described by the following phrase: two turning leaves, so that each leaf had two parts which could be opened and shut,—a very suitable arrangement, considering the breadth of these doors. According to Ver. 25, the ornaments on these temple doors are the same as those mentioned in ver. 18 sq.—On the front of the porch (of the temple) without there was a wooden עֵבֶר. GESEN.: probably a threshold which formed a kind of pediment as stepping-place to a colonnade or temple. How is that to be conceived of? It was evidently made of wood. A threshold-like approach, a person!—As the beholder's look returns again and again to the ample materials presented to it, something additional is always to be observed. Thus Ver. 26: closed windows and simple palms on the two shoulders, that is, side-walls, right and left. Either not mentioned hitherto, or at least now more exactly.—The brief concluding clause: וְהָעֵבֶר

וְהָעֵבֶר, probably simply intimates, that as there were closed windows and palms on the two sides of the porch, so there were windows of the kind on the side chambers, and palms on the wooden pediments. KLIEF.: On the side buildings (?) of the porch and of the side stories were windows and palms, and so also the עֵבֶר. Hengst. thinks that the words: "and the steps" [pediments] (= "and besides, the steps also are to be noticed in the porch," ver. 25), "place the extreme end to the east over against the extreme end to the west of the gizrah, with which the section began in ver. 15."

CHAPTER XLII.

- 1 And he led me forth to the outer court, the way northwards, and brought me to the chamber [that is, what there was of chambers] which is over against the gizrah, and [in fact] which is over against the building, toward the north.
- 2 Before the length [in front of the length] of a hundred cubits, the opening toward
- 3 the north, and the breadth fifty cubits. Over against the twenty of the inner court, and over against the pavement of the outer court; gallery [was] before
- 4 gallery in the third (that is, galleries). And before the chambers was a walk ten cubits broad, to the inner [court] way of one cubit, and their openings to
- 5 the north. And the upper chambers were shortened, for the galleries consume [take away] from them, from the [the space of the] lower and also from the
- 6 [the space of the] middle as respects the building. For they were three-storied and had no pillars as the pillars of the courts: therefore [space was] taken
- 7 away from the lowest and the middle, from the ground. And a dividing-wall which is outside, close by the chambers, toward the outer court, in front
- 8 of the chambers, its length was fifty cubits. For the length of the chambers which are to the outer court was fifty cubits; and [yet] 10, before the temple
- 9 a hundred cubits. And from under it [the dividing-wall] were these chambers:
- 10 the entrance was on the east in coming to them from the outer court. In the breadth of the dividing-wall of the court, toward the east, fronting the gizrah,
- 11 and fronting the building, were chambers. And a way before them; as the look of the chambers which were towards the north, as their length so their breadth 12 and all their outgoings, and as their arrangements, and as their openings. So also the openings of the chambers which were toward the south, an opening was at the head of the way, the way in face of the dividing-wall turned to it toward the east in coming [thence] to them [or: eastwards when one came to them (the 13 chambers)]. And he said to me, The chambers of the north, the chambers of the south, which are in front of the gizrah, these are chambers of holiness, where the priests who approach Jehovah shall eat the most holy things;

 there shall they set down the most holy things, and [that] the meat-offe-14 ing, and the sin-offering, and the guilt-offering, for the place is holy. The priests when entering shall not go out of the holy place to the outer court, and [but] there they shall lay down their garments wherein they shall minister;
 for they are holiness; they shall put on other garments, and [-o] approach to 15 that which [belonged] to the people. And he finished the measures of the inner house, and led me out the way of the gate whose face is toward the east, and 16 measured it [the house] round and round. He measured the east side on [-o] the measuring-rod five hundred [cubits?] rods [measured by rods] on the measuring-17 rod around. He measured the north side, "five hundred" in rods with the 18 measuring-rod. He measured the south side, "five hundred" in rods with the 19 measuring-rod. He turned to the west side; he measured "five hundred" in 20 rods with the measuring-rod. Toward the four winds measured he it; a wall was to it round and round, the length "five hundred," and the breadth "five hundred," to separate between the holy and the profane.

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

Vers. 1-14. The Chambers of Holiness.

The leading forth of Ver. 1 is easy to be understood, both from ch. xli. and from the outer court, where the structure of cells for the priests about to be described is situated, for הַלְקָחָהּ suggests to us such a structure. Comp. moreover, ch. xl. 17 sq. and xl. 44 sq. The outer court here harmonizes with the first passage, while its purpose does not; the one there was designed for the people. It would harmonize with the second passage that there too the purpose was for the priests; on the other hand, the inner court does not harmonize.—That it is added: and brought me, etc., is quite in the copious style of Ezekiel, as the immediately following will likewise show. The general statement: the way northwards, is made more precise by the closer fixing of the locality, in which the expression: over against the gizrah, repeats itself in: over against the building (situated there, ch. xli. 12 sq.), just as the northern direction mentioned in the outset does by: towards the north. Hengst. expresses the opinion that, considering the object of the gizrah-building, an adjacent building on either side withdrawing it from view was very appropriate, and that the description is designed to point to that.—In Ver. 2, מִלְּפָנֶיךָ can hardly (as HENGST.)

mean: "before the length" (determined for the gizrah from east to west), for the repeated לְ is merely a continuation. It was the front-length of the cell building to which Ezekiel sees himself brought, as also the opening toward the north shows that the doors of the building opened northwards.—The hundred cubits of length agree with ch. xli. 18, so that both buildings simply cover each other as to length; whereas the sacrificial kitchens (ch. xli. 19) embarrass Keil, who needs for them still forty cubits of length westwards behind the cell building; while Hengstenberg claims for them no separate building, but, as is usually the case with kitchens, places them below in the cell building. According to Keil, the cell building would stretch along still before the temple.—By the description in Ver. 3: over against the twenty, etc., the breadth of fifty cubits is put in relation to the twenty cubits' breadth of free space belonging to the inner court (ch. xli. 10), and at the same time more closely stated to be in a southern direction towards the temple (HENGST.: eastward), as the following: over against the pavement (ch. xl. 17), on its part points out clearly the northern direction; or a reference to what is farthest out, the outer court, is added to the reference made by the first לְ to what is inmost.—By the statement that gallery ran before gallery in the third, Hengst. understands: that one looked down from the walk before the chambers of the third story to another walk that was before the chambers of the second story (?). KEIL: one gallery in front of the other or towards it (?). Kliefoth takes לְ = עַל ("on,"

"over"), but what would מִלְּפָנֶיךָ mean? Also, מִלְּפָנֶיךָ does not mean, as he supposes with

Böttcher: "into the threefold." As ch. xli. 10 can refer only to our verse, we shall in the case of מִלְּפָנֶיךָ have to think of the first-mentioned galleries of the gizrah house, ch. xli. 15 sq.; and this so much the more as the description of the cell structure was determined immediately (ver. 1) after this building. Thus the galleries of the two buildings ran front to front; and this is said only of the third, namely, the two third galleries, for the first mention of the middle ones is in ver. 5; the highest also caught the eye first, and with them at the same time the height of the building could be given as of three stories.

The walk—Ver. 4—before the chambers, which was ten cubits broad, can only be supposed as extending from west to east before the northern long side of the building. To the inner court (ch. viii. 8, 16, x. 3) was a way of one cubit in breadth; this denotes the narrow approach to the inner court, on which the wider passage round the east wall of the building abutted; and according to this account, returning to the walk, it is said of the doors of the chambers or of the galleries, that they opened on the passage to the north. Hengstenberg makes the walk to be the "approach to the chambers," from which one had access to the interior of the chambers, and this interior to be "one cubit from the street, which was the thickness of the walls" (!). Keil, who can extract no suitable sense from the text, reads with the Sept.: מִלְּפָנֶיךָ, thus making a way of a hundred cubits long lead through the north gate into the inner court (!).—Ver. 5 harmonizes the galleries with the chambers, speaking first of the upper as ver. 3 had spoken of the third galleries. These chambers are said to be shortened, and indeed they were the narrowest; and therefore it is remarked of them alone in the first place, for (the details will become clear in ver. 6) the galleries took away from their breadth (יִזְכְּלוּ only here, instead of יִזְכְּלוּ).

They were shorter, it is said, than the lower above all, but also than the middle. So Keil understands the second and third כִּן in a comparative sense. If it is to be taken as the first, that in כִּן, then that one must be understood of the chambers in general, and the more exact definition must be given with the two following כִּן, as Hengstenberg says: "in the case of the middle ones, the half of the space which in relation to the lower was cut off by the galleries from the upper." He makes כִּן to be "building space—space which otherwise might have been built upon." The mode of expression indicates that the prophet means to say: the structure, which had lower, middle, and upper chambers (for they were three-storied, ver. 6), was shortened in the upper chambers, since the galleries there in particular occupied part of the breadth which the under chambers had entire, and which even the middle chambers had; the reason is, they had no pillars to support the upper galleries to the three stories of chambers, and so the upper chambers were necessarily contracted, and consequently had to lose in breadth, since the galleries which ran along the outer walls had to seek support in rests which were taken from the chambers. The explanatory expression: from the ground, throws light upon the בָּנֵן of the previous verse; hence the building there comes into consideration as to the ground-space which it could afford on its lower floor for the under and the middle chambers, which thus, especially the first, were broader than the upper, although self-evidently the middle chambers too must have been shortened by their gallery in comparison with the under. As the building became higher, the chambers became shorter.—We have to notice the reference to the pillars of the courts, of which nothing has been said hitherto, and we shall have to suppose them where they are wanting here, namely, in ch. xl. 17 sq. and 44 sq. The chambers there, too, may have had stories.—The whole description of the galleries, and the way in which this description is kept in connection with the building on the gizrah, is hardly intended merely to make plain the possibility of access to the chambers of the second and third stories, but is designed to give us the impression, that from the galleries, so easily accessible from the chambers, an equally prompt supervision over this hinder and interior part of the environs of the sanctuary was made possible, as by the guardrooms in the case of the gates; if the chambers here correspond to these guardrooms, then the galleries here correspond to the barriers there.

Ver. 7. נֶרֶךְ, that which “fences off,” is a dividing-wall, a boundary-fence, which is measured fifty cubits long, and consequently is to be sought for opposite the breadth of the building and on the east side, where the narrow way (ver. 4) led to the inner court, in distinction from which the further description will have respect to the outer court. In the first place, however, it is said to be outside, for if this wall ran along the chambers, its position is made plainer by the phrase: towards the outer court (where הָרֶךְ may remind us of הָרֶךְ, ver. 4); as also: in front of the chambers, illustrates still better the phrase: close by (running equally with) the chambers. If this wall concealed the narrow access to the inner court, still more so did it the under chambers on the east towards the outer court, and what had to be performed in these chambers, for—Ver. 8—the length of the wall corresponded to the length of the chambers which are to the outer court, that is, which here come into consideration for this court, as the eye fell on them in looking from the east. The proper length of a hundred cubits on the north side—before the temple, because the temple rose behind in its length as point of view and boundary—is very perceptibly distinguished by וְהָיָה from the above-mentioned so-called length (the breadth of fifty cubits). The reason why there is no mention of a dividing-wall in the case of the chambers of this northern long side perhaps is, that their windows and galleries (comp. on ver. 8) lay towards the gizrah, and only the doors opened towards the north (ver. 4). Ver. 9. So the east side chambers rose up from under the dividing-wall, which concealed them only below, but did not cover them so as to cut off the light from them.—The observation regarding the entrance, that it was on the east, which is still further described by: in coming to them from the outer court, may indeed be understood in distinction from the narrow way which led along there to the inner court (vera. 7, 4), but is rather to be taken as a corroboration, that whereas people for the most part got at these chambers from the east, a fence was requisite on this side also of the outer court. Hengstenberg converts the

Ver. 10 makes the transition to a parallel building on the other side, by first repeating the last described, in such a manner, however, that no misunderstanding is possible; hence breadth is said, and not “length,” as in ver. 7. The chambers were in the breadth of the dividing-wall, for they were situated in this breadth. The court to this wall is the just now mentioned (ver. 9) outer court, and the expression: toward the east, likewise borrowed from ver. 9, is a closer description of the position of the dividing-wall and consequently of the chambers, so that הַפֶּתַח is not to be changed into הָרֶךְ, which definition comes afterward in ver. 12. The description: fronting the gizrah, and (as ver. 1): fronting the building (upon it), which occupied the whole length, signifies exactly the same as: “in front of the length of a hundred cubits,” in ver. 2; hence the chambers were concealed on this side also by the gizrah building. That which in ver. 4 is called מִחְלָה, is in ver. 11 by way of variety called דֶּרֶךְ, but any misunderstanding is guarded against by the observation: as the look, etc. (that the chambers had the same look as those toward the north). The comprehensive: as the look, etc., said on the occasion of mentioning the way, is specialized by what follows. We would express it thus: As in relation to their length, so in relation to their breadth and in relation to all their, etc. The arrangements are what concerns the way and manner of the whole, and the particulars. Finally, the openings, although already comprehended in the outgoings, are, on account of an appendage to be immediately given to the north chambers, once more specially mentioned.

—Ver. 12, in the first place, shows that the chambers spoken of are to be conceived of as toward the south, in the same way as their patterns were “toward the north” (ver. 11); it then proceeds to mention “a door-opening,” which, while only supposed in vers. 4, 7, is now described in detail. Leading into the inner court, it was situated where the way began, or had its head at the wall of the court; hence it was constructed in this wall, wherefore it is added that the way proceeded בְּפָנָי, in face of the dividing-

wall, that is, so that this wall had it as it were before its eyes. הָרֶךְ is perhaps so often repeated because the narrower walk in question (ver. 4) is distinguished as הָרֶךְ from the longer and broader “walks.” הַדֶּרֶךְ is collective, because said at the same time for the north side. הַיְנִיָּה occurs only here; it is derived from הָנָה, which Meier interprets by: "to bend off," "to bend," "to incline," translating the adjective here: "bending," "turning," or "stretching" towards, which would be quite suitable to בָּתָּן, but would still more vividly express the thought: the dividing-wall inclined itself to the way passing before its eyes. Gesenius, taking for guide the rabbinical הָנָן, which means: "noble," "graceful," but also:

"insignificant," renders הָנָן by: "convenient,"

"suitable," which Keil transforms into this, that it denotes the wall corresponding to the cells, and running the same distance with them before the east narrow side of the building. In the remainder, similar to ver. 9.—The interpretation given of ver. 10 sq., almost the same as that of Keil, supposes only two cell buildings, whereas Kliefoth and Hengstenberg reckon three, adding an eastern "priests' court." Keil places the building here "at or on the broad-side (!) of the court-wall over against the separate place."

In Ver. 13 (as ch. xl. 45 sq.) his guide tells the prophet the purpose for which the north and south chambers were intended (only these two kinds of chambers are mentioned, completely refuting the idea of more than two buildings of the kind)—Which are in front, etc., since they ran along in front of the long side (hence also simply gishrah) of the off-place.—הָנָן, not abstr. pro concr., but as throughout, holiness, corresponding to the holiness of Jehovah, which is no single divine attribute (comp. ch. xx. 39 sq., and on ch. xxxvi. p. 343, etc.), but the expression of the entire relation of God to Israel (BÄHR, der Salom. Tempel, p. 56 sq.). This relation is once more strongly pronounced in קָדֵשׁ הַקִּדְשִׁים, by which are designated the priests' portions of the offerings, that is, of the offerings named (meat-offering, sin-offering, and guilt-offering), which had to be eaten by the priests alone, to the exclusion of their families (Lev. ii. 3, 10, vi. 9 sq., 19 sq., vii. 6, x. 12); hence the detailed account of their status (HENGST.: "who are near the Lord") and official character. In the case of the heave-offering or wave-offering, the priests' portion was partaken of even by the female members of the priests' families (Lev. x. 14). Comp. BÄHR, Symb. des Mos. Kultus; KURTZ, Der Alttestamentliche Opferkultus. On the distinction between "eating" and "setting down" Keil says: "Because neither the meal mingled with oil of the meat-offering, nor the flesh of the sin and guilt-offerings, could be eaten by the priests immediately after the presentation of the offering, but first the one had to be baked and the other cooked, they were, until this preparation, allowed to be set aside, but not in any place one pleased."—The different designation: קָדֵשׁ הַמִּקְדָּשׁ, by which

Ver. 14 still adds, with similar emphasizing of the priests, that after performing their functions (בְּבָאִם, as the context shows, is not: when they come to the service) in the holy place, that is, the inner room, they are not to repair without ceremony to the outer court (as Keil supposes, had they "been obliged to pass out through the inner gate in order to get to the sacred cells"), but—and for this the door, ver. 12, is excellently adapted—the official garments in which they (שָׂרֵת, "to order well," "to administer," in the Piel of respectful services before kings and princes, especially of service before Jehovah) performed the sacred service are to be put aside, laid down in the chambers mentioned, and exchanged for common garments.—הָנָן, namely: the priestly garments.—In יִקְרְבוּ we are instinctively reminded of אֶל-אֲשֶׁר לָעֵם.—אֶל-הַחֲצִיטָה, that the people come into consideration there. Not until the service of God is completed are the priests allowed to come into converse with them.

Vers. 15-20.—The Circumference of the whole.

Ver. 15. What was begun in ch. xl. 3 sq. was now finished. The antithesis of the measures of the inner house is: and he measured it round and round. The prophet therefore is led out,—יָצָא הַיָּמִינִי, which may mean the way to the gate, but also the way through it. The return to the east gate (comp. ch. xl. 6) depicts to us Ezekiel's re-entrance into the outer court; and thus the expression: round and round, will the more readily point to the wall (ch. xl. 5) from which he then (hence now from the opposite direction) came to the east gate. The inner house comprehends the whole interior up to the wall, of which it is said, ch. xl. 5, that it was מִחוּץ לְבֵית סָבִיב

סָבִיב. Keil disputes, without due grounds, the reference of the suffix in וּמִדָּרֶךְ to הַבַּיִת, although

we must concede to him that some indefiniteness may adhere to the suffix; at all events, round and round is not the wall as wall, which would have also its inner side, but as that which surrounded the house from without, and denoted the outside in reference to the house, so that we are pointed to the outside of the wall-girt sanctuary. Meanwhile, however, if nothing more definite follows, this only says that, after finishing all the measurements in the interior, a total measurement of the whole was taken outside on the circumference of the sanctuary.

Ver. 16. The measuring begins with the east gate; and hence on the east, רֹחַ, in the signification it has in the common expression: to the four winds, meaning the four directions whence the wind principally comes, is here said of the east side, as in the following of the north, south, and west sides.—Hengst. takes אַמּוֹת as a blending of אַמּוֹת and מַאֲוֹת, and translates: "five hundred cubits, measured in rods with the measuring-rod." That הַמִּשְׁאָמּוֹת cannot mean "five hundred" is clear, but what is the meaning of "five cubits"? Hence the Qeri: מַאֲוֹת. Then, however, we get by what follows: "five hundred rods," or we must say with Hengst. that by rods on the measuring-rod around, is intended to be observed that the measure would be obtained by measuring not in cubits, but in rods, with the measuring-rod described at the commencement. At all events, ch. xl. 5 favours this view, as also the square of five hundred cubits for the whole of the sanctuary, already, on ch. xl. 27, observed to be correct, has to be harmonized with the detailed statements. The blending, too, of "a hundred" and "cubits" would agree well with the brevity of similar statements; only, such brevity and obscurity in the case of a summing up, a general survey of the spatial relations of the sanctuary, as Hengst. supposes, is difficult to conceive and hard to accept. On the other hand, the abbreviation: five hundred (thus read with the Qeri), measured by rods, is easy of acceptance, when it is so very clear, not only from the definition of the "rod" given in ch. xl. 5, but from a presupposed after-reckoning of all the statements of measuring hitherto coming into consideration, that only cubits can be meant; even in ver. 20, where otherwise it might be expected, all mention of rods is omitted. Ewald, too, and Böttcher and Hitzig have decided in favour of cubits. That Ezekiel "gives elsewhere all the greater measures in cubits and not in rods," as Hengst. insists on, has, however, no significance when the prophet had to refer to a wider space, a space separating the sanctuary from the rest of the land, a space independent of all that had gone before, and which therefore might have been measured by rods, as Klief. and Keil hold. Comp. however, ch. xiv. 2.—Ver. 17. Five hundred, and the same in Ver. 18 and Ver. 19, merely the number; and this Hengst. explains by saying that, in the case of the other sides, the mere number suffices, so that the number given is self-evidently of cubits, according to ver. 16.—Is the question decided in Ver. 20? But toward the four winds, that is, in the direction of the four cardinal points (it is said קִבְּב in ver. 19, by which, however, at the same time, may be indicated the going round and round), is a mere résumé of what has been described singly in vers. 16-19. Accordingly, the suffix also in מִדְּרֵי is to be understood exactly as in ver. 15, that is, as referring to the house.—What now is to be understood by the wall which was to the house (לָהּ)? It is called חֹמֶה, as in ch. xl. 5, and, exactly as there, it is said that it was קִבְּב קִבְּב. It is not, indeed, said, as

Hengst. expresses himself: "he measured it, namely, the wall, round about;" but the observation here, that the house had a wall, gives no further information than that the measuring will have had respect to this compass of the house! Keil, indeed, refuses to understand the קִבְּב in vers. 16 and 17 of a square five hundred rods in length and breadth on these two sides, yet he gets in ver. 20 a space which measured five hundred rods towards each of the cardinal points, that is, a surrounding wall five hundred rods in length on each side; in whole, an area of two hundred and fifty thousand square rods, while the temple, with its courts, claims only two hundred and fifty thousand square cubits. Hengstenberg, at the mention of this in fact so much more considerable space than that of the sanctuary, but neither further defined nor filled up, is reminded of the Hungarian who, looking at a bare expanse, said: "Nothing but space," and finds a mere vacuum on each of the four sides "intolerable." But when he finds nothing corresponding in Solomon's temple, the form of which, however, is perpetually before the prophet's eyes, and in reply to what he otherwise expresses regarding the "enormous extent" of "useless space," Kliefoth, in giving the purpose intended: to separate, etc., says: "In the case of the tabernacle and Solomon's temple the outer court served for this purpose, whereas, in the case of Ezekiel's temple, the outer court also still belongs to the sanctuary, and is itself holy; and the purpose of separating the sanctuary from the common ground must be effected by this surrounding space, which, in this respect, takes the place in regard to Ezekiel's temple which the outer court took in the case of that of Solomon." Keil disputes the latter statement, and says that "the tabernacle had no outer court, and in Solomon's temple the outer court already formed a part of the sanctuary." He continues: "Only in the case of the latter temple, the outer court bordered immediately on the common soil of the city and of the land, so that the pollution of the land produced by the sin of the people could press without obstacle even into the sacred space of the courts. To this a limit shall be set in the sanctuary of the future, by this environing space set apart for separating the holy from the profane." That the extent of the temple, with its courts, is not rendered insignificant by the twenty-five times' greater size of the space in question, Keil proves from the circumstance that it "is not covered with buildings," and hence comes into consideration merely as so significant a separation from the profane, by which "strongly marked separation peculiar to Ezekiel's temple," the "inviolable holiness of this sanctuary" is, on the contrary, illustrated in an enhanced measure. That the surface of Mount Moriah affords no room for this is certainly no proof against the above-mentioned view of Keil and Kliefoth, for ch. xl. 2 speaks only of a very high mountain.

[Throughout vers. 16-20 Dr. Fairbairn abides by the rendering of the English version: "rods" or "rods," not "cubits," and adds: "We regard the immense extent of the sacred area as a symbol of the vast enlargement that was to be given to the kingdom of God in the times of Messiah. It was immeasurably to surpass the old in the extent of its territory, and in the number of its adherents, as well as in the purity of its worship. The wall that surrounded the sacred buildings is expressly said, in ver. 20, to have been for separating between the holy and profane; not, therefore, as in Rev. xxi. 12, and very common elsewhere, for defence and safety; as, indeed, its comparative want of elevation might seem to render it unfit for such a purpose. But its square form, and the square appearance of the entire buildings (as in John's city, Rev. xxi. 16), betokened the strength and solidity of the whole, along with a vast increase in extent and number. A perfect cube, it was the emblem of a kingdom that could not be shaken or removed. And thus every way it exhibited, to the eye of faith, the true ideal of that pure and glorious temple, which, resting on the foundation of the Eternal Son, and girt round by all the perfections of Godhead, shall shine forth the best and noblest workmanship of Heaven."—FAIRBAIRN'S Ezekiel, p. 470.—W. CHAPTER XLIII.

- 1, 2 And he led me to the gate, the gate that looks toward the east: And, behold, the glory of the God of Israel came from the east, and its [his] voice
 3 was as the voice of many waters, and the earth shone with His glory. And as the appearance [was] the appearance which I saw, as the appearance which I saw when I came to destroy the city, and [there were] sights like the appearance which I saw by the river Chebar; and I fell upon my face. And the glory of Jehovah came to the house by the way of the gate whose face [front] is toward the east. And the Spirit lifted me up, and brought me to the 6 inner court, and, behold, the glory of Jehovah filled the house. And I heard one speaking to me from the house, and a man was standing beside me.
 7 And He said to me: Son of man, [behold] the place of My throne and the place of the soles of My feet, where I will dwell in the midst of the sons [children] of Israel for ever, and the house of Israel shall no more defile the name of My holiness, they and their kings, by their whoredom and by the corpses of
 8 their kings, their high places; When they gave their threshold beside My threshold and their post beside My post, and [only] the wall [was] between Me and them, and they defiled [so defiled they] the name of My holiness by their abominations which they did, and I consumed them in My anger [breath of 9 anger]. Now shall they put away their whoredom, and the corpses of their
 10 kings from Me, and I dwell in their midst for ever. Thou, son of man, show to the house of Israel the [this] house, that they may be ashamed because of their iniquities, and they measure [so they measure] the harmony of proportion.
 11 And if they be ashamed because of all that they did, make them know the conformation of the house, and its arrangement, and its out-goings, and its in-comings, and all its forms, and what relates to all its ordinances, and all its forms, and all its precepts [laws]; and write before their eyes, that they may 12 keep its whole conformation and all its ordinances, and they do them. This is the law [the Torah] of the house; on the head [top] of the mountain all its border round and round is most holy! Behold, this is the law of the house.
 13 And these are the measures of the altar [altar of burnt-offering] in cubits; the cubit a cubit and a hand-breadth, and [indeed] the [a] bosom (the girth) had the cubit, and [i.e.] one cubit broad [thick], and its border at its lip [its edge] round
 14 about was a span, and this is the elevation of the altar; And [namely] from the bosom [at] the ground to the lower rest were two cubits, and a breadth of one cubit; and from the lesser rest to the greater rest, four cubits and a 15 breadth of one cubit. And the mountain of God four cubits; and from the 16 hearth of God and upwards were the four horns. And the hearth of God
 17 twelve in length by twelve in breadth, square in all its four sides. And the rest fourteen in length by fourteen in breadth in its four sides, and the border round about it was half a cubit, and its bosom [girth was] a cubit round about,
 18 and its [the altar's] steps toward the east. And He said unto me, Son of man, thus saith the Lord Jehovah: These are the ordinances of the altar on the day when it is made, to cause burnt-offerings to ascend upon it, and to sprinkle
 19 blood upon it. And thou givest to the priests, the Levites, those who are of the seed of Zadok, who draw near to Me,—sentence of the Lord Jehovah,— 20 to minister to Me, a bullock, a young steer, for a sin-offering. And thou takest of its blood, and givest it upon its [the altar's] four horns, and on the four corners of the rest, and on the border round about, and thou dost cleanse and 21 expiate it. And thou takest the bullock of the sin-offering, and one burns it
 22 in the assigned [appointed] place of the house, without the sanctuary. And on the second day thou shalt offer a kid of the goats without blemish for a sin-offering, and they cleanse the altar as they cleansed with the bullock. When thou hast completed the cleansing, thou shalt offer a bullock, a young steer 24 without blemish, and a ram of the flock without blemish. And thou offerest them before Jehovah, and the priests cast salt upon them, and make 25 them ascend as a burnt-offering [olah] to Jehovah. Seven days shalt thou prepare a kid for a sin-offering daily, and they shall prepare a bullock, a 26 young steer, and a ram of the flock without blemish. Seven days do they 27 expiate the altar, and purify it, and fill its hand. And they shall have completed the [these] days; thus it comes to pass on the eighth day and onwards, that the priests shall make upon the altar your burnt-offerings, and your peace-offerings; and I receive you graciously,—sentence of the Lord Jehovah.

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

Vers. 1-12. The Entrance of the Glory of Jehovah.

The measuring is over, the house is in this respect finished as an actual house (ch. xlii. 15), that is, its measurements are completed. But heaven and earth are said to be finished (Gen. ii.) only when the Eternal rested. And so the prophet's guide leads him back—Ver. 1—to the gate (וְאֵת הַמִּנְיָהּ), to the one that principally comes into consideration (comp. what has been remarked in the foregoing chapters regarding the significance of this gate, and also the Doctrinal Reflections), to the east gate,—we will have to imagine Ezekiel standing before this gate,—that after al. the measuring he—Ver. 2—may see the glory, sq. (see pp. 38 sq., 52), coming to its rest. HENGST.: a parallel to Ex. xi. 34 sq., and 1 Kings viii. 10 sq., and the counterpart to ch. xi. of our prophet (comp. ch. x. 19, xi. 1, 23). The gate of exit then is the gate of re-entrance now.—וְאֵת הַמִּנְיָהּ. comp. on ch. i. 24. The voice might refer more to the manifestation of the glory; comp. however. Rev. i. 15: His glory is at all events the glory of the God of Israel (Luk. ii. 9; Rev. xviii. 1). The significant addition and the earth, etc., is not sufficiently explained by a brilliant light cast upon the ground; but as the land of Canaan is hardly meant here, by this burst of light extending far beyond Israel is meant to be symbolized an enlightenment also of the face of the whole earth, that is, of the entire region of humanity, thus shown to have been in itself and hitherto dark, Isa. vi. 3, lx. 1 sq. It is like sunrise (אֶרֶב) in the Hiphil, to "make" or "give" "light," Gen. i. 15, 17) for the world through Israel's temple-gate, and in so far is certainly something additional which was not in the tabernacle or Solomon's temple; just as in general the temple of Ezekiel is a symbol of the future. — Ver. 3 in no way contradicts this. וַיִּבְרָא הַמָּרְאֶה אֵלַי may be translated:

"and as the appearance of the appearance which, etc., as the appearance (closer definition) which I saw when," etc., that is, quite as conspicuous as that was, was the appearance of glory this time also. KEIL: "And the appearance which I saw was to look upon just like the appearance which I saw when I," etc. כִּי is evidently a resumption of כִּי. The former appearance (וַיִּבְרָא) comes first before the prophet's mind when he wishes to describe what he saw, and seeks therefore for an appearance with which he can compare it; and then he characterizes more closely this appearance (וַיִּבְרָא), with which he compares that now seen. Keil's observation against Hitzig does not meet the point, but neither is Hitzig's alteration of the text necessary. In the first place, by means of this comparison the re-entrance of the divine glory is attested in the strongest way, and therefore so circumstantially. It was the same glory then as now. For all this, the prophet does not intend to deny the anger in the execution of judgment then, for he expressly defines more closely לְשַׁחַת, בְּבֹאֵי, which alone is the correct text, since the Lord did not come, but rather went, giving over the city to destruction, and in reality Ezekiel was the person coming—of course in the vision of God, the subject to be spoken of immediately. The prophet did not come in order to see the destruction of the city, but his coming was a seeing which had for its aim and issue his announcement of the overthrow; and then this ideal destruction on the part of the prophet was also realized by the judgment of God fulfilling it. Ezekiel first, Nebuchadnezzar afterwards (ch. xxx. 11), but by both certainly Jehovah. In the second place, the prophet, as he had already done in ch. x. 15, 20, compares the last visions (comp. ch. xl. 2), hence the coming of the glory with its individual manifestations, with the appearance which the manifestation had had on the Chebar (ch. i.).—On his falling down Hengstenberg observes: "In ch. i. 28 it was before the majesty of the angry God; here before the majesty of God appearing in His grace (Rev. i. 17)." Comp. also on ch. iii. 23.—Ver. 4. A continuation of ver. 2; there: whence the glory of the God of Israel came; here: whither the glory of Jehovah came; there: from the east; here: to the house through the east gate, to its dwelling, to its rest.

Ver. 5. Comp. on ch. iii. 12. There is still less need of the "wind" here; to arrive at the inner court, the prophet needed only to go, as hitherto, in vision. But Ezekiel needs taking up by the Spirit, not only because the impression of ver. 2 has cast him to the ground (HENGST.), but also in order to be able to follow, so far as was permitted to him as priest, the fresh revelation of the glory of Jehovah filling the temple. For the form of manifestation, 1 Kings viii. 10 sq. might be compared, and so much the more as that becomes quite plain there, which indeed is already indicated in Ex. xl. 35 sq., that the cloud is as significant in the manner of manifestation as the glory is in the actual fact, according as the cloud is one of fire or of light (Matt. xvii. 5).—Ver. 6.

Evidently, however, the מְדַבֵּר אֵלַי [Häv. understands the Hithpael of a conversation in the interior of the sanctuary (?), of a command to the angel to communicate to the seer the revelation of God], that is, the one speaking to him from the house whom Ezekiel hears first, is meant to be represented as visible by וַיֵּאֱמַר ה', so that the man is the medium between Jehovah and the prophet, and so must certainly be conceived of in analogy with ch. xl. 3 (which comp.), as Keil: ὁ λαλῶν, John i. Hengst. supposes: "the man has entered the door to speak to him." וַיֵּאֱמַר

in Ver. 7 is certainly the אֵלַי of ver. 6.—אֶת-

מִקּוֹם denotes an accusative, and requires a "behold" to be supplied. What the man says identifies him entirely with Jehovah, wherefore the reference by the article back to the man in ch. xl. 3 is intentionally omitted. We no longer walk with the prophet through the courts of the sanctuary to the measurements of his guide, but the vision is interpreted to Ezekiel, and through him to us, from the most holy place. The man's speech, legitimating itself as word of Jehovah, shows him to be essentially the glory of the God of Israel, so that we now know why nothing farther was said regarding the way and manner in which the glory of Jehovah filled the house (ver. 5), and the form of its manifestation. "Between the statement," rightly remarks Hengst., "that one spake, and the speech that was spoken, stands the account of the person of the speaker, to which the prophet has his attention first directed by the speech; the seeing was first occasioned by the hearing." We have before us in the man the essential revelation of Jehovah's glory. Comp. on ch. i. 26, pp. 55, 56; Rev. i. 10 sq. The Messianic-christological interpretation is the only explanation corresponding to the connection, so much the more significantly, as there is no mention in Ezekiel of the ark of the covenant, with which elsewhere the dwelling of Jehovah in the midst of Israel is wont to be connected; and hence also the לְעוֹלָם here, and in ver. 9, is to be taken as unconditionally literal (ch. xxxvii. 26, 28). Neither in the tabernacle nor in the temple of Solomon had Jehovah dwelt for ever, although these might be called the "place of His throne," that is, of the ark of the covenant (1 Sam. iv. 4; Ex. xxv. 22); see Bähr, Symb. der Mos. Kult. i. p. 387 sq., and parallel therewith מִקּוֹם כְּבוֹד

רָגְלִי, by which the lower part of the throne, more exactly the ground whereon it stands, is particularized. Comp. for the latter mode of expression, Isa. lx. 13. According to ch. lxvi. 1: place of the soles of My feet, hence the same footstool (the earth) as here, perhaps alludes to the most holy place of the temple, where the ark stood, while the ark which was set up upon the floor of the most holy place is to be compared to heaven, Isa. lxvi. 1; Ps. xcix. 5, cxxxii. 7. Reference is also made hereby to the ark of the covenant (1 Chron. xxviii. 2). Both modes of expression symbolize the temple in the traditional legal manner as the dwelling-place of Jehovah (אֱלֹהֵינוּ אֵשֶׁתְּנוּ),—the first referring chiefly to the ark, and the second chiefly to the most holy place (for which see ver. 12). Bähr says: "What the dwelling is in a larger sense and generally, the ark of the covenant is in a narrower sense and in particular; in it the dwelling of Jehovah is concentrated in a single point," etc.—In conformity with his theory of the conditionality of certain promises, Hengst. finds in the statement: shall no more, etc., reference to a condition, whereas it simply repeats negatively what the dwelling of Jehovah for ever has already said positively (ch. xxxvii. 23 sq., xxxix. 24, 29; comp. John x. 28).—On: the name of My holiness, comp. ou ch. xxxvi. 20 sq. Ch. xvi., xx.—פָּנָךְ is something "fallen down," "flaccid,"

a corpse. It cannot be proved that the burial-places of kings were in the neighbourhood of the temple. It will not do to take the corpses for dead idols, even although it should be a quotation from Lev. xxvi. 30, for that passage speaks of demolished idols, whereas flourishing idols are treated of here. Moreover, a closer definition could hardly be omitted (Jer. xvi. 18), which Keil, indeed, finds here in the context. Häv. insists on finding the idols in the kings (Amos v. 26; Zeph. i. 5), holding it to be a contemptuous expression for: the lifeless idols. On the other hand, Keil and Hengstenberg remind us of kings like Manasseh and Amon, who took to do with dead bodies, which according to the law were to be avoided as unclean and polluting, had built for them altars or high places in the courts of the temple (2 Kings xxi. 4, 5, 7), and patronized the worship of idols. As whoredom designates idolatry in general, so what is meant to be said by the corpses of their kings applies to the worship of kings, the forgotten subjection to Jehovah under them, who, if kings, yet are perpetuated only as corpses; one might be allowed to call to mind Schubert's poem: "The Princes' Vault." To this the appositional, loosely strung בְּמוֹתָם

the more fittingly attaches itself, as in בְּמוֹת the thought of the kings as also high points, points of worship in social life, easily connects itself with the worship on the high places, which was specially popular in the time of the kings, and tolerated even by the better kings; the worship of the king, and the worship favoured by the kings, would border on one another. As idolatry in general constitutes the defilement of the name of Jehovah, the doings on the part alike of the house of Israel in general, and of their kings in particular, so the figurative and literal worshipping on high places forms, with special reference to the kings, a contrast to the enthronement of the King Jehovah, and to His dwelling in the literal sense in the midst of Israel. [In the interest of the different explanation of בְּמוֹתָם

בְּמוֹתָם, it has been proposed to read בְּמוֹתָם, "in their death," as the Chaldee paraphrase already interprets. Zunz makes בְּמוֹתָם dependent on יָמָאָה, but the בְּ wanting before בְּמוֹתָם can be easily supplied from the preceding בְּזִנְתָּם and בְּפָנָי.—Ver. 8. The subject in בְּתָחָם is not the kings (HENGST.), but what was subject in ver. 7, the house of Israel and their kings. The suffix in תָּחָם means, if any particular persons, the kings, but better, Israel in general. What is then said refers neither to the temples of the high places, which had been placed so close beside the temple of God (KEIL), for their threshold cannot refer to their high places, nor to idol-chambers there (comp. for this ch. viii.), and idol-altars in the courts of the temple, which the kings of Judah built (such things would require to be expressed more plainly); nor is this disparaging expression meant to condemn the building of royal palaces like that of Solomon (1 Kings vii.); but if kings are specially aimed at, then the figurative mode of expression, as given by the temple of Jehovah, will pronounce sentence on the conduct of the kings who assumed an equality with Jehovah (1 Kings xii. 28, 32), by their idolatrous appointments and arrangements with respect to religion and worship. It is better, however, to hold that the defilement of the name of the holiness of Jehovah by the people and the kings consisted in this, that the consciousness of the distance between Jehovah and Israel had entirely disappeared from the life of the latter, the dwelling of Jehovah was as if it were not present in Israel, Israel performed his domestic and secret worship of idols as his worship of Jehovah, so that only the temple wall (הַקִּיר) still protested, and preserved, or at least marked to Israel the boundary between the Holy One and His people. [Keil understands הַקִּיר of the temple wall, which was "the only thing between Jehovah and the corpee-gods."—וְאֵבֶל, from בָּלָה imperf. apoc.

Piel (Ex. xxxii. 10, xxx. 3!), signifies: to make the measure full, to finish sin by death (Jas. i. 15).—בְּאֵפֵי, comp. ou ch. xxxviii. 18.—Ver.

9 resumes, in conclusion, the subject of ver. 7, as also to the same purpose; "the eternal duration of the new and perfect revelation of God as distinguished from the Old Testament merely temporary one, which is at this time passing over into complete fulfilment and glorification" (Häv.), is repeatedly set forth.—יִרְחֶקֶן

Ver. 10. וְהָיָה, ch. xl. 4.—The Aim of the Announcement of the Temple-vision, and consequently of the Vision itself as regards Israel.

It is not said that Israel is again to build a temple of the kind; but neither is it said that he is to build up his phantasy on this architectonic interim phantasy. But with the perception that Jehovah still, and now first in the proper sense, desires to dwell in the midst of Israel,—a perception which will be brought about by the announcement of this house to the house of Israel,—shame shall come over them through the knowledge of their iniquities, from a comparison of these iniquities with the mercy and grace of God (ch. xxxvi. 31, 32), so that the goodness of God leads them to repentance (Rom. ii. 4). This moral-prophetic tendency is thoroughly in accordance with the Messianic acceptance of the temple-vision.—תְּבִנֶיהָ (comp. ch. xxviii. 12), not so much: "plan," model (HENGST.), but ("proportionality," says FÜRST): the harmony of the proportions, the regular character of the edifice. KEIL: "the well-apportioned edifice." Hengst. observes on this measuring: "not as architects, but as Abraham went through the length and breadth of the Promised Land (Gen. xiii. 17) with the interest of the family belonging to the house, in a meditating and loving and thankful spirit, following the measures shown," etc.

Ver. 11. And the announcement for this purpose is not, if they are ashamed of themselves, to be confined to the harmony of the whole, but will enter into particulars, which, being enumerated at the beginning, and in a profusion of words, are well fitted to produce from the outset the impression of something important. צִוְיָהָ, from צָו, "to form" (Ps xlix. 15 [14]), is the shape, the form, hence primarily the outside, with which is joined תְּבִנֶיהָ, which Gesenius would derive from תָּבַן, and compares with תְּבִנֵּית. The word is derived from בָּנָה, and signifies the inside planishing of a dwelling-place, as also the dwelling-place itself (Job xxiii. 3), for which its out-goings and its in-comings, taking into account both the exterior and the interior, come above all into consideration. כָּל-צִוְיָהָ is everything that צִוְיָהָ is in the particular, the individual forms; כָּל-הַתְּבִנִּי the regulations in regard to the particulars of the arrangement; according to KEIL: "regarding what Israel has to observe, the ordinances of worship." [HENGST.: All here has a practical import (2 Tim. iii. 16). The high mountain, for example, on which the house is situated proclaims: "Hearts upward." The wall which surrounded the whole (ch. xlii. 20) proclaims: "Ye shall be holy, for I am holy." The guardrooms of the gates embody the word: "Without are dogs, whoremongers, murderers, idolaters." The chambers for the people in the outer court preached: "Rejoice before the Lord always," and: "Be ye thankful." The arrangements for the priests reminded of sin, and demanded that one should consecrate himself to God in the burnt-offering, present to Him always the thank-offering and the meat-offering of good works. The altar of incense proclaimed to all: "Pray without ceasing."] That the dwelling of the Holy One among His people has as its aim their sanctification in repentance and faith as to every part of them, is clear from the accompanying כָּל-הַתְּבִנִּי, which is, moreover, repeated by a parallel expression, and so strengthened (וְכָל-תְּבִנֵּיהָ), that is, all instructions and directions, what has thereby been given in doctrine according to which a man should live. And thus the symbolical view of the section (see Doct. Reflec.) has no need to seek elsewhere for farther justification. By the command: write, etc., the: make them know, passes over from oral annunciation into a more abiding form, into the written outline we have before us of the new temple, into the description given of the vision.—The: do, corresponding to the preceding: all that they did, certainly does not mean that they are to build such a temple, and just as little that they were to console themselves therewith. They are to repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. The "doing" intended is a spiritual, ethical doing.

Ver. 12. The mention of the תְּבִנֵּיהָ leads to the summary of all doctrine and precepts in respect to this temple, which is significantly—in contrast with the law of Moses which Israel has not kept—one might indeed say: as the law of Christ—laid down repeatedly (ver. 13) as the Thorah of the house. For all is summed up in this, that what has been represented on the (going back to ch. xl. 2) top of the mountain ("head" of the mountain and head article of the doctrine), the whole boundary marked out for the house round and round, is most holy (ch. xlv. 3). The summary thought which underlies the whole, the holiness of Jehovah, the sanctification of Israel, is in a way set forth by this, that even the courts appear in the light of the most peculiar abode of Jehovah, so that the perfection of a new temple as the completion of the old is here proclaimed as a close to the temple-vision proper. Hengst. quite uselessly takes pains to tone down the קֹדֶשׁ קֹדֶשׁ into

"eminently holy." For if it is conceded to him that "ideally" (as he says) such (a holy place) was already extant in the tabernacle and the temple of Solomon, and all behoved in view of it to strive to be holy in their whole conversation (for which he appeals to 1 Pet. i. 15), then he will have to concede that this "ideal" is set down here as a real, as the fulfilled law, since its ideality was nothing else than the idea or the future, the promised fulfilment in Christ. Num. xviii. 10 rather proves this advance than furnishes ground for contending against it, with Hengstenberg; for what is said in that passage of the court of the tabernacle is expressly limited to the priestly families representing the people, and, moreover, to the male portion of them. The Old Testament form, indeed, still obtains on the top of the mountain here, but yet the novum quod in vetere latet is distinctly apparent. The question is not concerning the "world surrounding" the sanctuary, but when the vision here finishes with the temple, the mutual relation of its parts must be viewed—a view rendered possible just by this, that the most holy place still remains, as the prophet has shown. Certainly the point of view is a "practical" one; but when Hengst. says: "the passage serves as the foundation for the confident expectation expressed in vers. 7 and 9, that the people will in future lay aside all unholy dispositions," then this looks forward to a future which points far beyond the immediately post-exile period, namely, that God (to speak with Hengstenberg) "holds in prospect to the children of Israel a help against themselves, whereby they may succeed in conquering the enemy that makes the dwelling of God among them impossible," this help being, of course, the Spirit of the Anointed One, of the fulfilling of the law, somewhat as in the passage cited by Hengst., 1 Pet. i. 3 sq. Comp. 1 Cor. i. 30: ἐς ἡμεῖς καὶ ὑμεῖς (2 Thess. ii. 13 sq.; Eph. iv. 20 sq., and similar passages). COCCÆIUS: "And the least on this mountain, within this wall of God, is greater than the high priest in the temple of Solomon, Matt. xi. 11; Rev. i. 6, v. 10; 1 Pet. ii. 9; comp. also Zech. xiv. 20, 21."

["In this striking passage we are first of all to note the character in which the Lord now appears to dwell and manifest Himself among His people. It is as their divine King, occupying that house as the throne of His kingdom. God had always claimed this position, and had at first resisted their desires to have an earthly sovereign, because this virtually implied a rejection of Him as the proper head of the State. Even when He consented to their request, it was with a solemn and earnest protest against the person chosen ruling in his own name, and for selfish purposes, or in any other way than as the Lord's vicegerent. The protest, however, was soon forgotten. The king looked upon himself, and the people also looked upon him, as possessing an absolute title to the throne, and the earthly head came very much to occupy, in men's eyes, the place of the true and proper King. But in the new and more perfect order of things now unfolded in vision to the prophet, this flagrant perversion of the past must be rectified; God must be known and honoured as alone properly 'King in Jeshurun.' And hence, not only here does He declare that He had come to occupy His throne in the house, but, as mentioned in the note on ver. 7, the earthly head, when spoken of in a subsequent chapter, is simply called 'the prince.' The supremacy and glory of Jehovah were henceforth to appear in their full splendour. We have farther to notice in the preceding passage the essentially moral character of all that was here displayed in vision respecting the future things of God's kingdom. It was not a pattern which God was going to carry out anyhow, and accomplish as by a simple fiat of Omnipotence. It depended upon the condition of the people, and only if they agreed to put away sin from among them, and give God the supreme place in their hearts, could He manifest Himself toward them in the manner described. And finally, while the whole scheme was fraught with lessons of instruction, and inlaid with principles of holiness, the grand and distinguishing peculiarity of this pattern of the future, as compared with the past, we are expressly informed, was to be a general and all-pervading sanctity. The law of the house—what was pre-eminent entitled to be called the law—consisted in the whole region of the temple-mount being most holy. Not, as hitherto, was this characteristic to be confined to a single apartment of the temple; it was to embrace the entire circumference occupied by the symbolical institutions of the kingdom,—the chambers allotted to the priest, and even the courts trodden by the people, as well as the immediate dwelling-place of Jehovah. All were to have one character of sacredness, because all connected with them were to occupy a like position of felt nearness to God, and equally to enjoy the privilege of access to Him. So that the pattern delineated is that of a true theocracy, having God himself for king, with the community in all its members for true denizens of the kingdom, and acceptable ministers of righteousness before the Lord."—FAIRBAIRN'S Ezekiel, pp. 473, 474.—W. F.]

Vers. 13-27. The Altar of Burnt-offering (vers. 13-17), and its Consecration (vers. 18-27).

["The remaining verses of this chapter (vers. 13-27), which contain a description of the altar of burnt-offering, and of the necessary rites of consecration connected with it, seem at first view somewhat out of place. But there is an historical reason for such a description being given here. Now that the Lord has taken possession of the house, the prophet goes on to show how the work of fellowship and communion with Him is to proceed on the part of the people. It must, as it were, commence anew, and of course be conducted after the old manner; for no other could here come into contemplation. But in ancient times the grand medium of divine intercourse was the altar, at which all gifts and sacrifices were to be presented for the divine favour and blessing. And therefore, the prophet here, to show that the way was open, and that the people might have free access to the fellowship of God, after having briefly sketched the dimensions of the altar, gives instructions for its consecration, and the consecration of the priesthood, which was all that was needed to complete the arrangements.

... The seven days' purification services for the altar have respect to the original directions of Moses for the same purpose, in Ex. xxix. 37, and are simply a preparation for the great end aimed at—that God might accept the sacrifices of the people, and be gracious to them (ver. 27). This indispensably required that there should first be a consecrated way of access—a holy altar, and a holy priesthood to minister at it."—FAIRBAIRN'S Ezekiel, pp. 474, 475.—W. F.]

Ver. 13, with which the vision already turns more expressly to the second particular, the service in the temple of Jehovah, has been prepared for by occasional references, such as ch. xl. 38 sq., xlii. 13 sq., but is introduced in particular by the "ordinances" and "precepts" commanded to be made known in ver. 11 of our chapter. We remark, as regards the predominating evangelical tone of the vision, that the statement that Jehovah's sanctuary, as well as Jehovah Himself, will dwell among His people, precedes any commandment or ordinance in regard to it. So the time of the wandering patriarchs was likewise before the time of the law, which simply came in between promise and fulfilment.—And these are the measures, the idea is symbolized in the "measure."—הַמִּזְבֵּחַ is the altar of burnt-offering (ch. xl. 47, ix. 2; Ex. xxx. 28 sq.). Both on account of its significance in regard to the people in their relation to Jehovah,—since it is for the court what the ark which is wanting in Ezekiel is for the most holy place, and the altar of incense for the holy place (comp. Ezra iii. 1),—and also because a fresh section of the vision announces itself here, the more exact statement of the measures is repeated in accordance with ch. xl. 5.—חֵיק, from

חָק, “to surround,” is the so-called bosom.—GESENIUS: the hallowed part of the altar, where the fire burnt; KEIL: its base; HENGST.: the same as its back (?), namely, the enclosure, which was of brass,—as being on the outside; “back,” because it formed the periphery of the altar; “bosom,” because it embraces and grasps the heart, since חֵיק properly means something that

grasps. Evidently the whole circumference of the altar will be first given. Keil translates: “a bottom-frame one cubit high and one cubit broad” (?). In the case of that which encloses the earth and stone, the kernel of the altar, the breadth is the thickness.—נִבְלָה (the feminine suffix here and in נִלְפָּתָה, referring to חֵיק, has been explained from the transferred relation), more closely defined by אֶל־נִלְפָּתָה קָבִיר, is, since anything else can scarcely be understood from the foregoing, the one span, that is, half cubit broad edging projecting over the circumference. —הָאָחֹר, as noun: a span of unity, of the one = one span. Keil, who interprets from below upwards, places here a moulding a half cubit high.—חָהּ נָב הַמִּנְחָה is commonly translated: the “back,” which נָב must as little signify as it can denote the “sole” of the altar, the bottom-frame with its moulding. According to the fundamental idea of the root-word, to be “drawn together,” “heaped up,” נָב may at least quite as well denote something elevated or high, which is so easily expressed by this object (altare), as what is bowed or bent, especially when circumference and edging have preceded, and when in this way the configuration in height was not yet touched on.—Ver. 14 would describe this from the bottom upwards; hence מִחֵיק הָאָרֶץ = from the circumference (starting from that with which the description began in ver. 13), where it rose above the earth, apparently as belonging to it and raising itself out of it. (And for this reason Hävernick already in ver. 13 makes the bosom mean: the lowest part of the altar, the part immediately on the earth, the support of the whole. Keil understands חֵיק of the filling up of the חֵיק with earth (!).—הָעֵקֶרָה, HENGST.: “closing;” KEIL: “walling round.” The Aramaicized word, which is derived as a softened form from עָצָר, denotes in 2 Chron. iv. 9, vi. 13, the court (חֲצֵר, the “enclosure”). If derived from עָזַר,

“to hold off” (hence, “to protect,” “to help”), the word would indicate a rest or landing-place,

as the courts formed such ascending landing-places or terraces. It can hardly be a third designation for the wall of the altar (HENGST.: “especially the external wall of the two cubits thick enclosure”). When, as here, the height of the altar is treated of, two rests are to be understood, one above the other,—first a lower one, because only two cubits high, and therefore called the lesser, in relation to the greater of four cubits high, the next and higher one. The repeatedly stated breadth of one cubit makes the detailed description of the more general description in ver. 13 more intelligible. We make by addition the height six cubits; Keil, seven cubits, but where is his half cubit נִבְלָה?

Ver. 15. הָהָרָאֵל, “the mountain of God,” four cubits high, denotes after the two court-like rests, in the priestly mode of expression, the altar proper, as it were the sanctuary upon the very high mountain (ch. xl. 2). The height of the altar which is being described suggested the expression; and accordingly the entire temple edifice, as it has been designated after the temple proper, “house” or “palace,” concentrates itself in the altar with its rests, designated as it is after its upper part: mountain of God. From this, however, the genuine priestly term, הָהָרָאֵל, is still to be distinguished. The Qeri reads:

אֶרְאֵל, adopting which Keil interprets, in conformity with Isa. xlix. 1, not: “lion of God,” but, from אָרָה, “to burn” (ara Dei): “hearth of God.” Hengst. holds for the reading in the text: אֶרֶי, “lion,” and takes אֵל, the י being elided by the Masoretes, as “ram,” while he thinks it possible that the original form was אֶרְאֵל, instead of אֶרְאֵל, so that a double sense had been intended. Lion of God and ram-lion, the lion that consumes the rams for God! At all events, what is meant is the upper surface, that is, in reality the fire-hearth of the altar from the four corners of which the four horns extended, and these, according to Jewish tradition, belonged to the essential requisites of the altar, and indicate the insignia of kingly dominion, hence the revelation of divine power and glory, etc. (BÄHR, Symb. i. p. 473); with these our description is completed as regards extent upwards. The altar has, like that of Solomon, a height of ten cubits.—Ver. 16. The account of the height is followed by that of the length and breadth, measured at the highest point of the altar, and given for the whole four sides from the ground up.—Ver. 17. Setting out now from that which is not a part of the altar proper (הָעֵקֶרָה, collective, comp. ver.

17, measures fourteen instead of twelve cubits square, since it adds from vers. 13, 14 the thickness of the “bosom,” a cubit on each side, to the length and the breadth; this is referred to in what follows: and the border round about it. etc. = “and its border at its lip round about” (ver. 13), although for the sake of variety we have half a cubit here, instead of a span there.—And its bosom, etc. (ver. 13); this explains the difference in the measurement here from that of ver. 16. The mention of the bosom and the border reverts to the beginning of the description of the altar (ver. 13), so that only בָּרֶכֶת there still needs to be mentioned, and this is now done by naming the steps, in distinction from Ex. xx. 26, indicating the elevation of the altar of burnt-offering. [Bähr carries an inclined plane round the altar for a similar purpose as the two rests here.]—תָּוֹרֵךְ, infinitive = when one turns, equivalent to:

toward; according to others, a noun, read by Hitzig as participle תָּוֹרֵךְ.

Ver. 18 leads to the consecration of the altar of burnt-offering, forming an introduction to its ritual for the purpose stated, and to its service. In other words, as the entire temple-edifice was referred to the underlying idea by means of the measuring, that is, was set forth as to its symbolical signification, so, in accordance with its intention as respects the people, in whom the idea is to be realized, the altar of burnt-offering has been purposely described at such length; but this intention will be effected only by this means, that, strictly parallel with the entrance of the glory into the sanctuary, a formal act of sacrificial consecration in respect of the altar of burnt-offering is provided for beforehand. The clothing of the idea is a kind of dramatic transaction between Ezekiel and the priests of the new temple, an act of the future with which we can compare from the past Lev. viii. (Ex. xxix. 10 sq.); 1 Kings viii. 62 sq.; 2 Chron. viii. 4 sq.—By the words: on the day when it is made, the ordinances of the altar are more closely defined as ordinances which are fulfilled (as to their idea) as soon as the whole temple, including this altar, will be in actual existence. A "being made" is also spoken of in the sense of the reference throughout to the people, just as the whole consecration points to men, who as such can do nothing pure or holy. Comp. Ex. xx. 22; Lev. xvi. 16. But the consecration of the altar, the ritual of which is told to the prophet in the Old Testament mode of expression, particularly by the solemn: "thus saith the Lord," etc., holds out the prospect of a consecration of the people by Jehovah.—By the avowed purpose of the altar, "to cause ascendings" (as the burnt-offerings meant to be wholly burnt, specially fulfilling the view, are called) "to ascend upon it" (with reference to the altar, the raising up of the gift), and to sprinkle blood upon it (which precisely in these offerings was done merely on the altar round about), is therefore signified in the first instance, and corresponding at the same time to the act of consecration here, the consecration of the people to Jehovah, their entire surrender and presentation of themselves to Him. The burnt-offerings usher in the class of offerings which obtains in the state of grace. The justified man lives henceforth not to himself; the service of the Lord which is ministered in the Church is symbolized by this purpose of the altar of burnt-offering; hence there is no act of worship without burnt-offering. Its expiatory significance comes out only in a secondary way in referring to the altar, just as the sprinkling with blood in the case of the burnt-offering takes place in the most

general form. But since, in the time before the law, the burnt-offerings were at the same time the sin-offerings,—just as their atoning nature reminds of the sin which continually adheres to us, although the awakened conscience is again hushed,—so likewise the history of sacrifice is represented to us by this oldest of all sacrifices; thus the self-surrendering reliance on grace continues to be taken into account, as in the past, so for the future, and so the burnt-offering may be called the perpetual offering of the Church of God.

Ver. 19 passes over from the altar as to its purpose to the priests and the appropriate victims. The former are simply presupposed as a body of priests descended from Levi, belonging through the tribe to the whole people as their natural and official representatives, and that without consecration, which took place at the tabernacle; nevertheless, instead of consecration the elective appointment is repeated (comp. ch. xl. 46), so that only the race of Zadok who draw near to Jehovah (ch. xlii. 13) are qualified for the service (comp. on ch. xlii. 15 sq.). As to the second element, the victim, בֶּרֶךְ בָּקָר, a young bullock was fixed on. The male was the fitting victim for the burnt-offering, and the bullock was the most distinguished among the animals coming into consideration for a sin-offering; and so the high priest, as priestly head and representative of the community, offered for his cleansing a bullock still in the full flower of his strength (Lev. iv. 3 sq., comp. 13 sq.).—Ver. 20. Comp. ver. 15; vers. 14, 17; ver. 18. The sprinkling of the blood is the sprinkling in detail of the particular parts characteristic of the sin-offering. The cleansing and expiation of the altar have a reflex influence on the people that made it, and that, at the word of God (in Lev. xvii. 11 the altar is a place of God), raise themselves up there to God. That which the two words employed express (cleanse, and expiate), that which the procedure above and below and around the extremities symbolizes, will be a complete sanctification of the people. With such a strong representation of the cleansing, an anointing of the altar, etc. (Lev. viii. 11) was not necessary in order to give expression to the idea.—Ver. 21. וְהָיָה הַזֶּה לְהִזְבֵּחַ, the article before the stat. constr.

It is quite as unwarranted simply to suppose everything omitted, as from what is not said to make the prophet be in contradiction with the Mosaic ceremonial. The statements in this vision are mainly determined by the idea to be set forth, and which shows itself everywhere. Thus there was no need of saying anything about the blood which was not consumed, and which elsewhere was poured out at the foot of the altar of burnt-offering to prevent its being profaned, since the sanctification is so strongly expressed in that no mention is once made of the fat upon the inwards which came upon the altar, but it is so spoken as if the fire consumed the whole animal (comp. besides in Lev. iv. 12, viii. 17, the manner of expression) without the sanctuary; comp. Lev. iv. 21, vi. 23. Thus not within the house, and if in a place that may be supposed related to it, certainly (comp. what was remarked in speaking of the gizar, ch. xlii.) in the "off-place," hardly ch. xlii. 19 sq.

Ver. 22. The goat is the atonement for a prince (Lev. iv. 23), but also the characteristic offering for the people on the great day of atonement (Lev. xvi.). Thus the people might be looked upon as perfectly represented at the altar of the court, ver. 19 sq. ecclesiastically, and here civilly, by their two heads the high priest and the prince (comp. ch. xlv. 3 sq.), with reference at the same time to the great yearly atonement. At any rate, only the second day is marked at the beginning which is made with the bullock as sin-offering; the following days up to the seventh are, as respects sin-offering, introduced and indicated by the second. — קָדִישׁ, integer, which had to be the quality of every victim, but clearly more noteworthy here when the civil side is treated of. — קָדִישׁ, the priests, or: one, etc., while at the same time ver. 21 sq. is illustrated in this respect by קָדִישׁ. The prophet does it

by instructing the priests to do it. — After what has been stated regarding these two days, that the bullock cleanses the altar, etc. (ver. 20), to which reference is expressly made in speaking of the goat of the second day (ver. 22), then of the completion of the two sin-offerings, to which the subordinate purpose of the altar, the mention of the sprinkling of blood (ver. 18), had led the prophet, so that he now comes to what is spoken of as the principal purpose, to the burnt-offering, which, in the indefiniteness as regards time with which the bullock and ram of which it consists are spoken of, can be quite as easily assigned to the first day as it is expressly assigned in ver. 25 to seven days. — Ver. 24. What remained still indefinite in ver. 22 now becomes quite clear by the mention of the priests. — Very significant, however, and exceedingly telling for the setting forth of the idea of sanctification already remarked in Ezekiel, is the casting of salt by the priests, which in the law is expressly demanded for the meat-offering, and appears here connected in a similar manner (שָׁלַח) with the burnt-offering, although salt (Lev. ii. 13) was to be put on every oblation. Salt (especially in contrast with leaven and honey), by its seasoning and antiseptic power, with its hidden cleansing fire which consumes everything unclean, is meant to bring out the signification of the powerful truth which keeps off impurity and hypocritical legal sanctity, viz. the surrender to the service of the Lord symbolized in the burnt-offering. Perhaps its character as salt of the covenant of God, with reference to the eternity thereof (Num. xviii. 19; 2 Chron. xiii. 5), comes additionally into consideration for the act of consecration. The quality of human nature, observes Hengst., is unsalted, and may not enter into relation with God.

Ver. 25. The seven days can be neither nine nor eight days, i.e. excluding the first two days, or at least the first day, for they are expressly seven; as also it is said again in ver. 26, שִׁבְעָה.

(שִׁבְעָה), with evident allusion to שִׁבְעָה in ver. 20. Moreover, apart from the significance of the number seven as the number of the covenant, consecration, sanctification, etc., it is the basis of all solemnities in Israel, as Keil observes: prescribed in the law without exception for every act of consecration continuing over one day. Comp. particularly Ex. xix. 37; 2 Chron. vii. 9. The one kid for a sin-offering daily cannot possibly be held to run counter to this, for it expresses what relates to the majority of these days, six days; and in respect of the first day, the bullock (ver. 19 sq.) stood clearly defined from the outset. The two victims appointed for burnt-offering (ver. 23 sq.) are also distinguished from the kid by the change from תִּשְׁלַח to תִּשְׁלַח. And not without significance could the cleansing sin-offering, in distinction from the burnt-offering, be ascribed—although only formally—to the prophet; in this keeping separate he represents the sanctifying grace of God, and the priests the community sanctifying themselves to God. — As ver. 23 sq. is supplemented by the שִׁבְעָה placed at the beginning of ver. 25, and qualifying the whole verse, the burnt-offering in question is to be offered daily during the seven days after the daily completion of the cleansing. — Ver. 26, concluding the act of consecration, — hence couched in general terms, — confirms both the merely seven days' duration of the consecration of the altar (for nothing else is meant by שִׁבְעָה), and also, in virtue of the entire consecration above mentioned, its perfect purification, on the ground and in consequence of the expiation (כִּפּוּר) of the altar, which according to ver. 20 is its cleansing. We might translate: a pronouncing clean for the present use, treated of in ver. 27. It is certainly also in harmony with this when, in making over to the altar thereby represented as entering personally on its functions, the peculiar phrase: fill its hand, is used. After the use previously in the description of the altar of the words "bosom" and "lip" in reference to it, its hand (יָד, plur., is a needless gloss) can cause no surprise, especially in Ezekiel, who delights in bold symbols. The altar representing the people in the priests, even of itself, easily becomes a person, and still more readily if the idea of it is to be made prominent. But to "fill the hand" is the expression used in Lev. viii. on occasion of the offering for consecrating the priests, inasmuch as those parts of the offering, which otherwise were heaved and waved in the thank-offering, were laid, along with the loaves and cakes, into the hands of the priests. With exception of the breast and shoulder, all this was laid on the altar as a sacrifice of consecration (מִלֵּא). The expression: מִלֵּא יָד, occurs similarly in Ex. xxxii. 29; 1 Chron. xxix. 5; 2 Chron. xxix. 31 (יָדֵיהֶם), in reference to Jehovah, so that the application to the priests in general denotes the giving of a present to them, which, although by the people, is yet as from Jehovah. It indicates in particular, however, their official right to their ministry, and the obligation of this ministry to offer to Jehovah in the fire of the altar. Since the expression, different from the consecration proper of priests, implies the conferring of the priestly office, the formal installation into it, — the making of it over to the altar here, corresponding to its purification, is designed to represent the making over of the altar of burnt-offering for the service assigned to it, as ver. 27 farther describes. The use for which this altar will have to be employed henceforth, after the completion of what has to be completed in regard to it in the seven days, as, moreover, it is expressly said: on the eighth day and onwards, is intimated by the burnt-offering and the Shelamim, which, however, appear not exactly as the principal and most frequent offerings, instar omnium (KEIL, HENGST.), but to make prominent the idea of a people of God in the state of grace, as the kinds of offering befitting such a relation to Jehovah. Hence also the Shelamim are not called here זֶבַח, "slain offerings," in order to give a general designation for offerings, or to mark the distinction from the burnt-offering, which falls entirely to Jehovah, but שְׁלָמִים, that is, salvation-offerings (peace-offerings), a designation well fitted to place them on a level with the "whole offering" (קָלִיל), as the burnt-offering is also called: full surrender is met by full grace, salvation perfect in respect to the past and for the future, and the individual's enjoyment of peace resting on and flowing from it (in which perhaps the more private character of this species of offering compared with the more official character of the burnt-offering should be noticed). The burnt-offerings mentioned first give the key-note, just as they are also strengthened through the bullock in the seven days' consecration. As supplicatory offerings, the Shelamim, therefore, are also rather thank-offerings, because the praying Church knows on whom she believes (as John xi. 41). Finally, the Shelamim were in the Old Covenant the oldest flesh-offerings after the burnt-offerings. Comp. also Ex. x. 25, xviii. 12 (in reference to the delivering of Israel out of Egypt), and Gen. xli. 1.—וְזָבַח, thus only here, elsewhere רָצַח

(ch. xx. 40, 41), refers to: "restraining," so that the guilt presupposed in having recourse to the sacrifice is confessed; hence Niphal in Isa. xl. 2 (Lev. xxvi. 41, 43: וְרָצַח) of guilt being recompensed, here: to receive as unrestrained by guilt (the idea of justification is perceptible in the word), equivalent to: to receive graciously.

CHAPTER XLIV.

- 1 And he led me back the way of the outer gate of the sanctuary that
- 2 looks to the east; and it was shut. And Jehovah said to me: This gate shall be shut, it shall not be opened, and no man shall go in through it;
- 3 because Jehovah, the God of Israel, went in through it; thus it is shut. As to the prince, he [is] prince, he shall sit in it, to eat bread [food] before Jehovah; from the way of the [to the] porch of the gate shall he go in, and
- 4 from its way shall he go out. And he brought me the way of the north gate before the house, and I looked, and behold, the glory of Jehovah filled
- 5 the house of Jehovah; and I fell upon my face. And Jehovah said to me: Son of man, set thy heart, and behold with thine eyes, and hear with thine ears all that I say unto thee concerning all the ordinances of the house of Jehovah, and all its laws [or: its whole law]; and thou settest [shalt set] thy heart to the approach of the house in [conjunction with] all the out-goings of the
- 6 sanctuary. And thou sayest to the contumacy, to the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Cease at last from all your abominations, O house
- 7 of Israel, When ye brought sons of the outland, uncircumcised in heart and uncircumcised in flesh, to be in My sanctuary, to desecrate it, even My house; when ye offered My bread [My food] (through them), fat and blood, and they
- 8 broke My covenant in addition to all your abominations. And [yea] ye have not kept the charge of My holy things, and [but] ye set [such, those] to keep My
- 9 charge for you in My sanctuary. Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: A son of the outland, uncircumcised in heart and uncircumcised in flesh, shall not come to My sanctuary; in respect of every son of the outland [shall it be said] that is
- 10 in the midst of the children of Israel. Nay, but the Levites who went far from Me when Israel went astray, who went astray from Me after their
- 11 detestable idols, they bear their guilt; And they are servants in My sanctuary, sentinels at the gates of the house and servants of the house; they shall slay the burnt-offering and the slain-offering for the people, and they
- 12 shall stand before them to serve them. Because they used to serve them before their detestable idols, and were to the house of Israel a stumbling-block of guilt, therefore have I lifted My hand over them,—sentence of the
- 13 Lord Jehovah,—and they bear their guilt. And they shall not draw near to Me, to minister as priests to Me, and to draw near over all My holy things to the most holy place, and [but] they bear their reproach and their abominations which they did. And I have given them to be keepers of the charge of the house, for all its service and for all that is to be done in it. And [but] the priests the [these] Levites, the sons of Zadok, who kept the charge of My sanctuary when the children of Israel went astray from Me, they shall come near to Me to minister unto Me, and stand before Me to offer unto Me fat and blood,—sentence of the Lord Jehovah. They shall come to My sanctuary, and they shall draw near to My table to minister unto Me, and to keep My charge. And it comes to pass, when they go to the gates of the inner court, they shall put on linen garments, and wool shall not come upon them when they minister in the gates of the inner court and at the house. Linen turbans shall be upon their heads, and linen breeches upon their loins; they shall not gird themselves in sweat. And on their going out to the outer court, to the outer court to the people, they shall put off their garments in which they minister [ministered], and lay them away [down] in the cells of holiness, and put on other garments; and they shall not sanctify the people in [with] their garments. And their head they shall not shave, nor suffer their locks to grow long; polling they shall poll their heads. And no priest shall drink wine when they go to the inner court. And a widow and a divorced woman shall they not take to themselves for wives; but maidens of the seed of the house of Israel, and the widow who was widow of a priest they may take. And they shall teach My people; what [the difference is] between the holy and the common, and between the unclean and the clean, they shall make them know. And over [matters of] strife shall they stand to judge in My judgments, and judge them [so]; and My laws and Mine ordinances on all My festivals shall they keep; and My Sabbaths shall they hallow. And to a dead body of a man shall he not go to be defiled; but for father, and for mother, and for son, and for daughter, for brother, and for sister who had no husband, they may defile themselves. And after his cleansing they shall count to him seven days. And on the day of his coming to the sanctuary to the inner court, to minister in the sanctuary, he shall offer his sin-offering,—sentence of the Lord Jehovah. And it is to them for an inheritance [namely], I am their inheritance; and a possession shall ye not give them in Israel, I am their possession. The meat-offering, and the sin-offering, and the guilt-offering, they shall eat it; and every devoted thing in Israel shall be theirs. And the first of all the firstlings of everything, and every oblation of all, out of all your oblations, shall be to the priests, and the first of your [ground] corn shall ye give to the priest, to bring down a blessing upon thy house. Whatever is carrion, or torn, whether of fowl or of beast, the priests shall not eat.

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

[As the preceding chapter had disclosed the purpose of God to re-occupy, and that for ever, this new temple, and had described the necessary means and rites of consecration in order to its being a source of blessing to His people, so the present chapter lays down regulations for preventing any new desecration of the house, such as might again compel God to withdraw His gracious presence. These regulations refer successively to the prince and the priesthood—the two classes through whom directly the former pollutions had been introduced into the house of God.—FAIRBAIRN.—W. F.]

The prophet observed in the priests' court (ch. xliii. 5) all that relates to the altar of burnt-offering. He is thence brought back, as we shall have to suppose, through the inner north or south gate the way to the outer east gate. It is not without significance that the east gate of the outer court (comp. ch. xliii. 12) is designated as "gate of the sanctuary, the outer one which," etc. Looking into it from the court (not as Hitzig and Hengstenberg: from before the outer east gate, as ch. xliii. 1), Ezekiel perceived that it was shut (comp. ch. xl. 11); and this must the more astonish him, as this entrance to the sanctuary had been described to him in ch. xl. as forming the rule for all the other gates of the temple. The fact, then, of its being closed demands an explanation, which also Jehovah (comp. on ch. xliii. 6, 7) gives him in Ver. 2. Since the whole vision points to the future, it is said first of all in reference thereto: This gate shall be shut (יִתְּחַל). Hence the closing shall continue for all futurity, as is again expressly confirmed by the statement: It shall not be opened, and strengthened by this other declaration: And no man (whoever he may be) shall go in through it,—in other words, by the exclusion of every one. When it is thereafter said: Because Jehovah, etc., the כִּי explains certainly the immediate present (יָדְעָה), the present closing of the gate, which, as we see in ver. 1, is the first thing treated of; but we shall have to draw upon it for the explanation for the future likewise, for this future has been announced as the continuance of the closing in the present. The way which the glory of Jehovah went (ch. xliii. 4) is thus a unique way, and will remain such, no man shall tread it henceforth; and this, when we look upon the fulfilment in Christ of all that had been written aforetime, reads like a Messianic prophecy, without its being necessary for us to suppose with the Church Fathers a direct reference to the virginity of Mary (sic porta Christi pervia, referta, plena gratia, transiitque rex et permanet clausa ut fuit per secula). [The Rabbins have interpreted the closing of the gate to this effect: that the Shechinah shall no longer be able to come out, an idea which Lightfoot has transformed into the ever-during dwelling of the glory of God in the Christian Church; while Hengst. expresses it thus: that the glory of the impending revelation of the Lord "embodies" itself in the door's remaining shut.]—When, after this quite universal explanation in respect to future and present of the shut east gate, Ver. 3, by its very commencing with the absolute construction וְהָיָה, directs attention to the prince, and, besides, gives as reason for what is to be said of him in reference to the east gate, וְהָיָה, that is as much as to say: quia prince it belongs to him; then an exception from the rule just laid down, that is, an exceptional entering of the prince through this gate at certain times and for certain contingencies, is not to be supposed, especially as what is announced regarding him is not: יָבֹא בוֹ, but simply: יִשְׁבֶּנּוּ בּוֹ, that he shall sit in this gate, namely (comp. for the expression: to eat bread before God, Ex. xviii. 12; Luke xiii. 26), to enjoy the sacrificial banquets. Of this place of the prince in the east gate, Hengst. exclaims: "How glorious must the entering Lord be, when the prince cannot be more highly honoured than by a place in the gate by which He entered!" Now, since according to vers. 1, 2 the entrance through the east gate was closed to him, the way by which the prince arrived at his place of honour will necessarily have to be given, as is accordingly done; and this account is not to be interpreted, with Keil, of the outside stair over the threshold at the guardroom, and onward to the gate-porch at the inner end of the gate-structure. For such a way surely וְהָיָה אֵלָם would be a strange mode of expression! On the contrary, this mode of expression is quite conceivable when we consider the way of the prophet (ver. 1), who had been brought from the north or south to the east gate, and finds himself there on the side of the court west of the gate, and hence has the porch right before him, so that he will the more readily define from it the way of the prince into the gate (from its way he shall also go out), as the entering from the way of the porch of the gate forms self-evidently the contrast to an entering from the way of the gate without. Consequently, the prince has (as Hitzig rightly understands) to come through the outer north or south gate into the outer court, and to cross the same, in order to arrive at the place where he will sit, etc. Whether the gate-porch which thus lay on this side (toward the court) of the gate-barrier is meant to be given as the place for the banquets of the prince may be questioned; Hengstenberg recommends, as "specially" adapted for them, "the inner threshold immediately adjacent to the porch." According to all this, the exception of the prince symbolizes merely, in its own way, the holiness of the sanctuary, the solemnity of drawing near to Jehovah and appearing before Him. It will no longer be as in the former temple, that any one (שָׂרָא) will march straight to the sanctuary through the east gate; but the saints of God, His people sanctified for ever, will know how to honour the holiness of Him who sanctified them. ("In the case of the tabernacle and its court there was only one entrance, from the east, through which all had to go," KLEF.) But it is significant that the civil head of the people (comp. on ch. xliii. 22), the prince, sits and eats in the east gate closed for every one, on the way which the glory of Jehovah went to fill the house (ver. 4), and there enjoys the fruit of that which has been provided. For the significance of the banquets has regard to the communion and friendly relation in which the participants stand to one another, and with the provider of the feast, who in the last resort is Jehovah—at least He participates therein in the sense of Rev. iii. 20; just as also the gladness and joy before the Lord, and even the joys of the kingdom of heaven, appear under the figure of a feast (Ps. xxiii. 5, xxxvi. 9 [8]; Matt. viii. 11; Luke xiv. 15; Rev. xix. 9). We have in this the genuine gospel feature, which excels in glory the face of the law. So much the more, however, as regards the prince—who, as has been said, is rather a reflex of the people (comp. ch. xlv. 10), just as to them also the entrance to the temple has been opened by the setting in operation of the altar of burnt-offering (ch. xliii. 26)—must we avoid the interpretation which accentuates in him the David of Messianic times (ch. xxxiv. 23 sq., xxxvii. 24). On this comp. also ch. xlv. 22, xlv. 2, 16. It would be better to insist with Hengst. on his "cheering" form, as opposed to the ceasing of the magisterial office in the exile, especially when his presence is so incidentally "presupposed." But this principship, which makes orderly civil relations again obtain in Israel, had its post-exile appearance in Zerubbabel, for instance (Zech. iv.), and has at all events been perfected in the Messianic kingdom, even as to the side applicable here, which Isa. liiii. 10 expresses thus: "The pleasure of Jehovah shall prosper through his hand;" while in ver. 11 he is said: "to see," "to be refreshed;" and similarly ver. 12.

[“In regard to the prince, it is impossible for us to think of any one but the royal head, as he is throughout spoken of as an individual, and in the next chapter is directed ‘to prepare for himself, and for all the people of the land,’ a sin-offering (ch. xlv. 22). So that the idea of Häver-

nick, that the word is used collectively for the rulers and presidents generally of the people, is quite untenable. And not less so is the opinion, that by the expression is simply to be understood the Messiah; for this is utterly irreconcilable with all the prescriptions given, and in particular with those requiring the presentation of sacrifices and sin-offerings for the prince. It is to be explained precisely as the whole delineation here, and in the preceding visions (ch. xxxiv.—xxxix.), by viewing it as part of an ideal description of coming realities under the form and aspect of the old relations. And no more than we expect other parts of the vision to find their accomplishment under the gospel by a restoration of the carnal sacrifices and institutions of Judaism, should we look here for an actual prince to follow the regulations prescribed. Standing on the position he did, the prophet must speak of the future under the image of the past; and as it was by means of the earthly head of the Jewish state that many of the former corruptions had been introduced, he now shows how a repetition of such evils is to be guarded against in the future. Whether the kingly power should ever again be concentrated in one person, or should be shared by many, is of no moment as regards the substance of the truth here unfolded.” As for the connection between the prince and the east gate (vers. 1–3), “what could this import, but that the prince should feel he now occupied a place of peculiar nearness to God? As God’s vicegerent and deputy among the people, it became him to be the most distinguished representative in public life of God’s holiness, to tread the higher walks of spiritual communion and fellowship with Heaven, and stand pre-eminent in his zeal for the interests of truth and righteousness. Far now from usurping the authority that belonged to God, and abusing to selfish ends and purposes the power which was given by Him for higher ends, all authority and power in Israel should be exercised—if this divine ideal were reduced to practice—in a solemn feeling of subordination to God’s majesty, and with an unfeigned desire for His glory.”—FAIRBAIRN’S Ezekiel, pp. 477, 478.—W. F.]

Vers. 4–16. The Priests.

Ver. 4. The outer north gate cannot be the one spoken of, for the prophet stands in the outer court before the porch of the east gate. He is brought אֶל־פְּנֵי הַבַּיִת, and so דֶּרֶךְ־שַׁעֲרֵה־הַצִּפּוֹן must be the way to the inner north gate, as this was also the way by which to get near to the temple-house.—Comp. for the rest on ch. xliii. 5 and 3. As there the filling of the house with the glory of Jehovah introduced the Thorah of the temple, especially the consecration of the altar of burnt-offering, which certainly forms also the transition to the temple-service, so here by a similar introduction, in which Ver. 5 refers so far back as to ch. xl. 4, the service before Jehovah is now introduced, and that with attentive regard to the personae. Thus the two parts of the section, ch. xl.—xlv., are even formally separated.—Jehovah, as in ver. 2.—The threefold demand upon the prophet, of which the first, which as the most inward strikes the key for the seeing and hearing, has its ground not exactly in the glory just now seen (HENGST.), but rather in what Jehovah will say to him, and in the abominations committed by Israel, to which it has reference.—What concerns the ordinances and laws of the house (comp. ch. xliii. 11, 12) is certainly limited here by לְמִקְדָּשׁ to the temple building proper, as is also indicated by the designation: house of Jehovah, repeated from ver. 4, so that the approach of the house with all the out-goings is to be understood in reference to the priests.—Ver. 6. That the house of Israel is to be addressed (ch. ii. 7) shows the more plainly how it had been represented by the priesthood of the past.—רַבְלֵכֶם מִבֵּל, literally: there is much to you from all your abominations, sufficient, enough for you, so that you may at last abstain (1 Pet. iv. 3). Like priest, like people; but also, like people, like priest (Hos. iv. 9).

Ver. 7, in this connection, in which the temple-house accessible to the priests alone is treated of, and priestly ministration is had regard to, can hardly refer to heathens or foreigners living amongst Israel (comp. for this Lev. xvii. 10, 12; Num. xv. 13 sq.; Ex. xii. 43, 44; 1 Kings viii. 41 sq.), foreign merchants as sellers of sacrificial victims, etc., nor heathenized Israelites in general, but must be understood as referring to the introduction of priests, who, as the children of Israel were called "heathens" (גֵּוֹיִם)

in ch. ii. 8, were בְּנֵי נֹכֶךְ, instead of being sons of Jehovah's house. In what sense the term employed is to be taken is shown by the next clause: uncircumcised in heart, which, if said of genuine born heathens, would be nonsense; whereas, said of Israelites, of the priests here, and conjoined with the following clause: and uncircumcised in flesh, it expresses exactly the same as Rom. ii. 25, when the ἀποστολικὴ ἀκαρτερία is meant,—when the direct opposite of the idea of the symbol realizes itself (comp. besides, Deut. xxx. 6), the distinction also which the symbol denotes will disappear, the Jew has become heathen. Comp. also ch. xvi. 8; Zech. xiv. 21 (Phil. iii. 3). The expression: to be in My sanctuary, which more closely defines the בְּהִיבְאֵכֶם as the bringing in to the priestly ministration, is still farther illustrated by the clause: to desecrate it, My house. When it is farther said: when ye offered לַחֲמִי (in a manner, the daily bread of Jehovah, which is immediately explained to mean the sacrificial food as to its elements: fat and blood, for which comp. Num. xxviii. 2; Lev. iii. 11, xxi. 6, 8, etc.), this parallel phrase to: when ye brought to be in My sanctuary, etc., confirms the view that priests are meant who formed the pure contrast to the Israelitish priesthood according to its idea, and this the more plainly as וְיִזְכְּרוּ (ch. xvi. 59, xvii. 18, 19) can scarcely be said of heathens as such, who were outside of the covenant; but when understood of such priests, it looks straight into the inmost relation, from which are derived the sanctuary, the service in it, and the sanctification of Israel. The interchange of ye and they is farther shown to be intentional by the next clause: in addition to all your abominations, inasmuch as not even the priests were correct, with whose holiness the people so frequently think they may venture to dispense with their own. Ver. 8 accordingly goes on to reprimand such shameful priestly representation of the people in respect to the holy things (ch. xxii. 8) of Jehovah (comp. ch. xl. 45, 46). Of this Keil gives a superficial view, when he says that "the people, by unlawfully admitting ungodly heathen into the temple, had not only forgotten the reverence due to the holy things of God (!), but had also made for themselves these heathen, so to say (!), ministers of God in His sanctuary." How can "permission to tread the temple" be "put on the same level," even only "spiritually," with "placing in the temple for superintending the worship"? What is meant flows, moreover, from the general statement, impossible to be understood except in its constant sense: And ye set (namely, such parties) . . . for you in My sanctuary. לְכֶם implies also the representation of the people by such keepers of the charge, which the sanctuary and the covenant of Jehovah with them bound Israel to keep. (Comp. 1 Kings xii. 31.) HÄV.: "Not to serve God, but to serve your own sinful inclination."

[FAIRBAIN: "The children of Israel are spoken of as doing all this, because the corrupt priesthood was inseparably connected with the sins of the people—the one continually acting and reacting on the other. And the corruption in the priesthood, it will be observed, is expressed as if persons had been put into the office who were not of the tribe of Levi, or even of the seed of Israel, but uncircumcised heathen. Not that literally persons of this description had been admitted into the priestly office; that did not take place, not even in the kingdom of Israel, where still the Israelites were employed, though not of the family of Aaron. But the prophet is viewing all in a spiritual light; he is reading forth the import of the outward transactions, as they appeared to the eye of God; and as in that respect the officiating priesthood had been no better than uncircumcised strangers, so he speaks of them as having actually been such."—W. F.]

Ver. 9. We have now, in condemnation of such profanation, Jehovah's solemn declaration regarding the personelle of His service in future. In the first place, a simple negating of what has been, that shall no longer be; hence כִּלְבֵּן נֹכֶךְ, to be understood in the same sense as in ver. 7; also the phrase: shall not come to, etc., corresponding to what has been previously said, is to be understood of priests, as: My sanctuary, proves beyond a doubt. But the summary winding up (לֵכֶם; EWALD, Gram. § 310a): that is in the midst of, etc., precludes, by the explanation it gives, every thought of genuine foreigners, or even of the גֵּוֹיִם, strangers, ch. xlvii. 22 sq.

"Jewish heathen," as Hengstenberg designates them, are most expressly excluded by this canon of church discipline, which begins at the house of God. To be a "son of Israel" is the first qualification which Jehovah demands for His priesthood, and this taken strictly explains likewise as antithesis thereto the son of the outland. Ver. 10. כִּי אֵם (a strong "but," EWALD, Gram. p. 856), after the ample negating (ver. 9), in-introduces the position which makes everything perfectly clear that the discourse is to be concerning the tribe of Levi. This designation is given in the outset, because there will still take place a choix sur choix, a narrower election in respect of the Aaronites, the peculiarly priestly family, and a degradation of priests to be servants and assistants, like the Levites given as such to Aaron and his lineage (Num. iii.). — רָחַק (ch. xi.

6, viii. 15), "to be away," to depart from, Jer. ii. 5, 8. — תַּעֲזָה is: "to stagger" (Isa. xxviii. 7), in

vi. 4), and then it is still people and priest taken together as formerly; and this is especially clear when אָשֶׁר תַּעֲזָה, corresponding to the אָשֶׁר

רָחַק, makes it conformable to "Israel's going astray." — וְנִשְׁאָו, ch. xiv. 10, xvi. 52, 58

(HENGST.: "they shall take their iniquity upon them"), the guilt to be borne will be made clear by the immediately following punishment. This idolatrous staggering had at different times seized hold of priest and people, sometimes more, sometimes less. Instead of allowing themselves to be dragged along by the people to active or even passive participation in the service of idols, they ought, from their office, to have restrained the people, Jer. ii. 8. Comp. moreover, Ps. xvi. 4. [Hävernick thinks here of "even the old misdeeds of Levi, which will make themselves observable."]—Ver. 11. They shall not be excluded from all service in the sanctuary, but degraded from the functions of priests to those of simple Levites; as Rashi expresses it: "to do what strangers and servants and women can perform." — שָׂרֵת is used also of priestly service; it is only פִּקְדָה (the function for those discharging it) that with the words expressly added points to the gates of the house, although the word in itself is equivalent to מִשְׁמֶרֶת, מִשְׁמָרֶת. It is still in respectful terms that these degraded priests are spoken of (it is not said: לְעֹבְדֵי אֱתֵיבָרֶת, as is said of the Levites specifically, Num. xvi. 9). They are porters and house-servants, yet in this at least they still represent the people, that they relieve them of the slaving of the victims; it is only with their "standing before them to serve them" that their being degraded to Levites becomes more marked (comp. Num. xvi. 9), because now the punishment corresponding to the guilt is — Ver. 12—to be mentioned; the guilt which they shall bear is characterized by the punishment for it in this way: what they were accustomed to do in the apostasy at the will of the people—and thus as a stumbling-block which caused to fall into guilt—is now officially imposed upon them.—Comp. on ch. xx. 5, 6, 15, 23, xxxvi. 7. —Ver. 13 hereupon expressly cuts them off from being priests as hitherto. בְּהֵן, the fuller stem of בָּן, signifies: those who establish anything as it should be according to the divine ordinance, the people continuing always in their functions; according to others: those bending themselves, namely, doing homage to the Eternal; Num. xvi. 10 of the priesthood, as distinguished from mere Levite service. — Is therefore antithesis to

לְשִׁרְתָּם, ver. 11. Further details are given in what follows. By the appositional אֶל־קִרְבִּי

הַקִּדְשִׁים, the expression: to draw near over all

My holy things, is—as itself suggests, and the plural קִדְשֵׁי (comp. Num. iv. 19) confirms—interpreted as referring to the eating of the most holy things (comp. on ch. xlii. 13), appertaining to the priests alone. For the rest, comp. ch. xvi. 52.—Ver. 14 recapitulates and sums up the reproach and guilt to be borne, with respectful reference to their former priestly calling; hence שְׁמֵרֵי מִן־, which mode of expression, however, receives its levitical limitation through לְכָל

עֲבֹדָתוֹ (comp. Num. xvi. 9, ch. iii.).

Ver. 15. Those likewise are called Levites who in contrast to the punishment of the former priests are all the more exalted as priests.—צִדְקָה, the son of Ahitub (1 Chron. v. 34 [vi. 8]), of the line of Eleazar (1 Chron. xxiv. 1 sq.), was co-high priest with Abiathar of the line of Ithamar, in consequence of the twofold service of worship in David's time, that at Jerusalem and that at Gibeon (1 Chron. xvi. [xvii.] 39). After Abiathar had like Joab repeatedly attached himself to Adonijah, the pretender to the crown, and had brought about his own fall and banishment to Anathoth (1 Kings ii.), Zadok was appointed by Solomon sole high priest, and with him the line of Eleazar again became the alone high-priestly one. We are not to go along with Hengstenberg when he, in order to interpret the sons of Zadok, goes back even to the relation of fatherhood in the Decalogue, and drags in the pope too as a holy father, simply to get a father-priest, after whom all priests (since 1 Kings ii.) are to be designated as his sons, "even the unfaithful," says Hengstenberg, "who were excluded in the foregoing passage" (!). He hazards this contradiction to the connection in order to get the faithful priests first in ch. xlviii. 11, and because he finds in ch. xliii. 19, instead of "sons of Zadok" (as in ch. xl. 46), "that are of the seed of Zadok," "the heads (!) of the high-priesthood, those who are of the high priest's kindred (Acts iv. 6), officiating at the consecration of the altar of burnt-offering" (that is, it is incorrect to say that in the whole vision the high priest never meets us!). In Zadok we might indeed be reminded of Melchizedek, had not the very name Zadok ("righteous"), and still more what is historically known of him, symbolized him as a type of the true priestly character. The faithful position which he had taken towards David he did not forsake towards Solomon, as Abiathar did (1 Kings i. 7, 8, 25, 26, ii. 22); he even anointed Solomon king over Israel. Consequently, in the theocratic (Messianic) signification of the kingdom of David and Solomon, Zadok kept himself precisely in the relation which is so significant for our vision (see Doct. Reflec.). Comp. also 1 Sam. ii. 35.—[FAIRBAIRN: "The promise of a priest-hood of the house of Zadok entirely corresponded to the promise of a shepherd with the name of David. It simply indicated a race of faithful and devoted servants, in whom the outward and the inward, the name and the idea, should properly coincide,—a priesthood serving God in newness of spirit, not in the oldness of the letter, as the people whom they represented should also have become true Israelites, themselves a royal priesthood offering up spiritual sacrifices to the Lord. In truth, it is the raising up of a people who should be such a priesthood that is meant by the description, and the sons of Zadok came into notice only because in connection with them there was an historical ground for taking them as representatives of a right-hearted spiritual community."—W. F.]—But as not all the children of Abraham are of his faith, so here the sons of Zadok are only those who kept, etc., who have kept and will keep themselves faithful to Me. Not until after this essential personal qualification for priest, is the formal and official service described: in general, the "drawing near," etc. (ch. xl. 46, xliii. 19), in particular, the "standing before Me (in contrast to 'before them,' ver. 11) to offer unto Me (comp. ver. 7) fat," etc., part of the service at the altar of burnt-offering.—Then in Ver. 16 comes the treading of the dwelling in the holy place, especially the drawing near to the altar of incense (ch. xli. 22), for which the name table is significantly retained. Finally, לְשֹׁמְרוֹ

Vers. 17-31. Priestly Duties and Privileges.

Ver. 17 begins with the most external, the clothing; the duty in this respect will make the symbolized inward obligation the more apparent. The coming to the inner gates implies the intention of service at or in the sanctuary, and thereby involves the duty of putting on (בְּשִׁטָּה, "flax") linen garments, and this makes לְשֹׁמְרוֹ, as already ordained by Moses, perfectly clear (comp. Ex. xxxix. 28, xxviii. 39 sq.; Lev. vi. 3 [10], xvi. 4, 23). The express prohibition of wool (צֶמֶר), what is "drawn together," hanging together like vellus, (lpos, iapos) gives additional emphasis to the linen, and makes the ministering in the gates of the inner court, that is, within them, and at the house, said of functions discharged within the house, the former in relation to the altar of burnt-offering, and the latter in relation to the altar of incense, still more distinctly prominent.—Ver. 18, like ver. 17, refers to the priest's garments; פָּאֵר is properly: "adornment," diadem, which might suggest the special high-priestly מִצְנֶפֶת; the word, however, occurs rather in connection with מִנְבְּעֹת, Ex. xxxix. 28 ("goodly bonnets"), and we have no warrant for supposing it is a special head-covering for priests in general. It is rather meant to be remarked that they are adorned (פָּאֵר is suggestive of floral ornaments), although with linen.—The covering for the loins

(מִכְנָסִי, plural or dual), reaching from high above the loins down to about the thigh (comp. Ex. xxviii. 42), forms the third of the four articles, as Bähr says, designed for the official dress of the priests (in accordance with "the symbolical place of Jehovah's testimony and revelation"); while the injunction about "girding," which, moreover, explains the sense and spirit of the whole linen dress, subjoins the אַבְנֵי, that is, girdle of the priests, as the fourth article. This was worn higher up toward the breast, as would then be confirmed by the added defining clause: not in sweat; which certainly will not bear the meaning: while they sweat, but according to Bähr is meant to imply: where they sweat. But בִּיָּעַ (יָעַ),

is forced out by pressure or anguish) certainly means nothing but what has been said already: that no wool shall come upon them; for as the white linen makes the cleanness apparent, so sweat, so readily produced by woollen stuff, especially when forming a girdle and thus confining the body, is meant to be guarded against as uncleanness, and on the whole accordingly the holiness of the priests for the sanctification of the people to be signified. [Did the Septuagint mean too tight girding, or girding in violent haste?]

Ver. 19. The repetition: to the outer court, is meant to strengthen the prohibition, which is particularly strong in our verse; to call attention to the distinction between the outer court and the inner, while both, however, are still only courts; and to the altar in the inner court, where the sanctification of the people willed by Jehovah has to take place. After this (comp. ch. xlii. 14) comes the laying aside of the priest's official dress, and the laying of it down at the place suitable to the "holiness of Jehovah" (ch. xlii. 13), and the putting on of other garments, for the purpose of guarding against the thought of another sanctification than the God-ordained one by the way of sacrifice. Not in their garments, that is, it is not they, although they are priests, who are to sanctify the people (comp. John xvii. 19!). Consequently, the going out to the people is to be understood in reference to sanctification, and shows moreover that this outer court was for the people. Expositors generally refer here to Lev. vi. 11, 20 (יִקְרָשׁ); Ex.

xxix. 37, xxx. 29; comp. besides, Ex. xxviii. 43; Lev. vi. 4 [11], xvi. 23. [That contact with the people defiles the priests when in their official dress, as Keil referring to Lev. xxi. supposes, is not said here.]

Ver. 20 forbids, as already Lev. xix. 27, xxi. 5, the shaving of the head smooth, as heathenish; censuring the Creator (!), says Hengst.; according to Bähr, as mourning, a sign of fellowship with the dead, inasmuch as the hair is a proof of life and vigour of body. The Egyptian priests kept the head always close shaved. On the contrary, the priests of Israel are to bear their head high, as the mediators of an eternal life in holiness through grace. — פָּרַעַ implies

"breaking forth," "being on the top;" hence, the hair on the head. The covering for the head is treated of next to the garments for the body. Keil cites for שָׁלַח ("to let loose"), as "to let grow freely," Lev. x. 6 and Num. vi. 5. But the first passage must not be so understood, and we need not suppose here, in accordance with the second, a prohibition of Nazaritism, but, as the markedly positive clause shows, the hair is simply to be kept short, to be polled. Comp. 1 Cor. xi. 14 sq. (Rev. ix. 8). (שָׂמַם is found only here.) On this Hengstenberg observes: "That which is the sign of a wild, disorderly man, who lets nature take its free course, might indeed be permitted to the Nazarite, in consequence of a vow undertaken for a time, in order thereby to typify his separation from the world; but not to the priest, whose duty it was to hold converse with the world, and adapt himself to society, to enter which with shorn hair was the custom even in Joseph's time. The priest should be no separated person." If flowing locks and the growth of hair generally is the sign of vigorous natural life, as the forbidden shaving also on its part symbolizes, then by forbidding the priest as representative of a holy people to let his locks grow long, the false positive, in addition to the false negative, is forbidden; the maxim that: every one is his own law (as every one his own devil), unbounded naturalism is forbidden. Neither annihilation nor yet glorification of nature, neither askesis unto death nor honouring of the flesh, but simply law, divine order, is the watchword for the servant of Jehovah. The sanctification treated of is neither heathenishly self-chosen, one's own fabrication, self-sanctification, nor is it a natural holiness of one's own, which needs not a sanctification in Jehovah's way.—Ver. 21. Although abstinence from wine is demanded, yet our passage has nothing to do with the Nazarite proper. His was a vow regulated by law; but always a free-will dedication pro tempore, where the man thus devoted himself to God with all his naturalism, just as he had grown up. That the priests are not to drink wine (Lev. x. 9) is grounded on no temporary, formal separation from the world, is no drastic consecration, as in the case of the Nazarite, but is simply an emblem of what is seemly, of sobriety of soul, of the true spirit of a servant of God, who goes into the inner court,—the reason assigned for the prohibition.

Ver. 22. From their manner of life in respect to drinking, and no doubt generally (Rom. xiii. 14), the obligation of the priests turns to their married life. The injunction not to marry a widow (Lev. xxi. 14, 13) is extended here from the high priest to the whole body of priests, who in this respect then appear high-priestly, just as in ch. xliii. 12 everything upon the mountain round about was most holy. The ordinary priest also is not allowed to marry (Lev. xxi. 7) אִשָּׁה זָרָה, a woman put away by her husband, of course with reason, because of guilt; one of this kind is classified as a factitious widow with those who are really widows. The permission to take a priest's widow forms a pendant to the judgment pronounced on the daughter of a priest in Lev. xxi. 9. For the rest, the verse relates to the priests' being holy with reference to the holiness of Jehovah. [The Jewish Talmudic view limits the first part to the high priest, understanding בִּזְרֵיךָ of the other priests: "Yet the widow who is (really)

Ver. 23 defines the official duties of the priests. יָרָה (Hiph.), "to spread out," the hand, for example, to point to something, to teach, here the people, of whom Jehovah says: My people (Deut. xvii. 10 sq., xxxiii. 10; Lev. x. 10); and above all to teach them the difference between, etc., for which comp. ch. xxii. 26. The priestly service, then, is to comprehend worship and doctrine, representation of the people before God, and representation of God before the people. (Comp. Mal. ii. 7.) But above all, everything with an eye to sanctification.—Ver. 24 gives in addition to this the court of judicature which they form in disputed cases (Deut. xvii. 8 sq., xix. 17): עֲלֵי-רֵב, they are to stand over the confused and complicated points raised by the parties, and because they have the power to stand over them as judges, since they have to judge in My judgments, they will always find in the law of Jehovah what is right in every case. Qeri: לְמִשְׁפָּחַת, and Qeri:

לְמִשְׁפָּחַת, are both equally unnecessary. What this administration of justice is in civil life—it too being a sanctification of the people through the judgment of God—has its counterpart in church life, in the observance of all the laws and ordinances, on all the festivals of Jehovah, the key-note for which is given with the hallowing of the Sabbaths (comp. for the reverse, ch. xxii. 26), while at the same time we are told what is always the main matter in priestly ministration.

Ver. 25 therefore shows how the priests have to keep themselves from defilement.—לֹא יִבֹּא, individualizes, to speak exactly.—The exception (כִּי אִם) affects the same blood-relations as Lev.

xxi. The exception of the high priest (Lev. xxi. 10 sq.) is not noticed, just as there is no notice of the high priest in the whole book. Ver. 26 is, according to Keil, the command to purify from uncleanness by the dead sharpened, inasmuch as he believes the seven days are appointed over and above the space of seven days prescribed by the law (Num. xix. 11 sq.), and finds this indicated in כֹּהֲרֵתוֹ, in which he thinks he sees a compensation for the previously permitted coming of the priests to the dead, which in the law had been forbidden to the high priest even in the case of father or mother. Rather perhaps the number seven simply points the more strongly to holiness and sanctification. Hengstenberg, on the other hand, insists on the distinction between: having been cleansed, and: "cleansing," which, he says, began with the beginning of the seven days (Num. xix.), seven days being the longest period which any uncleanness lasts. At all events it cannot be denied that Ver. 27 still demands the offering of a sin-offering when the priest enters again on his ministry.

After the duties come now the privileges of the priests, what is to accrue to them for their service.—In Ver. 28 we have, first of all, the fundamental condition known from the law (comp. Num. xviii. 20; Deut. x. 9, xviii. 1), expressed first positively, then negatively, and finally once more positively; which the Israelite priestly consciousness received and retained in living and in dying. For, since the priests of Israel are no foreigners, no dominant race, but of Israel, like all their brethren, it would be natural, when Canaan was promised by God as נַחֲלָה to the people to whom they belonged, that to them also there should be a definite tribal territory for inheritance and possession (אֲרָצָה, something which one grasps and retains). But they represent Israel not as to the flesh but as to the spirit, as to the idea which from the outset makes of this people God's peculiar possession, and thereby God their peculiar possession: "My" people, and I am Jehovah, "thy God." Now, as the Lord already (Gen. xv. 1) says to Abraham, the father of all believers: I am thy very great reward, so this is to the priests for an inheritance, that I am their inheritance (נַחֲלָה), as Jehovah says. They are thereby in such a position that nothing more is to be given to them (לֹא-תִתֶּנּוּ לָהֶם), at least

by their fellow-countrymen, to whom on the contrary they give an earnest of the ideality of their nationality, of the eternal inheritance, of the possession of Canaan in truth, in that they as matter of fact teach Israel its better self, its true aspiration, its eternal future. [Ver. 28 does not, as Keil supposes, treat of cities to dwell in, with the houses and pasture-grounds belonging thereto, which in the Mosaic economy Jehovah assigns to the Levites and priests from His own peculiar possession in land; comp. ch. xlv.]

Ver. 29. On the contrary, they have their livelihood from the offerings, and in so far live from Jehovah's hand. On the meat, sin, and guilt-offerings here mentioned, comp. in the law Lev. ii. 1-10; 1 Cor. ix. 13.—חָרַם ("separating") is what is devoted to Jehovah without possibility of redemption; for this comp. Lev. xxvii. 21, 28.—Ver. 30. בְּכֹרִים are the first-fruits of tree-fruit and of corn (from בָּכַר, "to break forth").

Comp. Ex. xxiii. 19, xxxiv. 26; Num. xviii. 13; Deut. xviii. 4.—תְּרֻמָּה is said of parts of the offerings with reference to the ceremonial of heaving and waving, which likewise signified consecration to Jehovah. The Rabbins explain the word of the gift "separated" for the Lord; for thus it took place with all the first-fruits, sheaves as well as loaves. At all events, the heave-offering is in general whatever is according to precept or of free will lifted up for Jehovah as a consecrated gift to the sanctuary, indirectly to its ministers (Ex. xxv. 2 sq., xxx. 13 sq.; Num. xv. 19 sq., xviii. 27 sq.). Comp. ch. xx. 40.—עֲרִיקָה, used only in the plural, is supposed to be

"groats," or "peeled grain" (Gesenius), with which רֶאֱשִׁית does not well harmonize; hence

Meier supposes grain-corn. Comp. Num. xv. 20 sq.—Everything mentioned in ver. 29 tends to sanctification; the heaving and waving in particular involved the thought, that in consequence of such gifts to the priest the blessing of God is brought down on the individual house. Hengstenberg translates: "and that thou mayest make blessing rest in thy house," and cites Matt. xv. 4, 5. Comp. Mal. iii. 10.—Ver. 31 brings to a close what refers to the sustenance of the priests, mentioning the things to be excluded therefrom.

נֶבֶלָה, a dead body, what lies stretched out of men and beasts, cadaver. טָרֵף, "something torn off," torn by wild beasts. Comp. ch. iv. 14; Ex. xxii. 30 [31]; Lev. xxii. 8. Lev. xvii. 15 marks this as defiling for any man, how much more so for the priests of Jehovah; so that by this the idea of holiness is exemplified. "Only what Jehovah gives to them and His sanctuary in offerings and dues, which, however, must never be unclean, shall accrue to them; and this at the same time forms the best transition to the awards which follow" (Ewald).

CHAPTER XLV.

- 1 And when ye allot [divide] the land as inheritance, ye shall make an oblation to Jehovah, a holiness from the land; the length five and twenty thousand and the breadth ten thousand; holiness [is] it in all its border round
- 2 about. Of this shall be [come, belong] to the sanctuary five hundred by five hundred, a square round about; and fifty cubits of environs for it round
- 3 about. And from [according to] this measure shalt thou measure a length of five and twenty thousand and a breadth of ten thousand, and in it shall be
- 4 the sanctuary, the most holy place. Holiness from the land is this; for the priests, the ministers of the sanctuary shall it be, who draw near to minister to Jehovah; and it is to them a place for houses, and a holy place for the
- 5 sanctuary. And five and twenty thousand in length and ten thousand in breadth shall be [belong] to the Levites, the ministers of the house, to them
- 6 for a possession, twenty chambers. And as a possession of the city ye shall give five thousand in breadth, and in length five and twenty thousand, beside [running along] the oblation of holiness; it shall be for the whole house of Israel.
- 7 And for the prince: adjoining the oblation of holiness on both sides and the possession of the city, before the oblation of holiness and before the possession of the city, on the west side westward, and on the east side eastward, and the length, beside [running along] one of the [tribal] portions from the west border to the east border. It shall be land to him for a possession in Israel; and My princes shall no more oppress My people; and [but] the land shall they give to the house of Israel according to their tribes. Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: Enough for you, O princes of Israel; remove [put away] violence and rapine, and do judgment and justice, take away your expulsions from My people,—sentence of the Lord Jehovah. Ye shall have just balances, and a just ephah, and a just bath. The ephah and the bath shall be of one measure; that the bath may contain [amount to] the tenth of the homer, and the ephah a tenth of the homer; its measure shall be after the homer. And the shekel [shall be] twenty gerahs; twenty shekels, five and twenty shekels, fifteen shekels, shall be your maneh. This is the oblation which ye shall make: the sixth of the ephah from the homer of wheat, and ye shall six the ephah from the homer of barley. And the ordinance of the oil: the bath of oil [what is to be offered as bath from the oil shall be] the tenth of the bath out of the cor, [which is] ten baths, a homer; for ten baths are a homer. And one sheep [or goat] out of the flock, from two hundred from the watered [land] of Israel, for the meat-offering, and for the burnt-offering, and for peace-offerings, to atone for [to cover] them,—sentence of the Lord Jehovah. All the people of the land, they shall be [held] to this oblation for the prince in Israel. And upon the prince shall be the burnt-offerings, and the meat-offering, and the drink-offering, on the feasts, and on the new moons, and on the Sabbaths, in all the festal seasons of the house of Israel; he shall prepare the sin-offering, and the meat-offering, and the burnt-offering, and the peace-offerings, to atone for [to cover] the house of Israel. Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: In the first [month], on the first of the month, thou shalt take a bullock, a young steer, without blemish, and cleanse the sanctuary: And the priest takes of the blood of the sin-offering, and puts it upon the posts of the house, and upon the four corners of the ledge of the altar, and upon the posts of the gate of the inner court. And so shalt thou do on the seventh of the month for the erring man and for the fool, and ye atone for the house. In the first [month], on the fourteenth day of the month, shall the passover be to you, a feast of seven days; unleavened bread shall be eaten [one shall eat manna]. And the prince brings on this day for himself and for the whole people of the land a bullock as a sin-offering. And the seven days of the feast he shall bring as a burnt-offering to Jehovah seven bullocks and seven rams without blemish, daily the seven days; and as a sin-offering a kid of the goats for the day [daily]. And as a meat-offering he shall offer an ephah for a bullock, and an ephah for a ram, and of oil an hin for the ephah. In the seventh [month], on the fifteenth day of the month, in the feast he shall bring just such [offerings] seven days, as the sin-offering, as the burnt-offering, and as the meat-offering, and as the oil.

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

Vers. 1-9. The Oblation of Holiness, the Land of the Levites, the Possession of the City, and the Portion of the Prince.

That Jehovah is the inheritance and possession of His priests (ch. xlv. 28) is a reality even for this world, as godliness in like manner has the promise "of the life that now is." In order to give form to this truth, Ver. 1 connects what follows with the preceding.—הָפִיל, from נָפַל, signifies:

"to make to fall," and is used peculiarly of the lot (ch. xxiv. 6); but when nothing suggests this, and when לֹ is not prefixed to the word, it is to be taken in its general sense, and בְּנִחְלָה, cum ב essentialis, is to be understood as meaning:

to divide in general. Comp. Ps. xvi. 6. (The reference to the time immediately after the Babylonian servitude, hitherto maintained by Hengstenberg, must now, as we may well conceive, be abandoned; and so then he makes the prophet travel to Utopia, etc.)—תְּרִימוֹ תְּרוֹסָה (Hiphil of רָם, referring to what was done in the case of the peace or thank-offerings with the shoulder of the victim—the waving with the breast) has here the more general signification, although not that of: "to present a present," nor that of: "to offer an offering," but that of: to consecrate, to hallow to the Lord (לַיהוָה), which, moreover,

was the meaning of the ceremony of heaving on high as well as of the heaving up upon the altar. Comp. also on ch. xlv. 30. For details see on ch. xlviii.—Holiness (corresponding to Jehovah) from the land, and thus separated, "partly for sacred and partly at least for higher, more general purposes" (BUNSEN); but see the intended use in what follows.—The word length is repeated, perhaps on account of the significant number mentioned for the first time, or because the natural length of the land is not to be regarded, but by length reference is meant to be made to that which is forthwith so called in the vision, the extension from east to west, and so the repetition is not exactly pleonastic. Whether rods (JEROME, RASHI, HÄV.) or cubits (EWALD, HITZIG, HENGST.) are meant, is not said. The supporters of both interpretations appeal to ch. xlii. 16 sq.; hence compare what is said there.—

The express mention, too, of cubits in ver. 2 is pressed into the service of both parties. Those who hold for rods say: Thus rods are always meant in what goes before, because here cubits are excepted; those who contend for cubits reply: Thus in what goes before, too, as everywhere in the case of all the large measurements, cubits are to be understood, otherwise rods would need to be expressly named. That cubits are mentioned first in ver. 2, Hengstenberg explains from "the unexpectedly small measure there, so that one might easily think of a larger scale." Böttcher, moreover, adduces against the measurement by rod which he calculates would give 40 German [about 900 English] square miles (?), i.e. almost the tenth of the whole land, the colossal disproportion to the statements elsewhere, especially as to the temple, which measures only 500 cubits square. Keil, on the other hand, maintains that ch. xlviii. with its proportions corresponds throughout to the τιμῆς of 25,000 rods in length and 10,000 rods in breadth. Comp. therefore ch. xlviii.—The breadth trends from north to south (ch. xlviii. 10).—Keil finds אֶלֶף עֶשְׂרֵה for 10,000 surprising, for which, he observes, עֶשְׂרֵה אֲלָפִים is constantly used in vers. 3, 5, and in ch. xlviii. He therefore prefers the 20,000 of the Sept., giving as additional reasons for this, that the part mentioned in ver. 3 is to be measured off from what was measured in ver. 1; also that the Levites of ver. 5 are to be considered, whose possession is likewise "Terumah of holiness" (ch. xlviii. 14 sq.), as is plain from other passages of our chapter; ver. 1 comprehends the land of the priests and of the Levites [25,000 and 20,000], which vers. 2 and 3 divide into two districts.—Finally, the character of the oblation, because to Jehovah, is again insisted on, and that in respect of all its border round about.

Ver. 2, after this general statement, marks off from the above-mentioned (מִן) the sanctuary described and measured in ch. xl., that is, the 500 cubits square forming the temple edifice, or, as Keil, in accordance with his view of ch. xlii. 15 sq.: the 500 square rods pertaining to the sacred enclosures of the temple. But as he adds: "there is still to be around this enclosure, which separates between the sacred and the common, a free space of fifty cubits on each side to keep the priests' dwellings from being built too near to the sacred square of the temple buildings," how, we ask, does he leave this latter entirely out of account!!—מִנְיָה, comp. on ch. xxvii. 28. "A free space of 50 cubits to a sanctuary of 500 rods would be much too small. It was evidently intended to be an interspace between the house of God and the houses of the priests" (HENGST.).—

Ver. 3. מִן הַמִּדְבָּרָה הָאֵלֶּה is not the same as מִנְיָה in

ver. 2; for if so, this distinct and different mode of expression would not have been chosen, which, as it refers to the measuring of the sanctuary, so it designates as the sanctuary the temple building, and not the "sacred enclosure of the temple." Keil needs 10,000 rods more in ver. 1, because he makes מִן הַמִּדְבָּרָה here = "this measured piece of land." מִן, as modified by הַמִּדְבָּרָה, which has had always hitherto to be translated "measure," denotes that from which the prophet has to take the measure, and is therefore entrusted with the "measuring" (מִמְדָּר, as it is expressly said); it had, indeed, been measured before him in ch. xl. The temple building, just referred to in ver. 2 as the principal part, is normal for the whole oblation, which as such is again referred to in Ver. 3, where also the centrality of the temple, already indicated by the phrase: and in it shall be the sanctuary, is distinctly denoted by the epithet: most holy, pointing to ch. xliii. 12. After that the holiness, the separation from the land for the holy purpose (for Jehovah, for His sanctuary) of the land of which the oblation-consists (הָאֵלֶּה), with (ver. 3) the sanctuary in it (inclusive of the courts), has been again insisted on. Ver. 4 treats now of the area in question in its relation to the priests, who, as hitherto (ch. xl. 46, xlii. 13, xlv. 15)—here, however, with a view to the sanctuary and its central position—are described, both as respects their official functions and their dwelling-places. Since they are such, since this is their official calling, it is befitting to assign to them the holiness from the land as a place for houses, explained in the clause following to be: a holy place for the sanctuary, so that this latter defines the priests' houses to be a dependency of the sanctuary, just as similarly in ch. xliii. 12 the whole was even called most holy (ver. 3 here). The last clause of the verse is commonly taken as indicating a second use for the area of the oblation, namely, for the temple, a superfluous repetition. The mention of houses is in harmony with the law, in which the thirteen cities for the priests (Josh. xxi.) likewise come into consideration simply as regards the houses in them. From that which is His own through the oblation Jehovah gives to the priests as His ministers, and as ministers of the sanctuary in the neighbourhood, the space necessary for dwellings (just as in ch. xlv. the necessities of life). This is an arrangement which doubtless is to be taken in connection with the entire division of the land, but differs from that laid down in Num. xxxv., so that it will have to be understood from the idea meant to be illustrated (Doct. Reflec. 19).

Still more surprising is the new arrangement in Ver. 5, where an area equal to that occupied by the sanctuary and priests' houses is assigned to the Levites as ministers of the house (ch. xlv. 11 sq.), without any farther description, while the priests were described (ver. 4) as ministers of the sanctuary, making thus a marked difference between them; and this distinction of the Levites is also marked by the phrase: to them for a possession; for the next verse goes on to speak likewise of a possession of the city, although this latter is "given" (comp. on the other hand ch.

xliv. 28, לָאֵלֶּה), and does not simply belong (יהיה), and לָאֵלֶּה stands evidently opposed to the מִמְדָּר of ver. 4. But this area will be different from the one demanded in general in ver. 1, although the Levites too belong to the ministers of the Lord, and the twenty chambers correspond very little to a special landed possession of the extent mentioned. Keil includes the land of the Levites in ver. 1; but indeed with his 20,000 rods in breadth there, of which 10,000 fall to the priests and the sanctuary, he has still a breadth of 10,000 rods left for the Levites. Hengst. on the other hand says: "Along with the priests the Levites receive a portion of land of like extent; then follows the district of the holy city with the same length, and a breadth of 5000 cubits; so that the whole portion marked off in advance for priests, Levites, and city is in breadth as in length 25,000 cubits."—Instead of יְהִי, the Qeri reads: יְהִי. —The words עָשְׂרִים לְשָׁבֳתָה formed a difficulty to the LXX., who perhaps imagined the text to be עָשְׂרִים לְשָׁבֳתָה. The chambers, instead of the thirty-five Levitical cities of Moses with pasturage, form, as regards the expression, no difficulty; they are very suitable diminutives of the "houses" of the priests. The priests have houses, the Levites as inferiors only chambers, which possibly may mean ranges of cells (ROSEN M.) or courts, with one-twentieth of the pasturage for each. Keil, who cannot understand the Masoretic text, and holds עָשְׂרִים to be a corruption of עָשְׂרִים, reads:

לְשָׁבֳתָה, by which, however, he obtains only "gates (!) as dwellings" for the Levites, understanding indeed the "gates" as equivalent in meaning to cities. Hengst. calls them the barracks of the Levites; the departure from the ordinance of Moses, according to which the Levites dwelt scattered through the whole land, is so much the more surprising.

Ver. 6. The land of the Levites could be properly oblation only if it were the same portion of land as that of the priests and the sanctuary, or if the reading in ver. 1 be 20,000 rods in breadth. Hence Hengst. limits the oblation to the sanctuary and the priests' portion. Only "in the wider sense" does he make it include also the portion of the Levites and the circuit of the city; it may include even the portion of the prince (he says), "since the prince acts as the minister of God." The structure of the clause in ver. 5 speaks in favour of a special area of 10,000 in breadth as Levites' land; and so does the consideration that by such a possession in land the so much greater number of cities than of priests' cities, which according to the ordinance of Moses belonged to them, is perhaps given expression to. Comp. besides on ch. xlviii. 20. But however much the definition in ver. 5: to them for a possession, indicates a special pec-

tion of Levites' land outside of the Terumah ("oblation") demanded in ver. 1, yet the possession of the city lies still farther outside, as likewise הַתְּחִינִי seems to separate it even from the land of the Levites. The city is the capital of the land. Its area has the same length as that hitherto given (25,000), but differs in breadth, which therefore is mentioned first; we have in this respect $10,000 + 10,000 + 5000 = 25,000$. The possession of the city "is to be distinguished from the city itself, which (ch. xlviii. 16) is square, the length being equal to the breadth" (HENGST.). The length of this possession runs along the oblation of holiness, by which designation is meant specially the land of the priests and the sanctuary. Its destined purpose, for the whole house of Israel, shows that it is to belong to no single tribe merely. Comp. ch. xlviii.

The transition to לְיִשְׂרָאֵל in Ver. 7 is mediated by the whole house of Israel in ver. 6, of which the prince is the civil head and representative.—Either a kind of protasis to which Ver. 8 forms the apodosis, or we may supply: "ye shall give," from ver. 6: כִּי־הוּא־עָלֶיךָ = on both sides, so that the oblation of holiness, which certainly may here include the land of the Levites, and the possession of the city lie between, running before these from north to south, so that seen from the west side what is westward as far as the Mediterranean Sea, seen from the east side what lies east as far as the Jordan is to belong to the prince; just as וְהָיָה explains that as to the length, that is from west to east, the territory shall run the same length with one, i.e. any one of the portions of the tribes, shall neither go beyond nor fall short of any single tribal portion. Jerome remarks that the prince received for himself a whole tribal portion, with the exclusion, however, of the land of the sanctuary, the priests, the Levites, and the city; but in return he has not only the duty of protecting the square in question, but also the honour of possessing on his territory whatever is holy pertaining to the nation.—Ver. 8. לְיִשְׂרָאֵל, more exactly defined by לְאֶרֶץ־יִשְׂרָאֵל: the land described in ver. 7 shall be the land assigned to him for a possession in Israel. The reason for this arrangement follows: לְאֶרֶץ. The former state of things, in which no landed possession, no crown estate, was allotted to them qua princes, had tempted them to misuse of their power, to acquire for themselves possessions.—My princes corresponds to My people; hence those who will in future have princely power over the people. This My applied to both parties contains at the same time the divine sentence on the former princes, who may be considered persons as little conscious of their high and responsible position as of the significance of Israel. Instead of taking to themselves, they are rather to give to the house of Israel, that is, to leave in possession, and also, if need be, to restore. The phrase: according to their tribes, shows what land is meant. [FAIRBAIRN: "That the whole ground for the priesthood, the prince, and the people of the city was to form together a square, betokened the perfect harmony and agreement which should subsist between these different classes, as well as the settled order and stability which should distinguish the sacred commonwealth, in which they held the highest place. That the priest's food were to occupy what was emphatically holy ground, was a symbol of the singular degree of holiness which should characterize those who stood in their official position the nearest to the Lord. And that the prince was to have a separate possession assigned him was to cut off all occasion for his lawlessly interfering with the possessions of the people, and to exhibit the friendly bearing and upright administration which was to be expected of him (ver. 8). And not only must he personally abstain from all oppressive behaviour, but as the divinely constituted head of a righteous commonwealth, he must take effective measures for establishing justice and judgment throughout the whole. Particular examples are given of this in regard to the using of just weights and measures in the transactions of business (vers. 9-12)."

—W. F.]—Ver. 9 concludes what specially regards the princes, by whose conduct in good and in bad a mirror and example was held up to the people, while at the same time it solemnly introduces the more general regulations which follow in regard to judgment and justice in trade and commerce.—The subject in ch. xlv. 6 was the people with reference to the priesthood, here it is the prince in reference to the people; as there holiness and sanctification, so here judgment and justice. (Jerome interprets רַב: let this tribe-like possession suffice you!) What has already taken place far too often is now so much the more enough, as all natural temptation has been taken away by the assigning of domains (ver. 7 sq.).—שָׁרֵן (שָׁרֵן) is virtually the same as הָקָם, a violent mode of acting, misuse of power, only stronger, because the consequence thereof: "devastation," is implied in the word, as in the corresponding justice the exercise of judgment is manifested. Hengstenberg thinks: the direct address shows that representatives or descendants of the princes who had formerly committed injustice were also in exile.—וְהָיָה is expulsion of the lawful possessor from his property, as in 1 Kings xxi.—The burden which this was to the community, the pressure which thereby was inflicted on Israel, is depicted in the words: הָרִיבֵם מֵעַל.

"The political parties especially," observes Hengstenberg, "gave occasion for the confiscations." Comp. besides, 1 Sam. viii. 14.

Vers. 10-12. Justice in Common Life.

The transition which is made by Ver. 10 shows what an example for the community the conduct of the prince may be in evil and ought to be in good.—("Princes have in all times attempted to take advantage of their subjects by alteration of coinage and weights," PHILIPSON.)—מִאֲזַיִם, dual, denotes the two scales of the balance, from אָזַן, "to make ready," "to fix;" in reference to the way this can be done, "to weigh," to determine the weight.—מִיָּדָה (מִיָּדָה), according to Josephus' statement in Greek, a measure about the same as a Berlin bushel [about $1\frac{1}{2}$ bushels English]; see Geseu. Lexicon. In the same way as the ephah for dry goods, the בַּת was used for liquids, as Delitzsch observes on Isa. v. 10. This measure occurs first in the days of the kings, and from Josephus' calculation it might contain somewhat more than 33 Berlin quarts [about 7 gallons English].—Ver. 11 now begins to discuss what is right as to measure (מִזְכָּר , pensum, Ex. v. 18), that which the ephah and bath are to represent, in order clearly to set forth exactness in trade and commerce as the divine characteristic of the people, as their holiness in ordinary life. Ver. 10 is expounded and illustrated by examples.—

together) shall be the measure, the norm, for ephah and bath, as the greatest dry goods measure, commonly called "cor" from the time of the kings, and (from Josephus) estimated at a little more than 15 Berlin pecks [about 600 English pints].—Ver. 12 proceeds to speak of the standard for money, the shekel. An exactly weighed and hence definite (small) pound of silver, called by the Rabbins "rock" in distinction from the gerah, which they called "little stone," is the oldest biblical standard of value, originally, in barter a weight, afterwards a coin, like the drachma among the Greeks and the as among the Romans. The value doubtless affixed by common agreement of the dealers to the ordinary shekel before the time of Moses cannot now be determined; but originating probably in Babylon, and coming through the Phenicians, the word meets us also in Greek (σικλος, σικλος).— גֶּרָה is what is "made small," hence grain as a small piece, like "grain" (a weight), from gratum; Gesenius supposes it to be the carob bean (καραύος), which the Greeks, Romans, and Arabians used as the smallest weight, in the same way as barley and pepper-corns have been so used,—the smallest biblical silver coin.—After the value of the shekel has been thus defined from the parts it contains (comp. Ex. xxx. 13; Lev. xxvii. 25; Num. iii. 47), there may perhaps, as Cocceius and J. D. Michaelis think, be three different kinds of shekel given, a larger, an intermediate, and a smaller. Hengstenberg better: "the maneh, probably of foreign origin, which explains its rare and late occurrence, is stated at a threefold value," according to its different worth in the several countries from which it came. The normal maneh = 20 shekels, corresponding to the 20 gerahs, stands first.— מָנֶה (1 Kings x. 17; Ezra ii. 69; Neh. vii. 71, 72), from a comparison of the first passage—in which Hengstenberg, indeed, prefers to read מָנֶה instead of מָנֶה —with 2 Chron. ix. 16, it appears that a maneh is equal to 100 shekels, a result usually reconciled with our passage by saying that civil shekels, that is, Mosaic half-shekels, are intended to be meant in 2 Chron. ix., since the בֶּקֶק in the course of time became as shekel

the widest spread large silver piece. But still 100 such shekels, or 50 Mosaic ones, by which

Ezekiel reckons, would not be $20 + 25 + 15$, the numbers given here, added together = 60 shekels; and besides, the three divisions and the putting of the 20 first remain unexplained! Hence Keil infers a very ancient corruption of the text. Hitzig, accepting like Hengstenberg three manehs, the only reasonable interpretation of the present text, supposes computation in gold, silver, and copper; that is, a gold, a silver, and a copper maneh. The Chaldee paraphrast, on the other hand, took the 60 shekels as the extraordinary value of the happy

Messianic age ($\text{וּמְנֵי רַבָּא קוֹדְשָׁא יְהִי לְכֵן}$). The interpretation of the LXX., accepted by Boeckh (Metrol. Untera.) and Bertheau (Gesch. der Isrl.), gives the following very insignificant proposition: The 5-shekel weight shall be to you 5 shekels, and the 10-shekel weight 10, and 50 shekels shall be a maneh.

Vers. 13-17. The Oblation of the People.

As formerly it was from the prince to the people, so now it is what the people have to render to the prince. The foregoing fixing of measures forms the transition, and the designation הַתְּרִמָּה in Ver. 13, taken from ver. 1 sq., is also an intermediate link. The oblation is offered to Jehovah as being set apart for purposes of worship. It is to be the sixtieth part of wheat and barley. שֵׁשְׁטִים , to divide into six parts, hence here: to take off the sixth part.—Ver. 14. חֹק הַשֶּׁכֶל is the ordinance of the oil, what the law of the oblation is to be in respect to the oil; namely, as explained by the apposition: הַבֵּית

הַשֶּׁכֶל , which Hengstenberg makes a parenthesis, and paraphrases thus: "the bath is the measure for the oil,"—the quantity taken from the bath of oil shall be the tenth part of it. The cor (1 Kings v. 2 [iv. 22]; 2 Chron. ii. 9 [10], xvii. 5), for dry goods and liquids, a post-Mosaic name of a measure; and hence it is not only added that the cor is ten baths, but also that it is the same as the homer, for ten baths (ver. 11) make a homer. [HENGST.: homer without doubt the native name; cor introduced from the Aramaic during or after the exile.] Thus the tenth of the bath is as regards the oil the hundredth part of the harvest.—Wine (specifically for the drink-offering) is not mentioned; small cattle however are—

Ver. 15—(the "oblation" in their case is to be one out of two hundred, and that one to come from fat pastures, to be well fed), but not oxen. The enumeration, says Keil, is not complete, but contains only the norm for levying the contributions; as Hengstenberg expresses himself: to serve as proof that the regulations here "do not bear the character of an actual tax," but are only by way of example and outline. Philippson remarks: "This impost appears intended to serve as substitute for the tithes prescribed by Moses, which are not mentioned here."— מִשְׁקָה is "a watered district," like Gen. xiii. 10; a significant allusion: Israel after their return to their own land will be as richly blessed as ever the valley of Jordan was before its devastation.

Ver. 16 consigns this oblation to the princes.—

יָרִי, they are to see to it that they render it.

The prince is hereby on the one hand enabled to provide for the service of worship, as on the other his representation of the people is made manifest. Hengstenberg holds the amount of this oblation to be too great, and barley moreover was not used in worship, unless we understand that "the other expenses for the general good" were to be included.—Ver. 17. Instead of לֶחֶם, which applies to all the people, we have now עֵל, that which concerns the prince only; on him it shall be incumbent. First, the things incumbent upon him are enumerated, and then is added what he has to do (הָרָאָה), namely, as is obvious from his very position, that he shall defray the material expenses of worship, and in so far perform it. He is indeed "governor of the feast," but not "officiator in presenting the atoning sacrifice on the feast days," with a priestly dignity, such as Umbreit attributes to him. יָרִי may simply be: cause to be done (ch. xlii.

2). Hävernick again well observes: "Thus there arises a beautiful contrast to the former state of matters. Instead of violent exactions, harsh oppression, infamous tyranny, and mutual injustice and disloyalty, comes a settled order of things, conscientious gifts of the people which are holy gifts. The prince appears as the theocratic head, who truly cares for the weal and safety of Israel, who supports in the liveliest and demands in the strongest manner the close communion of the people with their God; not only administering justice, but also caring for the most sacred interests of the people," etc.

Vers. 18-20. The Sin-offering in the First Month.

A solemn introduction: Thus saith, etc.—("Taking occasion from the thought in ver. 17, the prophet now portrays, as a new, solemn cycle of feasts begins in Israel, what also the prophets elsewhere announce regarding the sacred festivals in the Messianic period, e.g. Isa. lxvi. 23; Zech. xiv. 16," HÄV.) The whole mode of expression in Ver. 18, as well as the comparison of ch. xliii. 18 sq. (of the difference between that and this), and the connection with what follows,—all this compels us to reject the view given by Hengstenberg, that corresponding to the consecration of the altar of burnt-offerings, we have to regard the consecration of the sanctuary as a solemnity occurring only once. Hengstenberg compares the seven days' solemnity in the case of Solomon's temple (2 Chron. vii. 8), and the fresh consecration of the temple under Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix. 18 sq.), but especially the consecration of the tabernacle on the first day of the first month in Ex. xl. Besides what we have said already, the following consideration tells against this view. Surely we may suppose a difference between these sanctuaries built by men, like the altar of burnt-offerings (בְּיָמֵינוּ הַנִּשְׁלֹשָׁה), and the divine temple beheld by Ezekiel, when its consecration in this sense had already taken place by the coming in of the divine glory (ch. xliii. 2 sq.). The solemnity here ordained on the first and seventh days of the month (Nisan, ver. 21) is a yearly returning one, as is shown also by the reference in ver. 20 to continual recurrence. Num. xxviii. 11 sq. shows that the beginning of every month is to be solemnized, and Num. xxix. that there is to be additionally a special solemnity on the first day of the seventh month. On this comp. Ezek. xlii.—The cleansing of the sanctuary is effected here through a young bullock, instead of the goat prescribed by Moses for the new moon,—an augmentation of the sin-offering as to the victim, just as in Ver. 19 through the process which accomplishes the cleansing. The posts of the house (ch. xli. 21) refer to the sanctuary (ver. 18), without distinction in respect to its two divisions, the altar of burnt-offerings and the gate (doubtless collective for all the three gates, for if only the east gate were meant, specific mention of it would hardly be omitted) of the inner court.—Ver. 20, however, explains in direct terms that this cleansing of the sanctuary on the first and seventh days of the first month takes place from the ground (כֶּן), the cause which, in view of the holiness of the house, may be found in אִשָּׁה שָׁגָה, that is: the erring, frail man, and פְּתִי, either: folly, or, abstr. pro concreto: the fool (properly, the man open to every impression, easily led astray). The two designations are distinguished as actus and potentia, the occasional act and the natural disposition; but it has been rightly remarked that both denote sins of weakness. [Keil wrongly interprets כֶּן: "from,

away from," setting him free from his sin; for this neither agrees with the immediately following וְכִפְּרָתָם אֶת־הַבַּיִת, nor can it be found in the וְכִן תִּקְשָׁה, which refers back to ver. 19.] "Thus shall the year, newly consecrated by such a beginning, most truly present the appearance of a holy year. At the same time this is the preparation for the feast of the passover in ver. 21" (HÄV.). Since the great day of atonement (Lev. xvi. 16 sq.) had the same end in view as the very expressive and augmented solemnity ordained here on the first day of the month, the single yearly day of atonement is otherwise quite passed over, and thus there is ground for the opinion that the solemnity here is meant to express the idea of the day of atonement for the worship of the future.

Vers. 21-25. The Passover and the Feast of Tabernacles.

Ver. 21. The chief fundamental feast of Israel, the beginning of the feast-cycle, as afterwards its close, so that with the passover and the feast of tabernacles the whole circle of feasts in the narrower sense is either embraced (HÄV.), or decreed as the annual feasts of the future (KEIL). Comp. the original institution of the feast of the passover in Ex. xii.—חַג שִׁבְעֹת, to which is here added

יָמִים, is: feast of seven days, because it always lasted seven days (comp. Num. xxviii. 17), so that the "continuous" feast is denoted, but not, as HENGST.: "in contrast to the feast of consecration," but rather implying that in this con-nction recurring feasts are spoken of. The old translations render the designation simply: "a feast of seven days"; the addition: ימים, will at least distinguish it as seven-dayed from the "feast of weeks" (חַג שָׁבֻעוֹת), celebrated later at the close of harvest. Kliefoth, on the other hand, supposes that in future the passover will be held as a feast of seven weeks, which lasts seven weeks; and so not merely the seven days of unleavened bread, but the whole seven weeks will be passover—the feast of weeks shall be one with the passover. The ordinance regarding the מצות relates (he holds) to the whole seven weeks up to the feast of first-fruits. See the refutation of this in Keil on the passage. The seven days of the feast in ver. 23 also tell very plainly what is meant. Comp. on Dent. xvi.—Ver. 22 exhibits the prince in the charge imposed upon him (הַיּוֹם הַזֶּה, here הַיּוֹם הַזֶּה) — הַיּוֹם הַזֶּה is the above-mentioned fourteenth day of the first month, the feast-day proper (הַפֶּסַח), on the evening of which the paschal lamb was slain and eaten.—The sin-offering precedes, whereas in Num. xxviii. it follows after. In this way the idea of the day of atonement pervades also the passover of the future (for himself and for the whole people of the land). The victim, too, of the sin-offering on the first feast-day proper is not a goat, but a bullock! For the seven following days of the mazzoth there are ordained—Ver. 23—as a burnt-offering, instead of the two bullocks of Moses, seven bullocks, and instead of the one ram in the law, here seven rams, all without blemish, זָכוֹת, "for the day," each of the seven days; and only the one goat as daily sin-offering is retained from the law of Moses. This enhancement of the feast-offerings, 49 bullocks and 49 rams as burnt-offering, is additional proof of an element which has already repeatedly shown itself, to wit, Israel's state of grace for the future. In reference to the passover Hengstenberg observes: "That precisely the grace of redemption sealed by this festival was to receive so rich an accession by the events of the future." The seven lambs of the first year ordained in the law are omitted by Ezekiel; we might say, because the Lamb of God, who is the fulfilment of this feast, will be sufficient in the Messianic times. But, as only befits the symbolized idea meant to be made prominent, the meat-offering—Ver. 24—accompanying the burnt-offering surpasses even the measure of the latter. In the law there are to each bullock only three-tenths of an ephah of flour mingled with oil, two-tenths to the ram, and only one-tenth to each of the seven lambs; here a whole ephah, namely of flour, is appointed for each bullock and each ram, finally of oil one קָה (ch. iv. 11).

Ver. 25 describes the feast of tabernacles, the feast (חַג) falling on the 15th day of the 7th month, so designated because not expressed by name. Keil and Kliefoth assign as the reason for its not being named: "without doubt because the dwelling in tabernacles will for the future be discontinued." What the prince has to perform in this feast is, as to time (seven days) and kinds of offering, the same as in the passover. Hengstenberg excepts from this similarity the number of victims. Comp. Num. xxix. 13 sq. But the definition: as meat-offering, leaves us to suppose for the rest also nothing but a matter relative to number and measure, and Hengstenberg's solicitude about the passover as "the root of all feasts," seems in the case of such a comparison as is made here to overlook the fact that the number of victims, which indeed daily decreased, was far more signal and greater in the Mosaic feast of tabernacles; moreover, the eighth day, as concluding feast with its special offerings, is, as Keil observes, wanting here. Hävernick farther observes: "The sacred number seven dominates here both in the passover and in the offerings of the feast of tabernacles. The gradual decrease of the number of victims in the latter, explained by Bähr as a gradual decrease of the festal character of the seven feast-days, receives a fresh confirmation. Here, namely, an equal number of victims is appointed for every day. The distinction between the feasts themselves thereby almost disappears. Each day comes forth in its proper and symmetrical holiness. The sacred number seven pervades the whole cycle of feasts. The defective and imperfect character of the ancient mode gives place to a higher and more perfect form."

["As it was more especially in connection with the stated and yearly festivals that the prince had to represent the people in the public service of God, so the prophet takes a rapid glance of these, and refers particularly to the first and the last. But he first mentions a consecration service with which the year was always to begin, and of which no mention whatever was made in the law (vers. 18-20). On the first and again on the seventh day of the first month, the sanctuary was always to be cleansed, that the year might be commenced in sacredness, and that all might be in preparation for the feast of the passover on the fourteenth day of the month. As the prophet has introduced a new solemnity before the passover, so for the passover itself he appoints quite different sacrifices from those named by Moses; instead of one ram and seven lambs for the daily burnt-offering, he has seven bullocks and seven rams; and the meat-offerings also vary. And while there were quite peculiar offerings prescribed in the law for the feast of tabernacles, constantly diminishing as the days of the feast proceeded; here, on the other hand, the prophet appoints the same as in the case of the passover. This shows how free a use was made by the prophet of the Old Testament ritual, and how he only employed it as a cover for the great spiritual truths he sought to unfold. They were not permanently fixed and immutable things, he virtually said, those external services of Judaism, as if they had an absolute and independent value of their own, so that precisely those and no other should be thought of; they were all symbolical of the spiritual and eternal truths of God's kingdom, and may be variously adjusted, as is now done, in order to make them more distinctly expressive of the greater degree of holiness and purity that is in future times to distinguish the people and service of God over all that has been in the past."—FAIRBAIRN'S Ezekiel, pp. 485, 486.—W. F.]

CHAPTER XLVI.

1 Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: The gate of the inner court that looketh toward the east shall be shut the six working days; and on the Sabbath day 2 it shall be opened, and on the day of the new moon it shall be opened. And the prince cometh the way of [to] the porch of the gate from without, and will stand at the post of the gate; and the priests offer up his burnt-offering and his peace-offerings; and he worships at the threshold of the gate, and 3 will go out; and the gate shall not be shut until the evening. And the people of the land worship at the door of this gate in the Sabbaths and in 4 the new moons before Jehovah. And the burnt-offering which the prince shall offer to Jehovah on the Sabbath day is six lambs without blemish, and 5 a ram without blemish. And the meat-offering [shall be] an ephah for the ram, and for the lambs the meat-offering [shall be] what his hand gives, and 6 oil a hin to the ephah. And on the day of the new moon without blemish a bullock—a young steer, and six lambs and a ram; without blemish shall 7 they be. And an ephah for the bullock and an ephah for the ram shall he make the meat-offering, and for the lambs so much as his hand will attain 8 to, and oil a hin to the ephah. And when the prince cometh he shall come the way of the porch of the gate, and by the same way shall he go out.
 9 And when the people of the land come before Jehovah in the set times, he that cometh the way of the north gate to worship shall go out the way of the south gate, and he that cometh the way of the south gate shall go out the way of the north gate; he shall not return the way of the gate by which 10 he came, but they shall go out each straight before him. And the prince shall come in their midst; when they come and when they go out, they shall 11 go out [together]. And in the feasts and in the set times the meat-offering shall be an ephah for the bullock and an ephah for the ram, and for the 12 lambs what his hand gives, and oil a hin to the ephah. And when the prince shall offer a free-will offering, burnt-offering, or peace-offering, as a free-will offering to Jehovah, then one opens to him the gate that looketh toward the east, and he offers his burnt-offering and his peace-offering, as he will do on the Sabbath day; and he goeth out, and one shuts the door after 13 his going out. And a lamb a year old without blemish shalt thou daily 14 offer as a burnt-offering to Jehovah; every morning shalt thou offer it. And a meat-offering shalt thou offer with it every morning, the sixth of an ephah, and oil the third of a hin, to moisten the fine flour,—a meat-offering to 15 Jehovah, ordinances perpetual, continual. And they offer the lamb and the meat-offering and the oil every morning, as a continual burnt-offering.
 16 Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: When the prince shall give a gift to one of his sons, it [is] his inheritance, to his sons shall it be [become], their possession 17 as an inheritance. And when he shall give a gift from his inheritance to one of his servants, then it is his until the year of freedom, when it returns to 18 the prince; only his inheritance of his sons shall belong to them. And the prince shall not take of the people's inheritance to thrust them out of their possession; from his own possession he may endow his sons, that My people 19 be not scattered every man from his possession. And he brought me, in the entry which was at the side of the gate, to the chambers of holiness, to the priests, that look toward the north; and, behold, there was a place on the 20 hinder side westward. And he said to me, This is the place where the priests shall boil the guilt-offering and the sin-offering, where they shall bake the meat-offering, so as not to bring it forth to the outer court, to sanctify 21 the people. And he brought me forth to the outer court, and made me pass on to the four corners of the court, and, behold, in each corner of the court 22 was a court. In the four corners of the court were smoking courts, forty [cubits] long and thirty [cubits] broad; one measure was to them to the four

23 corner-rooms. And a range was round about in them, round about the four 24 of them, and cooking-places were made under the ranges round about. And he said to me: These are the house of the cooks, where the ministers of the house shall boil the slain-offering of the people

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

Ver. 1-12. The Prince and People at Sacrifice.

Ch. xlv. 1 sq. treated of the outer east gate, while here the inner east gate comes into consideration. There the prince appears as sitting feasting upon the offerings; here he is viewed as standing, in accordance with his duty of offering. Both passages accord to him precedence of the people. In Keil's view the two passages supplement each other in this way, that we have here the exceptions to the rule there. But ch. xlv. permits no exception in regard to the shutting of the gate (comp. on ch. xliii. 5, also xlvii. 2); and besides, it is the outer gate that is spoken of there, whereas here it is the inner. If one is to call it a case of supplementing, he can say: whereas ch. xlv. shuts the outer east gate always, the inner east gate also, according to our passage, should as a rule be shut; the Sabbath day and the day of the new moon are to form the exceptions.—Ver. 2. We are told in ch. xlv. how the prince arrives at the outer gate, namely, by the way of the porch of the gate (פֶּרֶךְ הָרֶחַל); that same way, only in respect to the inner east gate,—which, however, as we have seen on ch. xl. 31, has its porch likewise turned to the outer court,—the prince comes here also, so that פֶּרֶךְ הָרֶחַל means just the same as פֶּרֶךְ הָרֶחַל (ch. xlv. 3): from the outer court, into which he entered by the north or south gate. פֶּרֶךְ הָרֶחַל only makes the gate intended, but not expressly named in ver. 2, more plain as the inner gate, the gate that leads into the inner court. Hengst. takes it as: “without,” “beyond”; he makes the prince proceed through the opened door of the inner east gate as far as its threshold and post; not pass through the porch, but remain standing on this side of it, beyond the gate-opening, but close by it, on the threshold between the gate-opening and the porch. Keil, again, understands פֶּרֶךְ הָרֶחַל as meaning from outside of the temple through the outer east gate. Ewald makes as correction in ver. 1 the gate of the “outer” court.] The mention again of the east gate repeats, in reference to the prince, the distinction conferred upon him in ch. xlv. It is, however, rather a distinction from the people, or a distinction of the people in his person, than a distinguishing approximation of the prince to the priests. Compare with what is here said Solomon's probably pulpit-like brazen scaffold, on which he knelt, and which thus was situated before the altar of burnt-offering in the inner court (2 Chron. vi. 13); likewise 2 Kings xi. 14, xxiii. 3; 2 Chron. xxiii. 13, xxxiv. 31. According to the passage before us, the position even of the prince inside of the environs of the temple suffers a noteworthy modification. A definite, fixed, elevated standing place, a suggestus for the bearer of princely power at the entrance into the inner court, as occupied since Solomon by the pre-exile kings, is no longer spoken of. The king of the future is the Messiah; the princedom shines in His light (Doct. Reflec. 14), in the brightness of the glory that entered through the east gate, which in view thereof is shut for ever toward the outside, and it (namely, the east gate) is temporarily opened only toward the interior, to be shut again at even. The Messianic idea dominates the modification of the prerogative of the possession derived from the pre-exile kingdom within the architectonic symbolism of the theocracy. Hengst. says: “What is treated of here is not merely a subordination of the prince to God; there is also as regards worship a sharp line drawn between prince and priest.” Hävernick observes: “As on the one hand the prince is unreservedly acknowledged in his special exaltation, so on the other his rights appear in due limitation, in reference to encroachment of any kind on the priestly prerogatives. With regard to this, a position is assigned to him at the post of the gate leading to the inner court, on the threshold of the gate, hence at the head of the people, yet not in the priests' court proper." While he stands, the priests "do" what the prince cannot do, but must cause to be done by them. וְהָיָה (שָׁחָה) וְהָיָה (שָׁחָה),

"to bow"), Hithp. with הָ as reduplication of the third radical, reflexive.—And will go out by the way that he came (ch. xlv. 3). As what has been said invests the prince with privileges only above the people, Ver. 3 fixes the people's place at worship. בְּתָרָה [HENGST.: "opposite the opened door, through which they catch a glimpse of the altar of burnt-offering, which the prince—this is the only difference (? he enters the inner east gate, however)—sees from a nearer point"] is, according to Klief., equivalent to: through the opening of the gate, inasmuch as the people before the outer east gate have to look at the temple through it, and also through the inner gate (comp. ver. 9). The arrangement intimates that the people shall worship outside of the threshold of the inner east gate, the gate spoken of (הַבָּיְתָה).

Ver. 4. The Sabbath-offerings to be brought and offered by the prince are instead of: two lambs of the first year without blemish for a burnt-offering, and two-tenth deals of flour and oil for a meat-offering and drink-offering (Num. xxviii. 9); in future: three times as many lambs and a ram besides.—Ver. 5. This increase of offerings extends also to the meat-offering: an ephah for the ram (ch. xlv. 24). This may, and doubtless does, imply a proportionate increase with respect to the lambs likewise; כִּמְתֵּן יָדָיו, however, which does not necessarily mean the same as the formula in ver. 7, expresses free-willingness as the other element in the ordinance. A range of freedom along with the obligation, as HENGST., is not, however, so much the thought here, as, on the one hand, greater richness and splendour, which on the other presupposes a liberal and munificent disposition in the individual. "The disposition has become changed; with the greater blessings, demands higher than hitherto present themselves. But the more the amount to be spent is left to the free will of the individual, the more of zeal and faithfulness is presupposed" (HÄV.).—Ver. 6. The new-moon offerings, on the contrary, show a decrease; namely, instead of: two bullocks, one ram, seven lambs (Num. xxviii. 11 sq.), we have here only: one bullock, one ram, six lambs. Hengst., indeed, disputes this; the number of bullocks, he says, "is left to the free judgment, only it may not fall short of the two required by the law." In support of this view he takes כָּל as collective

(an "ideal unity"), and appeals to the plural תִּמְחִים, which certainly cannot be interpreted as referring to the frequent recurrence of the feast. (According to Keil, it is a "blunder of the transcriber" for תִּמְחִים.) Not only one bullock and one ram, however, but also the goat for the sin-offering (Num. xxviii. 15) is wanting here.—

Ver. 7. The increase appears to be retained only through the meat-offering (comp. ch. xlv. 24), and to be expressed by the formula: כְּמִשְׁכֵּן יָדָיו, which takes as measure, not the free will, like ver. 5, but ability (Lev. xiv. 30).

In order to pass over from Sabbaths and new moons to other seasons of worship, Ver. 8 first repeats what has been said in ver. 2. בְּדִרְכּוֹ = by the same way.—Ver. 9. Keil notices as a distinction from ver. 3, that there the people were spoken of "only incidentally" ("provided some of them came"), since they were "not bound to come on Sabbaths and new moons." Such a distinction, however, would require to be more definitely noted. In reality, Ezekiel as much supposes the people coming in ver. 3 as here, where the coming and going of individuals (הַבָּיְתָה) is expressly mentioned. Something similar to Deut. xvi. 16 is not exactly expressed here. The most that can be said is, that בְּמִקְוֵי (this is what makes the distinction from ver. 3)—כֹּוֹנֵן (יָעַן) the set time and assembling of the community—the coming and going of the people, might make more of a through, so that here the relative rank of people and prince, expressed in ver. 3, is not so much regarded, but care is taken for due order in the temple; and while in vers. 2, 3 the prince was distinguished from the people, here he and they are taken together. [FAIRBAIRN: "At the great festivals the prince was to depart from the state of isolation which it was proper for him to observe at other times, and at the head of the people join in the great throng of worshippers that were to pass through the temple courts from one side to another. It reminds us of David, who in this was doubtless the exemplar in the eye of the prophet: 'I had gone with the multitude, I went with them to the house of God, with the voice of joy and praise, with a multitude that kept holy-day.' A beautiful picture of a religious people: the highest in rank freely mingling with the mass of worshippers, and inspiring their devotions by the elevating influence of his presence and example."—W. F.] ("The reason of the regulation in ver. 9 can only be a theological one, that each should go out of the sanctuary another man than he came in (Phil. iii. 13); to avoid a throng, all must have been obliged to go in by the same gate, and out by the opposite one."—HENGST.) Hengst. renders בְּמִקְוֵי here: "in the feast seasons;"

in ver. 11: "on the feast days;" in order to assure himself of the continuance of the great day of atonement; and hence he renders בְּתִנִּים: "on the joyous feasts." Keil makes מִקְוֵי comprehend

"Sabbaths, new moons, and the day of atonement, all the seasons and days sanctified to the Lord." This in itself cannot be disputed, but in the connection here in Ezekiel may be very questionable. Keil at all events overthrows by this his own distinction of vers. 9 and 10 from ver. 3, which rests on the ground that vers. 9 and 10 speak of the high feasts, at which every one has to appear. בְּמִקְוֵי in ver. 9 points rather to the two days appointed for the first month, ch. xlv. 18, 20.—Since mention is made of two ways of coming,

the singular Qeri (קֵרִי) must be rejected.—Ver.

10, very suitably for the two days of the first month, views the prince and people together. Here, too, the Qeri is to be rejected; קֵרִי are prince and people. Hengstenberg rightly compares Ps. xlii. 5 [4].—Ver. 11 introduces the "feasts" strictly so called (see ch. xlv. 21 and 25) in addition to the "set seasons" (ch. xlv. 18, 20); but, as the statement of the meat-offering shows, the מִנְחָה are chiefly meant, for as to the feasts comp. the meat-offering ordained in ch. xlv. 24 sq., while the lambs are explained from ver. 6 of our chapter, which tells of those for the new moon. Hence what is there mentioned for burnt-offering must hold good also in ch. xlv. 18-20, and likewise the meat-offering here, for which comp. ver. 7 of our chapter. While the formula there measures according to ability, the one here expresses also that which corresponds to free-will, and this the more appropriately as free-will offerings are treated of in what follows.—Ver. 12. נִדְּכָה (Ps. cx. 3), from נָדַךְ, "to impel," is the peculiar inward impulse, the joyful readiness for good and for all sacrifices which comes from the Spirit of God (Ps. li. 14 [12]). The expression is used, as of the impulse originally, so of that to which one feels himself impelled, of the gift, and especially of the sacrifice to which a man was bound by no vow (Lev. xxii. 23). The repetition in our verse of this element makes it specially prominent. [FAIRBAIRN: "To show that his worship was not merely of a public and official nature, that it should spring from a heart truly alive to divine things, and itself delighting in fellowship with God, the prophet passes from those holiday services to the voluntary offerings and the daily morning sacrifice, which the prince was also to present to the Lord. In a word, the proper head of a religious people, he was to surpass them all, and be an example to them all, in the multitude and variety of his acts of homage and adoration."—W. F.] Keil observes on the modified regulation in regard to opening and shutting the gate, as compared with ver. 2, that the free-will offering could be brought on any day of the week; Hengst. points to the distinction that "in the free-will offering the prince appears as an individual, in the Sabbath-offering as the representative of the people."

Vers. 13-15. The Daily Sacrifice.

Ver. 13. The address to the people (תְּהִלָּה), where hitherto we have had to do with the prince, and the comparison of what was imposed on him in ch. xlv. 17, make it probable that the daily sacrifice is to be "an affair of the community," which "the priests have to provide" (KEIL). "Yet," observes Hengstenberg, "the conclusion is not certain; the transition from the prince to the people is an easy one, since in the foregoing passage also the prince represents the people. Ch. xlv. 18-20 likewise began with the address to the people, and undoubtedly the close here corresponds to the beginning there; the prince is encompassed on both sides by the people." According to Num. xxviii. 8 sq., two such lambs were to be offered daily for a burnt-offering, namely, one in the morning and the other in the evening. The more exact statement here: בֶּבֶקֶר בֶּבֶקֶר, that it shall be done every morning, either abolishes the evening burnt-offering (KEIL), or silently supposes it (HENGST.). The aim is, corresponding to ch. xlv. 18 sq., a similar sanctification of the commencement of the day as of that of the month and year; hence the sanctification of the whole of time in all its divisions, in distinction, perhaps, from the significance of the evening for Israel (Ex. xii. 6). If the evening sacrifice is to be discontinued, the increase of the meat-offering every morning in Ver. 14 (compared with Num. xxviii. 5, one-tenth of an ephah and one-fourth of a hin) perhaps comes into consideration for the deficit. לָרֶם, from רָסַם, "to rend," to scatter, to sprinkle. HENGST. and KEIL: to moisten.—סָלַח, probably from סָלַח (but of doubtful signification; MEIER: to split, to widen; GESEN.: to lift up, to oscillate), is the finest wheat meal. The plural חֲקִיתָ refers both to the burnt-offering in ver. 13, and the meat-offering here. The significance of such a solemnity every morning is emphasized by the תְּהִלָּה strengthening the עֹלֶם, for which, with Hitzig, Lev. xxiii. 14, 21, 31 is to be compared.—Ver. 15. Keil takes תְּהִלָּה as imperative; it is preterite with yav.

The Qeri reads the imperfect.—Again the emphatic תְּהִלָּה. ("That which is to be done daily forms a contrast to the festivities; it is to be acknowledged and honoured in due dignity and significance as a perpetual burnt-offering," HÄV.) HENGST.: "We move here entirely on the realm of Old Testament worship, and there is not the slightest (?) indication that, by the sacrifice of bulls, lambs, and goats, other forms of worship are here denoted. Even if the details were only colouring and means of representation, yet an intimation in regard to the whole should not be wanting" (neither is it wanting, it is manifest throughout the whole and in every part!) "if the announcement were to extend to a time when, by the offered sacrifice of Christ, a total revolution in the worship was produced. This is certainly correct; although the prophecy refers primarily to the restoration of the Old Testament worship, and in this respect has long ago found its fulfilment, and indeed a fulfilment that has long disappeared again,—the disappearance was proclaimed by the word of Christ: Behold, your house is left unto you desolate;—yet at the same time it conceals in the details the kernel of a general truth,—the imperishability of the worship in the community of God on earth, which is demonstrated among other things also by this, that as the worship here predicted had to perish by the Roman destruction, the worship in the Christian Church rose again gloriously." Any misunderstanding, as if Ezekiel should have predicted the Roman or Greek-Catholic worship, or a new evangelical worship of kindred form, might have been obviated by the consideration, that in everything here relative to the service of the temple of the future, the object aimed at is to give to the idea an expression as distinct as possible, although in terms of the Old Testament, and so in a symbolizing prophetic form, here specially to the idea, that whereas the Church Militant is a teaching church, the Church Triumphant of eternity (עולם תמיד) will on the contrary be a liturgic one; as also the so much debated question of constitution will be overcome, because solved.

Vers. 16-24. Appendices:—Vers. 16-18. The Right of the Prince as regards the Disposal of his Property.—Vers. 19-24. The Sacrificial Kitchens.

Just as supplementary matter to the temple building is appended in ch. xli. 15 sq. in the transition to the service of the temple, so we have here a supplementary statement in reference to the prince and the priests,—the former as the procurer and defrayer of the material of worship, the latter as the persons formally celebrating it, after the order of worship was finished in the foregoing.

Vers. 16-18. The Prince and his Possession.

Ver. 16. 'זה-אמר expressly introduces what follows as a divine ordinance, and not the fancy of the prophet; and this connects itself with that which was assigned to the prince in ch. xlv. 8 as his "possession in Israel." As we know from that passage, reference is made here too to the former despotic regime. When Hengstenberg says that "the prophet does not set himself up as a lawgiver, but only seeks to give a representation of the thought that the princes of the future are to be no despots, are to beware of the unjust absolutism of the princes of the past," it is clear, and Hengstenberg cannot deny it, that an ideal future is kept in view. But the ideality of the whole Old Testament is the future of the Messiah. Hengstenberg, indeed, observes quite correctly: "The prince cannot be Christ. He is one who may have several sons of his own body; who in the prospect of his death disposes of his property; who does not stand beyond the region of sin, else he should not need to be warned against it." The concession in respect of one of his sons preserves the character of the princely possession; it becomes an inheritance, but it remains in the princely family. Hengstenberg connects נחלתו with the principal clause, and makes the suffix refer to the prince: "this shall become his inheritance (surely: his possession, which in this case he bequeaths) to his sons." It is more natural to connect it with מנכני, and to make the suffix refer to the prince's son in question: the inheritance shall be his, bequeathed to him by his father (comp. on ver. 18); and this is confirmed by the immediately following clause, which does not generalize, so that, with Keil, the suffix in לנכני should now revert to the prince; but his sons are the sons of the just-mentioned prince's son, and the idea of the נחלתו is only farther carried out: it shall be their possession, so that it can be bequeathed (נחלה) to their sons also.—Ver. 17. The idea of "inheritance" remains the key-note as formerly, so that the farther concession in respect of a meritorious or favourite, servant of the prince does not indeed forbid a present to the servant in land from that which the prince possesses as hereditary property, but yet alienation and so lessening of the crown estates is guarded against by the limitation: until the year of freedom. דרור (from דרר), which denotes free outflowing (Ex. xxx. 23), is free motion in general, freedom, as the year of jubilee is consequently named in Lev. xxv. 10, 13. The reversion is the same as in the case of an Israelitish heritable landed possession, when it passes by sale to another.—The meaning of the phrase: only his inheritance of his sons, is clear from the foregoing: only what the prince has presented to his sons from his inheritance shall remain to them. [KEIL: "only his inheritance is it (!); as regards his sons, to them it shall belong."—Ver. 18. That which is to be preserved in the case of the prince, is also to be preserved for the people: inheritance in their case as in his. ינה, "to oppress," in general, hence: to exercise violence, to treat one with violence (ch. xviii. 7 sq., xlv. 8), here with כן.—On פני, comp. ch. xxxiv. (1 Sam. viii. 14, xxii. 7).

Vers. 19-24. The Sacrificial Kitchens for Priests and People.

Ewald inserts this section after ch. xlii. 13, 14, as he does the preceding ch. xlv. between vers. 8 and 9. The prophet, who has not changed his standing-place since ch. xlv. 4 sq., is brought to the חֲסִינֹת described in ch. xlii. 1 sq. (which comp.).—On מַבְחֹת, comp. on ch. xlii. 9.—As the chambers in question are the priests', Hengst. explains the appositional phrase: to the priests, as in Roman Catholic countries one may say, for example: "to the Carmelites," etc.—The description: that look toward the north, refers of course to chambers. The gate, accordingly, is the north inner gate; according to Hengst., the entry leads "from the inner court gate on the west to the east entrance gate of the fence-wall of the priests' cells."—שם, KEIL: "At the cells on the extreme hinder side toward the west;" HENGST.: "Thus the kitchens are in the cell building, not by and outside of it."—The Qeri has בִּירְכָתִים (HENGST.: יִרְכָתִים, "on their west side;" singular, as in Gen. xlix. 13; the suffix refers in fact to the chambers, in form to the priests, including under them the chambers"). Gesenius derives the dual from the original signification: limb.—Ver. 20. Here the guilt-offering comes first, whereas in ch. xl. 39, xlii. 13, xlv. 29, it always comes after the sin-offering, as it did in the law also, and hence appeared as a subordinate kind of sin offering, ordained merely for certain cases; in accordance with the leading thought that the sinner should not only desire atonement of his sin before God by a sin-offering, but likewise endeavour as far as possible to pay what was owing, make good the damage, make restitution for the crime committed.—בָּשֵׁל, “to swell;” hence, naturally: “to ripen;” artificially: “to cook” (Piel).—אָפֶה, properly: to draw together, is: “to bake.” Comp. moreover, ch. xlii. 13.—לְבַלְתִּי, to be understood as in ch. xliv. 19, which comp.; הוֹצִיאָה, namely: out of the kitchens, which were situated in the corners of the outer court, like those which follow, where the priests had to pass through the crowd in order to get to their cells. To the outer court, mentioned to prepare for what follows, forms the transition to ver. 21.—The repetition: הָיָה, repeats in words what was repeatedly seen: “a court in the corner of the court, and again a court in the corner of the court” (as HENGST.), so that ver. 22 first gives the exact number of four.—The being brought forth to the outer court is explained by its distinction from the inner, the priests’ court, against whose wall the cells and kitchens rested, as belonging to the sanctuary. Comp. ver. 19.—Ver. 22. These kitchens for the people are distinguished by the detailed description given from those formerly mentioned for the priests. Hengst. considers them: “as off-rooms of the chambers of the people in the sides of the court,” and translates חֲצֵרוֹת

קָטָר: “smoking courts,” saying that the ascending smoke is the characteristic mark of these “buildings,” and asserting that the verb קָטַר, with all its derivatives, signifies in Hebrew

only: to exhale, to smoke, etc. Gesenius assumes another root, קָטַר, “to bind,” “to close,” and understands: closed (partic. pass.) with walls and doors. This latter description would express as little as the other meanings, which Keil rightly rejects, and which the expression cannot have, such as: “uncovered” (KLIEF.), “firm” (HÄV.), “pressed over” (HITZIG.), and the like. The description from the smoke has, on the other hand, something pictorial and emblematic, in so far as it might point to this, that in these kitchens meat to cook will never be wanting.—מִקְצוֹעַ, plur. יָם.—and חֵזֶק, is: corner, from קָצַע, to “cut off.”—The Sept. and Vulgate omit מִחֲקָעוֹת, the last word of the verse, and the Masoretes, by points placed over it, mark it as suspicious. Hengst. holds it to be “a kind of priestly proper name for those rooms (HÄV.: a peculiar technical term for: placed in the corner), which Ezekiel here brings forward as a fond reminiscence.” It is part. Hophal, and signifies: “cornered,” “a corner room,” as Hengstenberg says; according to Keil: “cornered off,” “cut off in corners” (apposition to the suffix in לְאִרְבַּעָתָם).

Hävernich observes that the word still depends upon חֲצֵרוֹת.—Ver. 23. מָגֵר is something on which one walks round. Keil translates: “a row of standing places was in it round about.” [KLIEF.: “a framework was in it round about.”] running below the court-walls (מִיָּדָה) and along them, is meant to be described. [KEIL: a tier of wall-work had several single tiers, under which the cooking-hearths were constructed. HÄV.: “the surrounding boundary-wall rises so high above the kitchens, that these are constructed below the wall.”]—Ver. 24. בֵּית הַמִּבְשָׁלִים is in fact: the “kitchen-house,” but formally: the house where the cooks cook.—The ministers of the house, as formerly, are the mere Levites, in contradistinction from the priests.—“Not without reason is only the slain-offerings mentioned (the name bearing reference to the form; earlier the name denoted the essence: Shelamim), in distinction from the sin and guilt-offerings to be prepared in the kitchens of the priests. Only with the slain-offerings, such offerings as are akin to common slaughtering, was a communion connected. The greater part fell to the offerers, and was consumed in the sacrificial meals. But the slain-offering was not allowed to be prepared by the people themselves” (HENGST.).

Evidently the range of cooking-places (מִבְשָׁלוֹת), literally: “which cause to cook,” partic. Piel),

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS ON CH. XL.-XLVI.

1. Hävernich rightly finds “the nervous and lofty unity” in the prophecies of Ezekiel “manifested in this section also.” “The visions of the prophet find here their fairest completion and perfect rounding off.” Already in the exposition (on ver. 1 sq.) the harmony with the former part of Ezekiel’s prophecy has been remarked. Ch. xliii. 3 expressly refers back to ch. i. and viii. The free conformity in expression between our chapters and the whole closing portion generally, and the earlier chapters, has been often proved (comp. Philipsson, p. 1294). The proof is the more striking when we consider the complete difference of the subject. That we have a vision here too harmonizes not only with ch. i. and viii., but in general with the prophetic character of Ezekiel, ch. viii., xv., xvii. The prophet has repeatedly hinted at this close of his book. Thus ch. xi. 16, xx. 40, xxxvi. 38, xxxvii. 26 sq. The last passage in particular might be regarded as the text for ch. xl. sq. The eighth and following chapters required by the necessity of the idea our conclusion of the book.

2. In regard to analogies in the other prophets, Ezekiel’s contemporaries, as we may well conceive, will chiefly come into consideration. Hence, above all, Ezekiel’s fellow-labourer Jeremiah. Jeremiah represents the restoration and renewal of Israel as a rebuilding of Jerusalem, ch. xxxi. 38 sq. (with this comp. in our prophet, ch. xlvii. 13 sq., ch. xlviii.). Jer. xxxiii. 18 is similar to Ezek. xlv. 9 sq. Hag. ii. 7 sq. follows entirely the thought here of a new temple, insisting on its glory in view of a meagre present. But still more analogous are the night-visions of Zechariah (ch. ii. 5 [1] sq., ch. iv., ch. vi. 13 sq., ch. xiv.).

3. The parallel between Isaiah and Ezekiel, as it stands in relation to the vision in ch. i. (p. 41), is not completed by citing Isa. lx. as corresponding to the close of our book; but we shall have to seek the culminating point of Isaiah’s prophecy for the culmination of Ezekiel’s, in accordance with the office of this prophet to be the prophet of Jehovah’s holiness to obdurate Israel, —just as for the commencement Isa. vi. is covered by Ezek. i.—not so much in the close as in ch. liii. The corresponding pendant to our closing chapters is the life-like description given there of the Messiah and His sacrifice of Himself. It is this self-sanctification of Jehovah through His servant Israel which in Isaiah corresponds to the self-glorification of Jehovah in Ezekiel (ch. xl. sq.) by means of the new sanctuary and the new nationality; and this, again, accords with Ezekiel's office, to behold the glory of Jehovah in the misery of the exile. In this respect Ezekiel stands to Isaiah somewhat as Easter and Pentecost do to Good Friday.

4. The different views, especially regarding the vision of the temple, may be distinguished generally as subjective and objective. 1. The views which derive the explanation of ch. xl. sq. solely or chiefly from Ezekiel's subjectivity: (1) Already Villalpandus saw everywhere here only reminiscences of Solomon's temple and of Solomon's era, and consequently a similar line of thought to that in Ezra iii. 12. Similarly Grotius, only that he reconciled the differences between Ezekiel's temple and that of Solomon by ascribing them to the temple at the time of its destruction, just as Bunsen refers in this connection to 2 Kings xvi. According to both these expositors, Ezekiel traced out from reminiscences a pattern for the future restoration. Thus, according to Ewald, Ezekiel becomes "a prophetic lawgiver." "Such an undertaking, quite unusual in the case of earlier prophets," is explained from the "predominating thoughts and aspirations of the better class of those days for the restoration of the subverted kingdom." "Ezekiel probably meditated long, with passionate longing and lively remembrance, on the institutions of the demolished temple, etc.; what appeared to him great and glorious became impressed upon his mind as a pattern, with which he compared the Messianic expectations and demands, etc., until at length the outline of the whole arrangement which he here writes down pressed itself upon him!" "Above all, he sketches the holy objects, temple and altar, with the utmost exactness and vividness, as if a spirit (!) impelled him, now when they were destroyed, at least to catch up their image in a faithful and worthy form for the redemption that will one day certainly come; so that he must have diligently instructed himself in these matters from the best written and oral sources" (!). "Thus it is quite in keeping with Ezekiel's way of prophesying, that he introduces everything as if he had been borne in spirit into the restored and completed temple, accompanied throughout by a heavenly guide, and had learned exactly from him all the single parts of this unique building as to their nature and use." The paragraph ch. xlvii. 1-12 is, in Ewald's opinion, "from its great, all-embracing sense, quite adapted to bring to a close briefly and pithily all these presentiments!" "Yet when precepts more moral are to be given, or the perfected kingdom has to be described in its extent, reaching even beyond the temple, this assumed form (!) easily passes over into the simple prophetic discourse." (2) While the foregoing view looks to realization, Hitzig, for example, entirely rejects the idea that Ezekiel "considered such things (as our chapters contain) possible, feasible, or probable, and relatively commanded and prescribed them." "One does not or did not reflect that the prophet's calling was to express the demands of the idea, indifferent in the first instance about their realization." All is pure fancy, a mere castle-in-the-air, a kind of "Platonic sketch," as Herder expresses himself. The self-criticism of this view of our chapters can hardly be more suitably given than when Hitzig continues: "Inasmuch as this or that could be set in order otherwise than he imagines, he would not in regard to plans and proposals have resisted obstinately, but would have known how to distinguish the unessential of the execution from the essential of the thing itself. He sketches the future in the form he must wish it to take, in which it really would have the fairest appearance. If the reality falls short of the image, then the idea is defectively realized; but the fault lies in the reality, not in the idea, and Ezekiel is not responsible for it." This, moreover, is merely what already Doederlein and others have held with respect to the closing portion of our book. Similarly Herder: "Ezekiel's manner is to paint an image entire and at length; his mode of conception appears to demand great visions, figures written over on all sides, even tiresome, difficult, symbolical acts, of which his whole book is full. Israel in his wandering upon the mountains of his dispersal, among other tongues and peoples, had need of a prophet such as this one was, etc. So also as regards this temple. Another would have sketched it with soaring figures in lofty utterances; he does so in definite measurements. And not only the temple, but also appurtenances, tribes, administration, land, etc. How far has Israel always, so far as depended on his own efforts, remained below the commands, counsels, and promises of God!" (3) Böttcher has attempted to combine both views, and after him Philippon, who expresses himself to the following effect: "Ezekiel the prophet, sunk in himself, brooding over matters in the distance and in solitude, had not, like Jeremiah, upon whom the immediate reality pressed, viewed the occurrences simply as punishment of defection and degeneracy, but was conscious also of their inward signification, which came to him in the appearance of a vision. Hence he represented the destruction of the temple as a suspension of the relation of revelation between God and Israel; and so much the more necessary was it to represent the restoration of that same relation as the return of God into the restored sanctuary. Now, from the peculiar character of Ezekiel, this necessarily had to assume a form at once ideal and real,—ideal in its entirety as something future, real as individual and special, matter of fact in its appearance." As the "indubitable motive of the prophet," the following is given: "to keep alive in the exiles in the midst of Babylonian idolatry the idea of the one temple, and the priestly institute consecrated to it, as the centre of the religion of the one God; and at the return into Palestine to confirm the life of the people in their calling, by the removal of all elements of strife, and by approximation to the Mosaic state of things." Hengstenberg's view is surprisingly near the above one; he says: "With the exception of the Messianic section in ch. xlvii. 1-12, the fulfilment of all (!) the rest of the prophecy belongs to the times immediately after the return from the Chaldean exile. So must every one of its first hearers and readers have understood it. Jeremiah, whom Ezekiel follows throughout, had prophesied the restoration of the city and temple 70 years after the beginning of the Chaldean servitude, falling in the fourth year of Jehoiakim. Thirty-two years had already elapsed. Forty years after the devastation of Egypt (ch. xix. 13), the nations visited by the Chaldeans shall get back to their former state. According to ch. xi. 16, the restoration is to follow in a brief space after the destruction of the temple. We have before us a prophecy for which it is essential (!) to give truth and poetry (!!), which contains a kernel of real thoughts, yet does not present them naked, but clothed with flesh and blood, that they may be a counterpoise to the sad reality, because they fill the fancy, that fruitful workshop of despair, with bright (!) images, and thus make it an easier task to live in the word at a time when all that is visible cries aloud, Where is now thy God? The incongruity between the prophecy of Ezekiel and the state of things after the exile, vanishes at once by distinguishing between the thoughts and their clothing, and if we can rightly figure to ourselves the wounds for which the healing plaster is here presented, and at the same time the mental world of the priest (Ezekiel), and the materials given in the circumstances surrounding him, for clothing the higher verities which he had to announce to the people." II. The views which above all look to and keep hold of the objectivity of the divine inspiration of Ezekiel. The very regard which must, in one way or other, be paid to the circumstances under which the people for whom, and the Babylonian exile in which, Ezekiel prophesied, objectivizes in some measure his subjectivity, so that not all the views hitherto cited of our chapters and the ones that follow are to be designated as purely subjective; the properly objective, however, will be, that "the hand of Jehovah was upon him," that he was brought "in visions of God" to the land of Israel. Here the distinction is drawn by his own hand between the prophet of Israel and the fanciful Jewish priest; and not only this, but the unavoidable and irreconcilable alternative presents itself: either Ezekiel was a man of God, or a deceiver, for whom the fact that he had deceived himself also with assumed divine objectivity were no excuse, but would only be his self-condemnation. The case of Ezekiel, for the sake of truth, is too solemn for thinking of "poetic clothing" in the case before us. The subjective for the form before us, is to keep in mind when considering it what that form is. It has pleased God to speak to us through men. If we take full account of the national peculiarity of Israel in general during the whole old covenant, and of the peculiar personality in the case of our vision here, that is, that Ezekiel is the priest-prophet, that he above all other prophets is, as Umbreit says, a "born symbolist" ("in the temple which he erects he makes known his greatness as a symbolist, as well by what he says as by what he passes over in silence"),—if we concede to Umbreit the "surprising skill in popularizing instruction" which he observes in Ezekiel, we shall have to accept as the ultimate ground why Israel was the mediator of the world's salvation, and Ezekiel was chosen to behold the temple of the future, divine wisdom and its purpose for the world, that is, the objective αὐτὸ ἵσχυον above everything subjective. In accordance with this principle, we have to judge of (1) the view objectivized in this sense of a model for the rebuilding of the temple after the return from the exile, the supporters of which assume a building-plan "issued under divine authority," given by Jehovah through the prophet. Although there is a resemblance between Ex. xxv. 9, 40 and Ezek. xl. 4, yet it is not said to Ezekiel regarding Israel: "according to all that I show thee, the pattern of the dwelling, etc., even so shall ye make it;" the prophet is only to "convey," announce (נָתַן) all that he sees to the house of Israel. From this circumstance, and not because the reality fell short of the idea (HITZIG, HERDER), or, as Philipsson adduces here, "the similar fate of so many Mosaic precepts," the fact is explained that the post-exile temple was built without any regard to our vision. Only the fundamental reference to Solomon's temple, which in general obtains in Ezekiel also, meets us in Ezra iii. 12. This fact, the more remarkable considering the nearness of time, shows that ch. xl. 4, soon after it was written, and when fully known, was not regarded as a divine building-specification. We do not need, therefore, to express, as Hengst., "the obvious impossibility of erecting a building according to the specifications here given." The circumstance that the building materials are not given has at least not prevented the temple of Ezekiel from being, with more or less success, constructed and fashioned after his statements. Bunsen says that "the temple here forms a very easily realized, congruous whole, of which an exact outline may be made, as the prophet also has evidently done." Umbreit, too, holds this latter view. And although we have to do not with an architect but with a prophet, yet nothing stands in the way of our believing that the subjectivity of Ezekiel was pre-eminently qualified for this vision, from the fact that he possessed architectural capacity" (Introd. § 7). (2) The symbolical view. It corresponds generally to the character of Holy Writ. (Comp. Lange, Rev. Introd. p. 11.) In particular it pays due regard to the law of Moses, to the part of it relating to worship, the subject here. Especially when the whole worship of Israel is concentrated in the temple, a symbolical view respecting a vision thereof will be quite in place. Thereby only its due right is given to this objective, to the divine idea, in the shape which it has above all assumed in Israelitish worship. The symbolical character, moreover, is especially appropriate for the prophetic writings. As has already been often said and pointed out, the symbolical predominates in Ezekiel; and as to these concluding chapters, Hävernick adduces, as indicating their general character, the description of the circuit of the new temple (ch. xlii. 15 sq.), the representation of the entrance, etc. of the divine glory (ch. xliii. 1 sq.), the river (ch. xlvii. 1 sq. etc.), and observes that "it is just such passages that form the conclusion to the previous description, and hence cast a light on it." Comp. on ch. xliii. 10 sq. But everything architectonic is not a symbol, although everything of that nature will indeed primarily relate to the building to be erected, and will thereby at the same time in some way serve the idea of the whole. This character comes out clearly even in individual statements of number, yet all such measurements are not therefore to be interpreted symbolically. Nay, as the exposition shows, there are here bare numbers, resisting every attempt to trace them back to the idea. It is sufficient in respect to the numbers, that (comp. Umbreit, p. 269 sq.) 4, as "signature not only of regularity but also of the revelation of God in space," e.g. in the quadrangle of the temple; 3, "the signature of the divine," e.g. in the sets of three gates; 10, "perfection complete in itself," occurring often; likewise the "sacred number" 7; and the number 12 in the tables for preparing the offerings (ch. xl.), represent symbolism. (On the symbolism of numbers, comp. Lange on Rev. Introd. p. 14.) Umbreit rightly maintains: "It is a symbolical temple, notwithstanding the arid and dry description, in which only exact specifications of the number of cubits and the apparently most insignificant calculations and measurements occur;" as he says, "quite in keeping with the poverty of the immediately succeeding age and the dignity of the most significant inwardness." (3) The Messianic view (for which comp. Lange on Kings, p. 60 sq.) is only the taking full advantage of and applying the symbolic view in general. Symbol and type, emblem and pattern, must mutually interpenetrate one another in a law like that of Israel. What separates Israel from the heathen is its law; what qualifies Israel for the whole world is its promise. But now, because of sin, the law has come in between the promise and the fulfilment; that sin becoming the more powerful as transgression may make manifest for faith the grace which alone is still more powerful, and that consequently the necessity of the promise should be the more apparent; that is, the pedagogy of the law (and especially of its ethical part) to Christ. Thus the law of Israel is the theocratic expression of Israel, the servant of God, as he ought to be, and hence prefigures the servant of Jehovah who is the fulfilling of the law, as He is the personal fulfilling of Israel, inasmuch as in Him who was delivered for our transgressions, and raised again for our δικαιωσις, Israel after the Spirit is represented; so that here out of the law relating to worship rise up, as on the one hand sacrifice and the priesthood, so on the other the concentration of the whole of worship in the temple, this parable of the future, with reference to which Christ, John ii., gives the σημεῖον: Destroy (λυσάτω) this temple, and in three days I will raise it up (ἵσταναι), saying this of the temple of His body; as also the disciples remembered when He had risen from the dead, and as the accusation against Him ran (Matt. xxvi. 61). Accordingly the law, and especially the temple and its service, is σκῆμα ἵχνης τοῦ μέλλοντος; the future σκῆμα is given in the σκῆμα τοῦ Χριστοῦ (σκῆμα δι' αὐτοῦ, Heb. x.). "This reference to the future," says Ziegler (in his thoughtful little work on the "historical development of divine revelation"), "is the most dynamical among all the references of the law; its significance for its own time is so weak and unimportant, that it seems to exist solely for the sake of the future, although its office is the opposite of the office of the New Testament, which is formed and abiding in the hearts of men (δικαιωσις τῆς δικαιοσύνης, τοῦ πνεύματος); still it was a sensible type, a strongly marked and distinctly stamped shadow of the coming substances, and yet, moreover, a veil which concealed it." What has been said shows the typical signification of the vision of Ezekiel, in which the symbolical view of it is completed, and the pedagogic and providential necessity of that form borrowed from the legal worship in which it is enshrined. Here is more than what (as Hengstenberg can say) "suffices to employ the fancy." For the anointed one is τὸς τοῦ πνεύματος. But as the Messianic view of our chapters is thus justified by the symbolical view, when we have taken into account the law, particularly the law of worship in Israel, so likewise the already (Doct. Reflec. 1) noted connection of ch. xl. sq. with the previous chapters, especially with ch. xxxvii. 26 sq. (p. 351), yields the same result, as also the position after ch. xxxviii. and xxxix. and the relation to this prophecy will have to be taken into consideration. What holds good of ch. xxxvii. 26 sq. will also be a hint for our chapters. But even the Talmudists saw themselves compelled (principally because of the treatment of the law of Moses, to be spoken of presently) to acknowledge "that the exposition of this portion would be first given in Messianic times," as the "best" (according to Philippeon) Jewish expositors recognised here "the type of a third temple." The saying of Jesus in John ii. possibly alluded to the exegetical tradition of the Jews. Hävernick accommodates as follows: "The shattered old theocratic forms rather than new ones were above all cognate to the priestly mind of Ezekiel;" so "he sees nothing perish of that which Jehovah has founded for eternity; those forms beam before him revived, animated with fresh breath, and lit up in the splendour of true glory; he recognises their full realization as coming in first in Messianic times." As errors are still committed, e.g. by Schmieder, in the symbolizing of particulars, so the Messianic typology of a Cocecius has deserved, although only in part, the anathema on "mystical allegories," which above all modern criticism utters; for our defect in understanding in respect of many particulars will always have to be conceded. The Christian idea, however, the Old Testament typical symbolizing of which we have here to expound, is not only the idea of Christ, but also the idea of the Christian Church, the kingdom of God in Christ. If the resurrection of the Anointed One comes into consideration in the first respect, so in the latter does the consummation of the kingdom of grace, after its last affliction, into the kingdom of glory; comp. Rev. xxi. 22. The one is as eschatological in the wider, that is, christological in the narrower sense, as the other is eschatological in the narrower, or christological in the wider sense. By the translating of our passage into the higher key of John's Apocalypse, the relation of ch. xl. sq. to ch. xxxviii. xxxix. must be so much the more evident. Comp. Doct. Reflec. on xxxviii. and xxxix. We refer, finally, to what has been said in the Introduction, § 7, that Jehovah's building in Ezekiel here (still more in its already actual reality for the seer, so that what already existed had only to be measured to him) forms the architectonic antithesis to the buildings of Nebuchadnezzar. As the figure of Gog with his people may have presented itself to our prophet through means of Babylon (comp. Doct. Reflec. on ch. xxxviii. xxxix., p. 375), so from that same quarter may have been derived the representation given of the kingdom of God in its victorious opposition to the world. Hitzig, too (as we now first see when treating of the closing chapters), supposes that there probably "flitted before the eyes of the author living in Chaldaea, when describing his quadrangle, the capital of the country and the temple of Belus,—the former, like the latter, forming a square, with streets intersecting one another at right angles." Umbreit says of the vision of Ezekiel as a whole: "It is a great thought, which presents itself unadorned to our view in the prophetic-symbolic temple: God henceforth dwells in perfect peace, revealing Himself in the unbounded fulness of His glory, which is returning to Jerusalem, in the purest and most blissful unison with His sanctified people, making Himself known in the living word of progressive, saving, and sanctifying redemption. Everything is placed upon the ample circuit of the temple, whose extended courts receive all people, and through whose high and open gates the King of Glory is to enter in (Pa. xxiv. 7, 9), and then upon the order and harmony of the divine habitation, the well-proportioned building (ch. xlii. 10); and the revelations of the holiest are stored up in the pure, deep water of His word, which in life-giving streams issues from the temple. The stone tables of the law are consumed (!), and the fresh and free fountain of eternal truth streams forth from the temple of the Spirit, quickening and vivifying in land and sea, awakening by its creative and fructifying power a new and mighty race on earth. And thus hast thou, much misjudged yet lofty seer, in the unconscious depth of thy mysteriously flowing language, set up upon the great, undistinguishing (comp. Jer. xxxi. 34), well-proportioned, and beautifully compacted building, a type of the simple yet lofty temple of Christ, from which flows the spiritual fountain of life!" From this Messianic view of the section we have to reject (4) the chiliastic-literal view, according to which Ezekiel describes what may be called either the Jewish temple of the future, or the Jewish future of the Christian Church. It is interesting to observe what kind of spirits meet together here in the flesh; e.g. Baumgarten and Auberlen, Hofmann and Volek (who acts as champion for him, and that partly with striking power of demonstration against Kliefoth), are combined here only in general because they make the community of God at our Lord's Parousia to be an Israelite one. Comp. moreover, p. 357 and § 10 of the Introduction. Auberlen (Daniel and the Revelation of John, p. 348 sq., Clark's tr.) expresses the apocalyptic phantasm as follows: "Israel brought back to his own land becomes the people of God in a far higher and more inward sense than before, etc.; a new period of revelation begins, the Spirit of God is richly poured forth, and a fulness of gracious gifts is conferred, such as the apostolic Church possessed typically" (!). (One can hardly go farther in the delusion of "deeper" knowledge of Scripture than to make primitive and original Christianity a type of Judaism!) "But this rich spirit-imparted life finds its completed representation in a priestly as well as in a kingly manner. That which in the ages of the Old Covenant obtained only outwardly in the letter, and that which conversely in the age of the Church withdrew itself into inward, hidden spirituality, will then in a pneumatic (!) manner assume also an outward appearance and form. In the Old Covenant the whole national life of Israel in its various manifestations—household and state, labour and art, literature and culture—was determined by religion, but only in an external legal manner; the Church, again, has to insist above all on a renewal of the heart, and must leave those outward forms of life free, enjoining it on the conscience of each individual to glorify Christ in these relations also; but in the millennial kingdom all these spheres of life will be truly Christianized from within outwardly. Thus looked at, it will no longer be offensive (?) to say that the Mosaic ceremonial law corresponds to the priesthood of Israel, and the civil law to its kingship. The Gentile Church could adopt only the moral law; so certainly the sole means of influence assigned to her is that which works inwardly,—the preaching of the word, the exercise of the prophetic office."

(The Romish Church, however, has known how to serve itself heir saties superque to the Jewish ceremonial law!) "But when once the priesthood and the kingship arise again, then also—without prejudice to the principles laid down in the Epistle to the Hebrews (?)—the ceremonial and civil law of Moses will unfold its spiritual depths in the cultus and the constitution of the millennial kingdom (Matt. v. 17–19). The present is still the time of preaching, but then the time of the liturgy shall have come, which presupposes a congregation consisting solely of converted people," etc. etc. When Hengstenberg calls such interpretation "altogether unhappy," that is the least that one can say about it; but even that could not have been said if Ezekiel's descriptions really had the "Utopian character" which Hengstenberg attributes to them. He, however, justly adverts upon the incongruity of expecting the restoration of the temple, the Old Testament festivals, the bloody sacrifices (!), and the priesthood of the sons of Zadok, within the bounds of the New Covenant. Comp. Keil, p. 500 sq., who, both from the prophetic parts of the Old Testament and from the New, refutes at length the notion of a transformation of Canaan before the last judgment, and a kingdom of glory at Jerusalem before the end of the world. (Auberlen, who looks on the "first resurrection" as a "bodily coming forth of the whole community of believers from their hitherto invisibility with Christ in heaven," makes the now "transformed Church again return thither with Christ, and the saints rule from heaven over the earth;" and from this he concludes that "the intercourse between the world above and the world below will then be more active and free," etc. Hofmann's transference of the glorified Church to earth, and his further connecting therewith the national regeneration of Israel, Auberlen declares to be "incompatible with the whole of Old Testament prophecy, to say nothing of its internal improbability.")

ADDITIONAL NOTE ON CH. XL—XLVI.

[Dr. Fairbairn's classification of the views which have been held of Ezekiel's closing vision generally, and in particular of the description contained in it respecting the temple, is as follows: 1. The historico-literal view, "which takes all as a prosaic description of what had existed in the times immediately before the captivity, in connection with the temple which is usually called Solomon's." 2. The historico-ideal view, that "the pattern exhibited to Ezekiel differed materially from anything that previously existed, and presented for the first time what should have been after the return from the captivity, though, from the remissness and corruption of the people, it never was properly realized." 3. The Jewish-carnal view, held by certain Jewish writers, who maintain that Ezekiel's description was actually followed, although in a necessarily imperfect manner, by the children of the captivity, and afterwards by Herod; but that "it waits to be properly accomplished by the Messiah, who, when He appears, shall cause the temple to be reared precisely as here described, and carry out all the other subordinate arrangements,"—a view which, strangely enough, is in substance held also by certain parties in the Christian Church, who "expect the vision to receive a complete and literal fulfilment at the period of Christ's second coming." 4. The Christian-spiritual or typical view, "according to which the whole representation was not intended to find either in Jewish or Christian times an express and formal realization, but was a grand, complicated symbol of the good God had in reserve for His Church, especially under the coming dispensation of the gospel. From the Fathers downwards this has been the prevailing view in the Christian Church. The greater part have held it, to the exclusion of every other; in particular, among the Reformers and their successors, Luther, Calvin, Capellus, Cocceius, Pfeiffer, followed by the majority of evangelical divines of our own country."

To this fourth and last view Dr. Fairbairn himself strenuously adheres, expounding, illustrating, and defending it at considerable length, and with marked ability and success. We give his remarks in a somewhat condensed form.

"1. First of all, it is to be borne in mind that the description purports to be a vision,—a scheme of things exhibited to the mental eye of the prophet 'in the visions of God.' This alone marks it to be of an ideal character, as contradistinguished from anything that ever had been, or ever was to be found in actual existence after the precise form given to it in the description. Such we have uniformly seen to be the character of the earlier visions imparted to the prophet. The things described in chap. i.-iii. and viii.-xi., which were seen by him 'in the visions of God,' were all of this nature. They presented a vivid picture of what either then actually existed or was soon to take place, but in a form quite different from the external reality. Not the very image or the formal appearance of things was given, but rather a compressed delineation of their inward being and substance. And such, too, was found to be the case with other portions, which are of an entirely similar nature, though not expressly designated visions; such, for example, as ch. iv., xii., xxi., all containing delineations and precepts, as if speaking of what was to be done and transacted in real life, and yet it is necessary to understand them as ideal representations, exhibiting the character, but not the precise form and lineaments, of the coming transactions. . . . Never at any period of His Church has God given laws and ordinances to it simply by vision; and when Moses was commissioned to give such in the wilderness, his autho-

riety to do so was formally based on the ground of his office being different from the ordinarily prophetic, and of his instructions being communicated otherwise than by vision (Num. xii. 6). So that to speak by way of vision, and at the same time in the form of precept, as if enjoining laws and ordinances materially differing from those of Moses, was itself a palpable and incontrovertible proof of the ideal character of the revelation. It was a distinct testimony that Ezekiel was no new lawgiver coming to modify or supplant what had been written by him with whom God spake face to face upon the mount.

"2. What has been said respecting the form of the prophet's communication, is confirmed by the substance of it—as there is much in this that seems obviously designed to force on us the conviction of its ideal character. There are things in the description which, taken literally, are in the highest degree improbable, and even involve natural impossibilities." Thus, for example, "according to the most exact modes of computation, the prophet's measurements give for the outer wall of the temple a square of an English mile and about a seventh on each side, and for the whole city [i.e. including the oblation of holy ground for the prince, the priests, and the Levites] a space of between three and four thousand square miles. Now there is no reason to suppose that the boundaries of the ancient city exceeded two miles and a half in circumference (see Robinson's Researches, vol. i.), while here the circumference of the wall of the temple is nearly twice as much." And then, taking the land of Canaan at the largest, as including all that Israel ever possessed on both sides of the Jordan, it amounted only to somewhere between ten and eleven thousand square miles. Surely "the allotment of a portion nearly equal to one-half of the whole for the prince, the priests, and Levites is a manifest proof of the ideal character of the representation; the more especially, when we consider that that sacred portion is laid off in a regular square, with the temple on Mount Zion in the centre. . . . The measurements of the prophet were made to involve a literal incongruity, as did also the literal extravagances of the vision in chap. xxxviii. xxxix., that men might be forced to look for something else than a literal accomplishment. . . .

"3. Some, perhaps, may be disposed to imagine that, as they expect certain physical changes to be effected upon the land before the prophecy can be carried into fulfilment, these may be adjusted in such a manner as to admit of the prophet's measurements being literally applied. It is impossible, however, to admit such a supposition. For the boundaries of the land itself are given, not new boundaries of the prophet's own, but those originally laid down by Moses. And as the measurements of the temple and city are out of all proportion to these, no alterations can be made on the physical condition of the country that could bring the one into proper agreement with the other. Then there are other things in the description, which, if they could not of themselves so conclusively prove the impossibility of a literal sense as the consideration arising from the measurements, lend great force to this consideration, and, on any other supposition than their being parts of an ideal representation, must wear an improbable and fanciful aspect. Of this kind is the distribution of the remainder of the land in equal portions among the twelve tribes, in parallel sections, running straight across from east to west, without any respect to the particular circumstances of each, or their relative numbers. More especially, the assignment of five of these parallel sections to the south of the city, which, after making allowance for the sacred portion, would leave at the farthest a breadth of only three or four miles a-piece! Of the same kind also is the supposed separate existence of the twelve tribes, which now, at least, can scarcely be regarded otherwise than a natural impossibility, since it is an ascertained fact that such separate tribeships no longer exist; the course of Providence has been ordered so as to destroy them; and once destroyed, they cannot possibly be reproduced. . . . Of the same kind, farther, is 'the very high mountain' on which the vision of the temple was presented to the eye of the prophet; for as this unquestionably refers to the old site of the temple, the little eminence on which it stood could only be designated thus in a moral or ideal, and not in a literal sense. Finally, of the same kind is the account given of the stream issuing from the eastern threshold of the temple, and flowing into the Dead Sea, which, both for the rapidity of its increase and for the quality of its waters, is unlike anything that ever was known in Judea, or in any other region of the world. Putting all together, it seems as if the prophet had taken every possible precaution, by the general character of the delineation, to debar the expectation of a literal fulfilment; and I should despair of being able in any case to draw the line of demarcation between the ideal and the literal, if the circumstances now mentioned did not warrant us in looking for something else than a fulfilment according to the letter of the vision.

"4. Yet there is the farther consideration to be mentioned, viz. that the vision of the prophet, as it must, if understood literally, imply the ultimate restoration of the ceremonials of Judaism, so it inevitably places the prophet in direct contradiction to the writers of the New Testament. The entire and total cessation of the peculiarities of Jewish worship is as plainly taught by our Lord and His apostles as language could do it, and on grounds which are not of temporary, but of permanent validity and force. The word of Christ to the woman of Samaria: 'Woman, believe me, the hour cometh when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father,' is alone conclusive of the matter; for if it means anything worthy of so solemn an asseveration, it indicates that Jerusalem was presently to lose its distinctive character, and a mode of worship to be introduced capable of being celebrated in any other place as well as there. But when we find the apostles afterwards contending for the cessation of the Jewish ritual, because suited only to a church 'in bondage to the elements of the world,' and consisting of what were comparatively but 'weak and beggarly elements'; and when, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, we also find the disannulling of the Old Covenant, with its Aaronic priesthood and carnal ordinances, argued at length, and especially 'because of the weakness and unprofitableness thereof,' that is, its own inherent imperfections, we must certainly hold, either that the shadowy services of Judaism are finally and for ever gone, or that these sacred writers very much misrepresented their Master's mind regarding them. No intelligent and sincere Christian can adopt the latter alternative; he ought, therefore, to rest in the former. And he will do so, in the rational persuasion, that as in the wise administration of God there must ever be a conformity in the condition of men to the laws and ordinances under which they are placed, so the carnal institutions, which were adapted to the Church's pupilage, can never, in the nature of things, be in proper correspondence with her state of manhood, perfection, and millennial glory. To regard the prophet here as exhibiting a prospect founded on such an unnatural conjunction, is to ascribe to him the foolish part of seeking to have the new wine of the kingdom put back into the old bottles again, and while occupying himself with the highest hopes of the Church, treating her only to a showy spectacle of carnal superficialities. We have far too high ideas of the spiritual insight and calling of an Old Testament prophet, to believe that it was possible for him to act so unseemly a part, or contemplate a state of things so utterly anomalous. And we are perfectly justified by the explicit statement of Scripture in saying, that 'a temple with sacrifices now would be the most daring denial of the all-sufficiency of the sacrifice of Christ, and of the efficacy of the blood of His atonement. He who sacrificed before, confessed the Messiah; he who should sacrifice now, would most solemnly and sacrilegiously deny Him.'¹

"5. Holding the description, then, in this last vision to be conclusively of an ideal character, we advance a step farther, and affirm that the idealism here is precisely of the same kind as that which appeared in some of the earlier visions,—visions that must necessarily have already passed into fulfilment, and which therefore may justly be regarded as furnishing a key to the right understanding of the one before us. The leading characteristic of those earlier visions, which coincide in nature with this, we have found to be the historical cast of their idealism. The representation of things to come is thrown into the mould of something similar in the past, and presented as simply a reproduction of the old, or a returning back again of what is past, only with such diversities as might be necessary to adapt it to the altered circumstances contemplated; while still the thing meant was, not that the outward form, but that the essential nature of the past should revive." In this connection, Dr. Fairbairn refers to the vision of the iniquity-bearing in ch. iv.; to the sojourn in the wilderness spoken of in ch. xx.; to the ideal representation given of the king of Tyre in ch. xxviii. 11-19; and to the prediction of Egypt's humiliation in ch. xxix. 1-16. "Now in all these cases," he goes on to remark, "of an apparent, we should entirely err if we looked for an actual repetition of the past. It is the nature of the transactions and events, not their precise form or external conditions, that is unfolded to our view. The representation is of an ideal kind, and the history of the past merely supplies the mould into which it is cast. The spiritual eye of the prophet discerned the old, as to its real character, becoming alive again in the new. He saw substantially the same procedure followed again, and the unchangeable Jehovah must display the uniformity of His character and dealings by visiting it with substantially the same treatment. If, now, we bring the light furnished by those earlier revelations of the prophet, in respect to which we can compare the prediction with the fulfilment, so as to read by its help, and according to its instruction, the vision before us, we shall only be giving the prophet the benefit of the common rule, of interpreting a writer by a special respect to his own peculiar method, and explaining the more obscure by the more intelligible parts of his writings. In all the other cases referred to, where his representation takes the form of a revival of the past, we see it is the spirit and not the letter of the representation that is mainly to be regarded; and why should we expect it to be otherwise here? In this remarkable vision we have the old produced again, in respect to what was most excellent and glorious in Israel's past condition,—its temple, with every necessary accompaniment of sacredness and attraction—the symbol of the divine presence within—the ministrations and ordinances proceeding in due order without—the prince and the priesthood—everything, in short, required to constitute the beau-ideal of a sacred commonwealth according to the ancient patterns of things. But, at the same time, there are such changes and alterations superinduced upon the old as sufficiently indicate that something far greater and better than the past was concealed under this antiquated form. Not the coming realities, in their exact nature and glorious fullness—not even the very image of these things, could the prophet as yet distinctly unfold. While the old dispensation lasted, they must be thrown into the narrow and imperfect shell of its earthly relations. But those who lived under that dispensation might get the liveliest idea they were able to obtain of the brighter future, by simply letting their minds rest on the past, as here modified and shaped anew by the prophet; just as now, the highest notions we can form to ourselves of the state of glory is by conceiving the best of the Church's present condition refined and elevated to heavenly perfection. Exhibited at the time the vision was, and constructed as it is, one should no more expect to see a visible temple realizing the conditions, and a reoccupied Canaan, after the regular squares and parallelograms of the prophet, than in the case of Tyre to find her monarch literally dwelling in Eden, and, as a cherub, occupying the immediate presence of God, or to behold Israel sent back again to make trial of Egyptian bondage and the troubles of the desert. Whatever might be granted in providence of an outward conformity to the plan of the vision, it should only be regarded as a pledge of the far greater good really contemplated, and a help to faith in waiting for its proper accomplishment.

"6. But still, looking to the manifold and minute particulars given in the description, some may be disposed to think it highly improbable that anything short of an exact and literal fulfilment should have been intended. Had it been only a general sketch of a city and temple, as in the 60th chapter of Isaiah, and other portions of prophecy, they could more easily enter into the ideal character of the description, and understand how it might chiefly point to the better things of the gospel dispensation. But with so many exact measurements before them, and such an infinite variety of particulars of all sorts, they cannot conceive how there can be a proper fulfilment without corresponding objective realities. It is precisely here, however, that we are met by another very marked characteristic of our prophet. Above all the prophetic writers, he is distinguished, as we have seen, for his numberless particularisms. What Isaiah depicts in a few bold and graphic strokes, as in the case of Tyre, for example, Ezekiel spreads over a series of chapters, filling up the picture with all manner of details,—not only telling us of her singular greatness, but also of every element, far and near, that contributed to produce it, and not only predicting her downfall, but coupling it with every conceivable circumstance that might add to its mortification and completeness. We have seen the same features strikingly exhibited in the prophecy on Egypt, in the description of Jerusalem's condition and punishment under the images of the boiling caldron (ch. xxiv.) and the exposed infant (ch. xvi.), in the vision of the iniquity-bearing (ch. iv.), in the typical representation of going into exile (ch. xiii.), and indeed in all the more important delineations of the prophet, which, even when descriptive of ideal scenes, are characterized by such minute and varied details as to give them the appearance of a most definitely shaped and lifelike reality.

"... Considering his peculiar manner, it was no more than might have been expected, that when going to present a grand outline of the good in store for God's Church and people, the picture should be drawn with the fullest detail. If he has done so on similar, but less important occasions, he could not fail to do it here, when rising to the very top and climax of all his revelations. For it is pre-eminently by means of the minuteness and completeness of his descriptions that he seeks to impress our minds with a feeling of the divine certainty of the truth disclosed in them, and to give, as it were, weight and body to our apprehensions.

"7. In farther support of the view we have given, it may also be asked, whether the feeling against a spiritual understanding of the vision, and a demand for outward scenes and objects literally corresponding to it, does not spring, to a large extent, from false notions regarding the ancient temple and its ministrations and ordinances of worship, as if these possessed an independent value apart from the spiritual truths they symbolically expressed? On the contrary the temple, with all that belonged to it, was an embodied representation of divine realities. It presented to the eye of the worshippers a manifold and varied instruction respecting the things of God's kingdom. And it was by what they saw embodied in those visible forms and external transactions that the people were to learn how they should think of God, and act toward Him in the different relations and scenes of life—when they were absent from the temple, as well as when they were near and around it. It was an image and emblem of the kingdom of God itself, whether viewed in respect to the temporary dispensation then present, or to the grander development everything was to receive at the advent of Christ. And it was one of the capital errors of the Jews, in all periods of their history, to pay too exclusive a regard to the mere externals of the temple and its worship, without discerning the spiritual truths and principles that lay concealed under them. But such being the case, the necessity for an outward and literal realization of Ezekiel's plan obviously falls to the ground. For if all connected with it was ordered and arranged chiefly for its symbolical value at any rate, why might not the description itself be given forth for the edification and comfort of the Church, on account of what it contained of symbolical instruction? Even if the plan had been fitted and designed for being actually reduced to practice, it would still have been principally with a view to its being a mirror in which to see reflected the mind and purposes of God. But if so, why might not the delineation itself be made to serve for such a mirror? In other words, why might not God have spoken to His Church of good things to come by the wise adjustment of a symbolical plan? . . . Let the same rules be applied to the interpretation of Ezekiel's visionary temple which, on the express warrant of Scripture, we apply to Solomon's literal one, and it will be impossible to show why, so far as the ends of instruction are concerned, the same great purposes might not be served by the simple delineation of the one, as by the actual construction of the other.¹

"It is also not to be overlooked, in support of this line of reflection, that in other and earlier communications Ezekiel makes much account of the symbolical character of the temple and the things belonging to it. It is as a priest he gives us to understand at the outset, and for the purpose of doing priest-like service for the covenant-people, that he received his prophetic calling, and had visions of God displayed to him (see on ch. i. 1-3). In the series of visions contained in ch. viii.-xi., the guilt of the people was represented as concentrating itself there, and determining God's procedure in regard to it. By the divine glory being seen to leave the temple was symbolized the withdrawing of God's gracious presence from Jerusalem; and by His promising to become for a little a sanctuary to the pious remnant in Chaldea, it was virtually said that the temple, as to its spiritual reality, was going to be transferred thither. This closing vision comes now as the happy counterpart of those earlier ones, giving promise of a complete rectification of preceding evils and disorders. It assured the Church that all should yet be set right again; nay, that greater and better things should be found in the future than had ever been known in the past,—things too great and good to be presented merely under the old symbolical forms; these must be modelled and adjusted anew to adapt them to the higher objects in prospect. Nor is Ezekiel at all singular in this. The other prophets represent the coming future with a reference to the symbolical places and ordinances of the past, adjusting and modifying these to suit their immediate design. Thus Jeremiah says, in ch. xxxi. 38-40: 'Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that the city shall be built to the Lord from the gate of Hananeel to the corner gate. And the measuring line shall go forth opposite to it still farther over the hill Gareb (the hill of the leprous), and shall compass about to Goath (the place of execution). And the whole valley of the dead bodies, and of the ashes, and all the fields

to the brook Kedron, unto the corner of the horse-gate toward the east, shall be holy to the Lord.' That is, there shall be a rebuilt Jerusalem in token of the revival of God's cause, in consequence of which even the places formerly unclean shall become holiness to the Lord: not only shall the loss be recovered, but also the evil inherent in the past purged out, and the cause of righteousness made completely triumphant. The sublime passage in Isa. lx. is entirely parallel as to its general import. And in the two last chapters of Revelation we have a quite similar vision to the one before us, employed to set forth the ultimate condition of the redeemed Church. There are differences in the one as compared with the other, precisely as in the vision of Ezekiel there are differences as compared with anything that existed under the Old Covenant. In particular, while the temple forms the very heart and centre of Ezekiel's plan, in John's no temple whatever was to be seen. But in the two descriptions the same truth is symbolized, though in the last it appears in a state of more perfect development than in the other. The temple in Ezekiel, with God's glory returned to it, bespoke God's presence among His people to sanctify and bless them; the no-temple in John indicated that such a select spot was no longer needed, that the gracious presence of God was everywhere seen and felt. It is the same truth in both, only in the latter represented, in accordance with the genius of the new dispensation, as less connected with the circumstantialities of place and form.

"8. It only remains to be stated, that in the interpretation of the vision we must keep carefully in mind the circumstances in which it was given, and look at it, not as from a New, but as from an Old Testament point of view. We must throw ourselves back as far as possible into the position of the prophet himself. We must think of him as having just seen the divine fabric which had been reared in the sacred and civil constitution of Israel dashed in pieces, and apparently become a hopeless wreck. But in strong faith in Jehovah's word, and with divine insight into His future purposes, he sees that that never can perish which carries in its bosom the element of God's unchangeableness; that the hand of the Spirit will assuredly be applied to raise up the old anew; and not only that, but also that it shall be inspired with fresh life and vigour, enabling it to burst the former limits, and rise into a greatness and perfection and majesty never known or conceived of in the past. He speaks, therefore, chiefly of gospel times, but as one still dwelling under the veil, and uttering the language of legal times. And of the substance of his communication, both as to its general correspondence with the past and its difference in particular parts, we submit the following summary, as given by Hävernick:—'1. In the gospel times there is to be on the part of Jehovah a solemn occupation anew of His sanctuary, in which the entire fulness of the divine glory shall dwell and manifest itself. At the last there is to rise a new temple, diverse from the old, to be made every way suitable to that grand and lofty intention, and worthy of it; in particular, of vast compass for the new community, and with a holiness stretching over the entire extent of the temple, so that in this respect there should no longer be any distinction between the different parts. Throughout, everything is subjected to the most exact and particular appointments; individual parts, and especially such as had formerly remained indeterminate, obtain now an immediate divine sanction; so that every idea of any kind of arbitrariness must be altogether excluded from this temple. Accordingly, this sanctuary is the thoroughly sufficient, perfect manifestation of God for the salvation of His people (ch. xl.-xliii. 12). 2. From this sanctuary, as from the new centre of all religious life, there gushes forth an unbounded fulness of blessings upon the people, who in consequence attain to a new condition. There come also into being a new glorious worship, a truly acceptable priesthood and theocratical ruler, and equity and righteousness reign among the entire community, who, being purified from all stains, rise indeed to possess the life that is in God (ch. xliii. 13-xlvii. 12). 3. To the people who have become renewed by such blessings, the Lord gives the land of promise; Canaan is a second time divided among them, where, in perfect harmony and blessed fellowship, they serve the living God, who abides and manifests Himself among them¹ (ch. xlvii. 13-xlviii.)."—FAIRBAIRN'S Ezekiel, pp. 436-450.—W. F.]

5. In connection with the wall with which the description begins, mention is forthwith made (ch. xl. 5) of the "house." This makes clear in the outset what is the principal building, to which all else is subordinate, although the wall is called a "building." However large, then, that which the wall comprehends may appear to be, —and it is said in ver. 2 to be "a city-like building,"—the "house" is still the kernel. Comp. the measuring from it in ver. 7 sq. Hence the symbolized idea is the dwelling of Jehovah as a permanent one, especially when we compare ch. xxxvii. 26 sq. As type, the realization of the idea is to be found in the Word become flesh (John i. 14), as also the ναὶ ὁ ἱεὺς (John iv. 23) farther shows that the worship in spirit and in truth, and thereby the fulfilling of the worship at Jerusalem, has come with Christ. Salvation (ἡ σωτηρία) is of the Jews, as our vision also sets forth in an architectonic form; they worship what they know. But as the law was given by Moses, so grace and truth came by Jesus Christ. The original influence of the sanctuary on the first constituting of Israel as a people through the making of a divine covenant is still held by in ch. xxxvii. 26 sq. (Yes, Israel is Jehovah's family, His house, οἶκος τοῦ κυρίου, John i. 11; Jehovah's covenant with Israel is a marriage-covenant, Ezek. xvi.) The visibility of Jehovah's dwelling, even in the vision here, although spiritual, must be looked on as a pledge of the entire relation of Jehovah to Israel, and especially of the promise of the Messiah. This is the sacramental character of Ezekiel's vision of the temple specially insisted on by Hengstenberg. But the temple as the abode of Jehovah is a place of farther revelation, for Jehovah is the Self-revealing One. The very name Jehovah contains a pledge for the whole future of the kingdom of God, the Church of the future. Now this name, as is well known, coincides most essentially and intimately with the destination of this "house;" Ezekiel repeatedly emphasizes the fact that it is the name of His holiness, just as in connection therewith the sanctification of Israel is again and again expressed. Now, as this expresses also the ultimate aim of all Jehovah's revelation in Israel, we must have got before us in the sanctuary the perspective to the end of God's way with Israel and mankind in general, the vision of Israel fulfilling its destiny of being God's tabernacle with men, and the consummation of the world in glory, Rev. xxi. xxii. But the holiness of Jehovah, the sanctification of Israel, is signified forthwith by the wall "round about the house."

6. The significance of the wall, however, comes first into consideration in respect to the court of the people, so that in special the sanctification of Israel as the end and object of Jehovah's dwelling in their midst is before all thus symbolically expressed. If the "house" is the central point of the whole, still the court completes the idea of the house; as we have the temple in its entirety, as it was meant to be, only when it has the two courts conjoined with it. The reference to the city, and farther to the whole land, which undoubtedly was always contained in the idea of the court, is moreover expressly given shape to in Ezekiel (comp. ch. xlviii.). The court here represents the Israel in the widest extent that appears before Jehovah, as it lives in the light of His countenance and of intercourse with Him; that is to say, it refers to the idea proper of a holy people. When, accordingly, the visionary-prophetic description in Ezekiel exhibits a striking difference from the brevity, incompleteness, and indefiniteness of the historical account in the books of Kings and Chronicles, this indicates, as respects the idea, another Israel than the people had hitherto been. Hävernick remarks on "the wide compass, in order to contain the new community," and "the sanctuary extending itself on all sides of the temple indiscriminately," "that which was formerly undefined is now," as he says, "to receive a higher, a divine sanction." Bähr, speaking of Solomon's temple, says that the "almost total indefiniteness" of its court is owing to its "human character" in contrast to the idea and purpose of the house, and that even the court of the tabernacle, although measured and defined more exactly than that of the temple, shows numbers and measurements which indicate "imperfection and incompleteness." This latter statement might possibly give a hint as to Ezekiel's description of the courts of the temple, which is, on the contrary, so exact and detailed, and would at least be plainer than what Bähr says of the human as "not divine," etc., while yet he must concede to the court a mediate divineness. Israel in the wilderness might, as Jehovah's host, as the people under His most special guidance, still in some measure stamp this relation on the court of the tabernacle. In Solomon's temple, on the contrary, the self-development, left more to the freedom of the people, especially as they now had kings like other nations, and when their position under Solomon was so influential, would be expressed in the characteristic indefiniteness of the people's part in the sanctuary. But the Israel of the future, Ezekiel in fine would say, will be exactly and distinctly Jehovah's possession. Hävernick (and Bähr too) cites for the conformation of the court, "shaping itself according to the need of the people and the times," its well-known division by Solomon into two courts. After referring to 2 Chron. xx. 5, and the various annexes, the cells, and the frequent defilement of this locality (2 Kings xxiii. 11, 12), he concludes thus: "The treading of the courts (Isa. i. 12) has now come to an end; the repentant people are ashamed of their sins, and draw near to their God in a new spirit, Ezek. xlii. 10. The new condition of the courts is a figure, an expression of the new condition of the community. (Comp. Zech. iii. 7; Rev. xi. 2.) Thus in Ezekiel's symbolism the new garnishing of the courts comes to view as the quickening anew, the glorious restoration of the community of Israel." [Comp. additional note on p. 388.—W. F.]

7. But the description in our vision begins with the gates, dwelling specially on the east gate. For the copiousness with which the gates are described, comp. ch. xliii. 11, xlviii. 31 sq. Hävernicks, against Röttcher, dwells on their significance (p. 641 sq.); makes them since Solomon have acquired under his successors the "disturbing character of the incidental;" remarks that the law says nothing definitely regarding them; points out the profane use to which they were put (Jer. xx. 2); and maintains that, on the contrary, "the prophet assigns to them a definite relation to the whole of the building, so that they are thoroughly in conformity with the idea of the building." But the contrast to ch. viii. and those that follow is to be very specially observed. "Brought to the gates of the temple, the prophet had been witness of the idol-worship prevalent there. And he had seen the Shechinah departing out of the east gate. To this we have now a beautiful and complete contrast. Henceforth Jehovah will no longer see the holy passages in and out so contemptuously desecrated and defiled (ch. xliii. 7 sq.); on the contrary, the holy bands that keep the feast and offer sacrifice shall go in and out with the prince of the people in their midst (ch. xlv. 3 sq.; comp. Rev. xxi. 25 sq.). But above all, the glory of Jehovah shall enter in by the east gate (ch. xliii. 1 sq.). Hence this gate is the pattern for all the others," etc.

8. From the relation on the whole to the temple of Solomon, Bunsen thinks that "in general the old temple was the model;" only, on the one hand, the disposition of the parts was "simpler and less showy," and on the other, "an effort was exhibited to attain to symmetry in the proportions and regularity in general." While Tholuck and others remark on "the colossal size" in different respects, as indicating the pre-eminence of the future community, Hengstenberg finds throughout "always very moderate dimensions." Unmistakeably there is a reference throughout to the temple which Ezekiel had seen with his own eyes; this explains the brevity and incompleteness partially attaching to the description, although in respect to the sanctuary proper this peculiarity of Ezekiel, who is otherwise so pictorial, demands some farther explanation. That the knowledge of the temple, whenever it could be supposed, is supposed in our vision (comp. on ch. xli.), especially when what was seen presented itself, as it were, in short-hand to the prophet, is only what we should naturally expect. But it corresponded also to the typology of Solomon and the glorious age of Solomon, which had entered so deeply into the consciousness of Israel, and was so popular, when Solomon's temple forms the foil for the still future revelation of glory and the form it assumes. Ezekiel's vision presupposes, indeed, that which it passes over in silence, but certainly not always that which it suppresses, as having to be supplied from the days of Solomon. A supposition of this kind is least of all permissible for the metallic ornaments, of which nothing whatever is said in passages in which, on the contrary, e.g. ch. xli. 22, what is made "of wood" is particularly mentioned, or when explanations are made, such, for example, as: "This is the table which is before Jehovah." The old is presupposed, and also something new and different is inserted in the old when not put in its place. What Hävernicks observes generally regarding the use made of the sacred symbols of the Old Testament and the allusions to the law by our prophet, may be applied to the way in which reference is made to Solomon's temple and the knowledge of it supposed: "He lives therein with his whole soul, but by the Spirit of God he is led beyond the merely legal consciousness, he rises superior to the legal symbolism," etc. In the prophetic description in the chapters before us, we can perceive a struggle as of a dawning day with the clouds of morning; and if something testifies to the derivation of our vision from a higher source than a fancy, however pious, would be, we may take that something to be the sudden advent of peculiar and quite unexpected lights, which have in them at least something strange and surprising in the case of Ezekiel, who was not only familiar with ancestral tenets and priestly tradition, but strongly attached to both. One might sometimes say a less than Solomon is here (Matt. xii. 42), and yet not be satisfied with Hengstenberg's reference to the troublous times in which temple and city were to be rebuilt, but (as Umbreit beautifully says) will feel constrained to take still more into consideration the "worth of the most significant inwardness" for "the poverty of the immediately succeeding times," in view of "the new temple for the new covenant," so that whatever of "apparently meagre simplicity" attaches to our temple-vision may have to be read according to the rule given in Matt. vi. 29. Umbreit aptly says: "In the interior of the abode of the Holy One of Israel, quite a different appearance indeed is presented from that in Solomon's temple, and the splendour of gold and brilliant hues is in vain sought for therein; no special mention is made of the sacred vessels, and only the altar of incense is changed into a table of the Lord, which, instead of all other symbols, simply suggests the purely spiritual impartation of the divine life. The ark of the covenant was destroyed by the fire of God, and our prophet no more than Jeremiah cared to know about a new one being made, as also, indeed, it was actually wanting in the so-called second temple. It is enough that the cherubim resume their place in the sanctuary, and, entering through the open doors, now fill the whole empty house, in which the distinctions of the old temple are very significantly left out; for we no longer see the veils, and the whole temple has become a holy of holies." In the same strain Hävernicks says: "If Jehovah wills to dwell among a new people, He must do so in a new manner, although in one analogous to the former. It is the same temple, but its precincts have become different, in order to contain a much more numerous people; and all the arrangements and adjustments here testify to the faithfulness and zeal with which the Lord is sought and served. The whole sacred temple area has become a holy of holies: in this temple there is no place for the ark of the covenant (Jer. iii. 16), instead of which comes the full revelation of the Shechinah." On the one hand, the legal form of worship is retained in every iota, or tacitly supposed; on the other, a new element, as with ch. xli. 22, almost exactly what Christendom calls "the Lord's table," sheds its light over everything previously existing. On the one hand, the numbers and proportions express a magnitude and beauty, a majestic harmony, surpassing both the "tent" and the "temple" (ch. xli. 1); on the other, there are unmistakable indications, as respects the μορφή του, in the simplicity and plainness of the whole and the parts, of an ἰσχυρὰ ἀνθρώπων γυνώσκουσα, a κρίσις, and κατακρίσις, and here and there even a hint is perceptible of the outward poverty of the Church in the last times. Moreover, as the temple of Ezekiel consolingly presented to those who returned from the exile, approaching the more closely to them as respects its human character, its divinity and spirituality in their temple building, so again it contained a sacred criticism in the splendid edifice erected by Herod 500 years later (of the immensa opulentia of which the Roman Tacitus speaks),—a criticism which He who walked in this last temple of Israel, and who was Himself the fulfilling of the temple, completed ἀπὸ πύλου, and ἀπὸ πύλου, πύλου.

9. The treatment of the side-building (ch. xli. 5 sq.), especially in its connection with the temple-house, and the detailed description, kept now first in due correspondence with the sanctuary, of the building on the gizrah (ch. xli. 12 sq.), are worthy of observation, although not so important as Hävernick makes them. With a touch of human nature, Hengstenberg connects the side-chambers with Ezekiel's dearest youthful reminiscences, reminding us at the same time of Samuel, who, as well as Eli, had even his bedroom in such a side-chamber of the tabernacle. According to Hävernick, Ezekiel's description is meant to keep the annexe in fairest proportion to the sanctuary itself, etc.; it is the perfect building, instead of the still defective and imperfect one described in 1 Kings vi. The side-building and the gizrah are evidently distinguished in relation to the temple as addition and contrast. The description, too, given of both, suggests a still farther realization of the temple-idea, as regards priestly service and other modes of showing reverence to God, and also of the "in spirit and in truth" for this future worship.

10. As to the temple of Ezekiel's vision considered æsthetically, Bähr's thoughtful analysis (Der sal. Tempel, pp. 7 sq., 269 sq.) is so much the more applicable, as this visionary temple is still more animated and dominated by the religious idea of Israel, which in its futurity is the Messianic idea. The temple before us is in the highest sense of the word music of the future, although only a variation of an old theme. The import of this old theme, Solomon's temple and the original tabernacle, will first find full expression in Ezekiel's temple, whether its measures and numbers are the old ones or different. We must not employ here the classical criterion of the beautiful; sensuous beauty of form is not to be found here. The adornment of the edifice is limited to cherubim and palms, either together or separate; and of the cherubim it must be granted that, æsthetically considered, they are figures the reverse of beautiful. We meet, however, with nothing tasteless or repulsive, like the dog or bird-headed human forms, the green and blue faces of the Egyptian gods, or the many-armed idols of the Indian cultus. But what a difference is there between the temple of Ezekiel's vision and the fancy edifice, for example, the description of which is to be found in the younger Titrel (strophe 311-415, edited by Hahn; comp. Sulp. Boisseree on the description of the temple of the Holy Grail, Munich 1834),—the wondrous sanctuary on Mont Salvage, in which the ideal German architecture consecrates its poetic expression under the influence of reminiscences of Rev. xxi. 11 sq.! (The chapel of the Holy Cross at Castle Karlstein, near Prague, presents to this day a partial imitation, and on a reduced scale, of the temple of the Grail.) A large fortress with walls and innumerable towers surrounds the temple of the Grail, like an extensive and dense forest of ebony trees, cypresses, and cedars. Instead of the guard-rooms (ch. xli.) and the express charge of the house (ch. xliiv.) of Ezekiel, are the guardians and protectors of the Grail,—the templars, a band of spiritual knights of the noblest kind, humble, pure, faithful, chaste men. And whatever of precious stones, imagery, gold, and pearls the poetic fancy was able to imagine, is collected around the shrine of the Holy Grail. In the heathen temple, with its attempts to represent the divine, and especially in the Greek temple, conformably to the innate artistic taste of the Greeks, with such beautiful natural scenery cherishing and demanding this taste, where sky, earth, and sea on every side suggest the divine as also the beautiful, the execution, form, and shape, distribution and arrangement of the parts, as well as all its decorations, correspond to the demands of æsthetics; but already in Solomon's temple the ethical-religious principle of the covenant, and consequently of the theocratic presence of Jehovah among His people, penetrates and pervades everything else. Thus the tabernacle, and also the whole temple building, culminates in the holy of holies, which contains the ark of the covenant with the tables of the law, and in which the atonement par excellence is completed. A relation like this, then, is served by any form which rather fulfils its office than strives after artistic configuration, and the form has answered its purpose, provided it only is a religiously significant form. "Solomon's temple," says Bähr, "cannot stand as a great work of art before the forum of the æsthetic." Human art in general goes along with nature, hence its mainly heathenish, its cosmic (κοσμος, "decoration") character. Jehovah, on the contrary, is holiness, and no necessity of nature of any kind, no nationality as such, no deification of nature, no magic consecration binds Him to Israel, but the freest covenant grace, which has as its aim the sanctification of Israel as His people, with a view to all mankind. That Phœnician artists executed the building of Solomon's temple (comp. for this the exhaustive critique of Bähr in the work quoted above, p. 250 sq.)—although (KRAUSE, die drei ältesten Kunstkunden der Freimaurer-brüderschaft, Dresden 1819) freemasonry makes grand masters after Solomon, who is held to represent the Father (omnipotence), King Hiram as Son (wisdom), and Hiram Abif as Spirit (harmony, beauty)—concerns chiefly the technical working in wood and metal. If the artistic execution, thus limited, of the temple decoration bore on it a Phœnician character, and the employment of table work coated with silver showed signs of Hither Asia in general, yet the Phœnician element, this mundane configuration, would not amount to much more than what the Greek language was, in which the gospel of the New Covenant, as well as that of the Old, came before the world. But a specifically Christian element, the really fundamental element in the first and oldest Christian church architecture, namely, that what is also called (it is true) "God's house" is simply an enclosure of the congregation (oikos: ἐκκλησία, τὸν ἐκκλησίαν οἶκος, domus ecclesie), is an approximation to the extension of the outer court in Ezekiel, which extension is quite in unison with the Christological method of our prophet, with the peculiar regard he pays to the people of the Messiah (Introd. § 9). Comp. 2 Cor. vi. 16; Eph. ii. 20 sq.; 1 Pet. ii. 4. The Christian community forms in future the house of God, the temple; as also its development, externally and internally, is in the New Testament called edification, building. Voltaire has declared that he could remember in all antiquity no public building, no national temple, so small as Solomon's; and J. D. Michaelis held that his house in Göttingen was larger; whereas Hengstenberg ascribes to Solomon's temple, "inclusive of the courts, an imposing size." The prominence given in Ezekiel to the east gate of the new temple, although the holy of holies still lies towards the west, may remind us of the projecting eastward of Christian church buildings from the earliest age, and especially of the Concha closing them on the east. As the glory of the God of Israel comes from the east (ch. xliii.), so in the east is the Dayspring from on high (Luke i. 78; the Sun of Righteousness, Mal. iii. 20 [iv. 2]), the Light of the world (John viii. 12; Isa. ix.), which has brought a new day, the precursor and pledge of the future new morning and day of eternal glory (Rom. xiii. 12; 2 Tim. iv. 8). If the light-concealing stained windows of the Middle Ages are not to be traced back to the parts shut up and covered in Ezekiel's temple, still the powerful tendency to elevation upwards, so appropriate to the Gothic style, has at least some support in the pillars (ch. xl. 14), and even suggests an ἀνά τοῦ ναοῦ (Phil. iii. 20; Col. iii. 1 sq.).

11. The designation of the temple in ch. xliii. as the place of Jehovah's throne, etc., might make us suppose the existence of the ark of the covenant, unless its significance as (to borrow Bähr's words) "centre, heart, root, and soul of the whole edifice" necessarily demanded an express mention, when, for example, we have in Ezekiel most exact accounts of the altars; comp. on ch. xli. 22. Solomon's temple (1 Kings viii.) first became what it was meant to be from the fact that the ark of the covenant came into it. But the post-exile temple had an empty holy of holies, as Tacitus (Hist. v. 9) relates of Pompey, that "he by his right as conqueror entered the temple, from which time it became known that no divine image was in it, but only an empty abode, and that there was nothing in the mystery of the Jews." (Comp. Josephus, Bell. Jud. v. 5. 5.) The most probable supposition is, that the ark of the covenant disappeared at the destruction of Solomon's temple, that it was consumed by fire. For the traditions of what became of it are mere myths; e.g. in 2 Macc. ii., that Jeremiah, among other things, by divine command hid the ark in a cave in Mount Nebo, but when they who had gone with him could not again find the place, he rebuked them, and pointed to the future, when the Lord would again be gracious to His people and reveal it to them, and the glory of the Lord and the cloud would appear as formerly. [The Mishna makes it be hid in a cave under the temple, a statement which the Rabbins endeavour to confirm from 2 Chron. xxxv. 3. Carpzov supposes the ark included in 2 Chron. xxxvi. 10, and holds that it was restored by Cyrus, Ezra i. 7; a statement which Winer rightly cannot find in that passage, but rather the reverse; while at the same time he is unable to agree with Hitzig, who concludes from Jer. iii. 16 that the ark of the covenant was no longer in existence even in the days of this prophet. According to the Mishna (Joma v. 2), there had been put in its place an altar-stone rising three fingers above the ground, on which the high priest on the great day of atonement set the censor.] That the symbolical designation of the temple expressed in Ezekiel with reference to the ark of the covenant is simply a legal technical term may be the more readily believed, as in certain respects in contrast thereto, at least in distinction therefrom (although this is strangely denied by Hengst.), the whole precincts of the temple, in consequence of the re-entrance of the glory of Jehovah, became a holy of holies in accordance with the law of this house; comp. on ch. xliii. 12. W. Neumann expounds Jer. iii. 16 of the new birth of Israel, when Jehovah will be glorified in the midst of His saints, that these shall no longer celebrate the ark of the covenant. He rejects the opinion of Abendana, who, from ver. 17 of the same chapter, inferred that the whole of Jerusalem is to be a holy dwelling-place, and holds to Rashi's view, that the entire community will be holy, and that Jehovah will dwell in its midst as if it were the ark of the covenant. "For the ark of the covenant as such is a symbolical vessel. As it contains within it the law, which testifies to the covenant (Deut. iv. 13, xxvi. 17 sq.), so the covenant-people are represented in it, the bearers of the law through worldly life, until the days when it shall be written on the hearts of the saints (Jer. xxxi. 31 sq.). The Capporeth represents the transformation of the creature transformed by Israel's perfection in the Lord (?), the new heavens and the new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness, Isa. lxvi. 22, 23. If this is the thought which lies at the root of the symbolism, then when the ark of the covenant is no longer kept in commemoration, the shadows of the Old Covenant have passed away, all has become new, and the redeemed are the holy seed (Isa. vi. 13), to whom Jehovah's law has become the law of their life." The eloquent silence in our prophet regarding the ark of the covenant will, moreover, be understood in respect to the man who speaks as Jehovah (comp. on ch. xliii. 7), that is, in a Messianic-christological sense, notwithstanding that Ezekiel's Christology (Introd. § 9) has the Messianic people principally in view.

12. Ezekiel's vision rests throughout on the law of Moses. Were it otherwise in our chapters, Ezekiel could have been no prophet of Israel, nor the Mosaic law the law of God. This legal character was, moreover, well adapted to put an arrest on a mere fancy portraiture, if not to make it altogether impossible. As to the departure from the law of Moses, which, however, he must concede, Philipsson maintains that it is "not great," and "is limited to the number of victims" (!?). Hengstenberg denies any difference, calling it merely "alleged." On the other hand, Hävernicks, with whom many agree, speaks of Ezekiel's "many differences and definitions going beyond the law of the Old Covenant," while at the same time he rejects the idea that the prophet forms the transition to the farther improved system of the Pentateuch (VATKE), and affirms against J. D. Michaelis the unchangeable character of the law of Moses. Hävernicks says: "These discrepancies rather show with so much the more stringent necessity, that a new condition of things is spoken of in the prophet, in which the old law will continue in glorious transformation, not abrogated, but fulfilled and to be fulfilled, coming into full truth and reality." Bunsen speaks to this effect: "Ezekiel's design was to make the ritual more spiritual, and to break the tyranny of the high-priesthood. For mention is nowhere made of a high priest, whereas a high-priestly obligation, although slightly relaxed, is laid upon the priests (ch. xlv. 22). The daily evening sacrifice falls away, and among the yearly feasts we miss Pentecost and the Great Day of Atonement, all which accords with the absence of the high priest and the ark of the covenant; instead of these comes an additional feast of atonement at the beginning of the year (ch. xlv. 18 sq.), and the amount of the morning sacrifice and the festal sacrifices is enhanced. There is, indeed, much reference to the original law throughout, and it is anew set forth with respect to transgressions and abuses that had crept in, special weight being laid on the precepts concerning clean and unclean (ch. xlv. 17 sq.; comp. ch. xxii. 26); but still more does Ezekiel go beyond the law, and gives additional force to its precepts." We must call to mind the position generally of prophecy to the law of Moses. As prophecy is provided for in the law in the proper place (comp. our Comment on Deut. p. 134), namely, when Moses' departure demanded it, so its foundation is traced back in Deut. xviii. 16 sq. to Sinai, and thus it is thenceforth comprehended historically in the legislation. But although it thus stands and falls with the law, having by its own account, like all the institutions of Israel, its norm in the law, yet it rejoices in its extraordinary fellowship with God, its divine endowment and inspiration. And this not in order, like the priesthood, to teach after the letter, and to serve in the ceremonial; but the provision made and charge given already on Mount Sinai, as they make the official duty of prophecy to be the representation of God's holy will against every other will, so they give to it the character of a legitimate as well as legitimized officiality, which, like Moses, has to serve as the chosen means of intermediation in relation to the will of the Most High Lawgiver revealing itself; the calling is ordained in Israel for the continuity of the divine legislation. This latter qualification of the prophets of Jehovah in Israel afforded a foundation for their deepening of the legal worship, as opposed to hypocrisy and torpid formality, for their spiritual interpretation of the ceremonial; as, in view of their position towards the future, a consideration of the ecclesiastical and civil law in their bearing on the future followed as a matter of course. The idea which for this end dominates Ezekiel's closing vision is the holiness of Jehovah, and the corresponding sanctification of Israel, their separation to Jehovah as a possession. It is the root idea which the law expresses and symbolizes in all its forms, whether of morality, worship, or polity. And as it is said already in Ex. xix.: "Ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests," so it is also said in 1 Pet. ii. of the Christian community, that they who are lively stones are built up a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God through Jesus Christ (comp. ver. 9). Peter thus makes a New Testament use of the same mode of expression regarding worship, which, carried out in Old Testament form, is Ezekiel's representation of Jehovah's service of the future, when Jehovah shall dwell for ever in His people. Comp. ch. xx. 40. Ezekiel's position, therefore, to the law of Moses is not that of freedom from legal restraints,—a position which might be subjective and arbitrary,—but what he applies from the law for the illustration of the future, and the way in which he does so, passing by some things, more strongly emphasizing others, or putting them into new shapes, derives its legal justification from the idea of the law as it shall be realized in a true Israel, that is, the Messianic Israel. That the Messiah, who says in John xvii.: "And for them I sanctify myself, that they also may be sanctified in truth," remains as a person in the background, is quite in correspondence with Ezekiel's Christology (Introd. § 9), which, as already said, characterizes the times and the salvation of the Messiah through the Messianic people.

13. "The proper significance of the new temple lies in the full revelation of Jehovah in His sanctuary, in the new and living fellowship into which God enters with His people by this His dwelling among them" (Häv.). As being a return, which it is in relation to ch. xi., the entrance of the glory of the Eternal has, although with a New Testament application, corresponding to the: ἐγὼ μὲν ἔμωον παρὰς τὰς ἡμέρας τὰς τὴν συντάξιαν τοῦ αἰῶνος (Matt. xxviii. 20), also its Apocalyptic significance, as John says before the close of his Revelation (ch. xxii.): ἐγὼ ἔρχομαι, κομίζω Ἴησοῦν.

14. If the idea of the court is unquestionably that of the people, whose Messianic perfection as Israel Ezekiel is to behold, then, since everything on the mountain of the vision here is "most holy" (ch. xliii. 12), the immediately following detailed description of the altar of burnt-offering and its consecration can only point to the future manifestation of Jehovah's holiness and the sanctification of His peculiar people (1 Pet. ii. 9). "What holds good of the altar refers also to the whole court; the blessing of the altar includes in it that of the community. By means of the expiation of the altar, the purpose of the divine love, to see a holy people assembled, is effected. The first act, consequently, in which the significance of the new sanctuary is expressed, is the complete expiation of the people, and its efficacy in this respect far surpasses in extent and glory that of the old sanctuary" (Häv.). Accordingly, if they who are sanctified are perfected εἰς τὸ θεῖον by the προσφορά μύα (Heb. x. 14), the full and complete offering on Golgotha, then the idea also of this altar of burnt-offering upon the very high mountain must be fulfilled. But as the offering which fulfils is the most personal priestly offering, so the sanctification of the people in Ezekiel's typical temple takes place on the altar of burnt-offering in the priests' court, which therefore still remains separated from the court of the people, as in Solomon's temple, whereas in the tabernacle there was only one court. The symbolical representation of the dominant idea of the sanctification of the people was, from their being represented by the priests, rightly localized in a priests' court, which gives it due prominence here, where everything hinges on locality and arrangement. Thus also, as Bahr observes, in the camp of Israel the priestly family in its four main branches encamped close around the sanctuary on its four sides. [Comp. with this section the Additional Note on ch. xliii. 13-27, p. 410.—W. F.]

15. As the shutting of the east gate (ch. xliv.) for the future puts the key of Ezekiel's temple into the hand of Him who, according to the typology of the law and the prediction of the prophets, is the Coming One of Israel, so the prince's sitting and eating in the east gate must be taken as throwing light on the Messianic future of the people of the promise. It is very evident that by the "prince" is not to be understood the high priest of Israel. This interpretation, which was a Maccabean prolepsis, has now been abandoned. Kliefoth, Keil, and Hitzig justly dispute the indefinite sense which Hävernicks gives to the נָשִׂיא, yet they do not sufficiently attend to what may be said in defence of Hävernicks' indefiniteness, and which certainly tells against those who make the future theocratic ruler to be one with the King David of ch. xxxiv. and xxxvii., because he too is called נָשִׂיא, as indeed he is also called מֶלֶךְ. They must own, however, that there is a difference between: "My servant David shall be king over them," between the "one shepherd" who is "prince for ever," and the נָשִׂיא here, who comes into consideration quod נָשִׂיא. Now if this must be granted, then it is only with justice that Hävernicks observes that the designation נָשִׂיא sets before us the original, or, as he calls it, "the purely natural constitution of the Israelites" (Ex. xxii. 27 [28]), although not so much because "the time of the exile had again limited the people to this original constitution, or left them only a poor remainder of it," as because, looking, as in our vision we always should do, at the Messiah and His times, the discrepancy between theocracy and kingly power, which showed itself at the rise of the latter under Samuel, is to be adjusted on the original ground of the peculiarity of Israel. The נָשִׂיא is the prince of the tribe, as the tribal constitution of Israel put the juridical power and the executive into the hands of the natural superiors, the heads of families and tribes. And even when in time of need, as in the days of the judges, a dictatorship, the power of one over all others, is had recourse to, it is potestas delegata, and is on both sides considered as nothing else. With a tribal constitution such as the natural constitution of Israel was, the want of an outward centrum unitatis might in itself be painfully felt, and the instituting of one be looked on as a political necessity; but that for Israel the necessity of the time as such should have demanded a permanent institution of the kind, is strikingly refuted by the days of the judges, for the present aid of Jehovah answered to the momentary distress, and raised up the competent helper from out of the tribes of Israel,—“then when they entreated and wept, the faithfulness of God helped them, and sooner than they supposed all distress was over,”—just as the former examples of Moses and Joshua showed that in the Israelitish theocracy the right men were not wanting at the right time. Jehovah alone, as on another side the fundamental canon of the priesthood still held up before the people, claimed as His due to be Israel's king in political respects also. Originally there could be beside Him no other political sovereign, but merely the institution, in subordination to Him, of the princes of the tribes, and a sort of hegemony of a single tribe. The unity of the religious sentiment, which made the twelve externally separate tribes internally one community, had in earlier times made up for the want of an external centrum unitatis, and the free authority of certain individual representatives of this sentiment was quite in harmony therewith. Hence Jehovah says in 1 Sam. viii.: “They have not rejected thee, but they have rejected Me, that I should not reign over them.” Thus the demand of the people requesting a king must, having regard to Samuel, who occupied in Israel a position similar to that of Moses, be looked on as a symptom of disease, although the disease was one of development. We may concede to the elders of Israel who come before Samuel, Samuel's age, which they urge; and still more, as the occasion of their demand, the evil walk of his sons. We can point to the picture exhibited in the later period of the judges, when everything, even the temporary alliance of individual tribes, appears to be in a state of dissolution; we can along therewith take into account the pride of Ephraim, in whose midst the sanctuary stood, and to whose claims of superiority, even over Judah, all the tribes were more or less compelled to bow. Nay, even in the law (Deut. xvii. 14 sq.), where it refers to the future taking possession of Canaan, the future development of an Israelitish kingdom is taken into view by Jehovah Himself, and the very form foreseen in which the demand came to Samuel: “I will set a king over me, like all the nations that are about me.” But although this possible desire of the people, because tolerated, is not expressly blamed, yet neither the self-derived resolution there: “when thou sayest: I will,” etc., nor the pattern: “like all the nations that are about me,” is spoken of approvingly; nor can there be behind the emphatic command: “thou shalt in any wise set him to be king over thee whom Jehovah thy God shall choose,” anything but a presupposed conflict with the kingly authority of Jehovah, against which provision must be made in the very outset. Accordingly, when Jehovah Himself takes into view the earthly kingship for Israel, He does so in a way not very different from what Christ says in Matt. xix. regarding the Mosaic permission of divorce because of Israel's hard-heartedness: ἀπὸ ἀρχῆς διὰ τὴν σκληροκαρδίαν αὐτῶν. But Jehovah is the Physician of Israel, who (Num. xxi.) made Moses set the brazen serpent on a pole, as a remedy against the bite of the fiery serpents. That which expresses to the full the sentiment of the people under Samuel is also the undisguised: "like all the nations;" with this their request before Samuel closes emphatically as its culminating point. Although to Samuel the thing that personally concerned him: "that he may judge us," which they gave as their object in the case of the king to be appointed, was displeasing, was in his eyes the bad element in the request, Jehovah first set the matter before him in the light that in His eyes the request for the "king" (מֶלֶךְ) was rather a rejection of

His reigning over them, and explained to him the: "like all the nations," in the mouth of the elders of the people, by their hereditary disposition: "they forsook Me, and served other gods." Kingly power, such as the heathen nations have from early times, is a necessary self-defence of polytheism against its own divisive and centrifugal elements in the realm of politics; it is a socialistic attempt to arrange a life in community, and that is to unite, both to make the internal unity and order strong and powerful externally, and to keep them so. For מֶלֶךְ, from מָלַךְ, is derived from: "judging," as still attested by the Syriac signification: "to advise," and also by the fact that the kingly power in Israel arose from that of the judges: the ruler is he who stands over the opposing parties, over the strife, he who unites; very different from whom is מַשְׁלֵט, the tyrant, מָרַךְ, the coming to power by the right of the strongest. Thus kingly power is from the first peculiar to heathenism; and because the boundary between the human and the divine is to the heathen consciousness a fluctuating one, kingship, especially in connection with the idolatrous worship thereof which grew up among the heathen nations, comes to be regarded as the contrast to the theocratic relations of the monotheistic people of Israel. Accordingly, when the people of Jehovah ask a king such as all the nations have (comp. 1 Sam. viii. 20), this indicates that the theocratic consciousness is darkened and weakened in them; and thus a visible king appears necessary to them, because the invisible Ruler has, as it were, disappeared from their view. In times of religious and moral insensibility, inquiries are always directed to the political constitution; not to the state of society, but to the civil arrangements. And when Israel, forgetting the divine national prerogative they had enjoyed since leaving Egypt, placed themselves on a level with the heathen, then they must have looked on themselves with eyes like those of the heathen; it could not but occur to them, that in comparison with heathen monarchy they were, as Ziegler says, "a people poorly and weakly organized, visibly only republican, and therefore easy to be overcome by the heathen, whose power was concentrated in monarchy." Thus Israel's disease in desiring a monarchy "like the nations" was, that they had become infected by the political miasma of the polytheistic spirit of the age. For while the first king of Israel, Saul, very soon entered on the path of the heathen, the monarchy which is in accordance with the law of Israel first assumes shape with David, and then chiefly internally, and with Solomon, and then almost entirely externally. This, too, explains the significance of these two types of kings for the Messianic idea. Ziegler calls David: "the king among kings." "He comprehended thoroughly the office of a king in a theocracy; he was the best mediator between the people and Jehovah. Because he was the servant of Jehovah, he was also the lawful king. Through him the kingdom became the very best means for attaining to the divine purposes." Comp. Doct. Reflec. 14, etc. on ch. xxxiv., and Doct. Reflec. 21 on ch. xxxvii. But already with David—so that Solomon's sinking down from the greatest external kingly glory into the surrounding polytheism, and the after-division of the royal power through its being broken into two kingdoms, only furnish the foil to it—the wider and higher future of Israel was founded in spirit, namely, as this future should be realized in the Messiah. According to the flesh, the Coming One of Israel is the son of David; according to the spirit of Messianic prophecy, David is the historico-personal basis, its personal foundation, a thoroughly prophetic personality; as Ziegler says: "Partly inasmuch as he is manifestly a τύπος του μελλόντος in many phases of his character and life, even in the minute particulars,—that, like Christ, he began his official career in his thirtieth year, and that he went weeping over the Kedron, and ascended the Mount of Olives with covered head; but also partly because in his psalms he manifests himself a prophet in the narrower sense of the word, a prophet who by his psalms really adds new elements of revelation to the old, his prophecies entering into the most minute details, his Son is the Spirit of his poetry. If the people were comprehended in Moses as the κράτος as to the law, we may say of David that they are gathered together in him as to the theocratic kingdom." Hence these are far-seeing divine thoughts, and bearing special reference to the Messianic salvation which in 1 Sam. viii. Jehovah repeatedly urged upon Samuel, viz. to listen to the voice of the people, although the people will not at all listen to Samuel's voice. Not that Israel had, as Ziegler supposes, to be set by the monarchy on a level with heathenism in order to be preserved in the world,—for it was just the monarchy that destroyed its national existence, by drawing it into the politics of the great world,—but (and this is the sole object in view in the law regarding the king in Deut. xvii.) the possible conflict with Jehovah's royal dominion over Israel was guarded against by this, that in the Israelitish monarchy, especially as represented by David personally and by Solomon regally, Jehovah made His "Anointed" for eternity assume a preparatory shape, that is, filled the heathen-political form of government, which might be and still more might become such a contrast to the true, the theocratic Israel, with that which is the final purpose of God's dominion over Israel (just as already to the patriarchs kings were promised as their descendants). Accordingly in Deuteronomy also, as the Israelitish kingship rises up as on the foundation of the judgeship, so, parallel therewith, and in connection with the priestly office, the prophetic office rises up as a continuation of the revelation by Moses (מֹשֶׁה or מֹשִׁיחַ, Deut. xviii.), in whom, according to Peter, was the πρωτοπρεσβυτερος. And not less significantly does "the prince" in Ezekiel sit and eat in the gate, through which the glory of Jehovah had entered, and which it has Messianically sanctified. With him Israel appears again as what it was, just as the elders of Israel asked from Samuel a king like the nations, to be chief representative of Israel according to its tribal constitution; he who can be styled directly מֶלֶךְ,¹ will be so in

Messianic consecration and sanctification, so that Christian kingship might be symbolized. Umbreit observes: "Whereas at first every particular tribe had its Nasi, they now are all reunited under a single one. Thus an old name, and yet again new in its signification." From this Umbreit infers a prince "clothed with great splendour" (?), like another Melchizedek, who may combine well the rights of the state and of the Church in one spirit," etc. etc. Yet surely Hävernicks is right in finding indicated here the "true and complete harmony of civil and ecclesiastical order in the days of the Messiah." "Christ has no vicar; to no one but Himself shall the kingdoms of the world belong; but to pious princes (to princes as they ought to be), to lawful magistrates and lords, pertains a prerogative over the faithful, which again is a duty and a service" (Cocc.). Comp. what is said on this point in the exposition of ch. xlv. 2. [See also Additional Note on p. 417.]

16. In regard to the priests of Ezekiel's temple, Hengstenberg thinks the prophet "wishes to draw away the view from the dreary present,—the priests without prospect of office, the ruins of the priesthood,—and, on the contrary, presents to the eye priests in office and honour, in whom the Mosaic ordinances are again in full exercise and authority; and next he wishes to labour for the regeneration of the priesthood." It is only surprising, when in accordance with Hengstenberg's general view of our chapters the fancy is worked on here too by ideas of Mosaic priests, that the idea of the high priest is wanting, that this most powerful impression is disregarded. But as regards the removal of the degradation of the pre-exile priesthood, the mention of Zadok sets forth too prominently for this end just the age of David and Solomon. Ezekiel's priests certainly are Mosaic priests, but the Mosaic priests had a people to represent of whom it is said in Ex. xix. 6: "Ye shall be unto Me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation" (at the passover the whole people acted as priests); so that it is certainly Mosaic, although according to the inmost idea of the Mosaic law, when the people of the future are in Ezekiel specially represented by the priests. But it is quite peculiar to Ezekiel, that, in order duly to set forth the sanctification of the people by the lofty holiness of their priests, the high priest appears in certain respects absorbed into the priests, and these are represented in a high-priestly aspect. As the people are dealt with in ch. xlv. 6 sq. for the bad priests set to keep the charge of Jehovah's holy things (ver. 8), so the exemplification of priestly instruction of the people given in ver. 23 is that of the true priests' teaching to discern the difference between the holy and the profane, the unclean and the clean:

¹ It will each time be a more definite person, but that does not determine who it will be: only this perhaps is implied, that each nation may retain what is natural to it, what accords with its special character and historic development. The Bible declares neither a church constitution nor a state constitution; but in Ezekiel there is symbolized what in every constitution, in itself human, ought to be the shining, the higher: the humanly highest one (מֶלֶךְ) sits and eats in the east gate of the Highest, of Jehovah.

the high-priestly sanctity of the priests is to serve for a high-priestly sanctification of the people; the high-priestly idea is to become a national reality, just as the aggregate of these Old Testament letters (for which comp. Zech. vi.) is the fulfilling word of the "body of Christ" as the Church. For the figure of Zadok, the typical high priest, taken from the very specially Messianically-typical age of David and Solomon, corresponds to only such a Messianic prospect. Zadok's sons are called the true priests of the people, just as the true Shepherd of the people (ch. xxxiv. and xxxvii.) is a descendant of David. And here we have a parallel exactly similar to that of Jer. xxxiii., where the continuance of the Levitical priesthood is guaranteed in like manner as the continuance of the race of David, and similarly as to the increase of both,—in which respect there shall, according to Isa. lxi., be taken of the Gentiles for priests and for Levites; and so in this way the position of priests among the Gentiles, promised to Israel in Isa. lxi., fulfils itself as a universal priestly position. Hävernicks makes a "special" blessing for the priesthood be connected with the "general blessing of the theocracy," inasmuch as "not its hitherto meagre (?) form," but the priestly office, "as a faithful expression of the idea inherent in it, will be established in perpetuity;" and he compares Mal. iii. 8: "A new priesthood, made anew by the power of the Lord, arises on the soil of the Old Testament priesthood in the new theocracy;" just as Ezekiel's main concern is "the priestly office in general," so also the idea "of a really spiritual priesthood" comes to light in his writings, etc. When Hengstenberg compares Pa. xxiv. for the reformation of the priesthood, we observe that the "demands on His people," spoken of there "from the coming of the Lord of glory," are no specially priestly demands, but are addressed to the whole house of Israel; and the same is really the case with Isa. xl., which he also cites. The Messianic references of the priesthood of the sons of Zadok, whereby (neither by Zadok personally, nor by Samuel) the prophetic word spoken to Eli (1 Sam. ii. 27 sq.) is fulfilled, is not only maintained by the Fathers, but also by Keil;¹ comp. on 1 Sam. ii. 35 sq. The Berleburg Bible observes: "As in the person of Solomon the Spirit of prophecy pointed to the true and anointed Solomon, so also in this priest it points to the great High Priest, Jesus Christ." Hengst. remains "quite on the ordinary priestly ground; the prospect into the New Testament relations remains completely closed." According to him, the prophet has to do only with what is "to be accomplished after brief delay," etc. On the other hand, Umbreit says: "The priesthood is quite in accordance with the transformation of the house of God. The old class of mediators between Jehovah and His people, consecrated by descent, has disappeared, and we no more find the high priest than we find the ark of the covenant. Instead of the Levites, who, together with the people, have to bear the guilt of the profanation of the covenant, there have come now only the inwardly worthy, the sons of Zadok, who should fulfil their significant name by maintaining fidelity in this ideal sense; and the supreme enhanced law of the new priesthood is the maintaining of inward purity from every outward stain, etc. Their outward support is the holy gift of Jehovah, so that they can say with the godly man in Ps. xvi.: 'Jehovah is my portion and my cup; my lot has fallen to me in pleasant places' (ver. 5 sq.)." [Comp. Additional Note at pp. 419, 420.]

17. The temple building, with its sacred architecture on the basis of the first tabernacle, as Solomon's temple most richly displays it, symbolizes essentially the same as that which in the priesthood of the temple of Ezekiel's vision is illustrated liturgically by the ministrations in this temple. For the accomplished dwelling of the Holy One in Israel proclaims His people to be a sanctified, and therefore a holy people. These are the worshippers that the Father desires (John iv.), a kingdom of priests, or a royal priesthood (1 Pet. ii.); just as the "prince," representing the people civilly and politically, fulfils his idea in King-Messiah; while the priests, the "sons of Zadok," represent them ecclesiastically and spiritually. This is the purpose and constitution of Israel, the people of God. What the temple is "in spirit," the representation by the priesthood of the new temple gives "in truth," that is, in faithfulness and truthness of life. In the former, everything is most holy; in the latter, all are high-priestly. But in Christ the idea to be represented is realized in so much the more priestly a manner, because we have here the community of the Lord, the קהילה, where, in the case of Israel, was the congregation of the people, the עדה, the קהל. We might, moreover, find some difficulty in reconciling the omissions, and also the occasional so pregnant additions and stricter definitions taken from the idea of the law, in the ordinances regarding the priesthood, with what Hengst. maintains, namely, that the aim is, "by a few well-chosen strokes, to bring out the thought of the restoration of the Mosaic priesthood in its customs and its rights," while it has been so easy for the exposition (which comp.) to show the prominence given throughout to the priestliness and sanctity of the priests' office and the priestly order with reference to the people to be represented. As, moreover, the prince is, in ch. xlv., advanced to a privileged relation to the sanctuary (comp. ch. xlv. 13 sq.), so along with teaching, instruction, especially in holiness (בין קדש לחל) and sanctification

(בין קדש לחל, ch. xlv. 23), the settlement of disputes by the judgment of God, the establishing of righteousness (as is perhaps indicated in the name "Zadok"), is specified in ver. 24 among the official duties of the priests. The prince eats in the east gate in the enjoyment of peace; the priests have always to restore peace.

18. As, on the one hand, the burnt-offering is the predominant note in this temple-system of the future, so, on the other, in ch. xlv. "oblation" is said in reference to the whole land. It is the same idea of devotion to Jehovah which is expressed by both,—the national life consecrated to the Lord in fellowship with Him (comp. the sacrificial feasts, in the east gate, of the prince of this people), Israel's state of grace. The disquisition on the oblation of holiness, etc., preliminary to ch. xlvii. and xlviii., and for which ch. xlv. 28 sq. furnishes the occasion, is significant from the very fact of being thus occasioned. For where priests and Levites are taken account of expressly according to their ministry in relation to Jehovah (ch. xlv.), there the whole house of Israel (ver. 6), and the prince in particular, with their portions of land, appear in the light of sacred property belonging to Jehovah, and also as His servants, who, while His more peculiar servants, the priests, are to see to holiness and sanctification, have to endeavour after judgment and righteousness. In this way the new nationality dedicated to the Lord (chiefly by the burnt-offering, and symbolized by the "oblation") has to exhibit itself in civil, social, and secular life. It is actually a new nationality in relation to land and people; but, considered by itself, and apart from ch. xlv. 28 sq., it appears to mean the division of the land, and especially the "oblation." Spring has come, yea, the fields are now already white for the harvest (John iv.). The "oblation of holiness" announces itself as the commencement of the future harvest. EWALD: "The holy portion, which is previously taken from the rest of the land (like the tithes from the fruits of the field), and set apart for its own special purpose, is here very expressively mentioned in the outset, and with manifest reference to the now completed description of the temple (ver. 2; comp. ch. xlii. 20); while the prophet evidently hastens more quickly over the portions connected therewith of the common Levites and the city of Jerusalem, in order to come to the portion and duties of the prince," etc.

19. Hävernick says on ch. xlv.: "After the description of a so newly reviving order of things in church matters, it appears as a matter of course that the land itself must be treated as a new land, and stand in need of a new special division. This division stands in a converse relation to that under Joshua. While at that time the people before all, each particular tribe, receive their portion, and not until afterwards was a fixed seat in the land assigned to Jehovah, here Jehovah first of all receives a holy gift, which is presented to Him. A portion of land is separated for the sanctuary and the priests, and one of equal size for the Levites. The new temple is moreover kept separate by a kind of suburb, in order to point out its special holiness."

20. The design of the Mosaic regulation, according to which priests and Levites, especially the latter, were to dwell dispersed among all the tribes, whereby the curse formerly uttered with respect to Levi by Jacob in his blessing of the patriarchs (Gen. xlix.) became fulfilled as a blessing for Levi and for all Israel, was to settle the tribe among Israel in accordance with its calling. Bähr says: "If the Levites were to preserve the law and word of God, and thereby spread religious knowledge, promote religious life, pronounce judicial decisions in accordance therewith, etc., then it was not only suitable, but necessary, that they should not all dwell in one place, in one district. Their dwelling dispersed reminded them to spread the light of the fear of God and piety among the whole people, to give preference to no tribe, and to neglect none." On this we observe, that it is certainly not to be looked on as an abolition of the Mosaic ordinance that in Ezekiel priests and Levites are all concentrated in one place,—the negation of the former would necessarily have to be formally announced,—but the fulfilment simply comes in place of the former arrangement, inasmuch as the end proposed by that arrangement and regulation is present with and in the future Church. Hengst. thinks the relation of the priests and Levites to the sanctuary is meant to be made clear by their concentration in its neighbourhood. But already before this the cities of the priests at least were to be found in those tribal districts which lay nearest to the place of worship. The idea from which the grouping of the priests and Levites around the sanctuary has to be understood is rather what Jeremiah predicts: that they shall no more teach every man his brother, etc., that from the least to the greatest they all shall know Jehovah (ch. xxxi. 34). The aim of dividing Levi among all the tribes, viz. to care for, preserve, and spread abroad everywhere the law and the testimony, is thus attained. The people of the future will be such that their liturgical representation and the dwelling of their priests and Levites in the neighbourhood of the temple suffice; and besides, this significantly brings out the thought that Levi, this election from the elect people, is a "people of God in the people of God" (BÄHR). For, what was designed by the appointed cities, in which we already see them collected while they were dispersed among all the tribes, is fully accomplished in the land of the priests and the Levites (ch. xlv.); and if Bähr's interpretation of the number of the 48 cities of the priests and Levites as referring to the sanctuary (Symb. d. moe. Kul. ii. p. 51) needed confirmation, it might have it here, where what this interpretation makes of Levi's dwelling in the midst of Israel is expressly stated of the dwelling-place of the priestly Levites: "a holy place for the sanctuary" (ver. 4). Accordingly it is with this diversity as respects the Mosaic law, which Philippon calls "the real" diversity, exactly as Christ says in Matt. v.: "I am come not to destroy (καταλυναι), but to fulfil," and that: "not one jot or one tittle shall pass from the law till all be fulfilled."

21. The sanctuary, the land of the priests and Levites, and the prince's portion, form almost the centre of the land. The city does not include the sanctuary, but is situated beside it, also in the midst of the land. "No jealousy about the possession of them can any longer separate the tribes" (HAY.). "This whole district," says Bunsen, "is not to lie in the territory of a single tribe, which might thereby appear privileged, but, as accords with its sanctity, is separated from the tribal territories. In other words, the union-authority of the confederacy is to have a special seat for manifesting its activity. No wiser political idea could be devised. Hence Jerusalem still remains Jerusalem, but it no longer belongs to Benjamin." The central sanctuary is that which unifies also the tribes of Israel, just as the priesthood, royalty, and public property grouped around it give local expression to the unity and oneness of the whole. Instead of the "violence-inflicting and heaven-assailing tower of Babel" (NETELER), "the tabernacle of Shem" has become "a divine sanctuary," which then no longer symbolizes solely Jehovah's dwelling in Israel, but is at the same time a type for mankind in general of His tabernacle with men (Rev.

xxi. 3), and of their being united to and under Him. Comp. the Doct. Reflec. on ch. xlvii., xlviii.

22. Chiliasm—and this is conceivable of the Jewish Chiliasm, whereas such a final Judaism cannot but prove injurious to modern Christian Chiliasm (Gal. iii. 3)—forgets, while studying these closing chapters of our prophet, the beginning of his prophecy, the cosmic character of ch. i., which relates to creation generally, and on which the whole book is based. But indeed if πας Ἰσραὴλ in Rom. xi. is the people, i.e. Israel after the flesh, then it is only logically consistent to interpret the quickening in ch. xxxvii. as a bodily resurrection of all dead Jews. Those who are raised become by this fact, or as at one stroke, converted to Christ; those who are alive are Christians already, or will become so in consequence of this; and this whole Israel returns to Palestine, and forms in a transformed state, as it is already marked out for being by this awakening, the focus of the "millennial kingdom" for fresh salvation to all nations. It is illogical to wish to pick out one piece here, and to understand another merely spiritually; but he who here says A must also say B. Whether the converted Jews are to live in their own land, "under kings of the house of David, as a people who are to be preserved and finally also converted," as Kliefoth allows to be the doctrine of Scripture, or whether King David will then return and rule over Israel in glory, is rather an antiquarian than a theological question. Scripture teaches none of these fancies; nor does it speak of a kingdom of glory in the earthly Jerusalem, in which the Gentile Church is to be joined to Israel under the dominion of the then reappeared Christ-Messiah (as Baumgarten). According to the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, it has been the destination of Israel, as the people separated from all nations from the time of their first fathers, to be a blessing to mankind. And the more its national theocracy expanded itself to universal Christocracy, which comprehended also the Gentiles under the blessing of the Messiah, the more evidently there becomes exhibited in Israel, with its ecclesiastical and political forms, the preformation of an Israel which wholly is what Israel exhibits only in type,—a people of God that comprehends the redeemed, the saints of all mankind; in which accordingly, as to its worship, and as to its nationality in general, traced back to its original idea, and also viewed with respect to its future realization, the whole and (what is specially emphasized) every part always exhibits holiness and sanctification, the service of the holy God in spirit and in truth (Ps. xxii. 28 [27] sq., xlvii. 10 [9], cii. 16 [15] sq.; Isa. xxvi. 2, li. ix.; Luke i. 17; Rom. ix. 24 sq.; 2 Cor. vi. 16; Tit. ii. 14; 1 Pet. ii. 5 sq., 9, 10, etc.). Nation and nationality are historical and hence perishable colourings of the idea of mankind, which have entirely faded since the eternal idea of Israel has been fulfilled in Christ, in whom there is neither Jew nor Greek (Gal. iii.), but man, the new man (Eph. ii.) ἡ δικαιοσύνη καὶ ἡ βασιτεία τοῦ ἀληθοῦς. What could be fulfilled according to the letter—which, however, is the expression borne by the spirit of fulfilment—has been fulfilled in the people of Israel by their rising and revival from the graves of the exile, by their return thenceforth to Canaan under Judah as "Jews," by the period of the Maccabees, certainly in historical prelude only to the ideal, the entire, true fulfilment of the spirit-letter in the kingdom of God through Christ; according to which fulfilment the elect people are the people of the elect from all mankind, and the Jewish people now neither exist as a people, nor have a future such as Klicfoth would assign to them, namely, to be "holy in the same way that every Christianized nation (!) now is," for ἵδιαις ἰσ' αὐτοὺς ἡ ἔργη τις τοῦτος (1 Thess. ii. 16). For the Church of God in Christ, so far as it belongs to this world, the representation of its spiritual life in a service of atoning sacrifices and cleansings, as here in Ezekiel, can be no antithesis; for still, according to Heb. xii., the ὑπερισπαστος ἀμαρτία has to be laid aside, and (James iii. 2) πολλὰ πταίσματα ἄνθρωποις (comp. Ezek. xlv. 20). But to Ezekiel no other representation of the future could be given than in types of the sacred past of Israel—as of its law, so of the Davidic royalty and of Canaan as the land of promise. "But however prominent," observes Keil, "is the Old Testament clothing of the Messianic prophecy in Ezekiel, yet even in this guise lineaments are found by which we recognise that the Israelitish-theocratic guise is only the drapery in which is concealed the New Testament form of the kingdom of God;" and he very justly refers to 1 Pet. i. 10 sq., while he farther says: "Even although the prophets, in their uninspired meditations on what they had prophesied as moved by the Holy Ghost, may not have known the typical signification of their own utterances, yet we who live in the times of fulfilment, and know not only the beginning in the appearing of our Lord, etc., but a considerable course of the fulfilment too in the eighteen hundred years' spread of the kingdom of heaven on earth, have not so much to inquire after what the Old Testament prophets thought in their searching into the prophecies with which they were inspired by the Holy Ghost,—if these thoughts of theirs could be in any way ascertained,—but we have to inquire, in the light of the present measure of fulfilment (comp. 2 Pet. i. 19), what the Spirit of Christ, which enabled the prophets to behold and prophesy the future of His kingdom in figures of the Old Testament kingdom of God, has announced and revealed to us by these figures." Apart from the occasional references of Ezekiel's representation to paradise, to the first creation (comp. on ch. xxxvi. 35, xvi. 53), to which there is a return in Christ through God's new creation, the whole handling of the Mosaic law in Ezekiel, of its forms of worship as hieroglyphs of the future to be prophesied of the true Israel, can be understood only from the point of view of a transmutation of the law into its fulfilment.

HOMILETIC HINTS

On Ch. xl.

Ver. 1 sq. Jerome, despairing of the possibility, and especially of his own ability, to expound these chapters of Ezekiel, wished to break off and finish his commentary here. Only the urgency and importunity of friends urged him to continue; but every instant he acknowledges his inability, etc.—"The commencement and close, the cherubim and the new temple, are what every one first thinks of when Ezekiel's name is mentioned" (HENGST.).—The vision of the temple, as regards the date given, a trilogy of thoughts: from judgment to mercy, from prison to freedom, from the world to Christ and into the community of God.—"Under the material promises of God are concealed spiritual ones; take that to heart in these chapters too, therefore, sursum corda" (STARCK).—"God raises up His own in their misery by His comfort, and keeps them through the hope of things to come in faith and patience. When there is no prospect of deliverance, when no help, no refuge appears, then the Lord is present with His comfort" (HAFENREFFER).—"When it seems that all will be over with the Church of God, then God thinks of its maintenance and amelioration" (STARCK).—"To human eyes Canaan was lost for Israel, to human eyes Jerusalem lay in the dust; but the prophet sees it again far more glorious. Such seeing again is, however, truly given by God in the Spirit. Land and city and temple had been lost through the sins of the people; yet Israel must remain and fulfil its eternal purpose for the glory of God. God makes it even already in this prophet and in all like-minded bloom forth only the more gloriously, so that neither the sins of the people nor the power of its enemies can put an end to Israel. A fairer and loftier Jerusalem and temple must be still in store for Israel, which the prophet represents entirely by figures taken from the old land, the old royal seat, and the old temple. Yet he does not merely make the old be renewed; everything becomes quite different, in order to indicate that the kingdom of God will, in its completion, present a quite different figure" (DIEDRICH).—"The word of God, too, counts the years and months and days of our distress, to make us understand that it is not unknown to God how long we have borne the yoke of the cross and the oppression of tyrants" (STARCK).—"Ezekiel was already five and twenty years in a foreign land. We must be prepared and purified in many ways by God's Spirit before we can rightly understand the consolations of God; and one grows in God when one learns, under present sufferings, to see more and more of the eternal comfort" (DIEDRICH).—"It is manifest that this vision ought to have comforted the Israelites,—that they who neither had nor saw a temple were meanwhile to busy themselves with considering this temple, and to study what such a vision might denote" (COCC.).—"In the selfsame day the hand of Jehovah was upon me: in this is verified anew the name of the prophet. God is strong; for in Him as in all others flesh and blood cry out: Gone is gone, lost is lost" (HENGST.).

Ver. 2. "Give me eyes to see the glorious grace of Thy kingdom; give me strength to go even into the sanctuary!" (LAMPE).—"The prophet's visions are not deceptive dreams, but true, divine inspirations, Jer. xxvi. 12" (CR.).—"The land of Israel is the hieroglyph of the inheritance which God will give to His people from the whole world, which in contrast thereto is called the sea or the wilderness" (COCC.).—"The Church of God is the city set upon a hill, Matt. v. 14" (TUB. BIA.).—How different was it in Matt. iv., when the tempter took Jesus to an exceeding high mountain, and showed Him all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them!—"Through Christ we come even here in the kingdom of grace to the mount of God, to the heavenly Jerusalem, but the true entrance still awaits us in the kingdom of glory, Heb. xii. 22" (STARKE).—In the world, and yet high above the world; yea, the kingdom of the Anointed One is not of this world, and our citizenship is in heaven (Phil. iii. 20); and they who live by faith of the Son of God seek the things that are above (Col. iii.). The very high mountain points to the highest height.—On Mount Zion stands (Rev. xiv.) the Lamb, with His hundred and forty and four thousand.—"The high mountain is Christ, on whom the Church is founded" (GREGORY).—"The very high mountain is Mount Zion; not, however, in its present form, the state of humiliation, but in glorious exaltation. The high place already existed in the days before the destruction of the temple, Ps. xlviii. 3 [2], lxxviii. 17 [16]. It now returns. The new exaltation took its beginning in the return from the exile, and found its completion in the coming of Christ (ch. xvii. 22, 23)" (HENGST.).—This is indeed a place to sit down in and meditate. Jerusalem in the Old Covenant, the Jerusalem which is the Christian Church, and the Jerusalem above,—what a theme for contemplation throughout time and eternity!—The repose in the contemplation of human and divine things.—Jerusalem a Sabbath place in the working days of the world's history.—Ver. 3. "Christ is indeed the foundation and corner-stone of His Church; but He is also the Builder, who has laid the foundation and brings the building erected thereon always more and more to perfection, Matt. xvi. 18" (STARKE).—"The brass signifies holiness and purity, also life and permanent strength" (COCC.).—"He gives the holy and eternal temple, in which will be unchangeable repose" (ECOLAMPADIUS).—"He is the strong and invincible Hero" (STARCK).—"The serpent in the wilderness, too, was brazen; and Christ is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever" (LUTHER).—"In the Church everything must be ordered and judged by the rule of the divine word, Acts xvii. 11" (STARKE).—"The harmony of the kingdom of God.—"In the Church everything should be done decently and in order (1 Cor. xiv. 40); in it there is to be no confused teaching or dissolute life" (STARCK).—"Let every man examine himself by this measuring-rod, how far he has advanced" (GREGORY).—"Here applies what Plato wrote on his school: Let no one enter who is ignorant of geometry" (HAFENREFFER).—"Every believer ought to measure the temple of God and its magnitude, towers and palaces, and distinguish it from that which is not God's house, Ps. xlviii. 13, 14 [12, 13]" (COCC.).—"Elsewhere also Christ stands at the door and calls, invites in, shows the way, and opens the entrance to the temple and into the inner sanctuary" (BERL. BR.).

Ver. 4. "Christ by His Spirit speaks with us as man with man" (COCC.).—"There has been a difference of opinion among teachers regarding the signification of this temple, altar, city, and territory. But the opinion to be rejected above all is that of the Jews and men like them, who think that it is to be the third temple, which must be built by their coming Messiah, and in their vain and foolish hope boast much of its great glory, and do not see, blinded and dull people that they are, that the text will not bear such dreams as theirs. Therefore this building of Ezekiel's is not to be understood of a new material building, but, like the chariot at the beginning, and also the building at the end, is nothing else than the kingdom of Christ, the holy Church of Christendom here on earth even to the last day. But how all the parts are to be properly interpreted and placed, that we will defer until that life in which we shall see the whole building prepared and ready. Now, while it is still in process of building, and much stone and wood belonging thereto are not yet born, not to speak of their being squared, we cannot see it all; it is enough for us to know that it is God's house and His own building wherein we all are" (LUTHER).—"The thing is to see and hear exactly and lay to heart what serves for our peace; and this Israel has not done (Luke xix. 42).—"But all Israel must know its eternal calling; and if God gives special revelation to particular prophets, that revelation must accrue to the good of all" (DIEDRICH).—"Although it is a mystery, it ought not to remain a mystery.—But what Israel was contemplated in this? Certainly not that which is called Israel after the flesh, but the spiritual, true Israel. The former built not after the pattern; the latter still continues to build itself in this temple.

Ver. 5. "To learn to understand the arrangement, the holy building, begin with the most distant things. We must not despise even those who stand employed at the threshold. The will, not the ability, is pleasing to God. Beware, therefore, of despising those who are still engaged in laying the foundations, and give only distant hope of life," etc. (ECOL.).—"The boundary of the wall had a twofold signification. To the community it was a warning not to approach the sanctuary with unrenewed hearts (Ps. xv.). With respect to God, it was a pledge that He would eventually separate His Church from the world. Because the people of God had neglected the admonition contained in the boundary, the boundary was as a righteous punishment destroyed also in the latter respect. Desecration as punishment followed desecration as guilt. In the broken-down wall of the smitten city was typified the abandoning of the people of God to the world. That this relation will in the future take another shape, that God will again raise up His reformed people to be an independent power, is typified by the erection of the new wall, which is in this respect an embodiment of God's protection and grace, that are to be imparted to the covenant-people renewed in spirit" (HENGST.).—"The Church has a triple wall: God as protection, the angels as guardians, and believers, in other words their prayers" (L. LAPIDE).—"God has indeed broken down by the death of Christ the wall of separation which was in the Old Testament between Jew and Gentile, yet He makes in the New Testament an invariable distinction between believers and unbelievers, Eph. ii. 14" (STARKE).—"If even among men the king's measure is larger than the ordinary one, not so much because kings require a more abundant measure, as because kings should replenish their subjects with all munificence, why should not God's measure overflow with grace, truth, and power?" (COCC.).—"The larger measure of the sanctuary: (1) from the love wherewith God loves us; (2) according to the love wherewith we ought in return to love God in the brethren.—"One should be more liberal for the advancement of God's service than for other and worldly things, Gal. vi. 9" (O.).—"The breadth of the Church points to love, for nothing is broader; the height embraces the contemplation and knowledge, which alway ascend higher" (GREGORY).

Ver. 6. "How beautifully is everything measured and arranged in the community of the Lord by the eternal counsel of God! This is done by the wisdom of the great Founder and Master-builder (Eph. iii. 10, 11, iv. 12); which prepares by the measuring-rod of the gospel (Gal. vi. 16; Phil. iii. 16) living stones for the building of the Church, that it may become a habitation of God in the Spirit (1 Pet. ii. 5)" (TUB. BIB.).—"When believers enter, they have (1) a Guide with them into all truth; (2) without Him they can do nothing; (3) progress is made toward full knowledge of God and Christ," etc. (COCC.).—"We ought to increase and grow, as in age, so in wisdom and grace, Luke ii. 52" (STARCK).—"Christ is the dayspring from on high, who for us has opened the way for the rising of the light" (GREGORY).—"The east gate as model and pattern gate in its homiletic significance; every sermon ought to lead to the Father through Christ.—"In order to educate us by His Spirit, Christ undertook freely in our name this labour here, in that He became man for us, and ascended to the Father through suffering. Those also ascend these steps who will not, staying outside, give themselves up to lusts, but, wiser than the foolish multitude, attach themselves to God's people" (ECOL.).—"One must not so thoughtlessly imagine that only a single leap is required to come into heaven, but constant ascent is requisite and necessary in order to seek after the things that are above, Col. iii." (BERL. BIB.).—Ver. 7. "In the Lord's house are many mansions, according to the distinction of offices and gifts; each mansion, however, serves to ornament the house, John xiv. 2" (TUB. BIB.).—"Since there are many mansions in the Lord's temple, there is certainly still room there. Let no one wantonly exclude himself therefrom, Acts xiii. 46" (STARCK).—"The manifold positions and ministrations, and hence the manifold occupations in the kingdom of God.—"The thresholds show that entrance and exit are alike; as the beginning, so the end: he who begins well shall and will end well" (STARCK).—Ver. 8 sq. Behold, a wall round about; thou shalt not dream of overleaping it, or esteem it as non-existent; those whom God chose for Himself went out from the world, and are not of the world. There are also gates through which we have to enter in; but the way for mankind to God is through the one door, which is and continues to be Christ. Finally, the charge of the house for goings in and out is committed to the Spirit of Truth. No one shall enter in through the gate by lying and hypocrisy, and without the seal of the Spirit no one shall go out of the sanctuary into the world or pass over to eternity.—We first ascend the mountain on which the sanctuary is situated; next we must go up through the gate; and then we have before us the most holy place, namely, the manifestly revealed heart of the Father, with its blessed thoughts of peace.—"As he who no longer remains without is sheltered from the storms which rage there, so the Christian is not driven about by any wind.

The porch reminds us of the peace and repose connected with the consciousness of the grace of God" (ECOL.).—"Truly, they who are preparing for the holy office of the ministry are measured in many ways, and they should still farther test themselves by the measure of the sanctuary" (STARCK).—"O soul, when so many depths, breadths, and heights of knowledge come before thee in the commencement of thy Christian course, let not that discourage thee! Christ gives thee the Holy Spirit, who will by degrees teach thee all things, John xiv. 26" (STARCK).—Ver. 12. Ministers of the Church should be protected against being too much pressed upon, for they are still but men. There is, however, a professedly pious impertinence, which addresses them as if their bones were iron and brass; e.g., "The Lord is able to strengthen you," and the like. The Lord has in Ezekiel set a fence around the chambers of the keepers of the gate.—"We ought to avoid a brother who walks disorderly" (STARCK).—Ver. 13 sq. "Thus those who are in this way are walled around, covered, and protected on all sides; so that nothing can befall them in Him who is the Door and the Way, but everything leads forward to the sanctuary when we walk in Christ Jesus" (COCC.).—Ver. 16. "In the Church of God darkness has no place, but the light of truth and faith shines everywhere; yea, believers themselves are a light in the Lord, whose works shine before men, Matt. v." (STARCK).—"Teachers and preachers ought to have a fuller knowledge of the divine mysteries than others, 1 Tim. iii. 9" (O.).—"They who walk in the ways of the Lord have the true, cheerful, and clear light; while the natural soul is a gateway without windows" (STARCK).—"What is signified by the palms is already fulfilled in the essential nature of believers, and will be so in particular in Christ's glorious kingdom (Pa. xcii. 13 [12] sq.), when they shall sing of victory in the tabernacles of the righteous (Pa. cxviii.), with palms in their hands, Rev. vii. 9" (BERL. BIB.).

Ver. 17 sq. "In the Church of God provision is also made for satisfying the need of spiritual fellowship on the part of those who are like-minded, and no one requires for this reason to wander about outside the wall in this or that sect, hole-and-corner conventicle, or society for any object whatever. Notice the 'apartments' here, and how Christ hallows them (Matt. xviii. 20), and comp. Zech. iii. 10" (COCC.).—"Those who are employed in God's house ought to keep even their feet clean, for holiness is the ornament of His house" (STARCK).—Ver. 20 sq. "By the diversity of the gates you may recognise the diversity of those who enter" (ECOL.).—"The way to the sanctuary has been opened to the nations of the north also" (STARCK).—"As in our cathedrals every part tells something to the deeper-seeing connoisseur, so this is still more the case in Ezekiel's temple" (RICHTER).—"Everything here is in harmony and mutual correspondence, like the Old and the New Testaments, Moses and Christ, the prophets and the apostles" (STARCK).—Ver. 28 sq. "The courts are separated, for the covenant of Abraham is one thing, the covenant of Moses another, and the covenant of Christ still another. Yet they only mutually confirm one another. For are not the contents of the covenant the promises of God, who graciously forgives sin? One court, however, is nearer than another to the sanctuary. Walkest thou unhindered in the court of the priests, busied with spiritual sacrifices; then thank the Lord and extend meanwhile the hand to others, that by thy support they may overcome difficulties" (COOL.).—"The inward and the outward measure must correspond perfectly in Christians" (STARKE).—Ver. 31. "So 2 Pet. i. 5-7 enumerates eight virtues" (BERL. BIS.).—Ver. 38 sq. "This signifies that our heart may remain unclean, even when we give our bodies to be burned for the glory of God. The constant mortification of the flesh must ground itself on Christ, otherwise we will lose courage," etc. (COOL.).—"The believing soul presents its heart, as one sets a table, on which Christ as sacrifice is beheld, for faith lays hold of this alone" (STARCK).—Ver. 44 sq. "A place in the house of God is justly due to them who sing the praise of God in spiritual and heavenly songs, which contribute so powerfully to spiritual edification" (TÜB. BIS.).—"The spiritual songs of them who rejoice in the Lord, because they have been enabled to come to the altar and stand before God, form part of the spiritual sacrifice" (COOL.).—"In these corrupt days music is used more for sin and vanity than for the praise of God. When will it be free from this service to vanity? Ps. cxvii. 1; Isa. xli. 1" (STARKE).—"He who draws near to God sings to Him also in his heart; they, however, sing best who in the midst of troubles are full of joy. They incite others to sing," etc. (COCC.).—Ver. 46. "Since 'sons of Zadok' is in our language equivalent to: sons of righteousness, this implies that only those duly keep the charge who are justified by faith and born of God, whom Jesus Christ has begotten and upholds by the word of His power" (COOL.).—Ver. 47 sq. "The true temple is the body of Christ as He took it out of the grave on the third day, for it surpasses all figures and is pure life. The prophet here prophesies of it; but he does so in slipping words, and for the sake of his contemporaries his understanding of Christ in these chapters, where he speaks of Christ's kingdom and sanctuary, is still, as it were, in swaddling clothes" (DIEDRICH).

Ver. 1 sq. "We ought to go forward under God's guidance in the ways of the Lord from glory to glory, but not to go backward or stand still except in meditation" (STARCK).—"The temple a figure of the Church of Christ; as the former was gloriously built, so also the spiritual form of the Church of Christ is glorious, Ps. xlv. 14 [13]" (TÜB. BIS.).—"The Good Spirit leads men to the Church, there to listen devoutly to the word of God; the evil spirit keeps them back from it, 1 John iv. 6" (STARKE).—"That that can be entitled a palace which is at the same time called a tabernacle, shows how the King had resolved to become a pilgrim, just as He who is enthroned in the sanctuary on high walks with pilgrims, and is at home in the tabernacles of those who are humble and contrite in heart.—Ver. 4 sq. "The most holy place is set before us as the goal, and we understand thereby a heavenly state on earth, namely, the Church of the New Testament. Accordingly, in ch. xliii. the entire circuit of the mountain is called most holy, from which it is evident that no one is truly inside of this temple, or even in its courts, who is devoid of the New Testament perfection," etc. (COCC.).—Heavenly glory or eternal bliss is no doubt the only complete holy of holies; yet he who has entered the kingdom of grace has come to a glory which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath entered into the heart of any man, to praise and glorify God for ever.—"When we meet together, God is present in the temple (Matt. xviii.); for our heart is the dwelling-place of the Father and the Son in the Holy Ghost" (STARCK).—Ver. 5 sq. That the chambers are connected denotes the brotherly relation in the sanctuary, Ps. cxxxiii.; 1 John iii. 1 sq.—God provides for His servants covert and shelter in this world.—The chambers are not all of the same size, but they are all connected with the sanctuary; the same is the case with the progress and growth of the members of the body of which Christ is the Head.—The saints of God are also measured round and round; no heavier task is laid upon them, no greater temptation befalls them, than what is their Father's will.—Indefiniteness in spiritual endeavours is a token of disease, a want of sobriety and obedience of faith.—Ver. 6. Leaning upon God, upheld by Him, but not mixed up with Him in our affairs.—Of ourselves we cannot stand a single moment.—Ver. 7. "In God's house we must go upward by growth in grace, that the mind may be always the more firmly directed heavenward" (BERL. BIS.).—The breadth in the top part.—"Christians ought not to contract, but to expand as they grow older" (STARCK).—Higher grace gives expansion in width and breadth. The narrower points of view with which we ascend gradually disappear.—The broader heart on the height of the Christian life in theory and practice.—Prayer an ascending stair.—But let us not forget that which lies in the middle! In the middle is the means, the way of mediation.—Ver. 8. The secret of the height depends on the foundation.—Ver. 12 sq. The history of dogmas is in many respects the off-place in Ezekiel's temple.—Ver. 15 sq. God knows and determines the magnitude of the Church on earth.—Ver. 17. "Enlightenment is from above; only thus do we obtain a conception of heavenly things" (STARKE).—Faith is a window, and, as compared with vision, a narrow one.—"Through His wounds we see into the heart of Christ as through a window" (A LAPIDE).—Ver. 18 sq. "The ever-flourishing palm is the righteous one who has overcome sin and is in the eternal habitations. And so also we are genuine men, in God's strength, with the heart of a lion" (HEIM-HOFF.).—The palm a sign of victory, of life, of eternal glory.—The view of the palm which is promised to the victor.—"Teachers ought to be men, especially to humbled consciences, but also to be lions against enemies" (O.).—Ver. 21. The New Testament presents no other view than the Old.—Ver. 22. "This altar is at the same time a table, as Christ is to our souls in the Holy Supper" (STARCK).—Wood: the humanity, too, of Jesus was like us in all things except sin.—Ver. 23 sq. Doors let in and shut out; so also does the Church.—Ornament is here combined with solemnness. We have not here the joyous worldly beauty of Greece, but neither have we the solemnness dark as death, as in Egypt. The world opens its doors half to frivolity and half to despondency.—“The sanctuary of the heart also must be shut, and not with one door only. Our treasure is incomparable, and ought to be preserved with much watchfulness and strong exhortation” (HEIM-HOFF.).—“There is no mention of a veil before the holy of holies, because it was rent at the death of Christ, and must not reappear. This the Lord knew, who showed Ezekiel everything, and Himself rent the veil. Christ is the fulfilment and substitute for everything in the former temple that is wanting in the latter” (RICHTER).—Here on earth, however, are only windows; face to face will be first in heaven.

On Ch. xlii.

Ver. 1 sq.: “As this temple was provided with many chambers, but each had its own purpose, so believing Christians must be sanctified chambers for the glory of God,—one for this use and another for that, 2 Tim. ii. 21” (STARCK).—Ver. 5 sq. While in the previous chapter the breadth increased with the elevation, it here becomes narrower. The progressive growth in grace is a wider consciousness of Christ, but a constantly narrowing self-consciousness (1 Cor. xv. 9).—So is the service in the gospel, when with increasing years our view into eternity expands, and similarly contracts in temporal matters; the nearer the day of reckoning is, our responsibility becomes the clearer to us, and the more clearly do we see our many mistakes and disloyalties.—“There are three stages of life: youth, manhood, and old age, and the last is the narrowest of all” (STARCK).—Ver. 7 sq. God is able to set walls around those who desire to keep themselves pure from the stains of the flesh, and to protect them in the hour of trial and temptation.—“True believers are protected, no one can injure them, John x. 27 sq.” (STARCK).—The protection which is in an evangelically-understood official and priestly dignity.—“If God’s servants have no place under heaven, yet they have one in heaven” (STARCK).—“By these buildings connected with the temple, and pertaining to its outward economy, we should be reminded that the Lord bestows upon the pious the other necessities of life also. In Him they find their entire satisfaction; but they use food, drink, intercourse with men, and this whole world, as if they did not use all this. Thus, to the pure all things are pure that they do with pure and upright heart. The word of God makes us strong when it is with us, and blesses also outward things. David never saw a righteous man forsaken (Ps. xxxvii.). So also has the Lord ordained that they who preach the gospel should live of the gospel, 1 Cor. ix. 13, 14” (ECOL.).—“Oh, how sweet it is to cling to the temple like Anna! Luke ii. 37” (STARCK).—Ver. 13 sq. “If we have to understand by the priests the early Christians, or those brought up from childhood in the faith of Christ and walking in this way, then in these verses is figured their fellowship with one another in particular, their united inquiry into the word and meditation thereon and on the mystery of Christ for growth of knowledge and increase of joy, so that they are prepared and adorned in one and the same faith, alway to return to and worship at the altar, which is Christ” (COCC.).—“In word, in work, in everything, be Jesus read, and He alone” (TESS-

TEGEN).—Glory and holiness in their connection; how this connection is stamped on this temple and its arrangements and purposes, even to the most minute particulars.—His office secures enjoyment, too, to the minister of the gospel, but enjoyment from the holy; the Lord wills to be enjoyment to His own.—Profane ministers profane the sanctuary.—These two verses form a fitting text for introduction and ordination sermons.—That which is seemly for every Christian is, however, special duty for the priests. One should be able to discover in a preacher of the gospel, above all else, above all science, knowledge, culture, etc., that he is in the enjoyment of the sacrifice of Jesus Christ for the sins of the world.—“So also we ought not to approach the holy table of the Lord with worldly, impenitent hearts” (CALOV.).—From ver. 14 much pastoral wisdom may be learned.—“But the lesson is not that a pastor may for a time lay aside his clerical robes or hang them on a nail to make merry with the world” (BERL. BIB.).—A true minister of the gospel does not want to be called a clergyman in distinction from the laity,—a Pharisaic title, which the church regulations of our fathers do not know, and which modern State bureaucracy ought to abolish,—but as he is so in the spirit of the gospel in contrast to the world, even to the so-called world of culture.—The wrong and dangerous sociability of a minister of the word. The clerical coat does not make the clergyman, yet it is a defence and an admonition. The best clerical garment, and one which we may always put on and wear everywhere, is our sanctification in Christ.—It is as great a mistake to carry about the clerical coat everywhere, like a monk, as to leave it at home from unclerical frivolity or worldly-mindedness.—Paul became all things to all men (1 Cor. ix. 19, 22), but not at the expense of his ministerial office.—“When we sinners come in contact with Christ by faith, we are made clean, and become a holy, reasonable sacrifice, acceptable to God. But when once we are consecrated to God, we have to be on our guard that we on no occasion defile ourselves” (ECOL.).—Ver. 15 sq. “God gathers His Church from all the four quarters of the world, Isa. xlix. 12” (STARCK).—“So wide and spacious will the New Testament Church be, in distinction from the Old Testament Church. A greater than Solomon in all his pomp and glory is here; for Jesus is the Light of all nations, Isa. xlii. 6, xlix. 6; Luke ii. 32” (STARCK).—“All believers in the whole world belong to this temple. The true Church is the collection of the scattered believers that are in the world” (STARCK).—“Observe, only after he had learned exactly the internal magnitude did the prophet learn the external. It is labour in vain to labour in investigating nature until we have first laid a good foundation in godliness. Without this we continue too much devoted to the contemplation of visible things, and make them our idols, so that they become a stumbling-block and a snare to ourselves and other inexperienced persons. But when thou hast come to know the inner meaning of spiritual things, and hast tasted the length, height, and depth of the love of God, then thou mayest busy thyself with all visible things. Thou wilt everywhere pause, and, contemplating things with the spiritual eye, say: O Lord our God, how excellent is Thy name in all the earth!

Thou who hast made the heavens, declare Thy glory, etc. For by the contemplation of outward things thou wilt be borne along to the praise of the divine glory and the overflowing love of the heavenly Father toward His people, for whose sake He has made also this whole artistically-compacted framework of visible things" (HEIM-HOFF.).—"The prophet has now depicted everything so fully and clearly, in order to preach to his contemporaries, as babes in understanding, in a way intelligible to them, the consoling truth that God's Church is eternal through His grace, and that He will always rebuild His house among us, provided we only desire to be His. Whatever is lost must truly be restored more glorious than ever to them who love God; and where God's word finds lovers, His kingdom, too, increasingly assumes shape. But in Christ all has assumed such a shape, that through Him the sanctuary now always continues present in humanity; and the true altar of burnt-offering, Golgotha, is always before the eyes of the Most Holy Father, in order, for the sake of the sacrifice thereon offered, to love, sanctify, and protect us all. We thank thee, O most gracious eternal God and Father, who hast set up an eternal sanctuary for us sinners, never to depart from us, and hast sanctified us by the blood of Thy Son, and now givest unto us the four ends of the earth to embrace by Thy gospel; grant unto us to remain faithful in contemplation of Thee, and, ever fuller and fuller of Thy Spirit, to praise Thee through Jesus Christ. Amen" (DIEDRICH).

Ver. 1. "Jerusalem, how gladly would our foot stand in thy gates!" (Ps. cxxii.).—"Open to me the pearl gates, Thou who art the Ornament of heaven's city, Light from Light, chosen as the Light before the world began," etc. (DESSLER.).—"To come to Christ is really to find out the bearings of this world."—"The entrance took place after the measuring of the temple and consideration of its adornment. So did Christ show His disciples, represented in the person of the prophet, the whole heavenly edifice by word and work (John xvii. 6); and everything pertaining to the building of this spiritual temple was finished on the cross. The entrance of the glory from the east for lighting the temple took place when the apostles, on the day of Pentecost, were endued with power from on high," etc. (ECOL.).—"When Jesus comes there is light; darkness must disappear, and all is pure joy and comfort, Ps. xlvii. 11" (CR.).—"Ver. 2 sq. "The gracious advent of Jehovah indicates the visitation of grace in the forgiveness of all sins, in light, salvation, and blessedness" (STARCK.).—"The voice is that of Ps. xix., the voice of the gospel, which resounds through the whole world" (STARCK.).—"Where the gospel is preached, the waters of life make a noise not only of themselves, but also from the stones which men cast in, and from the rocky banks of worldly hearts which make resistance; but the glory of eternity shines upon earth."—"The loud noise of the glory is the voice of them who praise the Lord with one heart and one voice, here on earth as there in heaven, Rev. xiv. 1" (HEIM-HOFF.).—"We have here the hymn of praise and the triumphant joy of the saints as they cheer and encourage one another; the contradiction, confutation, and blasphemy of the wicked at the confessions of believers; the cries of the spectators expressing their various opinions, and the songs of the witnesses unto blood at the stake; just as in a triumphal procession the victors shout with joy, the vanquished howl. There is no more glorious victory than that of faith" (COCC.).—"The creature has its voice only from the Creator; and therefore His voice must sound louder than its, however loud it is, Ps. xciii. 3, 4 (Dan. x. 6; Rev. i. 15). He who said: 'Let there be light,' Himself shines forth at His appearing in the clearest light, as He who dwelleth in light that is inaccessible, 1 Tim. vi. 16; James i. 17 [Ps. l. 2; Deut. xxxiii. 2; Rev. xviii. 1]" (HENGST.).—"The justice and wisdom of God, kept secret since the world began, are set before the eyes of all. There was no corner in which the truth was not heard, whether it met with approval or contradiction. Thus no one perishes unless he is an enemy to the light. Christ is altar, priest, and sacrifice; hence they who are near the altar cannot but have a sight of His glory" (COCC.).—"Let us pray God to enlighten the dark earth of our heart with that holy light of His glory!" (ECOL.).—"Ver. 3. The terror of the prophet on account of the past and in the present; what will be the future terrors of the wicked!—"The thought of the perdition of the lost always causes pain and alarm to the true prophets" (STARCK.).—"The knowledge of God never causes pride, but humility, because it at the same time discovers the corruption of the heart. The more modest a man is, and the less he trusts to himself, the more is he endowed with the knowledge of God. The bowed down are, however, revived by the Lord and led by the Spirit to the place where the majesty of the God of glory shines" (HEIM-HOFF.).—"Ver. 4 sq. Whom the Spirit has cast down, the Spirit raises up again.—This is life in dying, rising up in falling.—"Yea, thus shall God's temple be, full of divine spirit and life; but then it must consist of other materials than brick or stone" (DIEDRICH.).—"What hinders this glory from filling also thy heart, provided it is not full of other things, and needs first to become empty, that thy hunger and desire may by the breath of the Spirit seek and find satisfaction in its fullness?" (BERL. BR.).

Ver. 6 sq. "God does not relinquish mankind; He continually creates anew His Israel for Himself" (DIEDRICH.).—"That Jesus aimed at the preservation of the temple is shown by His cleansing of the temple at the commencement of His ministry, whereby He intimated His intention to effect a wholesome reformation. Not until after this reformation was decisively rejected did He, at the close of His ministry, effect the second cleansing of the temple, which is the symbolical announcement of its destruction: Ye would not have reformation, therefore ye must have revolution. The sentence: 'Behold, your house is left unto you desolate' (Matt. xxiii.), immediately follows the saying: 'How often would I have gathered thy children,' etc. Had they let themselves be gathered, their house would not have been destroyed; it would have become 'a house of prayer for all people' (Isa. lvi. 7). Jesus speaks first in view of His passion in Matt. xxiv. 2, when the stiff-necked obduracy of the people had been completely revealed. Had the Jews listened to Him, had they not imposed silence on His disciples, the stones of the temple would not have cried out (Luke xix. 40; comp. Hab. ii. 11). Not until they had stopped up the mouths of the true witnesses did the preaching of the stones sound forth. But while the abolition of the form was brought on by the mass of the people, who once more, and in the most culpable manner, thrust away from them their Creator, and lightly esteemed the Rock of their salvation (Deut. xxxii. 15), the election, far from being deprived of the blessing pertaining to them, found a glorious compensation for the loss of the temple in the Church of Christ, the legitimate continuation of the temple, John ii. 19" (HENGST.).—"It is man in whom, as in a temple chosen for Himself, He sets the throne of His glory. This is a New Testament word of promise; for what else does it imply than that sins are forgiven, our heart renewed, confirmed, and made obedient to the truth?" (HEIM-HOFF.).—" (1) This temple shall be the true temple; (2) this temple is different from the former temple. Into it nations and kings bring indeed their glory, but the kings and people of Israel no longer their abominations" (COCC.).—"False doctrine brings the threshold of God and the threshold of men close to each other.—"Where the government of the Church is conducted by and according to the spirit of the State" (BERL. BIB.).—"In this way the divine becomes human, and the human looks as if divine; and this is the devil's union-work.—Therefore the sanctuary of the king is still not Jehovah's sanctuary.—"A table at once the Lord's and the devil's, Paul has expelled from the Church" (STARCK.).—"Ver. 9. "God now first returns to the apostates; but His grace is designed to work repentance, and then He will never more depart from them" (DIEDRICH.).—"Ver. 10 sq. "Solomon's temple left the people in their disobedience and worship of idols; but this house belongs to a higher order. He who lays it to heart will cease sinning, and duly examine the temple and its measurements. For the measuring of the temple, which is not visibly present, must be done in the Spirit, 'which temple, however, are ye' (1 Cor. iii.). And therefore each one should examine with abasement his heart and conscience, and be displeased with himself because he has lived so long in ingratitude toward God," etc. (ECOL.).—"The shame of the poor sinner finds in the temple, which is Christ, exactly the right measure.—The understanding of Ezekiel's temple-vision from the self-knowledge of the heart.—The turning to repentance through the promises of the gospel.—"The contemplation of the goodness and the works of God ought to bring shame into our hearts" (STARCK.).—"The form of the divine economy of grace is, in outline, here described" (BERL. BIB.).—"Ver. 11 sq. "They who repent of their sins are capable of knowing the temple and its arrangements, while those who wantonly pursue fleshly desires receive not the Spirit of wisdom, and are incapable of knowing the law of the Lord (2 Tim. ii. 19; 1 John iii. 3). For the law of the house is God's law, that everything be most holy" (HEIM-HOFF.).—"That the temple stood on the top of the mountain lets the whole land have it continually before its eyes in its midst, and not now and then only on occasional visits" (DIEDRICH.).

Ver. 13 sq. "Christ is the true altar (Heb. xiii. 10); for He is the propitiation for our sins (1 John ii. 2; Rom. iii. 25), and He has sanctified Himself for us, John xvii. 19" (CR.).—"No one could go into the temple without passing by the altar, and so no one can go into heaven without the sacrifice of the death of Christ, Acts iv. 12" (STARCK.).—"Golgotha the true altar of burnt-offering: "here hangs the antitype of all the sacrifices" (LAMPE).—"Ver. 18 sq. "Thus God comes first and gives grace; His grace makes ashamed, chastises, sanctifies, reconciles, and produces intimate eternal fellowship. This is always God's way with us men, provided only we recognise it aright in these days of ours, when now it is set in the most glorious light; Christ and the apostles have given additional clearness to Ezekiel" (DIEDRICH.).—"In the New Testament we no longer offer material, but spiritual sacrifices through Jesus Christ, etc., 1 Pet. ii. 5" (TÜB. (STARCK.).—"The prayer of a righteous man availeth much, because it is effectual, Jas. v. 16.—"All true believers are priests who can draw near to God, for access to the throne of grace has been opened to us through Christ" (STARCK.).—"The ministers of a king are glorious; how much more so are they who minister before the King of all kings!—Ver. 21. Comp. Heb. xiii. 11 sq.—"All this only illustrates more clearly the sacrifice of Christ" (RICHTER).—"Ver. 22. Golgotha the place of purification of all altars.—Ver. 23 sq. "A man can offer himself as a burnt-sacrifice to the Lord, when he fully, entirely, and unreservedly devotes himself to Him in faith and love. The end of our creation, redemption, and sanctification, involves this" (BERL. BIB.).—"V. r. 25 sq. Christ finishes His work in His people too.—"It is not enough to begin well in what is good; we must also stand fast in the Lord, and continue steadfast unto the end, 2 Thes. iii. 13; Heb. iii. 14; Rev. ii. 10, iii. 11" (CR.).—"But those who are sanctified to the Lord by the sacrifice of Christ ought to praise God's benefits, and especially to remember them at the Holy Supper, according to the saying: This do in remembrance of Me, and: Show the Lord's death till He come" (HEIM-HOFF.).—"Ver. 27. "They who were in Christ before others ought in this to serve as priests to the younger believers" (BERL. BIB.).

"Blessed are they who walk under God's guidance, whom He brings back as here to the principal gate toward the east" (STARCK.).—"God's connection with mankind remains a secret" (DIEDRICH.).—"The shut gate is the book sealed with seven seals, which only the victorious Lion of the tribe of Judah opens, and no one shuts (Rev. v. 5). When we draw near to Him who is the Door of the sheepfold, He, because He is the only-begotten of the Father, will open unto us and show us the Father" (ECOL.).—"Christ needs no successor to figure as His vicar in the Church" (BERL. It also belongs to Him alone to speak the word of God. Hence even the prince is not allowed to enter the Church for the purpose of making his own discourses be heard there. For in the Church is the throne of Christ alone, and of no one else. What is said of the prince is rather this, that he ought to have a good conscience and joy before the Lord because of his princely office, which does not merely consist in this, that we live in peace and quiet under his sceptre, but also that the people may hear the word of God, and without fear offer to Him the sacrifices of their worship" (COCC.). (Interpreting the prince as the Messiah: "No one knoweth the Father but the Son, who is from God, because He says: My meat is to do the will of Him that sent me" (John iv. 34), COOL.)—Ver. 4. "If the prophet here again falls to the ground before the glory of the Lord, have we not humbly to acknowledge and confess our frailty and weakness in presence of the divine mysteries! No plummet of the understanding sounds the abysses of the mysteries of God. Let us be content with what revelation presents to us" (after JEROME).—"God reveals His glory to His servants, especially when He calls on them to make known His will to the people, Acts xviii. 9, xxiii. 11" (TUB. BIB.).—"Consider, O Christian, whether thou art what thou art called; whether thou hast God or some one else dwelling in thy heart; whether thou art full of glory or of worldliness, sensuality, and carnality!" (STARKE).—Ver. 5 sq. Divine things are not to be drowsily listened to, or drowsily engaged in.—In everything there must be heart—in seeing, in hearing, in doing.—Pectus theologicum facit, not pathos.—The goings in and out of the sanctuary, a solemn consideration for every one, but especially for those who keep the charge of the sanctuary, whatever their rank in the service.—"The sin which still adheres to believers makes them often inattentive in the most necessary things; hence they need many a stirring up and putting in remembrance, 2 Pet. i. 13" (STARCK).—Ver. 6. Sinners make light of their doings; but God suddenly says: Enough.—"He who seeks to be saved out of this lost world must once for all have enough of it" (STARCK).—The feeling of final surfeit of the world must, however, include aversion; for repentance is conversion, not so weariness of the world, disgust with the world, or such like.—There is a difference between the Israel after the flesh and the Israel after the Spirit.—Ver. 7. "The false Israel gives the sacraments to the heathen, and elects heretics to office" (DIEDRICH).—I know thy works, saith

the Lord, but of thy faithfulness I know nothing. Quite enough to remove the candlestick, although baptizing, marrying, and dispensing the Lord's Supper still go on.—The so-called liberal clergy.—The voice of the people, the choice of the people, is not God's voice, God's choice, but frequently God's judgment to the full.—Strange doctrine indicates an uncircumcised heart; and where that is, in spite of ordination and consistorial confirmation, and whatever else pertains to circumcision, there is nothing but the foreskin of a hireling, a thief, and a murderer of the sheep.—"Self-chosen divine service is an abomination to the Lord" (STARCK).—The responsibility in the election of a pastor.—The outward discharge of the ministerial office, however exact, does not make a minister such as he should be according to God's word.—A person baptized in due form may yet be no Christian after the Spirit.—Ver. 8. The false teachers, who please the spirit of the age and have the applause of the world.—What general can employ a soldier who is everything else, but no soldier! And the general superintendents [bishops, presbyteries] ordain year by year men who have got through their examinations and are of canonical age, but who are fitter for anything else than for being pastors.—Ver. 9. "It is accordingly a token of the greatest decline of the Church when the wicked and manifest hypocrites are not only not expelled, but go freely in and out, and even have the ruling power" (BERL. BIB.).—The Church of the future of Jesus Christ, a pure church.—Ver. 10 sq. The judgment on the priests of the sanctuary, already begun inwardly, is their evil conscience, that cripples all energy in presence of the world, and degrades them to the position of paid domestics; and outwardly too, for even men of the world have no respect for them, although they do not revile them as fanatics.—The false righteousness, which is not God's righteousness, is also a detestable idol, behind which so many preachers commit adultery.—"Where there are ungodly teachers there is no want of ungodly hearers, Jer. v. 31" (STARCK).—The lower service in the sanctuary a question of conscience reaching into many a pastor's life.—Degraded priests a mirror for pastors.—Ver. 11. But even in the performance of subordinate service, where one originally stood higher, the grace of God may be with us, provided we let God's humbling of us issue in conversion of heart, and look upon the punishment as a righteous recompense. It is not at all necessary that we should, as the world calls it, make a successful career in the clerical profession.—It is not natural gifts, but heartfelt piety, which decides as to the testimonials which the Lord grants, and as to capacity for office in His eyes.—Ver. 12. Least of all should a preacher be a stumbling-block and cause of destruction to others. Yet the grace of God will still raise up from their fall even those who caused others to fall. Grace and always grace. Let us not despise the offer, let us not neglect the day of grace.—But there is no grace without self-judgment and self-condemnation.—The sins of the preacher in their consequences as regards the life of the community.—"A minister of the Church ought to be a pattern to the flock in doctrine and life, 1 Tim. iv. 12; 2 Tim. i. 13; Tit. ii. 7" (STARCK).—The servant who knows his lord's will and does it not shall receive a double amount of stripes.—

Vers. 13, 14. The ignominy of failure in ministerial life: personal access to God is hindered, and the office becomes a torment.—“Wherein can they who have cause to be ashamed before others of their former doings, and have given much offence to others, complain of God that the first have become last, when God still finally receives and takes hold of them, although they do not attain to such a high position as otherwise they might have attained to, and which others have attained to? Should they not rather extol God's exceeding great and undeserved mercy to them?” (BERL. BIB.)

Vers. 15, 16. The sons of Zadok are those who have neither received the mark of the beast in their hand nor in their forehead (Rev. xiii.).—“Faithful servants of God are highly esteemed in His sight, Ps. cv. 15” (CR.).—Ver. 16 sq. Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God (Matt. v.).—“Sheep they ought to be, but neither to keep the sheep for the sake of the fleece, nor to enter in in sheep's clothing” (BERL. BIB.).—“Let him who desires to be found at last among them that are clothed in white robes, be diligent to have a conscience void of offence, Acts xxiv. 15 sq.” (STARKE).—The precepts according to the law should remind us that preachers particularly run within lists, as Paul writes of the Christians. What is fitting for any one else may yet be far from seemly in a preacher.—But it is just those who take things easy that speak most of their severe toil and the heavy labour they have to undergo.—Ver. 19 sq. “Let them manifest their intimate fellowship with God and the glorious privileges over which their soul rejoices in a becoming walk and conversation. They are not to conform to the world, but to shine as lights among men (Phil. ii. 15); while at the same time they are not to make a show of their inward life, lest the people from hypocrisy should imitate that to which their mind is a stranger” (HEIM-HOFF.).—“They certainly should go among the people, but not seek to exalt themselves over the people because of their prerogatives, but to hold converse with them as brethren with brethren” (COCO.). (Comp. on ch. xlii. 14.)—He who ministers at the sanctuary must never seem profane, nor a fop in his attire, nor comic in his speech, nor a man of the world in his transactions. He may seem ridiculous to the world, only never conformed to the world.—But the pretended sanctification through holy priests is also of the devil, for of God Christ is made to us sanctification, etc., and there is no other mediator than He, the only Mediator between God and men.—Ver. 20 sq. Seemly, but not remarkable either in defect or excess.—Men of extremes are unfit for the holy ministry.—“The spirit of believers is a spirit of power, and of love, and of a sound mind, 2 Tim. i. 7” (BERL. BIB.).—Ver. 22. Ministers' widows an exception among widows.—But this neither bids ministers marry, nor forbids their remaining unmarried, only the marriage ought to be a priestly one.—The spiritual side of the married state.—Ver. 23. As their life, so above all their teaching ought to preserve the people from defilement, and train them to purity.—Ver. 24. God's word is God's judgment, the righteous Judge, right law and upright judgment.—The servant of God as umpire in disputes. He must not be a party man, but stands over the parties.—The Sabbath in the pastor's house also a subject for reflection.—Ver. 25 sq. They who are the messengers, heralds, and representatives of an eternal life shall neither have their serenity disturbed by the death of believers, which is no death, nor their pure walk defiled by the life of the spiritually dead, which is no life.—“Have no fellowship with those who love dead works but hate the life of God” (BERL. BIB.).—We too are allowed to wipe our eyes, as God wipes away every tear from the eyes of His saints.—At Jehovah's altar is peace and joy in the Holy Ghost (Ps. cxxxii. 9, 16).—Ver. 28. “Why dost thou, O teacher, strive for a larger stipend and greater income? Knowest thou not that the Lord Himself will be thine inheritance and thy exceeding great reward, or wishest thou not that He should be so?” (TÜB. BIB.).—“All who have first the kingdom of God for their possession, are also truly priests. God feeds them wholly on what is hallowed, and he who will have a blessing in his house must evince love to them” (DIEDRICH).—What greater inheritance can there be than God, the Lord of all; and what greater possession than He who made, who sustains, and rules heaven and earth?—“So Christians ought not to endeavour after filthy lucre; they are not to have their portion in this world, but to have their home in heaven” (ECOL.).—Ver. 31. “In God's service there is no filthy lucre. The Lord purifies everything for them who eat with Him” (DIEDRICH).

Ver. 1 sq. “Here in particular I acknowledge the weakness of my knowledge. I silently revere the mysteries of this passage. Neither will any mortal explain them completely, because that which God has prepared for them that love Him does not come into the heart of man. This indeed I see, that he speaks of the possession of the land of the living, as also the Revelation of John has borrowed much from this passage.” Thus Ecolampadius expresses himself.—“God promises believers an inheritance, and will also give it them in due time, but that is in heaven” (STARKE).—“God the Lord needs indeed no land for Himself, yet it is for His honour when real estates are bequeathed to churches and schools, that those who labour in them may receive their support from them, Gen. xlvii. 22” (STARKE).—“They who live from God's hand are content with His measure, even when it turns out small and modest” (STARKE).—“It ought to be our joy to be near God, to be associated with Him” (STARKE).—Ver. 2. “There is nothing twisted and crooked with God; with Him everything is straight” (STARKE).—“The paths are often crooked and yet straight on which Thou makest Thy children come to Thee,” etc. (ARNOLD).—Ver. 3. The sanctuary was situated in the centre of all; so ought religion to be the central point of all life, and Christ the centre of true religion.—Religion, faith, Christianity ought not, either in the life of nations or of individuals, to be placed in a corner merely as a tolerated piece of antiquity.—Ver. 4. “If those who labour in the church and the school have no official houses, still they must have houses to dwell in. Therefore it is fitting that the community should build such, and keep them in a habitable condition” (STARKE).—“When ministers' houses are near the church, they can the better attend to their office, 1 Chron. ix. 27" (O.).—"The Lord's faithful priests shall dwell beside Him, and be with Christ, for refreshment and revival from the strife and disquiet of men among whom they are scattered" (COCC.).—Ver. 5 sq. "Although a lesser service in the Church appears to be incumbent on church officers and school-masters, yet care must be taken to provide them with food and lodging," etc. (STARCK.).—"Hence offices and ranks which are not mutually destructive ought to continue; only let each in his place belong to the Lord" (TOSSANI).—"The sanctuary is not included in the city or state as formerly, for God will not permit His kingdom to be confounded with the temporal power; this, however, does not mean that God cannot rule in the state, but only that God's kingdom and human kingdoms are different. For human authority is not to interfere in the kingdom of God, but the divine authority does interfere in the kingdoms of men, and God makes subjects obey their princes, servants their masters, and children their parents; and all obedience, if of the right kind, is paid to Him as the Lord, and to men as brethren and fellow-servants whom the common Lord has placed in authority for the Lord's sake. But we do not obey God for the sake of a man, nor can any man by his power make us obedient to God," etc. (COCC.).—"Hence when this prophecy places the sanctuary outside of the city, and yet annexes the sanctuary to the city, that indicates that in the kingdom of Christ states and governments will belong to the people of God; in which, however, the kingdom of God will not be absorbed nor confined" (COCC.).—"The magisterial office is holy, and has also part in the holy, Num. vii. 1 sq." But they must keep close to the sanctuary, and the magistracy must protect the confessors of the truth on the right and on the left. The deepest ground, however, is this: Christ's disciples are all of them priests, and they themselves are also the royalty; they themselves offer sacrifice and also protect themselves, for God Himself is their strength through Christ. He who has the Spirit of Christ will easily understand the whole of this figure," etc. (DIEDRICH).—"It behoves us to celebrate the feast of tabernacles in spirit and in truth so much more than the Jews the nearer we approach eternity. For the nearer we come thereto, the less ought we to hold by this world, but on the contrary ought to withdraw our thoughts from the earth, from houses, cities, and lands, and allow scarcely a thought to arise in us that we still have a portion on earth and in the world; but, since we only dwell in tabernacles, let us have our loins girded, as those who are ready to depart, that they may be with the Lord" (BERL. BIB.).—"Our home is above, to which we draw nearer every moment" (HEIM-HOFF.).—"Tabernacles ought to be as passover; that is, we ought to pursue our pilgrimage on the ground of eternal redemption.

Ver. 1. "There is a time for prayer and a time for work. On work-days we are not to rest, as on the Sabbath. He who does not work ought not to eat, whatever his pretences are. The door to the Father, the Source of all grace, opens itself to us when the gracious light of the love of God again shines forth, as it often does after great darkness. The way to the Father, on which Christ preceded us when He prayed for us, now stands always open to us, for the Sabbath is eternal, and we see the door to the inner sanctuary of the temple: only in a figure through a glass do we see the glory of the Lord" (HEIM-HOFF.).—"At the door, but not at the altar.—

The temporal power, moreover, ought, in reverence for what is sacred,—which is and ought to remain sacred to its subjects,—not to overstep the privileged position assigned to it, not to command or forbid when it has no authority for the one or the other.—“Princes and lords should abide in their calling” (CR.).—“But the temporal power and teachers and preachers ought also to live in harmony with one another, and to assist one another in furthering the glory of God, 2 Chron. xix. 11” (W.).—Ver. 8 sq. Prayer and diligent attendance on divine service are becoming alike for people and prince.—In the Old Covenant it is said: before the Lord; in the New Covenant: in the Lord.—Ver. 8 sq. Every one has his assigned path under God’s guidance, and on it he should abide.—“God’s guidance demands quiet; where the foot itself makes a noise, the will of the eternal Father is exchanged for our own choice” (ZINZENDORF).—“But many shall come from the north and from the south to worship in the Lord’s house, Matt. viii. 11” (STARCK).—“The influence of love shall extend into the whole world from the south to the north, so that they from the north and they from the south shall go to meet one another, in order to receive and embrace one another as brethren” (BERL. Grace makes the heart free, and so also willing. Voluntariness is a measure of grace, as mercifulness is a sign that we ourselves shall obtain mercy.—“He who confines his prayers and devotions to Sundays and festivals does not yet know what it is to serve God, what it is always to pray (Luke xviii. 1) and to worship God in spirit and in truth. Daily ought we to exhort and arouse ourselves, that we fall not again into sin; daily ought the praise of God to be heard from our mouth, Heb. iii. 13” (STARCK).—In every gift God looks on the giver’s heart: My son, give me thine heart.—A people that shall be pure willingness, the prospect held out in Ps. cx.—As God’s grace is new every morning, so also ought our devotion to Him to be renewed every morning.—The whole life of man ought to be a life consecrated to God.—“Our whole life should be a sacrifice, from morning to night, and next morning again” (BERL. BIB.).—The consecration of time.—Since Christ’s appearance the night has disappeared, and the day has come; there are now only morning sacrifices.—Watchman, what of the night? was a question of pre-Christian longing. Is there not yet light towards Hebron? was the daily question of the priest in the old temple.—“The whole section is of the deepest importance for us, inasmuch as it instructs us to live in the word, when God’s grace does not make itself known to us in the visible” (HENGST.).—Ver. 16 sq. If the prince is understood to be the Messiah, then according to that view Christ’s gifts here to the children are different from those to servants, which are only temporary, and taken from them again!—“The year of freedom shall be ‘the day of revelation of righteous judgment,’ which is already exercised in secret. The hypocrites, who are condemned by the silent judgment of their heart, shall one day be manifest also to the world” (HEIM-HOFF.).—“Rulers ought not to invade the rights of their subjects, 1 Kings xxi. 2 sq.” (TÜB. BIB.).—“He who is profuse in giving is (easily) compelled to take from others what belongs to them” (HENGST.).—“The kingdom of Christ is very different from an earthly one, for He supports His subjects, not His subjects Him, John x. 11” (STARCK).—In Christ’s kingdom injustice has no formula, either socially or judicially.—“Spiritual things ought to be left in the spiritual order, and temporal in the temporal; confusion in this particular confuses the position of the people in other particulars also” (HEIM-HOFF.).—Ver. 19 sq. In the kingdom of God, as in the kingdom of nature, and in the full sense of the expression, everything has its own place. Only the things of men are in disorder, because they are sinners, and sin is disorder in every respect.—Servants of the Church should have the gift of distinguishing times and places, and above all, of discerning the spirits.—Consideration for the people, an important part of pastoral prudence.—To cook is to bring to a proper condition, so that the food tastes well and is agreeable; so ought also the truth to be prepared.—Is not homiletics a kind of sacred cookery?—“When teachers have rightly experienced wholesome truths in their heart, then they understand also how to set them rightly before others, Matt. xiii. 52” (STARCK).—“The same kind of food does not do for the simple and children and for grown men” (BERL. BIB.).

(2.) The Holy Land and the Holy City (ch. xlvii., xlviii.).

CH. XLVII. 1. And he brought me back to the opening of the house, and, behold, waters issued from below the threshold of the house eastward: for the front [the face] of the house is toward the east, and the waters came down
2 from under, from the right side of the house, south of the altar. And he brought me forth the way of the north gate, and made me go round the way without to the outer gate, the way of the eastward-looking [gate]; and, behold,
3 waters came purling out from the right side. When the man went forth to the east, there was a measuring-line in his hand. And he measured a thousand cubits, and made me pass through in the water—waters to the ankles.

- 4 And he measured a thousand, and made me pass through in the water—waters to the knees [they reached]. And he measured a thousand, and made me pass through—waters to the loins. And he measured a thousand—a river [was it then] which I could not pass through, because the waters rose up, waters of swimming, a river that could not be waded. And he said unto me, Hast thou seen, son of man? And he led me, and brought me back to the bank of the river. When I returned, behold, on the bank of the river very many trees, on this side and on that. And he said unto me, These waters, going out as they do to the east boundary, then flow down over the steppe, and come to the sea, brought forth [they come] to the sea, and the waters are healed.
- 9 And it cometh to pass that every living thing which shall creep, whithersoever the double stream shall come, shall live; and very many fish are there, for these waters come thither, and they shall be healed; and everything liveth to which the river cometh. And it cometh to pass that fishers shall stand on it [shall place themselves over it], from En-gedi even unto En-eglaim there shall be a spreading-place for nets; as to their kind, their fishes shall be as the fishes of the great sea, very many. Its mire [its swamps] and its pools [holes], these shall not be healed; they are given to salt. And [yet] on the river there shall rise up, on its bank, on this side and on that, every kind of tree for food; its leaf [foliage] shall not fade, nor its fruit cease; according to its months it bears first-fruits, for its waters flow forth from the sanctuary; and its fruit is for food and its leaf [foliage] for healing. Thus saith the Lord Jehovah: The territory itself, the land which ye shall take to you for an inheritance, [shall be] for the twelve tribes of Israel; for Joseph [two] portions. And ye inherit it, every one as his brother, which I lifted up My hand to give to your fathers; and [so] this land falleth to you for inheritance. And this is the border of the land on the north side, from the great sea on the way to Hethlon, to come to Zedad; Hamath, Berothah, Sibraim, which is between the border of Damascus and the border of Hamath; Hazar the middle, which is on the border of Hauran. And the border from the sea is from Hazar-Enon, the border of Damascus, and [in the] north northward there is the border of Hamath; and [this] as the north side. And as to the east side, from between Hauran, and Damascus, and Gilead, and the land of Israel, is the Jordan; from the border ye shall measure to the east sea; and [this] as the east side. And as to the south side, to the right; from Tamar to the waters of Meriboth-Kadesh is the inheritance [to the river] to the great sea; and [this] as the side to the right southward. And with respect to the west side, the great sea from the border to over against the way to Hamath; this is the west side. And ye divide this land for you according to the tribes of Israel.
- 22 And it cometh to pass that ye shall allot [divide] it as an inheritance to you and to the strangers sojourning in your midst, who have begotten children in your midst; and they are to you as the native among the children of Israel; with you shall they share in the inheritance among the tribes of Israel. And it cometh to pass, that in the tribe with which the stranger sojourns, there shall ye give him his inheritance. Sentence of the Lord Jehovah.

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

As the entrance of the glory of the God of Israel (ch. xliii. and xlv.) forms the centre for the first section of this closing vision of the glory of Jehovah's kingdom, namely, for the temple and its service, so the waters of life from the temple give the key-note for the second section,—the holy land and the holy city,—and at the same time furnish the interpretation of the second and thereby of the first section.

Vers. 1-12. *The Waters of Life.*¹

ADDITIONAL NOTE.

[“It is necessary to take the first part of this chapter apart from the second, which relates to a different subject, the new division of the land, and which ought to have formed part of ch. xlviii. The vision contained in the first twelve verses of this chapter is a thing by itself, although it stands in close connection with what precedes, and springs naturally out of it. The prophet has been exhibiting, by means of a variety of detailed representations, the blessed results to the Lord's people of His re-occupying His temple. The way now stands open to them for a free and elevating communion with the Lord; and the work proceeds, on their part, by the regular employment of all spiritual privileges and the faithful discharge of holy ministrations. God is duly glorified in His people, and His people are blessed in the enjoyment of His gracious presence and the benefit of His fatherly administration. But what is to be the nature of the kingdom in this new form, in respect to the world without? Is it to be of a restrictive or expansive character? Is the good it discloses and provides for a regenerated people to be confined, as of old, to a select spot, or is it to spread forth and communicate itself abroad for the salvation of the world at large? In an earlier prophecy (ch. xvii.), when speaking of the future Head of the divine kingdom under the image of a little twig, plucked from the top of a cedar in Lebanon, and planted

upon a lofty mountain in Israel, the prophet had represented this not only as growing and taking root there, but as winning the regard of all the trees of the field, and gathering under its ample foliage beasts of every kind and birds of every wing. The kingdom of God, as thus exhibited, seemed to carry a benign and diffusive aspect toward the entire world. And should it be otherwise now, when presented under the different but more detailed and variegated form of a spiritual house, with the living God Himself for the glorious Inhabitant, and a royal priesthood for its ministering servants? No; it is for humanity, mankind as a whole, that God was thus seen dwelling with men; and though everything presents itself, according to the relations then existing, as connected with a local habitation and circumscribed bounds, yet the good in store was to be confined within no such narrow limits; it was to flow forth with healthful and restorative energy, even upon the waste and dead places of the earth, and invest them with the freshness of life and beauty.

“This fine idea is presented by the prophet under a pleasing natural image. He is brought back by the angel from the outer court, where he was standing, to the door of the temple on the east; and there he sees a stream of water gushing from beneath the threshold, and running in the direction of south-east, so as to pass the altar on the south. He is then brought outside by the north gate, and carried round to where the waters appeared beyond the temple-grounds, that he might witness the measurements that were to be made of them, and the genial effects they produced.”—FAIRBAIRN'S Ezekiel, pp. 489-491.—W. F.]

The bringing back of the prophet in Ver. 1 is explained from the circumstance that he had tarried (ch. xlv. 21) in the outer court; latterly, at the sacrificial kitchens for the people. The opening of the house is the temple gate, where the entrance into the holy place of the temple opens.—חֲזָקָה stands first by itself, both times

parallel to each other, to describe the very first impression, namely, that the waters (Häv.: “in particular, living spring water is often in Scripture a symbol of the divine blessings, Isa. xli. 17 sq., xlv. 3”) came forth from below, and so did not pour down from the heavens, but issued from the depth of the sacred foundation upon the mountain; and this is without doubt to be thought of in connection with the filling of the house with the glory of Jehovah (ch. xliii., xliv.). What Tacitus observes (Hist. v. 12) about "a never-drying fountain, whole mountains hollowed out below the surface, and ponds and cisterns for keeping the rain water;" or when Robinson does not doubt that there is in the rock "an artificial well at a depth of some 80 feet below the Haram,"—all this serves for understanding the prophet only by way of contrast;—he means and intends to describe nothing of the kind. [W. Kraft (Topographie von Jerusalem) thinks that the prophetic contrast refers to the spring known only to the priests as hidden, and whose water served only for the outward cleansing of the people.]—The מִתְחַת הַבַּיִת that follows

subjoins the more exact definition of the first מִתְחַת, as: below the threshold of the door of the temple, מִתְחַת without a ל, so that we have to seek the fountain-head not at this threshold, but farther in in the house.—The reason for saying eastward is the "eastern" position of the temple front; the waters which issued from below the house flowed toward the place where the glory of the Eternal had entered the house. Even Hitzig's dictum, which makes קִרְיָמָה to mean:

"in the east," does not destroy the very expressive causal nexus of the two sections of these concluding chapters of Ezekiel; but W. Neumann acutely observes: "The circumstance that the water flows east appears significant to the seer, and yet again, on the other hand, natural; for, says he, the front of the house is toward the east. According to ver. 12, the spring is the bearer of the mysteries of the sanctuary, and consequently the means of bearing along its ideal substance; and to this the פָּנִים [properly: 'the constantly changing multifarious aspects or manifestations of the soul through the exterior, the complex unity of which we call the countenance,' STRIE] corresponds; because the soul of the temple looks to the east, the gushing stream flows in the same direction."—This already indicates the farther course of the water as to its direction immediately after its gushing forth under the threshold of the door of the temple. But before treating of this direction, mention is again made of this so characteristic gushing forth. While, however, after the first מִתְחַת, to avoid repeating the מ before מִתְחַת, it is merely said:

מִתְחַת מִתְחַת הַבַּיִת, there now follows after the second מִתְחַת the more exact statement: מִתְחַת הַבַּיִת, from the "shoulder" of the house, i.e.

the right one. מִתְחַת means here neither: in the south = beneath (Judg. vii. 8), which is sufficiently expressed by מִנְּבֶה, nor: downwards (HITZIG), which is sufficiently expressed by יָרֵד. What is meant to be described is a stream of water flowing from the temple, not one conducted into the temple; hence the brook

Etham cannot be supposed, from which Lightfoot brings the water by means of subterranean channels for washing the victims and cleansing the house. (Comp. also the combination of Judah Leo in Lundius, die alten jüd. Heiligh.) Dereser infers from יָרֵד, that the fountain "fell into the earth on the south side of the altar of burnt-offering in the court of the priests, and flowed on under it until it reappeared outside of the courts of the temple." יָרֵד is employed to accord both with ver. 8, and also in general with the view current in Israel, according to which that which tends towards the abode of the Highest ascends, and hence that which comes out from it will descend. KEIL: "because the temple lay higher than the inner court." הִימְנִית. After the repeatedly marked eastern direction, there can be no doubt which right side is meant; a person looking to the east has the south on his right, as also מִנְּבֶה plainly indicates. This מִנְּבֶה has its signification in reference to the altar of burnt-offering, which stood before the porch of the temple (ch. xl. 47): לְמִנְּבֶה, the right (south) side of the house, the south part of the east side. The fact that the water issued "from the south end of the threshold," Hengst. explains from the circumstance that "the altar of burnt-offering lay immediately before the east door of the sanctuary; the water must therefore issue not from the middle of the threshold, if it was not to meet with an immediate hindrance; it must first come forth where the altar no longer stood in the way." This is quite natural. Neumann speaks of "the prominence given to the right side as the side of good fortune and power." He says: "If even in the feasts of the Bedouins the cup-bearer must hand the cup to the drinker from the right, to prevent complaint of want of respect, how could that which was here commanded by a heavenly hand for healing (ver. 8) come from another quarter?" [KLIER: "But the temple had two thresholds, one before the flight of steps at the door of the fore-porch, and one at the west end of the porch, before the temple gate. If, then, ver. 1 speaks in the outset of the door of the temple, that shows us that we have to understand the latter threshold. If the temple is the body, and its fore-porch the head, then its right shoulder is in the angle which the south wall of the temple porch forms with the east wall of the temple. The threshold of the door of the temple abutted with its south end on this corner, and thence under the threshold the fountain gushed out and ran down into the inner court."] "The water," says HÄV., "comes from the sanctuary;" that is to say, "it is the fulness of blessing which is poured out over the community from the new manifestation of God. Without this going before, the people cannot serve the Lord in the new manner; and the service of God, again, is itself a grace and a gift from Him. If the fountain proceeding from God is simply a testimony to His revelation of Himself, then it cannot be a mere material fountain."

Ver. 2. In the court, surrounded with buildings and walls, Ezekiel cannot descry the farther course of the waters. For this he is brought forth through the north gate, for the outer east gate is always shut, and to go out through the south gate the prophet would be obliged to cross over the waters. [Neumann infers, from comparing ch. xl. 35, xlv. 4, that the guide had a preference for the north gate (but see ch. xlv. 9), and seeks the reason in the significance of the north in the prophecies.] He proceeds on the outside along the wall of the outer court, the way to the east gate, as the outer gate is more exactly designated. [Neumann erroneously, because against the prophet's uniform mode of expression, refers the epithet eastward-looking to the way.] The thrice repeated וַיֵּרָא thus emphasizes and depicts the circuit which Ezekiel had to take, because the aim of the prophet's going—the regaining a view of the waters—is the main matter. Whether the waters flowed forth over or under the courts is not expressly stated; at all events they ran under the surrounding walls, and doubtless under the stone pavement of the outer court.—וַיֵּרָא resumes verbally, when the waters were seen again, the וַיֵּרָא of ver. 1, so that the וַיֵּרָא without the article occasions no difficulty whatever; no other waters can be imagined than those which the prophet had seen before.—מִפְּתֵיחַ (Piel particip. of פָּתַח) only in this passage, thus a unique and not less pictorial expression. Ges.: “to trickle;” and Umbreit adduces its affinity with פָּתַח, so that he gets “weeping” waters, which would portray such an “insignificant commencement of the issue” as does not harmonize with ver. 1. How can that be thought of as trickling here which has already flowed through the courts? The affinity of the expression with פָּתַח, “to pour out,” likewise observed by Gesenius, would lead to a signification such as: to gush out. Hitzig goes back to פָּתַח, a word which does not exist; and Meier to פָּתַח, “to burst forth” (!). Hengst. thinks of פָּתַח, “a bottle,” and supposes a “gurgling,” like the “sound which the emptying bottle makes,” which, however, does not correspond to the “character of fulness and livingness” which, according to him, the waters in themselves must have; he translates, indeed: “gushed out.” Neumann assumes a radical signification: “to break up,” “to set free;” hence: פָּתַח, “to break forth.” To translate it with Keil: “to purl,” very probably comes nearest the figure.—מִן־הַיָּמִין

הַיָּמִין; Hitzig: “not the south side of the whole temple-circuit, but: the southern half of the east front;” NEUM.: “on the beholder's right hand, when he has come out here from the north;” HENGST.: “the right side is here also the south-east, the south side of the east gate, where the water comes forth only because it has taken its rise on the south-east side of the temple;” KLIEF.: “the angle which the eastern outer gate formed with the wall of the outer court is meant.” At all events this is meant to be expressed, that the waters which Ezekiel here saw again were the waters which came from the sanctuary.

Ver. 3. Hengstenberg translates: “When the man went forth to the east with the measuring-line in his hand, he measured a thousand cubits,” etc. Ezekiel's guide is, in distinction from ver. 2 (וַיֵּרָא), now considered by himself

(בְּצִמְתוֹ הָאֵשׁ). He had קָו (ch. xl. 3: פָּתַח)—from קָו, according to Gesenius: “to twist;”

according to Meier: “to bring together”—in his hand, which is remarked because of what follows, where not merely the farther course of the waters, but still more their peculiarities during the course, are set forth. Following the waters in an eastern direction, the man measured a thousand cubits.—וַיֵּרָא gives the experience of the prophet, whom the man makes to wade in the water from one bank to the other; hence it is not appositional to וַיֵּרָא, but an independent clause, the meaning of which many attempts have been made to distort, when yet it must contain a statement corresponding to the following increments. Kimchi, making use of Gen. xlvii. 15, interprets it: “water of vanishing” = little water. The dual form: וַיֵּרָא, certainly does not refer to an abstraction, but, as uniformly, denotes things paired naturally or artificially; in the connection here, without doubt, a corporeal duality, but not, as Gesenius: “foot-soles” (“shallow water which only wets the soles”); against which Hitzig justly observes that the water reached to the foot-soles in the very beginning. וַיֵּרָא is not exactly the same as וַיֵּרָא, that is, “extension,” flat of the hand, and hence also flat of the foot, foot-sole, but וַיֵּרָא rather suggests וַיֵּרָא, a garment extended so as to reach to the ankles. [Neumann thinks that “waters of the foot-soles” probably were waters of only the depth of the sandals, which the prophet had put off (!) in the court of the priests, and again put on; and that, in conformity with the phrase: וַיֵּרָא, we have to think of the two ends, the two lower extremities of the body, that is, the feet: waters of the extremities were waters which scarcely covered the feet.]—וַיֵּרָא, measured by the measure, which was a cubit-measure.

Ver. 4. After the second measuring of a thousand cubits, i.e. of distance along the course of the waters, the result of the waters becoming always deeper is וַיֵּרָא; וַיֵּרָא; an ungrammatical form, so much the more striking, as we have the stat. constr. וַיֵּרָא before and after. See Hitzig's explanation, which, however, is a mere conjecture, while the supposition of a separate clause (waters, to the knee they reach) is easier, and at the same time more emphatic. After a third measuring, we have waters to the loins. But after the fourth measuring of another thousand cubits, i.e. in all, at a distance of four thousand cubits, it is —Ver. 5—a river! וַיֵּרָא looks like an exclamation of Ezekiel's surprise on seeing what reminds him of the impetuous rush of a mountain torrent. The going through, hitherto possible, is no longer so, for the waters נָחַל, "swelled," "grew in height" (Job viii. 11, x. 16; comp. also Ex. xv. 1) to נִשְׁחָזַק, in which swimming was possible, yea, necessary, if one were to cross from bank to bank—to a river which cannot be waded. The prophet describes the increasing volume of water by the two parallel clauses: "waters of swimming," "a river that could not be waded."

The question in Ver. 6 indicates the halting-place in the vision, whereby what had been already seen, that is, the out-flow and on-flow of the waters in gradually increasing strength, is, in passing over to what follows, marked off as a thing apart by itself. Yet it is specially the continuous increase of the waters to which the prophet's attention is called. KEIL: "A natural brook cannot in so short distances have increased so mightily, unless brooks fell into it on all sides, which was not the case here." HENGST.: "The Messianic salvation crecit eundo, while the streams of worldly enterprise dry up after a brief course—are streams whose waters lie (Isa. lviii. 11; Job vi. 15 sq.). Comp. the supplement through the person of the Mediator of salvation in Ezek. xvii. 22, 23; and in the New Testament, the parables of the mustard seed and the leaven. The same progress which is exhibited in its efficacy among the nations shows itself also in the life of individuals, making them become great out of small, fathers in God out of children." NEUM. calls attention to the Messianic element in the designation: son of man, and observes that "the seer was thereby reminded that his vision was for mankind, that this swelling stream flowed on to the days of the completion of the human race." The נִשְׁחָזַק taken by itself may be a mere recording here of what had taken place before,—“a wading in to the neck” (Isa. viii. 8), as Hengst. expresses it,—in order to get the knowledge indicated in ver. 5; or, according to others, it is to be taken in conjunction with נִשְׁחָזַק, as defining it more exactly: he brought me back to come up again out of the water.—נָחַל לְבָנִי, to the bank (up to the bank), etc.

NEUMANN, Kliefoth, and Keil understand it thus: And he made me go, namely, away from the last-mentioned place, and brought me back to the bank of the river (Ewald, too, in his last edition: "and made me go and return on the bank of the stream"). According to this, the prophet was led on the bank, in order to learn the depth of the waters,—but he was rather led through three times, and hence the fourth time probably just in and out again!—and brought back to the bank, to see that it was covered with trees. It seems, however, to agree better with the end intended, to understand לְבָנִי as stating the purpose; for,

as Hengst. says, the attention is now to be turned to the bank, to observe it, and not as hitherto the waters in their bed. [Hitzig makes the guide measure at a distance from the water, and the prophet, after his last vain attempt, come to the guide; whereupon the latter put his question to the prophet, and returned with him to the bank of the river, and during the time that Ezekiel's back was turned to the river, its bank became adorned with trees. HÄV.: "from the end, from the point where the river flows into the Dead Sea (!), the prophet returned once more to its bank."—Ver. 7. נִשְׁחָזַק, literally: "when I turned myself back." Hitzig disputes the transitive signification of the verb, but indisputably the objective suffix נִי is attached to the infinitive; whereas Hitzig takes the suffix as genitive of possession: "when he came back with me."

On the return of the prophet (נִשְׁחָזַק seems to comprehend the נִשְׁחָזַק וְלָבִי of ver. 6)—who would probably have followed the course of the water still farther had it depended on him, but is obliged to return to the edge of the bank, just because he has to notice the bank of the river, and that (as ver. 8 shows) as far back as the sanctuary—that is realized which was intended with a נִשְׁחָזַק, as in vers. 1 and 2; it is the third stage in the vision. How much the matter treated of refers to the brink of the river, the repeated mention of it shows. But the fact that "so long as the beholder followed the measurer, he saw nothing of the trees on the bank," arises from the nature of the process in the vision. The looking forward gave Ezekiel the knowledge of the progressive fullness and depth of the waters; not until he looks back does he come to know—with a view to what follows—the fertilizing, enlivening effect of these waters. נִי, as the words:

very many, show, is collective (Gen. i. 11 sq., ii. 9), and in accordance with ver. 12 is to be understood of fruit-bearing trees. (The phrase: on the brink of the river, indicates the cause. It has been said that Ezekiel interchanges לְבָנִי and לְבָנִי; but when the bringing of the prophet out of the water and on to the bank was referred to, לְבָנִי was employed in ver. 6; here, where the reference is to the trees growing on and overshadowing the bank, we have simply לְבָנִי.) But it confuses

the meaning of the waters when Hengst. finds here "the need of salvation denoted by hungering as well as by thirsting." Nothing has been said of this in connection with the waters. It is not the case that "life or salvation is here represented in the shape of the fruit-tree, as before by the water" (for which Hengst. compares Isa. lv. 1 sq.).—It cannot with strictness be said that "the trees have here no independent import, but come into account only for their fruit," for there is not the slightest mention here of their fruit. It would be better, with Hitzig, to call to mind ch. xxxvi. 35, and to think of the restoration, cultivation, and fertilization of the land in general, as a blessed dwelling-place for Israel. The trees are not very "great," but very "many,"—not one tree, as in ch. xvii. 22 sq.; Dan. iv. 7 [10] sq. "That this stream here depends on the four streams watering the garden of Eden (Gen. ii.), and this forest on the tree of life, is a gratuitous assertion. Nothing is said of the immortality-giving power of the trees, and the waters no more bear fish of paradise on their waves than do the rivers in Ps. i. 3" (NEUM.).

Ver. 8. Corresponding to the twofold direction of the prophet's observation, the interpretation, which now begins, tells us regarding the course of the waters and the effects they shall produce. Had the prophet desired to follow the water farther, this desire would have been met by the saying: "these waters go out;" in other words, as they come out from the sanctuary, vers. 1, 2 (יֵצְאוּ, ver. 1), i.e. take their departure thence, so their progress is directed out "toward," "to" (אֶל), etc.—The statement: הַנְּחִלָּה הַקְּדוֹמֹנָה, is no such "general" determination of the region in which the waters are to prove themselves effectual as Hengstenberg supposes. At any rate, what is thereby designated is not—as the exegesis of the Fathers, following the Sept., delighted to maintain, in view of Jesus' residence there—הַנְּחִלָּה of Josh.

xx. 7; the גְּלִיל הַנְּחִלָּה of Isa. viii. 23 [ix. 1]; the northern district in the tribe of Naphtali, called הַנְּחִלָּה in 2 Kings xv. 29—the later Galilee. On the contrary, הַקְּדוֹמֹנָה expressly distinguishes it from that Galilee. The very word נְחִלָּה, the feminine formation from נָחַל, evidently denotes with the article a definite district; there were several 'נְחִלֹת, Josh. xiii. 2 (Joel iv. 4 [iii. 9]), xxii. 10 sq. Derived as it is from נָחַל, "to break off,"

"to roll off," a "section," something "bounded off," is to be understood; and because it is here in the east, the border-land there, lying opposite the centre of the land, would be meant, as distinguished from every other border district.—

After the statement of the direction (יֵצְאוּ אֶל), there follows the account of the course of the waters, as also it is said in the outset in ver. 1 (יֵרְדוּ) that the waters, namely, came down (יֵרְדוּ), "flowed down," עָל, that is, over.—

הַעֲרֵבָה, defined by the article, is to be interpreted by the context. From the intransitive עָרַב, to be "contracted," hence to be "arid," "dry," heath, wilderness, steppe is meant.—Geographically, the Arabah is the whole valley of the Jordan, extending even beyond the Dead Sea; comp. our Comment. on Deut. i.; but in accordance with the previous definition, we find ourselves in that part of the Ghor which lies above the Dead Sea.—After יֵצְאוּ and יֵרְדוּ, we have now בֹּאוּ, the coming to the goal. How much stress is laid upon this goal, as that which is to be defined in respect to the course of the waters, is shown by the repetition of הַיָּמָה אֶל-הַיָּמָה after הַיָּמָה. As the Dead Sea is called in Deut. iii. 17, iv. 49, יַם הַעֲרֵבָה, so in ver. 18 of our chapter it is designated the "east sea;" and thus we cannot with other expositors understand here the western, the Mediterranean Sea, which, moreover, is distinguished in ver. 10 as "the great sea." If the Arabah, the μυγα πρὸς of Josephus, which he names ἑρμηνα, is an unhealthy plain "full of salt clay," then this is only the fitting introduction to the Dead Sea, with its well-known peculiarity.—הַיָּמָה (particip. Hoph.) הַיָּמָה has,

following the Sept., been translated: "into the sea of the mouths," inasmuch as the Jordan falls into it, and, according to Gadow (in the Journal of the German Oriental Society, 1848, i. p. 61), forms "a slimy delta." [EWALD: "into the sea, into the sea of the muddy waters;" מְרִיחָה,

"muddy," "foul"!]. The comparison of Zech. xiv. 8 and the dual form in ver. 9 have led others to suppose a dividing of the waters, so that נְחִלָּה refers one time to the east, but afterwards also to the west. "The prophet," says Umbreit, "sets out first and specially from the Dead Sea; he does not, however, confine himself to it, but makes the waters flow also into the great west and world sea. For the sea of the wilderness appears, indeed, as the most fitting symbol of the death of sin ('the Lord hath no pleasure in the death of the sinner, but that he should turn and live'); but until now there is no water altogether healthy, and for this very reason there is a flowing forth of the fountain of life still farther into the world of sin and of death." [According to the Midrashim, the river divides itself into twelve waters, which flow to the twelve tribes; it is even said to flow on so far as to Calabria and into Barbary.] It only remains that, in accordance with the stress laid upon the issuing forth of the waters in question in vers. 1 and 2, and again in ver. 12, we understand the expression: brought forth, used of the waters on their way to the sea, as an emphasizing again of the fact that they proceeded from the temple, and that this is done just here in order to pass on to the purpose effected by them when they have reached their goal. (HENGST.: reference "to the higher hand, which executes, according to deliberate counsel, the plan of salvation." NEUM.: "waters that well forth from the threshold of the temple, that come to the Dead Sea. Not only that, but, moreover, having arrived at the Dead Sea, they are brought forth; thus the sanctuary of the blessing expressly connects itself with the doomed domain of the curse.")—The waters of which it is said that they are healed are self-evidently (2 Kings ii. 22) the waters of the Dead Sea, as is shown also by what follows. The spiritual signification of the waters is now told to the prophet: healing of the dead, which accordingly means only sick unto death, is the aim of their being brought forth from the sanctuary to the Dead Sea, to the east boundary; that is, we might say, from Israel into the world, which is thereby auspiciously symbolized as in the east, consequently with a reference to the rising of the Sun of Righteousness (Mal. iii. 20 [iv. 2]). [Grotius explains נְרַפְאוּ

in this way, that the waters flowing in continue wholesome, notwithstanding their flowing through.] The character of the water of the Dead Sea has already been correspondingly described by Diodorus: ἡ δὲ θάλασσα καὶ ἀλὴν ὡς βροχὴν δούρειαν. Comp. Tacitus, Hist. v. 6. Jerome calls it mare amarissimum, quod Græce λικμάλιστον, id est, stagnum bituminis vocatur. Comp. von Schubert (Reise in d. Morgenl. iii.

p. 85), who remarks on the deceptive appearance for thirty persons of the "clear and pure" water. Comp. moreover, von Raumer's Palästina, p. 61 sq.; Robinson's Physical Geography of the Holy Land, p. 209 sq. [HENGST.: "The wilderness is in Scripture a figure of ungodliness (!), and so a fitting emblem of the world estranged from God and excluded from His kingdom, Ps. cvii. 5. In Joel, the valley of the acacias, the tree of the wilderness, corresponds to the Arabah here. Comp. also Isa. xxxv. 6. As a symbol of the corrupt world lying in wickedness (1 John v. 19), the Dead Sea is the more appropriate, as it owes its origin to a judgment on the corrupt world, and the spiritual eye discerns under its waves the figure of Sodom and Gomorrah (ch. xvi. 1)."]

The transition is now made to the effects of the waters flowing to the Dead Sea. Very impressively Ver. 9 begins first of all with the prophetic וְהָיָה (NEUM.: "it has then come to pass, then the fact lies open to observation"): what manifests itself in consequence of the healing of the water, in reference to the water itself, as an effect of the healing waters of the sanctuary.—But what of כָּל־נֶפֶשׁ חַיָּה? Is there, then, any living thing in the Dead Sea? There is not, although Prince Pückler asserts that he ate there fishes taken living from the Dead Sea. The Jordan carries in some, or "they voluntarily accompany its waves" (VON SCHUBERT), but "they must soon pay with their life for their love of travel, because they die in the salt brine, or because this brine thrusts out their light bodies to the shore." A fish seen by Robinson, and said to have been caught in the Dead Sea, was found near the mouth of the Jordan, and dying in a state of exhaustion. "Neither fishes nor snails live in this very salt lake" (VON SCHUBERT). "Some herons," Gadow relates, "sought the little fishes washed into the sea, that died instantly in the sharp lye; I myself observed some wrestling with death. Sea fishes which Marshal Marmout at Alexandria cast into water taken from the Dead Sea, died in two or three minutes." Thus "living things" can only be spoken of in respect to the Dead Sea as things that were alive and then died there, or that live but must die when they come thither. But the mode of expression employed is rather a prophetic anticipation, picturing as it does in the healed water, in contrast to the death dominating it, life already preserved,—life, too, which, through אֶשְׁרָא, significantly alludes to Gen. vii. 21, viii.

17 (death and preservation), and Gen. i. 21 (creation). Quite as readily could a contrast to the Jordan carrying the living to death in the Dead Sea be found in the following words: everything whithersoever the double stream shall come shall live. HITZIG: "which creeps in every place to which rivers (נְחָלִים, pointed as plural) come." (EWALD: נְחָלִים.) KEIL: "which swarms wherever the brook comes."—נְחָלִים. What is the meaning of the dual, where hitherto we have always had נָחַל? Keil thinks the best solution is that of Hengstenberg, who, referring to Jer. l. 21, explains "two rivers" as equivalent to strong river, remarking that the doubled often stands for the distinguished (Job xi. 6; Isa. lxi. 7). He might have known that already Umbreit translates it: "two rivers," and in doing so refers to "the fulness of the water." The avalis emphaticus, too, of Stier (Lehrgeb. p. 218) comes to the same thing, as he also cites for it Jer. l. The original "waters" (מַיִם) have grown in ver. 5 to a

and the healed הַמַּיִם have been expressly named side by side in ver. 8, be very appropriately (not indeed as Maurer: because of the similarity with מַיִם) expressed succinctly by the dual form

נְחָלִים, and by נְחָלִים indefinitely, because of their rushing streams sweeping away death and opening up the way to life! Thus, as NEUM.: "We see it at once, the result of the flowing in is manifest in the sea itself; the river is not lost in it, but neither does the river swallow up the sea; it impenetrates it with its living power, and wherever the eye follows these united streams, it beholds the swarming newly produced life," etc. KLEF.: "When the waters of the river shall come into the waters of the sea, they will divide themselves," etc.—וְחָיָה, to retain life and to enjoy life, in pregnant contrast to the dying of which this sea is suggestive. KEIL: "to revive, to come to life."

[Hitzig, too, remarks on the masculine construction of נֶפֶשׁ (חַיָּה and אֶשְׁרָא), so that חַיָּה appears as a substantive in the genitive dependent on נֶפֶשׁ. NEUM.: "Thus everything, that in the power of life bears in itself the germ of life, shall unfold this germ; the view which underlies is not that of the feminine, of what is upheld by the Spirit, but of what breathes independently."]—The description of this life accords with the nature of the water, the healthy vital power of which finds expression in its fulness and the multitude of its fishes. But we have first "everything that creeps and moves quickly, אֶשְׁרָא, said of every kind of animal mobility" (NEUM.), in order primarily to give pictorial expression to life in general in the all-sided manifold swarm. The following clause adds the more special: and there are very many הַרְבֵּה (a collective, expressing at the same time the most different kinds), a feminine form of רַב, which, from רָבָה, "to become-

thick," denotes first of all, as here too in accordance with the context, the strong large sea-fish, and then fish in general. (UMBR.: "to live and multiply most abundantly.")—The cause of this, which was formerly incorporated in the general description, is now taken by itself, in order to explain the special case of the fishes: for these waters come thither and they shall be healed, i.e., as this repetition from ver. 8 clearly shows, the waters of the Dead Sea, to which נְחָלִים also points.—But the description reaches its full height of expression of life with the clause: and everything liveth, etc. First, everything, etc.; then, the many fishes of various kinds in particular—in other words, the Dead Sea in its piscine life; finally, the whole Dead Sea as such. Hence formerly שָׁם, whereas the two following times שָׁמָּה; as also the preceding יִרְפָּאוּ (imperf. Niphal) is illustrated by נָחַי, and therefore also we have

הַנְּחַל, from ver. 5 sq., in antithesis to the waters of the Dead Sea. "The Dead Sea has become a sea of life" (NEUM.). [EWALD: every one that draws water out of it. CALMET: every land, however unfruitful, provided only the river waters it, shall be at once made most fruitful. DERESER: "all the regions of the Dead Sea, to which the water penetrates, shall swarm with fish."]

Ver. 10. וְהָיָה again. ["Out of death there arises, by the omnipotence and grace of God, a rich life. The new community is numerous, innumerable as the fishes of the sea," HÄV.] Because not only the life of the sea, but the (Dead) Sea itself as alive is exemplified in the abundance of fish, this abundance is described partly as to the employment it occasions, and partly as to the numerous kinds of fish. In the former respect, וְיָמְדוּ עָלָיו (Qeri) עָמְדוּ, "they have placed themselves," one sees them standing), "fishers place themselves over it" (the river, not the Dead Sea, but also not the whole length of the river on its banks, but where the Dead Sea touches it, because the filling of it with fish-life is the subject in hand). With this agrees also the statement as to locality given: וְהָיָה נָחַי וְהָיָה נָחַי, which has given occasion to so many disquisitions. These must be two points lying near each other, as the same expression: וְעַן' and וְעַן', and not less the difference, which is simply that between a "kid" and "two calves," seems designed to show. Hengst. thinks that perhaps וְעַנְיִים is a dual, such as that in ver. 9: "the double calf in parallelism with the kid." He supposes "the fountains are named after the finders," "the calf had distinguished itself by the discovery" (1). Seriously, however, En-gedi ("kid's fountain," which reminds Sepp of the ibex, seldom pursued here by a hunter) is "Ain-Didi," on the west bank of the Dead Sea, the southmost point inhabited by the Israelites, with an Egyptian climate and Egyptian products; and regarding En-eglaim ("two-calves' fountain"), Jerome says that it is situated at the beginning of the Dead Sea, where the Jordan flows in, that is, northward. Since the death of living things occurs at the entrance into the Dead Sea, we feel certain that this is the right place. Hengst. finds "En-gedi obliquely over against the Eglaim mentioned in Isa. xv. 8;" for, "as obviously the whole compass of the sea is intended, En-eglaim is to be looked for on the east side." EWALD: "the whole present stretch along the Dead Sea." Neum. disregards any geographical basis: "Two fountains (עַיִן) flow now into the Dead Sea, both of them living and full of fish, into the dark depths of death; but in those days of salvation, a river of life shall flow from the one to the other. No longer shall there be only small and quickly-dying fishes moving here and there before the months of the fountains; the whole intervening water, now waste and dead, shall then become alive, and swarm with the fishes of the great sea." — מְשַׁמֵּחַ [EWALD: "a casting-place for nets"]

xxvi. 5, 14. Gesenius holds both forms to have the same signification: place of spreading out. In order, however, to suppose the act of spreading out, we must with Neumann take the fishers as a spreading out of the nets; they will be quite absorbed in that occupation, will be nothing else; and this is not so inadmissible as Kliefoth supposes; while Rosenmüller's interpretation of the וְהָיָה, as referring to the places, that they shall be places for spreading out the nets, can quite well be extracted out of the phrase: from En-gedi even unto, etc., although it is not so obvious.—

לְחָרְמִים, whether for the take, or, after the take,

for drying, which, however, is done as fresh preparation for new labour, for a new take. [HENGST.: "The question is not of fishers who will arrange after their kind the fish caught, but only of those who catch fish of different kinds."] By the nets is characterized not only the fulness, but also the manifoldness, the various kinds of fishes that may be or are caught.—לְכִינָה, "as to the kind"

(collective), intentionally (as Raphe shows) without Mappiq, means at bottom the same as with ה: "in respect to their kind;" care is always taken to express the variety of kinds corresponding to the הָיָה here and in ver. 9. "Life is de-icted with far more significance not by multitudes alone, but by the variegated mixture of the most different kinds, which are commingled together" (NEUM.).—"Allusion to the account of creation (comp. also ver. 9): the new community, a similar creation of God's" (HÄV.).—וְהָיָה, not:

of the healed מֵיִם of the sea, nor of the נְחָלִים

of ver. 9, nor of the banks between En-gedi and En-eglaim, but of the fishers, or the nets.—The comparison with the fishes of the great sea, said to be very many, is connected, as Hitzig observes, with the לְכִינָה: there shall live in it the many kinds of fish of the great sea, and many of each kind, —as the fishes, sq., is proverbial for this—and not merely the few kinds of small fresh-water fish. The fish of the Mediterranean thus compared are, moreover, conceived of as living, so that this too shows that the Mediterranean cannot have been spoken of previously. [HENGST.: "The sea is a symbol of the world; accordingly men appear as the living creatures in the sea, as the fishes (Rev. viii. 9). Hitherto there were only dead fishes, only unspiritual, unsaved men. Thus the meaning of the fishers cannot be doubtful: the fishes are the men who have attained to life through the Messianic salvation; the fishers are the messengers of this salvation, who gather those who are quickened into the kingdom of God, introduce them into the fellowship of the Church," Luke v. 11; Matt. xiii. 47, etc.]

Ver. 11. בְּצִוְיָהּ (Qeri) is singular; the plural of the Qeri appears to be put because of the following plural, בְּצִמְתֵּי. Gesenius: בְּצִמְתֵּי, incorrectly written for בְּצִמְתֵּי. בְּצִמְתֵּי is a moist place. RASHI: marais (marsh). One might perhaps make the distinction to be what is turned into swamp by the natural recession of the sea from the bank, and the artificially constructed salt-pits (Zeph. ii. 9). These form the exception from the rule of healing and quickening; they are the places in which the healing waters produce no effect. "We have just observed the fishers placing themselves from one fountain to the other, that the life of the sea may become conspicuous through them; but here in the pools is death" (NEUM.). "The waters even which the river brought to them," thinks Hitzig, "would become corrupt, if left standing along with the whole mass of water without any fresh inflow." J. D. MICHAELIS: "Palestine would lose much were it to lose this salt, got without labour, and were the Dead Sea to become quite fresh; hence this gift of nature is to remain." Hitzig's view and reasons, even if satisfactory for the וְלֹא יִפְסָדוּ, are certainly not so for the

וְלֹא יִפְסָדוּ; which clause, moreover, is not to be explained on the ground of utility (as is done by Michaelis), it is the expression of a judgment. "Those districts," says Hävernick, "in which the salt-deposits proper were formerly found, shall also henceforth be such waste places. The thought is this: only those who bar themselves against the gracious stream of divine love, and are unwilling to regain health, are henceforth to be given over to the curse, continuing to exist as monuments thereof (Zech. xiv. 17)." Around the sea of death there lingers on a death which abides: this is the second death, the death unto death. What is given to salt is entirely forfeited to death. KLEIN: "They shall be made into salt." HENGST.: "The salt comes into consideration here not as seasoning, as frequently, but as the foe of fertility, life, and prosperity (Job xxxix. 6). A contrast to deliverance from the corrosive power of the salt, which would be effected by the waters from the sanctuary were access afforded to them; they remain given over to salt: he that believeth not the Son of God shall not see life, etc., John iii. 36."—In Ver. 12, that of which the seer obtained merely a general view in ver. 7 is now more exactly particularized to him, as the conclusion of the entire section. After the contrast (ver. 11) to the healing effect of the waters of the sanctuary (ver. 8), there comes in what follows something antithetical, and therefore parallel to ver. 9 sq.: the quickening effects as regards the banks of the river, and so back to the source of the waters, form a parallel to the quickening effects as regards the goal, in relation to the Dead Sea. In fine, viewed forward or backward, they are the waters of life; as on the one hand they sustain life, so on the other they produce fruit.—וְהָיָה, as the waters since ver. 5, on their way to the Dead Sea, and considered in contrast thereto (ver. 9), have been designated, so that the reference is to their course from their coming out of the temple walls.—The description: on the river, is amplified thus: "on its וְהָיָה on both sides." The "rising up" forms also, no doubt, an antithetical pendant to the former deepening and deepening and descending of the waters.—וְהָיָה, "what is edible" (HENGST.:

"all fruit-bearing trees;" HITZIG: "every tree of edible fruit"). KLEIN: "they shall bear edible fruits of all sorts." Their described quality, however, is not this alone, that they are trees of food, and hence yield food—not wild, acid, hard fruit; but an abiding freshness of life and vigour distinguishes this growth of trees (which is elsewhere expressed by ever-flowing, never-failing waters), both as to the leaf (וְהָיָה, Ps. i. 3, "to fade," "to fall off," cognate with וְהָיָה) and the fruit (וְהָיָה). In respect to the latter it is said:

according to its months, that is, as these change (HITZIG: distributively), וְהָיָה, said of the "first commencement," of the "first of a thing;" hence וְהָיָה, the first-fruits, signify, according to Hitzig, that the trees produce fresh fruit every month; and this, according to Hengst., "indicates the uninterrupted enjoyment of salvation;" or the fruit is as eagerly desired and hailed with as much joy as early first-fruits, or generally as superior fruit, which can claim, as it were, the right of the first-born (Deut. xxi. 16). Comp. Rev. xxii. 2. NEUM.: "The thought in fact is: what used to delight the heart every year, will henceforth be furnished every month. According to Horapollon, the palm puts forth a new branch with every new moon. The month is looked on as the property of the trees, because the change of the moon always enables them to put forth in similar change the life welling up in them." We are not to compare here the enchanted gardens of Alcinoüs (Odyss. vii. 114 sq.). The reason assigned, too, which makes the leading thought the active principle of the effects, accords with the closing character of the verse: its (not: the stream's, as Neumann, but: the trees', this forest's) waters, namely, the waters "proceeding from the sanctuary." HITZIG: "from the dwelling-place of Him who is the Author of all life and fertility." NEUM.: "a deep disclosure regarding what the temple of his God was to the prophet. With Him is the fountain of life, and in His light we see light, Ps. xxxvi. 10 [9]. But this is just the sanctuary; because its source is holy, therefore the flood of the river produces fruitful germs. And וְהָיָה is not moral parity, but sublime, transcendent parity, which sheds its enlightening beams over all the dark places of the earth. Hence the lofty praise of the seraphim in Isa. vi. 3."—As formerly the fishes were for the nets of the fishers, so now the fruit of the trees is for food, etc. וְהָיָה (Qeri:

וְהָיָה, which is unnecessary), for וְהָיָה is not necessarily the fruit of each and every tree, but can be taken collectively with the plural. As we have here a reference to paradise and the first creation (Gen. ii. 9), so we have also to redemption, the future salvation, in the phrase: and its (the forest's) leaf, וְהָיָה—HITZIG: "for medicine;" on which he remarks: "doubtless for external application, since the leaf is laid upon wounds as soft and cooling, apart from its special healing virtue; רִפְיָה is derived from רָפָא. In this, too, the thought of mending and of healing is united and conjoined in this closing clause, so that in this sense "medicine" is by no means "a very unsuitable disharmony in these figures of perfection," as Neumann says, whose thoughts run on "the blessed salvation enlivened by a sweet life of rapture," and on "adorning life with fragrant chaplets." This last would as mere ornament be altogether out of place here. HENGST.: "Salvation must present itself for the terribly sick heathen world, above all, in the form of saving grace. Besides the nourishing fruits, therefore, are named also the healing leaves." HÄV.: "The trees are trees of life, with allusion at the same time to Ps. i.; the figure of the fishes refers to the extent, the greatness of the community; and this figure of the trees to its nature, in so far as the divine grace transforms it into truly living members, who themselves bear rich fruit, and thereby become a means of life and recovery to others also." [Philippson says of the entire section: "This description answers to no fountain actually existing in Jerusalem, and contains suppositions which no actually existing fountain could fulfil. Hence it belongs to the realm of those prophetic intuitions of the future land, in which this land appeared, altered in its nature, endowed with the most glorious fertility and wonderful virtues. We have to consider this section as a poetical resting-point of the prophet, in which, between dry narration and representation, the prophet's enraptured soul expatiated on the prospects of his people." According to this, the hope of the Jews of the present should finally be æsthetics.]

Vers. 13-23. The Fixing of the Boundaries in the Holy Land.

Hengstenberg, in accordance with his view of the concluding portion of Ezekiel, makes the prophet return from the distant Messianic future, the prospect into which, according to him, suddenly opened in vers. 1-12, to the lower salvation, the temple and city of the future, which formed the presupposition of the higher salvation. According to Hitzig, "the previous section forms the transition to this, inasmuch as in that section Ezekiel first of all, following the course of the river, turns himself away from the temple and the idea of the Terumah; in other words, it still remains to treat of the land itself from which that Terumah was selected." It would be an entire break in these closing chapters, which hang so closely together, were vers. 1-12 an insertion of essentially different character, meaning, and signification from that which precedes them, and that which follows them. But if vers. 1-12 are decidedly symbolical, and their contents specially Messianic, then we have in them the key for everything in these chapters, both what precedes and what follows, not merely "the transition" to what follows. Then the temple is a symbol of the new revelation of God among Israel in their own land; then the partly indicated, partly instituted worship as to acts, persons, and times, symbolizes the future worshipping in spirit and in truth; then the blessing, which abolishes even the Dead Sea in its character of curse, cannot leave the Holy Land untouched, but only with the fixing of its boundaries and the division of the enclosed territory among the tribes (ch. xlviii.) will the theocracy of the future be complete. We cannot say, with Ewald, that "the whole book might have been perfectly well concluded with the last great figure in ch. xlvii. 1-12." Ewald himself is compelled to admit that "the position of the sanctuary and its immediate environs in ch. xlvii. 1-8 is not yet explained with sufficient clearness;" but what still follows finds its explanation less by reference to this, than by the fact that in ch. xlv. 1 the division of the land by inheritance is presupposed, without our having up to this point heard anything regarding it, except the prophecy of the return of Israel into their again reviving land (ch. xxxiv. 25 sq., xxxvi. 8 sq., xxxvii. 21 sq.). Only by what follows from ver. 13 to the end of the book do the people of God attain to rest, as the glory of God came to its rest by its re-entrance into the sanctuary (ch. xliii.). In the sense of such a connection, comp. Rev. xxi. 3: καὶ ἔσονται μετ' αὐτοῦ, καὶ αὐτοὶ λαοὶ αὐτοῦ ἱστανταί; the sanctuary with its environs still continues in ch. xlviii. the main point of view. Not merely, as HÄV. says, "does the whole representation take its departure from the sanctuary, and so naturally also returns thither," but the close of Ezekiel's book is intended to depict the glory of God by the glory of His kingdom (Intro. § 5). Thus neither the incidental presupposition of the division of the land by inheritance, nor the obligation to be set apart as defined in ch. xlv., nor, in particular, the city—which, it is true, is to belong to Israel as a whole (ch. xlv. 6)—can suffice; but all Israel must in their tribes colonize the land, in order, after everything has been bounded off externally and internally, to see the glory of Jehovah in the sanctuary, as the foundation of the glory of Israel in their own land, brought to full expression. "Hence," as Hävernick observes, "this impresses also upon the whole land a new aspect, a more glorified conformation."

Ver. 13. A solemn introduction marks off the following section (comp. ch. xli. 1, 16). וְהָאֵלֹהִים

GRÆNIUS: "unquestionably a false reading for וְהָאֵלֹהִים (as ver. 15). So read also the Sept., Vulg., Chald., and fourteen manuscripts." This is easy to say, also easy to imagine, but the analogy of וְהָאֵלֹהִים for וְהָאֵלֹהִים, after ch. xxv. 7 (which see), cannot be applied here. Although we can hardly say, with Hengstenberg, that it "would almost seem as if Ezekiel wished to tease scribes and critics, and to put them to the test" (!!), still, the propagation of such a clerical error as וְהָאֵלֹהִים for וְהָאֵלֹהִים in ver.

13 is so much the more difficult to imagine, as the matter is really different in ver. 15, where we have וְהָאֵלֹהִים, from what it is here. Hengst. makes וְהָאֵלֹהִים to be of similar import with וְהָאֵלֹהִים in Prov. xvii.

22, which word, occurring only there, signifies, according to him, "the inwards"! He translates thus: "(this is) the inside of the border," and observes on it: "The stem is וְהָאֵלֹהִים or וְהָאֵלֹהִים; cognate is וְהָאֵלֹהִים, middle (in Chald. וְהָאֵלֹהִים), וְהָאֵלֹהִים, valley, as the interior enclosed by mountains." All this might be allowed; but that עַם , "people," is "the interior, the centre, in antithesis to individuals as the periphery," is so far from correct, that the direct opposite would be nearer the mark. The stem signifies: to draw together; and hence עַם (people) and $\text{גוֹ$ (body) refer to "connection." A signification such as: body, suits the גוֹ of Prov.

xvii. 22 in its parallelism there with גוֹ , and a similar signification would be the suitable one here in Ezekiel. For the question in ver. 13 is not concerning גְּבֻלָּה in the sense of "border," as in ver. 15, but concerning the territory itself, whose borders are first defined in ver. 15 sq. Vers. 13 and 14, introductory to the fixing of the boundaries, and vers. 22 and 23, which conclude it, give us to understand that the division of the land among the twelve tribes of Israel is the dominating design; only with reference to this, that is to say, preparatively, are the boundaries of the land to be treated of.— אֶת־הָאָרֶץ explains

לְשׁוֹנֵי sufficiently; אֶת־הָאָרֶץ is accusative.— לְשׁוֹנֵי is, according to Hitzig, distributive, and denotes the point of view which is to obtain in the division of the land, since all Israel, the re-united people of God, shall return to their land (ch. xxxvii.); from which point of view, also, the curt יִסְכֶּה חֲבֵלִים = Joseph shall receive of it (plural)

"inheritances" (measured off portions of land), is directly explained, without our needing, with Ewald, to punctuate dual חֲבֵלִים , although two

portions are meant, in accordance with the ancient prophetic injunction of Jacob, the patriarch of the tribes (Gen. xlviii. 5). The more exact determination is so much the more presupposed as understood; "as Levi is to have no other portion of land except that in the sacred Terumah, the tribes can only be made twelve in number when (as always) the tribe of Joseph is counted and treated as two, Ephraim and Manasseh" (Klief.). Comp. Josh. xvii. 14 sq. [The Sept. translate the nom. pr. יִסְכֶּה .] Already Eusebius has observed in the Præp. ev., that Plato, too, divides his ideal state into twelve parts, and the capital likewise.

After the determination concerning the point of view of the number twelve for the division of the land, as it has been in ver. 13 first stated generally, and then specialized in Joseph, Ver. 14 lays down the second principle for the division of the land: into equal parts. What was said regarding Joseph is not in contradiction with this principle, as Hitzig maintains, for, as Keil justly replies, the words: ye inherit it, אִישׁ בְּנָחֻלֵּי, only affirm that of the twelve tribes which Israel numbers in relation to נַחֲלָה , the one shall receive

as much as the other. Comp. the opposite principle in Num. xxvi. 54, xxxiii. 54; and comp. Ezek. xlviii. 1 sq. There is no reason for supposing that אִישׁ signifies: "inasmuch as," or:

"because." Comp. ch. xx. 28, 42.—The symbolical character of these introductory regulations, which the very norm of the symbolical number twelve leaves scarcely questionable, must be beyond all question, unless the principle of equality in division here laid down should go on the strange supposition that each tribe would comprehend the same number of individual members, or, in contrast to the first division of the land, the new division, with all its appearance of justice, should yet in fact and reality be practically unjust, namely, because treating the more populous tribe exactly as the weaker. This Philippson also admits, when he remarks "that this would be more contradictory to the Mosaic law than all the other deviations of the prophet taken together;" but he gets over the difficulty by saying that only the same direction from east to west is given for the tribal portions, and that the equal division among the individual Israelites is spoken of. Bunsen, on the contrary, maintains "the ideal nature of the plan." The number twelve of the tribes of Israel expresses the whole of the people, but it does so according to their idea, and thus in a spiritual manner; but still more does the equal share of each tribe in the common inheritance make the land of promise become a symbol of something else than the earthly Canaan. (Comp. 2 Pet. i. 1; Ps. xxxviii. 11, 29.) The seed now has come to whom the land was promised by Jehovah (Gen. xii. 7, xvii. 8; Gal. iii. 7, 16).

Ver. 15. We have here the fixing of the boundaries, which (as in Num. xxxiv., Josh. xv.) is done with reference to the four cardinal points; but here, instead of south, west, north, and east, the order is north, east, south, west, just as also in ch. xlviii. the several tribes follow from north to south. Hengst. explains the difference "from this circumstance, that in ancient times Israel came from the south into the land; here, on the contrary, the return is from the land of the north." Klief.: "We must so understand this deviation that the Holy Land will in that future be indeed the same as the old Holy Land, but yet in a certain sense opposed to the old, the counterpart of the old Canaan."—After that גֵּרָה has preceded with vers. 13 and 14, it can now be said with וְ of the boundaries proper: וְגֵרָה גְּבֻלָּה .—The north boundary begins from the Mediterranean Sea (as in Num. xxxiv. 7 sq.), hence in the west, and proceeds on the way to Hethlon, to come to Zedad (זֶדָד , of the direction whither). Since צָדָר or צָדָר with ה locale helps also to determine the boundary in Num. xxxiv. 8, doubtless on the north-east, as the antithesis to the point of departure on the west naturally suggests, so certainly no other Zedad is to be thought of. Robinson holds it to be Sudud, four hours from Hama, on the west entrance of the wilderness, east of the road which leads from Damascus to Emesa; Keil declares himself against this. Hethlon is unknown. Gesenius places it in Syria of Damascus.—Ver. 16. A more detailed account, by means of several other places, of the north boundary as compared with the other boundaries.—Hamath, of which Keil says: not the city on the Orontes, but the kingdom whose south border forms the north border of Canaan; while Gesenius takes it for this important Syrian city (Epiphania), and compares Num. xiii. 21, xxxiv. 8. Hitzig denies that here at the beginning the land of the city could be meant, and therefore, appealing to the Sept., he takes it as a gloss (from ch. xlviii. 1) to Zedad, the word before it.—בְּרוֹחָה is, according to Gesenius = בְּרוֹחִי (2 Sam. viii. 8), a city in the kingdom of Aram-Zobah; is it perhaps the seaport of Berytus in Phœnicia?—סְבָרִים (identical with זָפָן in Num. xxxiv. 9) is further defined by the clause: which is between, etc., without thereby becoming clearer.—The closer definition: which is on, or: “toward” the border of Hauran (חֲזָר), brings the middle Hazer (חֲזָר), the “middle court” into relation with the transjordanic Auranitis, without, however, defining the latter more exactly.—Ver. 17 “states the north border for the third time,” says Klief. (without, however, being able to solve the difficulty of the double Hamath in ver. 16), “but so that it, after ver. 16 has named the series of Israelitish border places, defines the boundary by border places outside of Israel.” His view is, that “Damascus and Hamath are the boundaries on the north, in this way, that the north-east Damascene border place opposite the north-east Israelitish border place, Zedad, is Hazar-Enon, while on the north side the land of Hamath extends itself.”—The point of departure from the Mediterranean Sea is once more repeated; hence this must be the most western point of the north border.—חֲזָר

Keil sets down as “the fountain of Lebweh in the Beca, on the watershed between the Orontes and Leontes. The calling of Hazar-Enon the border from the sea, indicates that it forms the most eastern boundary-point for the north border drawn from the sea, as it is added: the border of Damascus, that is: the border place from Damascus, or: “on the border,” etc. (HENGST.), or: toward the border, etc.—חֲזָר, according to Hengst., “denotes first the north border, to which all the places named belong,” and then “northward” gives the “special in the general;” for “the north border was no straight line, but had its more northern and less northern points; the most northern was Hamath.” HAV.: “The repetition strengthens the conception: northward and northward.”—וְאֵת פָּאֵת, doubtless as accusative, with: looks to, or: measures off, understood. Hävernick finds “the boundary-line drawn here with still greater exactness than in Num. xxxiv., partly to indicate the still sharper and more definite fixing of the limits of the new Canaan than of the old, and partly to express here too the thought that the new community shall obtain the fullest possible possession of the promised land.” However unknown the various places named may be, thus much seems certain, that the only design of the many names is to draw the boundary with full sufficiency.

Ver. 18 defines as the east border briefly the Jordan, agreeing in this with Num. xxxiv. 10 sq., only with different local colouring. Hauran, Damascus, and Gilead are put on the east, and the land of Israel on the west side. Keil makes the remarkable sequence: Hauran, Damascus, Gilead, to have arisen through regard to the Jordan, which does not reach so far as Damascus; if it had, the sequence must have been Damascus, Hauran, Gilead. While Klief. insists on this, that Num. xxxiv. gives in addition the district east of the Jordan conceded to the transjordanic tribes, whereas, according to the statement here, the Holy Land of the future shall no longer have any portion not fully incorporated; Hengst., on the contrary, maintains the continuance of the frontier land, referring for this to Pa. ix; Mic. vii. 14; Jer. i. 19; Zech. x. 10; also in Num. xxxii. 30, xxxiii. 51; Josh. xxii. 9, the land of Canaan lying west of Jordan is in the same way set over against, e.g., Gilead.—The border from which they are to measure is the above-defined north border. The east sea is the Dead Sea, in distinction from the west, the Mediterranean Sea.

Ver. 19. The south border. The nearer definition of the direction by חֲזָר marks only the transition to the place where the determination of the southern boundary begins. Tamar, says Hengst., “does not occur elsewhere in the Old Testament;” it is, according to him, to be sought for “in the extreme south-east, at the end of the Dead Sea.” Robinson’s conjecture in favour of Thamara, that is, Kurnub, lies open to many objections. On the other hand, the waters of Meriboth-Kadeah, that is, the waters of strife, are those known of old. Hengst. observes: “Only instead of the singular in Num. xxvii. 14, the plural Meriboth is put, to point to this, that the strife there involves in it a whole fulness of rebelliousness,—a solemn nota bene for those who, like their fathers, were still to the present day a house of rebelliousness.” These waters of Kadeah (Num. xx.) in the wilderness of Zin were near Kadesh Barnea (Num. xxxiv. 4).—נַחֲלָה, accented as “inheritance,” is retained by Hengstenberg: “the inheritance (reaches) to the great sea,” who cites for this the oldest translators, Sept., Jonathan, and the Syriac. The possession here (according to him) corresponds to the border of the land in the case of the first two sides. On the other hand, already Hävernick (Vulg.) thinks of the “river of Egypt,” the Wady el Ariah, which appears throughout in the Old Testament as the extreme south-western boundary of Palestine; also Num. xxxiv. 5 is (in his view) decisive for this acceptation, and consequently for a change of the punctuation into נַחֲלָה.

Comp. Josh. xv. 4. HIRZIG: “in the direction of the river to the great sea;” and for this he urges in addition that Πῶς ἡ ἀπορία is also called simply Νεα, that is, נַחֲלָה, with the omission of the genitive.—

The Mediterranean Sea is given as boundary-point on the south-west.

Ver. 20. The west border, with which the fixing of the boundaries concludes. As it is formed by the Mediterranean Sea, only the terminating points south and north have to be noticed. In the former respect stands סְבָרִים, that is, from the south border defined in ver. 19; in the latter, עַד-נֶגְבָה לְבֹא חֲמַת, that is, to over against the place where one comes into the territory of Hamath, which was set down in ver. 17 as the north boundary; comp. Num. xxxiv. 6. Klief. further observes: “The Philistine coast district is here, as with Moses, included in the Holy Land; the fact that it was not conquered by the Israelites happened against the will of God: the Holy Land of the future shall be the real, entire, full Holy Land."—Ver. 21. A concluding clause referring back to ver. 13, as well as preparing for ver. 22 sq.

Ver. 22. Like a codicil to a will; EWALD: "and with the genuine prophetic innovation, that the protected should have quite as many rights as the ancient sons of the soil." חֲזָקָה

comp. vers. 9, 10. — HÄV.: "The prophet's perspective extends itself beyond the borders of Israel to those of the Gentile nations. Israel arrived at the goal of its development forms at the same time a fresh point of connection for the Gentiles. He who connects himself with the true, perfect Church, enjoys the same privileges and blessings as Israel itself. That which the Old Testament contains in the weak type in relation to strangers passes here into complete fulfilment." HITZIG: The prophet draws here the inference from Lev. xix. 34; the limitation and exception in Deut. xxiii. 3, 4 is here omitted. For this he gives as reasons: inasmuch as "residence in a strange land could even weaken an exclusive disposition," and "the lessening of the population of Israel made them wish for and favour the accession of strangers." HENGST., on the contrary, holds that what is here said does not primarily refer to "strangers in general," but to those who have begotten children in your midst, hence to those "who have been naturalized in Israel in the times of affliction," as similarly Abarbanel. HENGST. urges against "the hosts of the heathen," "the boundaries of the land confined between the Jordan and the Mediterranean." (Might we not imagine we perceived here the rationalismus vulgaris?) The question, too, "concerns only the strangers already naturalized in Israel." He says: the exception which the Ammonites and Moabites make (Deut. xxiii.) in regard to the reception of born heathen into the community of God serves only to confirm the rule. "Already, in the state in which Moses found the people, there was a considerable foreign element, the whole posterity of the servants who went down to Egypt with Jacob. A fresh accession took place in Egypt at the time of the exodus (Ex. xii. 38; Num. xi. 4). In 1 Chron. ii. 34, 35 we have an example that these Egyptian strangers were considered in the partition of the land, and, indeed, in the territory of the tribe to which they had attached themselves. Further, Moses gives in Num. x. 29 sq. the friendly in-vation to his Midianitish brother-in-law to share with his tribe the lot of Israel. Hobab, says Knobel, shall accordingly have a share in the land. Hobab consented, and we find his race afterward in the Hebrew land. Comp. Judg. i. 16, iv. 11; Jer. xxxv. Only apparently at variance with Ezekiel is the conduct of Ezra toward the heathen wives (Ezra ix. 10), and that of Nehemiah (ch. xiii.) toward the heathen men who had settled among the Israelites. Ezekiel speaks of those who had attached themselves to Israel by inward inclination at a time when it had no form nor comeliness, and when there was nothing in it to desire but the true God; Ezra and Nehemiah are zealous against the attempt to give heathendom equal rights in the midst of Israel, and to break down the partition-wall so necessary in the pre-Christian times. Both the attraction which Ezekiel commends, and the repulsion for which Ezra and Nehemiah are zealous, arise rather from the same principle; it is the true God who here binds and there severs."—Hitzig remarks on the clause: who have begotten children, etc., that for their sake the fathers received a landed possession, but the childless proselyte did not. Keil understands it of permanent settlement in Israel, in contrast to temporary or transitory residence there. "Here too there is, analogous to Isa. lvi. 3 sq., attached to the promise a condition, the idea of which is already involved in Deut. xxiii. 7, 8 (that Edomites and Egyptians shall only in the third generation enter into the congregation of the Lord). This involves the close, firm, and faithful attaching of oneself to the congregation, whereby one has to the utmost removed and excluded himself from the national communion of heathens. Comp. also Lev. xxv. 45." Certainly not testifying to an already very prevalent custom, but in a prophetic mode of expression, Ver. 23 adds again חֲזָקָה. The more general sense of this specializing Hävernicks expresses to the following effect: "Heathendom forms no new church alongside of Israel, no proper tribe alongside of the twelve families of Israel. It is absorbed into Israel as God's holy ordinance, which continues unalterable, as an ensign for the Gentiles, into the one true Church, which has existed from the beginning and shall exist for ever." Very rightly does Kliefoth point out the connection of our prophetic passage with the prediction in ch. xxxvi. 36, xxxvii. 9, 28; only he wrongly adduces ch. xlv. 9, which compare. "There shall henceforth be no distinction between the members of God's people born of the seed of Abraham and those born of the Gentiles."

CHAP. XLVIII.

- 1 And these are the names of the tribes: from the north end by the way of [toward] Hethlon, as one cometh to Hamath, Hazar-Enon, the border of Damascus northward to the border of Hamath, and they are to him the east
- 2 side, the sea: Dan one. And on the border of Dan, from the east side to
- 3 the westward side: Asher one. And on the border of Asher, from the east-
- 4 ward side to the westward side: Naphtali one. And on the border of Naphtali, from the eastward side to the westward side: Manasseh one.
- 5 And on the border of Manasseh, from the eastward side to the westward
- 6 side: Ephraim one. And on the border of Ephraim, from the east side and

7 to the westward side : Reuben one. And on the border of Reuben, from the 8 east side to the westward side : Judah one. And on the border of Judah, from the east side to the westward side, shall be the oblation which ye shall offer, five and twenty thousand in breadth, and the length as one of the tribo-portions from the eastward side to the westward side ; and the sanctuary is 9 in the midst of it. The oblation which ye shall offer to Jehovah is in length 10 five and twenty thousand, and in breadth ten thousand. And to these, to the priests, shall the oblation of holiness be ; northward five and twenty thousand, and seaward in breadth ten thousand, and southward in length five and twenty thousand ; and the sanctuary of Jehovah is in the midst of it.
 11 To the priests is the hallowed portion, [to those descending] from the sons of Zadok, who kept My charge, who went not astray when the sons of Israel 12 went astray, as the Levites went astray. And there is to them a heaveportion from the oblation of the land most holy, by the border [border district] of 13 the Levites. And the Levites [receive], over against the border of the priests, five and twenty thousand in length, and in breadth ten thousand ; the whole 14 length five and twenty thousand, and the breadth ten thousand. And they shall not sell of it, nor exchange, nor shall the first-fruits of the land pass 15 over [into another hand] ; for [it is] holiness to Jehovah. And five thousand that are left in breadth before the five and twenty thousand that is profane, for 16 the city, for dwelling, and for open space ; and the city is in its midst. And these are its measures : the north side four thousand and five hundred, and the south side four thousand and five hundred, and on the east side four thousand and five hundred, and the westward side four thousand and five 17 hundred. And there is an open space for the city, northward two hundred and fifty, and southward two hundred and fifty, and eastward two hundred 18 and fifty, and westward two hundred and fifty. And the residue in length, over against the oblation of holiness, ten thousand eastward and ten thousand westward ; and it is over against the oblation of holiness, and the produce 19 thereof is for food for the labourers of the city. And as to the labourers of 20 the city, they shall labour it out of all the tribes of Israel. The whole oblation is five and twenty thousand by five and twenty thousand : a fourth-part 21 shall ye offer the oblation of holiness, for a possession of the city. And the residue [belongs] to the prince, on this side and on that of the oblation of holiness, and of the possession of the city, before the five and twenty thousand of the oblation unto the border eastward, and westward before the five and twenty thousand toward the westward border, over against the tribe-portions, [it belongs] to the prince ; and the oblation of holiness and the sanctuary of the 22 house are in its midst. And [namely] from the possession of the Levites, from the possession of the city [from that] in the midst, shall be the prince's, between the border of Judah and between the border of Benjamin—the prince's it 23 shall be. And the rest of the tribes : from the eastward side to the westward 24 side : Benjamin one. And on the border of Benjamin, from the eastward 25 side to the westward side : Simeon one. And on the border of Simeon, from 26 the eastward side to the westward side : Issachar one. And on the border 27 of Issachar, from the eastward side to the westward side : Zebulon one. And on the border of Zebulon, from the eastward side to the westward side : Gad 28 one. And on the border of Gad, toward the south side, to the right is the border : from Tamar to the strife-waters of Kadesh is the inheritance [along 29 the brook] to the great sea. This is the land which ye shall divide of the inheritance to the tribes of Israel, and these are their portions : sentence of 30 the Lord Jehovah. And these are the out-goings of the city : on the north 31 side, four thousand and five hundred by measure. And the gates of the city after the names of the tribes of Israel : three gates northward ; the gate of 32 Reuben one, the gate of Judah one, the gate of Levi one. And on the eastward side four thousand and five hundred : and three gates ; the gate of 33 Joseph one, the gate of Benjamin one, the gate of Dan one. And as to the southward side, four thousand and five hundred by measure : and three gates ;

- the gate of Simeon one, the gate of Issachar one, the gate of Zebulon one.
 34 As to the westward side, four thousand and five hundred : its gates three ;
 35 the gate of Gad one, the gate of Asher one, the gate of Naphtali one. Round about eighteen thousand : and the name of the city from that day : "Jehovah thither" (Jehovah Shammah).

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

Vers. 1-29.—The Division of the Land among the Tribes, with the Separation of the Part to be separated.

Vers. 1-7.—The Seven Upper Tribe-portions.

The division of the land, like the fixing of the boundaries (ch. xlvii. 15 sq.), begins in the north, inclining thence to the south. Hitzig denies the significance of the number seven here : "As the section itself regarding the Terumah is put in the middle, so his object is to move the central sanctuary, which must lie between Judah and Benjamin, but historically lay far nearer the south border than the north, as near indeed as possible to the centre, yet also toward the south." Hengst., on the contrary, argues from the division of the number twelve into seven and five,—a division which often occurs also in the grouping of the Psalms, where "the sacred number seven is always the chief number, and five appears only as its supplement." "Even upon the land," says Häv., "is the character of pleasing to God to be stamped throughout."

["The territory to be divided being thus obviously viewed in an ideal light, the division itself is conducted in the same manner,—not as it ever could have taken place in the reality, but after rule and measure, in exact and regular portions, running alongside of each other the whole breadth from west to east, and standing in a common relation to the temple in the centre. Seven of the tribes have their portions on the north, on account of the greater stretch of the land in that direction with respect to the actual Jerusalem, and in the following order :—Dan, Asher, Naphtali, Manasseh, Ephraim, Reuben, Judah ; the latter having its place close by the central portion on the north, as Benjamin had on its south. This honour appears to have been given to these two tribes in consideration of their relative historical superiority, having so long adhered to the temple and ordinances of God, when the others deserted them. Dan, on the contrary, was placed at the extreme north, on account of the low religious character of the tribe, precisely as John, in representing the whole elect Church by twelve thousand from the several tribes of Israel, leaves Dan out altogether (Rev. vii.). As there were actually thirteen tribes, he finds his twelve times twelve by omitting Dan, whose idolatrous and semi-heathen character made it border morally, as it did locally, on the Gentiles. Here the two tribes of Joseph are thrown into one, to admit of Dan's having a place, but it is still the lowest place in the ideal territory of a blessed world. With these exceptions, we can discern no specific grounds for the particular places assigned to the tribes respectively. The order on the south side was, Benjamin, Simeon, Issachar, Zebulon, Gad. But the city, the temple, the prince, and priesthood, with their respective portions, being situated precisely in the middle, and not within the boundaries of any of the tribes, was intended to intimate that all were now to be regarded as having a common interest in them ; and that the miserable and mischievous jealousies which had of old exercised so disastrous an influence, especially between Judah and Ephraim, should finally and for ever cease. All now should stand related as a united and compact brotherhood to the sanctuary of the Lord, from which, as a central fountainhead of life and blessing, there should continually stream forth manifestations of grace to all the people."—FAIRBAIRN'S Ezekiel, pp. 498, 499.—W. F.]

Ver. 1. The starting-point: the north end, ch. xlvii. 15.—The course goes from west to east; hence "Hethlon" and "Hamath," and "Hazar-Enon" as the eastmost point. HENGST.: "from Hazar, etc., to the border," etc., so that the northmost point is Hamath, ch. xlvii. 17.—The words: and they are (pertain) to him, refer to the tribe immediately named, Dan. —פֶּתַח-קִרְיָם

קִרְיָם, KEIL: asyndeton = the east side and the west, the tract toward both sides. HITZIG: "the east side of the sea," that is, what lies east from the sea, namely, from the north end of this east side, from Hazar-Enon. HENGST.: "the east side, the west sea." But he takes "him" as the ideal unity of the tribes as a whole, although Dan (he says) was specially in the prophet's mind. At the division of the land under Joshua, Dan had, west of Benjamin, taken possession of only a part of the land's breadth; but in the days of the Judges, Danites had pressed northward, and had named the conquered Laish Dan, so that Dan denoted the north border. Hengst. makes one of the prophet's points of view to be to show the equality of all the tribes as "members of equal rank in the body of the people of God." Thus in the case of the tribe allotments, and afterwards in the case of the gates, "the sons of the handmaids and of the wives, and those of the latter again among one another, were intentionally and skilfully intermixed (Rev. vii. 5-8), and Dan the son of the handmaid stands at the head, because there is with God no respect of persons: Israel is a brotherly people, in which no member may raise itself above another."—מִן אֶת־דָּן means: that Dan shall receive an inheritance, as Keil supplies חֶקֶל, from ch. xlvii. 13. KLIEF.: "the single equal heritage for each tribe being considered as a monad." Similarly in what follows; and always, in distinction from the former order of things, taking in the whole breadth of Canaan, "from the east side to the seaward side."—Ver. 2. Asher.—Ver. 3. Naphtali.—Ver. 4. Manasseh.—Ver. 5. Ephraim.—Ver. 6. Reuben.—Ver. 7. Judah, who is thus preceded by three pair of tribes, the list of the seven upper tribes closing with him, just as from him the whole people received even their name. Keil observes: "Asher and Naphtali, who formerly occupied the most northern district, are ranged beside Dan; then follows Manasseh, since half-Manasseh formerly dwelt to the east of Naphtali; and Ephraim is ranged beside Manasseh, as formerly beside the western half-Manasseh. The reason for bringing in Reuben between Ephraim and Judah seems to be that Reuben was the first-born of Jacob's sons."

Ver. 8 places, moreover, the Terumah on the border of Judah. "The normal condition of Israel is reached, according to which all the life of the whole land streams forth from its truly spiritual centre, and the unity of the whole community rests entirely upon the Lord Himself and His self-revelation in the midst of the people. In this way the fact also is explained that Judah dwells nearest the sanctuary, while Benjamin occupies a corresponding position on the south side of the temple. The reason of this is not so much the warlike character of these two tribes, as their attachment to the temple when the ten tribes revolted from it. Both tribes represent such a disposition, and the prophet's higher spiritual point of view manifests itself in this division of the tribes, as differing essentially from the old division, inasmuch as this latter was determined principally by outward need and external relations" (HÄV.). According to Bunsen, Judah lay sufficiently near the centre in order, with Ephraim, "to form the fulcrum of defence." The Terumah, which refers us back to ch. xlv. 1 sq., is employed, according to Hengst., sensu latiori, including also the portion of the prince; it rather appears, however, to be denominated a parte potiori, as it is expressly said: and the sanctuary is in the midst of it, although the five and twenty thousand in breadth will comprehend all, if the clause: and the length as one (any one) of the tribe portions from the eastward side to the westward (seaward) side, is to be understood in accordance with ch. xlv. 7. Then, however, Ver. 9, the oblation, as it is distinctively called, which ye shall offer to Jehovah, will not, like that: which ye shall offer, in ver. 8, be the Terumah in the special sense. The "sanctuary" in ver. 8 forms the transition to this specializing.—Thus also it cannot be misunderstood when in Ver. 10 the oblation of holiness (comp. on ch. xlv.) is adjudged to the priests, for the sanctuary lies in their portion.—The clause: northward, etc., makes the upper boundary of this main division of the whole the same (25,000) in length, that is, from east to west, as the last-measured boundary southward. Westward and eastward, whereby the breadth is given, that is, in the direction from north to south, the measurement yields the same result in each case, 10,000.—בְּתוֹכָם חֵלֶק fixes in some measure more exactly the בְּתוֹכָם of ver. 8, whose suffix Keil makes refer ad sensum to חֵלֶק, instead of to תְּרומָה. At all events, בְּתוֹכָם there is not = "therein" (HITZIG).

The expression: "in the midst," refers, however, neither to one of the tribe-portions nor to the "oblation," but to the priests' portion, which the oblation bounds off on all sides. In our verse the suffix refers more definitely to the oblation of holiness in its length and breadth, which are given as to the four sides.—Ver. 11. Kliefoth renders חֶקֶל קֹדֶשׁ, "the hallowed portion," to the priests it shall belong. So also Rashi. Pual pass., as it is, can here denote nothing more suitably, especially as the suffix in the previous בְּתוֹכָם is thereby most easily explained. Most expositors, following the old translations, and influenced by Isa. xiii. 3, render it in a plural sense; and similarly Kimchi takes it distributively: "he who is hallowed of the sons of Zadok." The participle certainly lies inconveniently between לְכֹהֲנִים and מִכְנֵי, but the plural in 2 Chron. xxvi. 18 cannot decide in favour of the singular here, for the singular here would, as Hengst grants, denote "the hallowed part as distinct from the unconsecrated part,"—a restriction which can no longer be introduced in the case of the sons of Zadok (comp. xlv. 15 sq.), after they have been repeatedly represented as the hallowed priestly personelle. What does this saying of Hengstenberg's mean: that they are sanctified "by their fidelity, by which they made their election sure"? It ought rather to be said that the part of the Terumah which is specially the Terumah—the "oblation of holiness" (as in ver. 10), or הקדש, as is said here—belongs to those who are the priests of the future, namely, to the priests who are taken from the sons of Zadok, who kept, etc. (referring to the "sons of Zadok"); comp. ch. xlv. 15. The ן denotes no selection or restriction among the sons of Zadok, but simply their descent, whence these priests are, with a reference back to what is contained on that subject in the previous chapters. [Keil's objection in respect to הקדש

tells, moreover, against such a view as this: "to the priests it is consecrated,"—a view which indeed would correspond neither to the form of the text nor the facts of the case.] The mention of the going astray of the Levites, like whom the children of Israel went astray, shows, what hitherto is manifest throughout, namely, that the tribe of Levi, not the priestly family of Aaron, was intended; whereas Hengst., in order to have the necessary distinction and contrast, thinks of those who were "as a punishment desecrated (!), degraded, and reduced to mere Levites." The meaning, on the contrary, is simply this: the sons of Zadok stood firm when the rest of Levi stumbled, and along with Levi, Israel. That some of the sons of Zadok also had gone astray, and in contrast to them the description here is given, is not the case.—Ver. 12. והיתה להם, although no formal apodosis to ver. 11, most expressly confirms the view taken of ver. 11.—הקדש, as the following ן likewise shows, is less a part (KLIEF.)

of the oblation, than an abstraction therefrom; hence in a spiritual respect somehow in relation to the oblation, what is most holy in relation to the sanctuary; KEIL correctly: "the offering from the oblation." But this "Terumiah" from the "Terumah" is designated most holy because it is this in relation to the part which belongs to the Levites. Observe how the old ordinances as regards places are converted into ordinances in reference to persons, and thereby Jehovah's relation comes out as a relation appearing in men. [HENGST.: "the heave-portion which fell to the priests is designated most holy, because it has God's sanctuary in the midst of it, and belongs to His most eminent ministers, in distinction from the part of the Levites, which has only the second degree of holiness, and from that of the city, which has only the third" (!).] The closing definition: אל-עבר, not merely forms the transition to what follows, but also indicates that we have to imagine the priests' portion as adjoining the south or the north side of the Levites' portion.—In Ver. 13, accordingly, this latter is expressed, as it had to be expressed in respect of the Levites, namely: that they are to have their appointed portion close to the border of the priests (לעמדת). HENGST.:

"In the description of the oblation, the prophet, for theological reasons, began with the middle portion, the priests' part; it was then necessary to guard against the thought that the Levites' part was separated by the city, or the city by the Levites' part, from the sanctuary. The servants of the house, and likewise the inhabitants of the city, as constituting the holy assembly at the divine services, behoved to have the sanctuary as near as possible." Comp. for the determination of the circumference, ch. xlv. 5. As to the repeated closing clause: the whole length, it will lose its appearance of tautology if we assume with Kliefoth that it is meant to express briefly the two lengths (north and south) and the two breadths (east and west), instead of going through the cardinal points one by one, as in ver. 10.—Ver. 14. Comp. Lev. xxv. 84. "It is regarded as the gift of first-fruits to Jehovah, to which the Lord has the sole right, and which thus may never come into the hands of another" (HÄV.). "The ordinance applies naturally also to the priests' land, although it is expressly given only for the Levites' part, because its holiness is less, so that the thought of its being saleable might more readily arise" (HENGST.).—עֵבֶר (Qeri: עֵבֶר);

the Kal is quite sufficient, there is no need of a Hiphil form.—That which is acknowledged as first-fruits of the land is holy to Jehovah. "Traffic is excluded where God is the landowner and the Levites only usufructuaries" (HENGST.). "This land is an offering; the heaving is one form for it, and the gift of first-fruits the other" (KLIEF.).

As in ch. xlv. 6, so now in Ver. 15, the possession of the city comes after the land of the priests and Levites. Kliefoth observes, referring to ch. xl. 2 (!), that the prophet beheld the city to the south; hence it lay south of the priests' portion and the sanctuary, and so the Levites' portion lay north of that of the priests. Ezekiel, he goes on to say, setting out as he does from the middle of the Terumah, does not, as in the division of the land among the tribes, follow the direction from north to south, but takes first the more central priests' portion (vers. 9-12); but the fact that he then (vers. 13, 14) describes the Levites' portion, lying north of it, and thereafter takes up the city-possession, lying south of the priests' portion, has its ground in this, that the portion of the Levites is also holy, whereas the portion of the city is profane. It is still simpler to take as motive for the order observed, besides the reference to ch. xlv., the connection of priests and Levites with the central sanctuary. In this way the Levites necessarily preceded the city. The five thousand are left when we subtract twice ten thousand in breadth (vers. 9 and 13) from five and twenty thousand in breadth, that is, from north to south (ver. 8).—הַנּוֹתֵר is neuter, according to Hitzig; it is the particip. Niph. of נָתַר.—עַל פְּנֵי, before the side in question, namely, from east to west; this gives a third oblong, which, however, is only half the breadth of the two former.—הוּל is profane, in contrast to the former "most holy" and "holy" of the portion of the priests and Levites. PHILIPSON: "they are common land for the city, for dwellings, and for environs." These five thousand are set apart generally for the city (לְעִיר), and specially for dwellings and as precincts for free use, pasture, arable land, etc. As the city is the title for this portion of land, so the verse concludes by stating that the city is בְּתוֹכָהּ.

Hengst. makes the feminine suffix refer to the city in the wider sense (לְעִיר), within which the city in the narrower sense lies. Kliefoth translates: "in the middle in it." Since the city lies in the midst of the city-district, this makes it, as Klief. observes, lie right opposite the sanctuary in the south.

Ver. 16 first subjoins the more exact statement in regard to the length from east to west, previously only indicated by עַל פְּנֵי. The oblation affords it a front of five and twenty thousand; its measure, however, is such as to make a square of four thousand five hundred on each side, to which is added in Ver. 17 an open space of two hundred and fifty on each of the four sides. The חֲמִשָּׁה found in the text, and left by the Masorites unpunctuated, is almost universally considered an error of transcription; Hengst., on the contrary, says: "It points to this, that the south side equally with the north side has 4500 cubits; five stands for: on the five, or: to the five," etc. The length of the city-district (namely, city and free space), from east to west, amounts to $4500 + 250 + 250 = 5000$, and to the same in breadth from north to south, so that the square in this respect occupies the entire breadth of the city-district, while it only comes to a fifth of the 25,000 in length from east to west. ["The small compass of the city district" (cubits 1), observes Hengst., "wholly excludes the inhabitants from agriculture."—Ver. 18 disposes of what remains of the length (KLIEF.: "in the length") along the holy oblation, the section eastward and the section seaward, 10,000 each. "This is to remain over against the holy Terumah, that is, as a part of it, although it is assigned neither to the priests, nor the Levites, nor the city" (KLIEF.). Hengst. explains the phrase: "over against the holy oblation," as indicating "that we are not to imagine that the Levitical part is shoved in between, whereby the holy oblation would be separated from its guardians." The proventus, the תְּבִיאָה of the הַנֹּחֵר, what of fruit the soil of these two districts yields, is destined for support (לֶחֶם) for the labourers of the city.

They are further described in Ver. 19, where it is said of them: עֲבָדָהּ. (1) HAV.: "By these are not meant slaves, nor (as KIMCHI) such as cultivate gardens and fields (against which there is the הַיִּיר), but, as Gesenius puts it: those who perform service in building the city, which the prophet represents as an honourable office. The holy city as well as the temple belongs now to no single tribe, but to all Israel, so all the tribes take part in building and maintaining it, by workmen chosen for the purpose, who receive their support from land assigned to them situated in the immediate vicinity of the holy temple-district."

Hävernick makes עֲבָדָהּ refer to הַנֹּחֵר, and the last thought of ver. 18 to be: "the residue of the city-district shall serve for support to the workmen, and they shall cultivate it, for which they shall be bound to the service of the city." (2) HENGST. translates thus: "who serve the city;" and "can only understand by this a militia (!) that take the city in the midst,—military service is the only possible service on a large scale to a city,—and, as is so emphatically stated, are encamped as a guard beside the holy oblation with the temple." "On the north side of the holy oblation are the Levites as the militia sacra (Num. iv. 23, viii. 24); on the south side the ministers of the secular arm, which has to protect the Church." "Adjoining the provision made for these servants on both sides is the domain of the prince (!), who is to be considered the commander of these guards." For עֲבָר, in the sense of "military service," Hengst. refers to ch. xxix. 20. But if ever an exposition has missed the mark, it is here. We hear the mounting of guard on the Berlin University Platz, and Hengst. must also mention Egypt as an example "of such military colonies endowed with land;" he comforts himself with the thought that this militia "is not to be gathered out of the lands of other lords, as formerly the Cherethites and Pelethites, but is to consist of such as are willing also to serve their Lord in this lower (!) sphere." (3) KLIEF.: "The workmen of the city are the labouring class dwelling in it; in this city they are not to be destitute of possession, as is usual in the cities of men, therefore considerable portions of land are assigned to them for support; and to explain this ver. 19 subjoins, that from all the tribes of Israel (עֲבָר, transitively with the accus.) they are to employ these in labour; namely, when they come from all parts of the land to the holy city to the feasts, and because the land in the capital gives employment to labourers," etc. (4) Hitzig takes עֲבָר as colere locum, of cultivating through residence = to inhabit: hence, "for the inhabitants of the city;" ver. 19: "And as to the inhabitants of the city, people from all the tribes of Israel shall inhabit it."—הַנֹּחֵר, singular, stands as collective, "but the suffix in עֲבָדָהּ does not refer to it, and to make it refer to הַנֹּחֵר would yield no suitable sense; hence we are to read: עֲבָדָהּ, and the reference to עִיר, which is certainly not of the common gender, is to be accepted." As in ver. 18 the masculine suffix in תְּבִיאָתָהּ refers to הַנֹּחֵר, so also does the suffix in עֲבָדָהּ. Ewald translates thus: "And every labourer of the city will cultivate it." NETELER: "and as to the workman of the city, one will take him for workman out of," etc.—Ver. 20 sums up the whole, namely, of the previously described oblation, as a square of 25,000, i.e. inclusive of the possession of the city; and then describes the possession of the city as a fourth-part of the "oblation of holiness," as the portions of the priests and Levites in the narrower sense are called, which have a breadth of 20,000, of which the 5000 of the possession of the city are a fourth. Philippeon, on the other hand, translates thus: "In square form shall ye offer the holy oblation, together with the property of the city;" as similarly Ewald. And already Hävernick took לֵאמֹר as: "in addition to the possession of the city."

Ver. 21; comp. ch. xlv. 7. The portion of the prince on both sides, east and west, of the "oblation" described in ver. 8 (25,000 from east to west). לְפָנָיו , translated by Ewald: "close to;" by Hengst.: "over against;" by others: "along," with reference to the east and west skirt of the Terumah, which was only 25,000 long. The position is described first eastward, and then, with some variations (instead of לְפָנָיו , now עַל , with omission of the "oblation;" instead of עַד־בְּנֵי־עַל , now עַל־בְּנֵי), westward likewise; while in conclusion there is added: close to the tribe-portions. It is scarcely necessary to remark in explanation, that the prince's portion abuts on the north (like the Levites' portion) on the portion of Judah, on the south (like the possession of the city) on the portion of Benjamin. That which lies eastward and westward between Judah and Benjamin belongs to the prince, to whose domain the suffix in בְּתוֹכָהּ refers, namely, to הַנֹּתָר .—Ver. 22

describes the same object, only instead of eastward and westward, it is now from north to south; hence, setting out from the possession of the Levites, namely, in the north, and from the possession of the city.—The designation בְּתוֹךְ does not belong to הָקֵיץ (KEIL), but stands as an asyndeton, like: possession of the Levites, and: possession of the city; and counts as the third the central part, namely, the portion of the priests, with the lately-mentioned temple-sanctuary, after mention has been made of the two outer parts. Thus, what is to be the prince's domain extends from north to south, namely, on both sides (ver. 21); and when it is described as in the direction of north to south, it is represented as lying between the border of Judah and between the border of Benjamin. The question, moreover, of ch. xlv. is renewed here: rods? or cubits? Keil and Kliefoth reckon by rods, because, reckoned by cubits, "the prince's land would be more than six times as large as the whole Terumah;" whereas, measuring by rods, the actual size of the land is in correspondence. Hengst. adduces the fifty stadia of Hecatæus in proof of the 18,000 cubits of Jerusalem.

Vers. 23-29.—The Five Lower Tribe-portions.

Ver. 23.—The rest of the tribes follow southward: first, Benjamin, which tribe opens the series on this side, as Judah closed it on the other. Three pairs precede Judah, and two pairs follow Benjamin: first, Ver. 24, Simeon; thereafter, Ver. 25, Issachar; then, Ver. 26, Zebulon; and, finally, Ver. 27, Gad.—For Ver. 28 comp. on ch. xlvii. 19.—Ver. 29, a closing formula. HENGST.: "It is said of the inheritance, because a part of the whole was not to be distributed, but to be previously set apart as holy ground."

["The desire of giving due prominence to the sacred portions in the centre, leads the prophet again to enter into some statements regarding the Terumah, or oblation, and its subdivisions. Nothing of importance is added to what was said before, except that the 5000 rods apportioned out of the 25,000 square to the city is here laid off in a square of 4500, with the 250 all round for suburbs. This space for the city was not strictly holy ground, in the sense that the sacerdotal portions were, and hence it is called profane or common. But being thus immediately connected with the sacred portions, and standing apart from the individual tribes, the city built on it formed a fit and proper centre to the whole land—in its position and its structure the beau-ideal of a theocratic capital, encompassed by the most hallowed influences, and fitted to exert a uniting and healthful effect upon the entire community. Hence the prophet closes the description by the mention of some things regarding the city which might serve more deeply to impress the feeling of its being the suitable representative and common centre of the community. Itself occupying a central position, and immediately in front of the house of God, it was also to have twelve gates, bearing the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel; in token that all the family of faith had their representation in it, and, as if they were actually resident in it, stood before the Lord for the enjoyment of His favour and blessing. He specifies, again, the entire circumference of the city, 18,000 rods (between twenty and thirty miles), as a symbol of the immense numbers of the covenant-people under the new and better dispensation of the future, immeasurably transcending what had existed under the old. And to exhibit the character of the city itself as representative of the community at large, and indicative of its own relative position, it was to bear from that day, namely, from the period of the beginning of this new and better order of things, the honourable name of 'Jehovah-Shammah'—not, as has been already stated, Jehovah-there, but Jehovah-thither, or thereupon. For it was in the temple, rather than in the city, that the Lord was represented as having His peculiar dwelling-place. But His eyes were to be ever from the temple toward the city, and again from the city toward the whole land. The manifestations of His love and goodness were to radiate from the chosen seat of the kingdom through all its borders; He in all, and all united and blessed in Him. So that the consummation of this vision substantially corresponds with the object prayed for by our Lord, when He sought respecting His people that they might be where He was, and that they might be all one, as He and the Father are one; He in them, and they in Him, that they might be made perfect in one."—FAIRBAIRN'S Ezekiel, pp. 499, 500.—W. F.]

Vers. 30-35.—The City as to Extent, Gates, and Name.

In continuation of Ver. 15 sq., we have now in Ver. 30 the out-goings of the city, that is, the outlets, with evident reference to the gates; for "the boundary-lines marked out by walls" (HENGST.), "the extremities into which a city runs out" (KEIL), are only such in virtue of the gates. The measure here on each of the four sides is 4500; comp. ver. 16.—The detailed account begins, as in the dividing of the land, and so with evident reference thereto, from the north.—Ver. 31. The gates are designated after the names of the tribes of Israel. There are three gates to each side, hence twelve in all; comp. Rev. xxi. 12. The naming does not follow the position of the tribe-district, and thus the omitted tribe of Levi appears here in the north, honoured by a gate named after it. The three sons of Leah (as Deut. xxxiii.) are first mentioned; as Keil observes: "the first-born by age, the first-born in virtue of the patriarchal blessing, and the one chosen of Jehovah for His service instead of the first-born of Israel." In Ver. 32 the three east gates, where Joseph is named next after Levi, and comprehends in his name his two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh ("Rachel's sons and the son of her handmaid," KEIL). In Ver. 33 the three south gates bear the names of the other three sons of Leah; and, lastly, in Ver. 34 the west gates are given, after the names of the other three sons of the handmaids, as Keil observes.

Ver. 35. Then follows the close of the book; it closes with a name, with the symbolical name of the city, whose whole compass—doubtless calculated likewise in a symbolical point of view—is given as: $4 \times 4500 = 18,000$. Kliefoth remarks on this number, that it is $= 12 \times 1500$; hence, a product of 12 by a multiple of 10. "The city of the people of God," says he, "has now become the capital of the new world." Neteler connects with it the millennial kingdom, saying: "A thousand years are with God as one day, and one day as a thousand years; hence the city is called the millennial kingdom" (1).—The name of the city is annexed to its whole circumference, just as before the gates named follow the statement of the extent. Thus it appears that the name of the city itself now expresses the same relation to Jehovah which the names of the gates did to the people of the covenant. Hitzig translates: "The name of the city is from that day: Jehovah there," and understands this to mean: from the day of its being built. Hävernick makes the following excellent remarks on the whole connection: "Already in the foregoing the thought was made prominent, that Jerusalem should be the common property of all the tribes. Over against the temple, the place of the divine revelation is Jerusalem, the Church of God, living before and in Him. As such, it forms a closely knit together, indissoluble whole, a stately unity rooting itself in God. In order duly to set forth this thought, there is annexed to the division of the land among the individual tribes a consideration of the city itself. For that division is nothing less than an isolating or dis-severing of the individual tribes; but forthwith the higher unity of the prophetic intuition, again embracing and knitting all firmly together, presents itself. The community is one accepted of God and hallowed to Him; standing itself in the presence of God, it forms the one true stem of the new Church, and has thereby reached its full destination. In the first place, the greatness of the community expresses itself to the prophet in the compass of the city; and then in its name, its quality, its holiness. 'From that day,' that is: henceforth for ever, Isa. xliii. 13. The name itself is: 'Jehovah thither,' not: Jehovah shall dwell there. For Ezekiel distinguishes between temple and city: Jehovah does not properly dwell in Jerusalem, but, in the proper and highest sense, only in His sanctuary. Thence He looks toward Jerusalem, is turned thither with the fullness of His love and grace. What now makes Jerusalem a true city of God is the love entirely turned toward it, the good pleasure of God resting upon it," etc. HENGST.: לְיְהוָה means: from the day when what is described will be so; it does not and cannot mean: "always," and just as little can it mean: "from to-day." לְיְהוָה is not: "there," but, as always: "thither." But query ch. xxiii. 3 in Ezekiel himself, if not ch. xxxii. 29 sq. He explains the name from Deut. xi. 12. "This 'Jehovah thither' manifested itself in the most glorious manner in the appearing of Christ, in the many attempts He made to gather the children of Jerusalem, in His tears over Jerusalem. When, however, His own would not receive Him, then the 'Jehovah thither,' which had availed for the restored city five hundred years, passed over to the new people of God, the legitimate continuation of Israel and Jerusalem (Matt. xxi. 43), to which Jesus had promised to be with them unto the end of the world."—Kliefoth with right expresses himself against an alteration of the punctuation (לְיְהוָה into לְיְהוָה , "and the name of the city is henceforth: Jehovah is its name"), and also against the idea that לְיְהוָה can mean anything else than: "thither." "But then the name purports that Jehovah will raise Himself up thither, toward the city, and will do so from the day, that is, from to-day, that this city and what depends upon it may come into being."

In view of the total ruin of the people of God, the whole comfort of the prophet's predictions, the full significance of his labours, is yet once more completely summed up in the last words of his ministry. Schmieder says: "Notwithstanding the irregularity of the natural boundaries, Ezekiel views the Holy Land as a rectangular, oblong quadrilateral, etc. The centre falls exactly at Sychar, where Jesus speaks to the woman of Samaria (John iv.). Mount Gerizim is the site of the new temple, but the Holy City is at a distance of about five miles off; the place in which it is situated is 'the place of Bethel.' The revelation of John contains in its closing chapters cognate views, which presuppose and surpass, but do not exactly interpret Ezekiel."

ADDITIONAL NOTE.

["Thus ends the marvellous vision of the prophet—like marvellous whether we look to the lofty pattern (true in the spirit, though unavoidably wearing the garb of imperfect forms and shadowy relations) which it embodied of better things to come in God's kingdom, or to the time chosen for presenting this to the Church of God. The cause of Heaven was then at its lowest ebb. The temple that had been, together with the kingdom it symbolized and represented, were laid in ruins; they were to be seen only in broken fragments and mournful dilapidations, as if smitten with the powerful curse of an irrecoverable perdition. Yet from the midst of these howling desolations, as from the very 'suburbs of hell,' the prophet ascends, with assured step, the mount of vision, and has there exhibited to his view, not, indeed, the very image of better things to come, but the ideal pattern after which the blessed and glorious future was to be fashioned. He even sees it as already present; and, with such imperfect materials of thought and utterance as then stood at his command, he gives it forth to the Church and the world as a thing which his own eyes had beheld, showing how God would certainly dwell with His people in a manner He had never done before—how He would at once immeasurably extend the sphere of His kingdom, and greatly elevate the condition of those who belonged to it—and how, through the copious effusions of His life-giving Spirit, the former imperfections should be done away, the most remote regions of the divine territory hallowed and blessed, and even the peculiar haunts of cursing and desolation made to rejoice and blossom like the rose.

'O scenes surpassing fable, and yet true!
Scenes of accomplished bliss! which, who can see,
Though but in distant prospect, and not feel
His soul refreshed with foretaste of the joy?'

"That such scenes should have been described with such assured confidence, and at a time so deeply overspread with gloom, was indeed an ennobling triumph of faith over sight. It gave a most illustrious proof of the height in spiritual discernment, and far-reaching insight into the purposes of Heaven, which is sometimes imparted in the hour of greatest need, especially to the more select instruments of the Spirit's working. And surely the children of the kingdom now must be chargeable with neglecting an important privilege, if they fail to profit by so inspiring an example. Here the heart of faith is taught never to despair—not even in the darkest seasons. And when it is seen how much of the scheme delineated in the prophetic vision has already been accomplished, should not believers feel encouraged to look and strive for its complete realization, assured that God is ready to hear their cry, and to second with the aid of His Spirit the efforts that are made to dispossess and drive out the hostile powers that continue to linger in His kingdom? It is theirs, if they feel thus, not only to contend in the best of causes, but also with the surest prospect of success; for the Lord Himself is upon their side, and His word of promise must be established.

'Thus heavenward all things tend. For all were once Perfect, and all must be at length restored.
So God has greatly purposed: who would else
In His dishonoured works Himself endure
Dishonour, and be wronged without redress!
—Come, then, and added to Thy many crowns,
Receive yet one as radiant as the rest,
Due to Thy last and most effectual work,
Thy word fulfilled, the conquest of a world.'"
—FAIRBAIRN'S Ezekiel, pp. 501, 502.—W. F.]

DOCTRINAL REFLECTIONS.

1. Ch. xl.-xli. show the temple and its service; ch. xlvii. and xlviii., the land and the city. It may be said that in these two parallels temple and service stand related to each other, as do land and city. The temple comes to expression in its service, as the land finds its most expressive name in the city, ch. xlviii. 35. But the land gets sanctification, healing, and quickening from the temple; so that the waters which stream forth from the temple in connection with the entrance of the glory of Jehovah into the sanctuary, and transmit the blessing of the temple to the land, are the kernel, as they are the connecting link between the two closing sections of our prophetic book.

2. Hävernicks sums up what has preceded in the expression (Rev. xxii. 3): "And the throne of God, etc., shall be in it, and His servants shall serve Him." Ch. xl.-xliii. treat of "the new and glorious indwelling of the Lord in Israel;" ch. xlv.-xlvii. "of the new service of the Lord which shall follow on the ground of that completion of all the divine manifestations of grace;" now, however, according to him, "the rich blessing of God which comes upon the new community from the new indwelling of God" is described. This latter assertion cannot be upheld in the face of ch. xlvii.; at least, vers. 1-12 of that chapter, keeping, as they do, within Canaan, appear to exhibit in a very characteristic manner the perfection of Israel, rather than to contain an account of what accrues to the new community of the Lord in the way of a rich blessing of God. The community of the future, with the service which obtains in this temple, is described as being what it should be. For as Jehovah (ch. xxxvi. 27) puts His Spirit within Israel, so He makes them walk in His statutes, and keep and do His judgments. But this sanctification of Israel comes (ch. xxxvii. 28) with the sanctuary in the midst of them. Hence not only the specially priestly temple-service (ch. xlv.), but likewise the representation therein of the people by the prince, yea, the people themselves (ch. xlv. 3, 9), and that, as ch. xlv. shows, as to judgment and justice (comp. ch. xlv. 24) in all their affairs (ch. xlv. 9 sq.), appear in connection with the sanctuary. When Ezekiel portrays the new community as conformed to the law in their worship, this specially manifests the connection of the sanctification of Israel with the sanctuary of Jehovah (in accordance with ch. xxxvii. 28); in general, however, the prophet comes in this way only to that which he has always throughout his book prophesied as the form of the sanctification and holiness of Israel. Only the deviations here and there from the Mosaic law in the service of the future defined by the temple, and in general, the freedom which prevails in this respect in the ordinances (while Ezra's scrupulously exact adherence to the law shows the direct opposite), presuppose so very significantly for this future of which Ezekiel prophesies the fulfilling of the law in the popular life. The letter of the law is, as to its spirit, learned in the Spirit which Jehovah put within Israel (comp. also ch. xxxix. 29), in that it is lived, in that the idea of the law has become the life of the people. Thus there is an end to the pedagogy of the law. The fulfilled idea of the law, as exemplified by our prophet, realizes itself in a newness of life. But that this newness has still its expression in a legal form, in the forms of the Mosaic worship, as little disparages the new reality of the future, as when in the New Testament the sacrificial service furnishes clothing for the thoughts of the Christian life. It is, however, a proof not only of the priestly, but of the historical standpoint generally of Ezekiel's prophecy; it is the necessary shell which adheres thereto. Comp. besides the Doct. Reflec. on ch. xl.-xli.

3. The waters from the sanctuary—to which they are finally traced back again in ver. 12, and consequently are represented as belonging thereto—no doubt raise up fruit-bearing trees on their banks; but the significance of this is not the amplification, e.g. of ch. xxxiv. 26 sq., that is, the fruitfulness of the land (ch. xxxvi. 8 sq., 29 sq.); for as the aim of this water is the healing of the Dead Sea (ch. xlvii. 8 sq.), so likewise the foliage of these fruit-trees serves for healing (ch. xlvii. 12). We may say: As the aim of the temple-sanctuary is sanctification, so that of the waters from the sanctuary is healing, so that sanctification and healing are the two leading theological thoughts dominating the whole closing part of Ezekiel. But with the thought of healing the completion of Israel is already alluded to.

4. Ch. xvi. 53 prophesied the ethical restoration of Sodom, and the same thought returns here with the healing of the waters of the Dead Sea. Since the Dead Sea, like Sodom and Gomorrah, stands throughout the whole of Scripture as a type of judgment, the judgment is, in the character of threatening, by its healing symbolically removed from the sight of Israel. Israel by its sanctification is exempted from judgment, has no further judgment to fear (ch. xxxix. 29). The healing of the Dead Sea in its land, which immediately precedes the settling of the boundaries and the division of the land (ch. xlvii. 13 sq.), is the characteristic symbol of the completion of Israel, the community of God. Only the salt pools and pits of ch. xlvii. 11 still remain, but in the same way as when in the closing verse of Isaiah (ch. lvi. 24) they go out and look upon the carcasses of the apostates, whose worm dieth not, etc., and who are an abhorring unto all flesh.

5. From Genesis onward, which also relates the genesis of Israel as the people of God, there runs through Holy Scripture a twofold reference, namely, to the people of the promise, and to the Promised Land. This twofold reference meets us here also in these closing chapters. But as we have repeatedly seen, the people of Israel are to be taken in their prophetic character of the future as referring to mankind, and the land of Israel is to be taken as referring to the earth. Now in Ezekiel, people and land become united in the symbol of the sanctuary, of the temple in the midst of the twelve tribes and their portions of land, as indeed the prophet accentuates this centre, which thus unites all the parts into a whole. By this the idea is symbolized which has realized itself in the Son of man, who unites mankind in Himself; who as the second Adam is the centre for the whole earth; who can say: To Me is given all power in heaven and on earth, go ye therefore and make disciples of all nations, and preach the gospel to the whole creation! We have there the sanctuary for sanctification, and here the Saviour for healing; preparation and fulfilment, beginning and end.

6. Stier on John vii. 38 rightly interprets the word of Scripture to which our Lord appeals there as referring to Christ Himself (Words of the Lord Jesus, vol. v. p. 282 sq.; Clark's Tr.). When here in Ezekiel the healing, life-giving waters flow from the temple, then, at least according to what Scripture here says (but comp. also Joel iv. [iii.] 18, and afterwards Zech. xiv. 8), the fulfilment cannot possibly be sought for in him who believes in Christ. (ὁ πιστεύων εἰς ἡμὲς corresponds to the ἐρχόμενος πρὸς ἡμᾶς (ver. 37), just as in John vi. 35 ὁ ἐρχόμενος πρὸς μετὰ καὶ ὁ πιστεύων εἰς ἡμᾶς mutually correspond.) The αὐτὸς, out of whose καὶ ὅσα ποταμοὶ βύσσουσι ὕδατος ζῶντος, can also according to John only be He ἰσ' in the Baptist (John i. 33) saw το πνεῦμα καταβαίνει καὶ μένει ἐν' αὐτῷ, and with allusion to whom he says in general (John iii. 34): οὐ γὰρ ἐκ μέτρου δίδωμι ὁ βίος το πνεῦμα. This One who is the Anointed κατ' ἔξουαν explains to the Jews (John ii.) the temple of His body. Consequently He not only could, but must have understood of Himself what the Scripture says of the "rivers of living water flowing out," as He also began by saying: If any man thirst, let him come unto Me; and this quite apart from the circumstance that, as the feast suggested ever since the march through the wilderness, "the spiritual rock that followed" was, as Paul expressly says in 1 Cor. x. 4, the Anointed One. Zech. xii. 10 also was very clearly uttered with this reference, as Jesus, too, in John vii. 39 spoke of the Spirit, not that should flow out from him that believes on Him, but "that they should receive (λαμβάνειν) who believe on Him; for πνεῦμα ἅγιον (in the sense of the outpouring of Zech. xii. 10) was not yet, because Jesus was not yet glorified." Comp. John xx. 22. Thus Christ has interpreted Ezekiel xlvii. 1-12 as referring to the Spirit of Pentecost. When Stier, in accordance with his apocalyptic mysticism, makes the thought be included here of "the community of the Lord, particularly in its glorious final perfection, but only the community as a whole, in so far as the Lord Himself flows through and fills it, sends forth from it His streams of blessing,"—that goes beyond the letter, upon which Stier insists so much, and beyond the sense and spirit of the letter in John; and, moreover, the word of prophecy in Ezekiel does not point to such a perfection. We may at all events say with Roffhack (Ev. Johannis, i. p. 302 sq.): "In the derived sense the saying may hold good of believers; for twelve Galilean fishermen and publicans produced that spiritual movement in the world, the swell of whose waves still at the present time presses onward to the remotest ends of the earth." "Interpreted as referring to believers generally," observes Roffhack, "it could not but wholly mislead thousands regarding their own faith and that of their brethren."

7. Hengstenberg says in his commentary on our prophet: "We shall have to regard as the Mediator of this salvation for the whole world the exalted Descendant of David, who, according to ch. xvii. 23, grows up from a feeble sapling to a glorious cedar, under which all fowls dwell; to the fowls of every wing there, correspond here the fish of every kind in ver. 10. In harmony with our prophecy, the salvation here announced took its beginning in the time of the second temple, and poured itself forth from the place where Jesus had the chief seat of His activity over the nations of the earth" (comp. on John vii. 3, 4). In the Christology, 2d ed., he observes in particular: "In Ezekiel the water issues forth under the threshold of the house toward the east; according to the Apocalypse, the stream of water proceeds from the throne of God and of the Lamb. John has completed Ezek. xlvii. 1 from ch. xliii. 7. The reason why the streams of salvation now proceed from the sanctuary, is that the Lord has entered into it with His glory. From the temple, now lying in ruins, they could not issue, because the temple was not yet truly the place of God's throne. This the sanctuary, that is, the Church, first became through Him in whom dwells the fulness of the Godhead bodily. Henceforth it is called 'Jehovah there,' ch. xlviii. 35. As the announcement of the indwelling of the glory of the Lord in ch. xliii. found its fulfilment in Christ, so John points to this when he speaks of the throne of God and of the Lamb." In his commentary he says: "The relations of the New Testament to our section (ch. xlvii. 1-12) are very rich and manifold. In reference to it the Lord, in Matt. iv. 18, 19, speaks to Peter and Andrew. On it rests the miraculous draught of fishes by Peter at the beginning of the ministry of Jesus (Luke v.), and likewise the draught after the resurrection (John xxi.). Jesus with evident design embodies, at the commencement and the close, the contents of our prophecy in a symbolic act. Not less allusive to our prophecy is the parable of the net which gathered of every kind (Matt. xiii. 47). Finally, in Rev. xxii. 1, 2, the last and most glorious fulfilment is announced."

8. "Other prophets, too, have the symbol of a temple fountain (comp. Joel iv. [iii.] 18, and Zech. xiv. 8), but nowhere is it seen so beautifully carried out as here" (UMBREIT). The fundamental passage, or at least the older passage, is Joel's. It is not necessary, however, to consider Ezekiel as borrowing from Joel; the thought is applied as originally in him as in Joel or Zechariah; the only thing common to the three is the water. But unmistakably there is a connection between the three prophetic passages. That which the healing of the Dead Sea, this removal of a spectacle of judgment as old as the days of Abraham, signifies in Ezekiel as to the fulfilment of Israel, is in Joel, likewise as to Israel, expressed in the watering of the valley of Shittim, which symbolizes as fulfilled the wilderness-journey of Israel, their period of probation generally. With the east sea Zechariah takes up Ezekiel's thought of judgment of the Dead Sea, but with the west sea he subjoins thereto reference to the salvation coming from the Jews unto the Gentiles. The Israel completed in the Messiah, in Christ, the temple, draws water with joy from the wells of salvation (Isa. xii. 3). When Jehovah counts and writes up His people among the nations (Ps. lxxxvii.), all His springs are in Zion. "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters," it is said in Isa. lv., for there is a river whose streams make glad the city of God, the dwelling-place of the Most High (Ps. xlv.). whereas judgment passes over the world in the morning of the day of the Lord. Peace to him that is far off, and to him that is near, saith the Lord; I healed it, Isa. lvii. 19.

9. Before we take up for comparison the representation given in the Revelation of John, let us first consider the order in our prophet. That which was prophesied to Israel specially in ch. xxxvii. 26 is carried into effect in ch. xl.-xlviii., in which the Messianic salvation as to land and city is symbolically set forth in the temple, its service, and the waters. These chapters are eschatological in the sense that Christ and the Christian Church are the end, the fulfilment of Israel. Ch. xxxviii. and xxxix., again, contain eschatology in another sense, that is, the Christian sense; see p. 374 sq. These chapters are a specifically apocalyptic enclave in Ezekiel, whose close (ch. xxxix. 21 sq.) then points back to ch. xxxvii., by way of preparation for the following chapters, and to form connection with them. Thus Gog and Magog stretch beyond ch. xl.-xlviii. Since, then, the schema of the fulfilment of Israel, as sanctification to be God's people in the spirit that is to be poured forth—this fulfilment set down just as it took place through the Messiah, by means of the Christian Church—is summarily expressed in ch. xxxvii. 26 sq. and xxxix. 29, the last conflict of this fulfilled Israel, that is, of the Christian Church, is foreseen in the apocalyptic chapters xxxviii. and xxxix., so that the world-progress of the gospel, and the development of the nationalities for and against Christ and His community, will lie between ch. xxxvii. 26 sq., or, we may say, between ch. xxxix. 21 sq., and ch. xxxviii.-xxxix. 1-20. After the legal γρᾶμμα, with which, although according to the freedom of the spirit of fulfilment, the completion of the Old Testament Church is described in ch. xl. sq., there comes, as early as ch. xlv., but much more in ch. xlvii. 13 sq., the historical γρᾶμμα of the taking possession of and dividing the Promised Land. As, in order to understand the temple, we must go back to its idea, especially after the entrance of the glory of the Lord (ch. xliii.), and as in connection therewith (ch. xlv.) the service of the community of this sanctuary is understood of the worship of the Father through the Son in the Holy Ghost, so in like manner the only significance which the undeniably symbolical temple-water assigns to the land and the twelve tribes, and to the city with its gates, is that which the people of Israel has, through the Christian Church, obtained for the earth, "the territorium of the kingdom of God" (KEIL); for, in the Church of Christ, Israel has become complete as to the members, just as in Christ, the Messiah of Israel, as to the head. The Chiliastic interpretation of our chapters, even if correct in assuming that the letter of Ezekiel's prophecy—which, however, is symbolical—relates to Israel and Canaan, that is, that what is meant is an earthly, historical fulfilment, must still be regarded as advocating a restoration to the pristine condition, irrespective of the fulfilment of the Old Covenant in the New.

10. It harmonizes with the chronological order given in Ezekiel that John's Apocalypse takes up in ch. xx. 8 sq. the prophecy of Ezekiel through Gog and Magog (ch. xxxviii.), that is, in its specifically apocalyptic passage (p. 373), and this after previously introducing in Rev. xix. 17 sq. the final conflict against Christ of anti-Christianism and pseudo-Christianity, and the judgment and overthrow of the latter as the beginning of the end; we have seen (p. 377) why the colouring of the description in the Apocalypse is borrowed from Ezek. xxxix. 17 sq. That this and the other final conflict (Gog's) both belong to the history of the Christian Church of Israel, is perhaps indicated by the mention of the χαρῶμα του θύπου, both as to those who have it (Rev. xix. 20) and those who have it not (Rev. xx. 4), which reads as parallel to ch. xlv. 15, although the Old Testament framework of the description of the sons of Zadok has something essentially different of its own (not yet overthrow, but degradation is inflicted upon those who stumbled, in contrast to the sons of Zadok). But if Ezekiel in ch. xl.-xlviii. beholds Israel perfected on earth in the temple and its service, and placed in its twelve tribes within the bounds of Canaan, and if this symbolical representation is a prophecy of Christ and the Christian Church, the kingdom of God in this guise on earth, then the Apocalypse of John interprets the certainly apocalyptic hint that these closing chapters of our prophet come after the attack, etc. of Gog, and, beginning by making Rev. xx. 11 sq. the end of the world, the last resurrection and the final judgment precede Gog's attack; hence it interprets our ch. xl.-xlviii. as referring to the perfection of the Christian Church, the kingdom of glory (Rev. xxi. 1-xxii. 4); and here, corresponding to Ezekiel's earthly description (Canaan), the Apocalypse describes a new earth, and also retains throughout the Old Testament colouring of our prophet. The justification of interpreting John's Apocalypse with this application is to be found in the principle that the perfection of the Christian kingdom of God at the end of the world is just the full final perfection of Israel in Christ, just as Israel after the Spirit and the Church of Christ are only one continuous thing. That which the general judgment in John carries out in its reference is indicated by the giving over to salt in Ezek. xlvii. 11, with respect to the completion of Israel; and as the (Dead) Sea, in ver. 8 there, is healed to life, so in Rev. xx. 13 the sea gives up its dead, and there is no more sea (ch. xxi. 1), and there shall be no more death (ch. xxi. 4). That Keil says too much when he says: "The prophetic picture in Ezek. xl.-xlviii. gives a clear idea of the kingdom of God erected by Christ in its full configuration," is already evident from his own limitation of this assertion, for he supposes merely a "partial Old Testament outline to this New Testament image of the heavenly Jerusalem, Rev. xxi. and xxii." But still more markedly does the comparison of the Apocalypse present essential differences. While Ezekiel's temple is situated in Canaan, as repeatedly stated in ch. xlv. and xlviii., the New Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 2, 10) comes down out of heaven from God. The distinction is not this, that in Ezekiel city and temple are separated, but that the New Jerusalem of the Apocalypse has no temple whatever, God and the Lamb are its temple (ch. xxi. 22); and this furnishes the most express confirmation of the explanation given of Ezekiel's temple, as referring to the dwelling of God in Christ. While in Ezekiel the entire circuit of the temple is most holy (ch. xliii. 12, xlv. 8), in John this now holds of the city. The glory of God entering into and filling the temple in Ezekiel (ch. xliii., xlv.) lightens the city, etc., in Rev. xxi. 23; its gates, too, are not shut; compare, on the contrary, Ezek. xlv. 2, xvi. 1 sq. So also it can be said that the holy city of the Apocalypse is called the "bride" (ch. xxi. 2, 9) of the Lamb, just as He is alike her Temple and her Bridegroom. The closing representation of John's Revelation is occupied with this city of twelve gates, and is accordingly borrowed from the close of Ezekiel, from the city "Jehovah Shammah" (ch. xlviii. 35). Apart from particulars, the ample magnificence of precious stones and gold, etc. in Rev. xxi. 18 sq. forms a noteworthy contrast to the meagre simplicity of Ezekiel's temple (p. 445). Moreover, the cube form (Rev. xxi. 16), like the most holy place, comes very specially into consideration for the New Jerusalem. But in respect of the river of the water of life (Rev. xxii. 1 sq.), it has to be noticed that in the Apocalypse it flows in the midst of the street of the city, and that the leaves of the tree of life on either side are designated as his garments for them, a still clearer reference to Ezekiel (ch. xlvii.), and, in accordance with the original promise that in Abraham's seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed, removing for the Gentile world (as already in Rev. xxi. 24) the apparent limitation to Israel of Ezekiel's prophetic description; as Neumann expresses it: "The transformation of Israel to a blessed eternity is the consecration of the nations, Isa. lx. 3 sq. Hengst., who in the 2d edition of his Christology makes the symbolical view of our closing chapters be confirmed beyond question by the Apocalypse, just as he attributes "to the entire description of the new temple, in its main points, a Messianic character" ("and of such a kind that under the New Testament the fulfilment is always going on, while the completion belongs to the future"), in his commentary on Ezekiel cannot keep the Apocalypse and the prophet far enough apart, simply, indeed, on the ground that "in Ezekiel everything is mundane, there everything is supramundane;" neither of which is the case, not even in the form of expression, and also not so in the sense expressed. At all events, Hengstenberg finally concedes in his commentary that "the fact cannot be mistaken, that in a certain (?) sense the entire description of the new temple bears a Messianic character," etc.

11. The Mosaic law may, in respect to worship, be said to culminate in the temple, just as its goal and that of the temple is the Anointed One, as the fulfilling of the law in general; and so the spirit of the law, as well as the Spirit of Christ, may be considered as the water flowing from the temple. Both met together at the first Pentecost of the Christian Church, and moreover, those of Israel on whom the Spirit was poured forth were assembled in the temple; and the preaching of Peter was like a first bursting forth of these waters from the temple.

12. "The Dead Sea has its place in worship also. The Talmud Menachoth prescribes that the salt used in sacrifice should be salt of Sodom. Every sacrifice receives in the salt the death-consecration, and consequently it is just this use which explains why the waters of life flow into the sea of death. As all the health and blessedness of a glorified future well forth in the former, so in the latter surges the torment of the curse, all the woe of the divine judgments which culminate in death" (NEUM.).

13. The fishers in the vision (ch. xlvii. 1-12) are not mere figures in the landscape, however true it is not for the East alone that fishing is part of the picturesque in a well-watered region. For what Ezekiel treats of is not so much the abundance of water as the abundance of life, of living fishes. And so, too, Neumann has no right to bring in the fishes as palatable food (Num. xi. 5; Neh. xiii. 16), as the third kind of Sabbath food among the Jews, in order to get "an inviting attraction," which is altogether foreign to our vision. True it is, however, and needing no reference to the fishponds beside the temples of Paphos and Hierapolis, and the fish idols Derceto, Oannes, and Dagon, that "in the multitude of fish is mirrored the most exuberant (!) and richest fulness of life." Neumann observes, moreover,

"the lively movement in the element of all purity, in order to contemplate in this figure the most blessed existence of the sinless." In the Talmud the Messiah, too, is called "fish," and according to Abarbanel the constellation Pisces announces His birth. The swarming life of the fishes in ver. 9 sq. is dramatized by means of the fishes. Neumann says on this occasion: "To man was given the dominion also over the fish of the sea, Gen. i. 28; Ps. viii. 9 [8]. He has now grasped the sceptre. Comp. Isa. xix. 5, 8. The greatness of the affliction there testifies to the greatness of the blessing here. In Jer. xvi. 16 the fishers are the executors of the judgment; in Ezek. xxvi. 3 they are sureties for the fulfilled judgment. Yet where a Dead Sea became alive, there the fishers in their ceaseless movement, in the ardour of their activity, testify that here the curse is changed into a blessing."

14. The palms of Engedi continued to be known to a late period, and although the vineyards of Cant. i. 14 have disappeared, still there was here a place of life not far from the seat of death. May not (asks Neumann) the other fountain (Eneg-lainu) have been in equally beautiful natural scenery? like two oases on the border of the Dead Sea? "And the names fountain for oxen and fountain for goats surely indicate pasture grounds. Thus the fountains would encompass like a silver frame the steppe that was to be transformed, and from their brilliancy the figure itself would become light."

15. It is only in accordance with the specifically Israelitish tenor of Ezekiel's prophecy, particularly in this closing section, that in ch. xlvii. 22 the reference to the Gentiles keeps itself within Israel; enough has been said in the earlier chapters for supplementing and explaining. Hofmann compares Isa. xiv. 1 sq.; on which Delitzsch observes that "the letter of the promise at all events is not in a New Testament form, because the community (ecclesia) has no other mode of manifestation for Old Testament days and Old Testament perception than the national form. This national form of the community is broken up in the New Testament, and will never be restored."

16. "When the new earth is designated as Canaan, and the new humanity as the nation of Israel with its twelve tribes, this is because that has appeared in the new humanity and the new earth which was aimed at, begun, and pre-figured in Israel and Canaan. In proportion, however, as the kingdom of God extends itself on earth, and the salvation of Christ finds faith in men, the people of God become oecumenical, gain over the earth, and obtain the mastery of the world; until God gifts it to them as a new world. The Revelation of John omits all features which refer back to the previous development, because it has to do with the absolute consummation. God will one day make the new altar; life will give health to the sea of nations; at last we have the consummation before our eyes. Our temple-vision may be compared to paintings" (Kaulbach's frescoes), "which attempt to represent historical developments upon one sheet, and must be interpreted and understood like these" (KLEFF.).

17. The city Jehovah Shammah forms the antithesis not to Babylon alone, but also to the city of Gog (ch. xxxix. 16). Perhaps, too, the permanent grave of Gog (ch. xxxix. 11 sq.) and the healed Dead Sea stand to each other in significant contrast.

18. Hofmann thinks "the hope which was ever and anon whispered to the national community of God under all circumstances is not lost either to the community of God which then existed in the form of a nation, or to the nation which was called as such to be the community of God; and the fulfilment will correspond in both respects to the prophecy."

HOMELETIC HINTS

On Ch. xlvii.

Ver. 1 sq. "Before his view stands a paradise of the nation returned to God, from whom the fountain of life flows forth in richest effusion, filling the land and all waters with healing virtues, — behold in this the word of God in its vigour of heavenly life, destroying disease and death!" (UMBREIT).—"From the restored temple issues finally salvation for the whole world" (HENGST.).—"For this is the most intrinsic characteristic of these waters, that they spread through the world the consecration of the most holy place" (NEUM.).—"The waters of life in their significance, whence they come, and whither they flow. — "Water, which makes the unfruitful land fruitful, and affords refreshing drink to the thirsty, is in Scripture a figure of the blessing and salvation which already in paradise are represented as a watering of the ground (Gen. xiii. 10). Comp. in Isa. xlii. 3 the wells of salvation, and in Isa. xlv. 3 the Spirit as the blessing, for the root of disease is sin" (HENGST.).—"In the Church of the New Covenant there is a river of living water, the rich gifts of the Holy Ghost, which flow out into it. Only we must come and taste this water, that we may be made whole, John vii. 37 sq." (TÜB. BIB.).—"The watering of Canaan implies a great spiritual fruitfulness" (LAMPE).—"The gospel is no invention of man, but an outflow from God in Christ" (STARCK).—"The Eastern and the Western Church. — "The water is the fatherly kindness and compassion of God, out of whose treasury innumerable benefits flow to us. The water turns at once to the altar of Christ, because we behold in Christ the love of God, and from Him flow upon mankind the spiritual streams of blessing which are to quicken and give health to the world, John xiii. 10, iv. 10" (HEIM-HOFF.).—"By this water is signified the preaching of the gospel, which offers to us grace and the forgiveness of sins in Christ. Water cleanses, so do God's word and grace (John xiii.), of which baptism is the symbol. Also the course of the gospel, as the course of these waters, no one can stop" (LAVATER).—"It is the water of life, which Oriental mysticism in vain seeks for in other places" (UMBREIT).—Ver. 2. "The kingdom of God cometh not with outward show (Luke xvii. 20); at first it has even an insignificant appearance, but soon it grows and increases mightily (Matt. xiii. 31, 32)" (W.).—"That the waters at first flow out so gently is meant to intimate how entirely different is the process in the kingdom of grace from that in the course of worldly things. For whatever glorious or great thing takes place in the kingdoms of the world creates great wonder and surprise in its very beginning; but the kingdom of God cometh not so (Luke xvii. 20). In the kingdom of God, things proceed from little to great; in the kingdoms of the world, often from great to little; Satan, as Luther says, begins his things with lofty impetuosity, but finally they end in nothing, and everything comes to disgrace" (HAFENREFFER).—"At first it appeared an insignificant work, with a few disciples in Judea; then it was preached in Samaria, and soon after in the whole world" (LAVATER).—Ver. 3 sq. "Faith has always to do with the water here, namely, because it is constantly occupied with consideration of the word of God" (STARCK).—"No one has learned so much, that there is not more to learn still. Christianity is prefigured in the water through which Ezekiel was brought. Experience teaches that the longer Christians exercise themselves in godliness, the less value they set on themselves; they confess finally that they cannot reach the bottom; they can depend upon nothing that is theirs, but must submit themselves simply and solely to the grace and mercy of God" (SORIVER).—To him that hath shall be given, that he may have abundance.—"The mysteries of the gospel are like a deep river, which finally becomes so deep that one cannot sound it, Eph. iii. 18" (TÜB. BIB.).—"When reason cannot fathom the divine mysteries because of their depth, the faith which trusts to the truth and wisdom of God, as it were, swims across, Luke i. 34 sq." (STARCK).—"We find here a twofold figure; the one is the four measurements of a thousand cubits each, the other is the four depths of the waters. The one refers to the exceeding great extension of the kingdom of Christ toward all the four quarters of the globe; the other to the different degrees in the measure of the Spirit to which the nations called to the kingdom of Christ shall gradually attain," etc. (MEYER).—"The four world-kingsdoms in Daniel are like a shadow of the four great epochs in space and time, through which the waters of life diffuse their fullness over the world, gradually transforming it until its peace shall become as a river, and its righteousness as the waves of the sea (Isa. xlviii. 18); until the earth shall be full of the knowledge of Jehovah as the waters cover the sea," Isa. xi. 9 (NEUM.).—"So the books, too, of the Holy Scriptures are, as to their contents, like these waters, of dissimilar depth. Some come only to the ankles, others to the knees, or even to the loins, and some are altogether unfathomable, like these last nine chapters of our prophet" (PFEIFFER).—"At first the word of God seems to us like water which reaches only to the ankles; one thinks it is not so deep, one will easily wade through. But when a man reflects diligently with heartfelt prayer, then his understanding is more and more opened in the divine illumination; then it already reaches his knees—he acquires a far higher esteem for it (Ps. cxix. 129). When he advances farther, he gets always deeper into the hidden wisdom, and Holy Writ is to him a water which comes to his loins; he is so captivated therewith, that he finds in it his highest satisfaction, and forgets over it everything else in the world. Finally, it becomes a water over which he must swim; he cannot fathom the mysteries" (GLASSIUS).—"The river of life, which is at first small, always grows in volume, because the grace and knowledge of Christ should always increase in us; and the divine love and mercy should appear to us always greater, more glorious, and more worthy of admiration, the more attentively we consider them.

For who can comprehend their height and depth? Who is so void of understanding as not to be astonished, when he considers that the God of immortality interests Himself in poor mortal man, yea, in the sinner, who so often rises up against Him and breaks His word, imparts to him heavenly treasures, makes him immortal and a partaker of the divine nature? Of this spiritual blessing more and more is always imparted to believers. Here we have sprinkling, cleansing, the taking away of the heart of stone, and the impartation of the new heart, and the anointing with the Holy Ghost. In such measure does the water of life increase" (HEIM-HOFF.).—"Friends of missions behold here a glorious emblem of missions, particularly of the most blessed missionary activity proceeding from Israel" (RICHTER).—Ver. 6. "In this life we see darkly and through means of the word, hereafter face to face, 1 Cor. xiii. 12" (STARCK).—Ver. 7. The gospel makes fruitful trees on all sides.—"How wholesome, how fruitful is the living water of the gospel, and of the gifts of the Spirit which it gives us! They restore health, they bring forth fruits of blessedness which endure unto eternity, John iv. 14" (TÜB. BIB.).—"Blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord (Jer. xvii. 7 sq.).—"Believers are trees planted by the rivers of water (Ps. i.); they flourish to the glory of God (Isa. lxi.), and produce rich and ripe fruit (Ps. xcii. 13 sq.)." (STARCK).—Ver. 8. First urbi, and then orbi, holds good of the Messiah.—Salvation is of the Jews, but it is a salvation for the world.—"Covered with loose pebbles and wild rifted rocks, furrowed by dry torrent-beds, enclosed and obscured at the sides by lofty chains of mountains, the Arabah exhibits only here and there traces of fertility in the growth of herbs and plants, where fountains and streams flow down from the mountains; it is the evening gloom of the wilderness-night, the land in which is the darkness of evening (Isa. xxiv. 11; Jer. ii. 6). The steppe a world in the bonds of death, where the mystery moulders below in silence, and shoots up in roses of the grave" (NEUM.).—God's sanctuary a well-spring of life for the Dead Sea of the world (Ps. lxxxvii. 7).—The Dead Sea in the darkness of nature, in the light of the promise.—God's thoughts of peace over the abysses of the world's wretchedness.—Judgment and grace.—The world is a desert and a Dead Sea.—"Oh the greatness of the grace of God, which desires not the death of the sinner, but his healing!" (STARCK).—By conversion we lose our former salt.—"In other cases a clear and wholesome stream, which flows into a muddy and putrid lake like this, becomes corrupt; it is otherwise with the gospel, which brings recovery and health to the earthly-minded heart" (STARCK).—"The gospel is a word of life to them who believe in it (John vi. 68) and its spiritual rivers are living waters to them who drink thereof (John iv. 10)" (TÜB. BIB.).—"It is a power of God, but man will not let the power work, Heb. iv. 2" (STARCK).—Ver. 9. "The sea, the restlessly swelling depth, an emblem of disquiet (Isa. lvii. 20), unfruitful (Isa. xxiii. 3), boiling up with violent impetuosity (Job vii. 12; Ps. xlv. 4 [3]), even in its most glorious aspect only darkling night, like phosphorescent gleams around a corrupt tree, awakening a painful desire and longing for launching forth on distant voyages (Deut.

xxx. 13), and down even to the shady abyss (Lam. ii. 13), unfathomable and dark, the most natural expression of the dark and destructive power of death (Jer. li. 42; Mic. vii. 19), its harshness increased by the flood supersaturated with salt," etc. (NEUM.).—"In the Dead Sea of the world there arises just such a gladsome swarm of those who have become partakers of life from God, as formerly of ordinary fishes in the natural sea at the creation. The salvation is for all, without distinction of nation, rank, or age" (HENGST.).—"From death into life, from the service of sin into the glorious liberty of the children of God, come rich and poor, young and old, bond and free, Jews and Greeks, who receive into them the law of the spirit of life. For whosoever calls upon the name of the Lord shall be saved" (HEIM-HOFF.).—"The fishes in the water and the drops in a river are innumerable; so also the multitude of believers shall be amazing, Isa. lx. 7" (STARKE.).—"The two rivers are the two Testaments, the two sacraments" (STARCK.).—Ver. 10. "The ministers of the Church are compared to fishers, because of the contempt with which they are regarded by the rich and powerful of this world; because of their labour by day and by night, in heat and in cold; because of the fruitlessness of their labour at times, when they say with Peter, We have caught nothing; because, too, of the dangers they incur in stormy weather; because of their confidence, which, as in the case of the husbandman, must rest on God; because of the various kinds of implements which they use, nets, hooks, etc., preaching, inviting, admonishing, etc. And they rescue souls from the abyss" (STARCK.).—Nets and fishers everywhere, this is the appearance which the world in Christ presents.—"The world is the sea, the fishes are the men; so long as the fishes swim freely hither and thither at their own will, they profit no one, but when caught they are profitable. In the same way, so long as men walk according to their own lusts and pleasures, they are of no real use either to God or their neighbour; but when they are caught or converted by the gospel net, then they are profitable to God and their neighbour, Philem. 11" (STARKE.).—Ver. 11. "In the Dead Sea of the world the marshes and swamps are originally of the same nature as the main sea; the only difference is, that they shut themselves off from the healing waters, which flow from the sanctuary. Comp. the saying: Ye would not, and the drawing of the Father (John vi. 44), which comes to meet the longing of the soul. It is, however, sufficient punishment for the world that lieth in wickedness that it continues as it is" (HENGST.).—"The mud-puddles probably indicate separatist, self-contained parties, which do not receive those streams of salvation, and consequently cannot be healed. To these belong Gog's adherents, ch. xxxviii" (RICHTER.).—"Such, too, are those who entrench themselves against the truth and craftily wrest the Scriptures throughout; people of this kind are not easily brought to the knowledge of the truth" (BERL. BIB.).—"Over the figures of light there comes once more a dark shadow. Yea, nothing can rescue from death that which is his own (Isa. xxvi. 14). All transformation is only the fruit of a ripening, during which there is constant need of being put in mind of the day of wrath, which comes on the earth, as here on

Israel" (NEUM.).—He who will not have Christ wills to have eternal death.—No salvation out of Christ.—"The eyes of God regard him who opposes Christ as a morass, because he prefers the wilderness of sin to eternal salvation, John iii. 19" (STARCK.).—"He who, in case of conversion, still seeks to retain bypaths and bosom sins, is not upright before God. Divided allegiance is of no avail here, Matt. vi. 24" (STARKE.).—"The ungodly, who despise God's word, or do not persevere in the path of life, remain dry and unfruitful. Blessed, on the contrary, is the godly man who meditates on the law of the Lord day and night (Ps. i.). He is always flourishing, always alike; he walks in the ways of the Lord, and edifies and elevates others" (HEIM-HOFF.).—Ver. 12. The blessed growth close by the river of life.—Evergreen leaves, yet not leaves merely, but also fruit! Thus it is with life from God's sanctuary.—Hypocrisy and true piety.—"The never-fading of the leaves implies the perseverance of believers in temptations, in persecutions, in death" (STARCK.).—"The works of believers, which in other respects are done even by unbelievers, are fragrant of faith and love, and are therefore fitted for converting the heathen" (BERL. BIB.).—"Would that all men knew how well it is with him who is included in the number of Christians, of true members of Jesus! Then one always goes onward (and never backward) in his happiness; he is in the path of life, and always receives grace for grace" (ROTHE.).—Healing and sanctification.—"A pleasant figure of the blessing imparted to mankind from the dwelling among us of the God-man. His word flows forth from Him, swelling through all lands with ever-increasing power, and always more and more disclosing its fulness. He who holds to it and is rooted in it brings forth fruit continually, and it has power to quicken even what has long been lifeless, and to turn the curse into a blessing. In Christ we have this as a matter of daily experience; Ezekiel in vision saw it in the future; his prophecies have respect to us" (DIEDRICH.).—Ver. 13 sq. "In the community of God every one has his place and his share according to his gifts, 1 Cor. xii. 28" (TUB. BIB.).—"Who can define the boundaries of the Church, especially in the last days? But as here the boundaries of Canaan are defined, so the boundaries of the Church are faith and life in the Scriptures of the apostles and prophets, which accordingly no one is to overpass, Gal. vi. 16" (STARKE.).—The Church of God has her boundaries within and without. The inheritance of the saints in light (1 John iii. 1 sq.).—"God gives to His children very differently; from him to whom a double portion has been given, a corresponding return is required" (STARCK.).—"In the New Covenant the same grace is offered to all men. God is not a respecter of persons. It is one and the same Christ, one Spirit for all, Gal. iii. 28" (STARCK.).—Ver. 22 sq. "Oh what comfort it is that the Gentiles are no longer to be strangers and foreigners from the promise, but citizens, and of the household of God! Eph. ii. 19" (STARKE.).—"It is not birth, but the new birth, that makes men children of God" (STARCK.).—"Here, under earthly figures, the Jerusalem that is above, with her children, is typified, and the calling of the Gentiles from east and west and the utmost bounds of the earth is described; for many shall come from the east and from the west, and sit down to eat with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of God, Ps. xlvii. 10 [9]" (HEIM-HOFF.).—"God here opens to all the holy gates of His Church, and prescribes to the Church herself the commandment of meekness, love, and brotherly kindness" (HAFENREFFER).—"Those who were formerly strangers shall then be heirs of the whole world. In Christ, in faith, in the New Covenant, the alien disappears. Those who were aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and far off, and they who are nigh, are made one; the two are made one new man, Eph. ii. 12. For he who is in Christ is through faith Abraham's seed, and an heir and possessor of his promise, Gal. iii. 28, 29. The incorporation of believers into Christ makes a complete unity, and a new spiritual body, consisting of all true members without distinction, for in the new creation all members prosper alike before God, etc." (BERL. BIB.).—Right and title in the faith.

On Ch. xlviii.

Ver. 1 sq. "As the tribe of Dan stands at the beginning, so in the kingdom of God the last are first, Matt. xix. 30" (STARCK).—Believers are all Israel, and are so in truth, because according to the Spirit of sanctification.—Ver. 8 sq. "Thy heart is in thy midst; take heed to whom it belongs: is it a temple of God in which His Spirit dwells, 1 Cor. iii. 16 or is it a habitation of unclean spirits, Luke xi. 26?" (STARCK).—God has an eternal right to the centre of man; hence He says to man: Give Me thine heart; God is the centre of the spirit world, and in Him everything lives and moves.—"We ourselves ought to be God's oblation" (STARCK).—Ver. 11 sq. "Teachers, above all men, ought to keep God's commands and do that which they teach others. They ought to attach themselves chiefly to the sanctuary of the Lord, around which they dwell" (STARCK).—God is near to them who show themselves to be His priests and ministers in this world.—"To err with the erring excuses no one; the way is broad, not for us to walk on it, but to call attention to the narrow path of life" (STARCK).—Ver. 14. "Simon Magus wanted to buy the power of imparting the Spirit; but that is not permitted, because it comes solely from the Lord's portion, which may not be bought or sold" (HEIM-HOFF.).—"In the administration of church-estates nothing ought to be applied to one's own use" (STARCK).—Ver. 15 sq. Wherever believers dwell, their city is always one and the same.—"The city pertains to the holy, as respects the eternal destination of its inhabitants, for the members of the Church are called with a holy calling; it is in very truth the fellowship of the saints, of the truly anointed, for Christ, the glorious Head, is its Temple and Sanctuary. But in the actual state in which the Church appears in this world, the righteous and the hypocrites are intermixed, and there are many nominal Christians who count as dead, that is, in the death-list of the Church, in which list, indeed, those who have died in the Lord are not inserted; but from the appearance which she presents here, the Church universal on earth must also be regarded as a profane Church" (after STARCK).—On all the four sides which bound the world, and always by thousands. Thus the Church has spread from the fulness of the Godhead. This her false friends forget when they believe they must enrich her; but not less so her enemies and persecutors, when they imagine they needed only to rush upon her at full speed, thinking her small and contemptible, and that she and God and conscience, etc., are nothing but vain imaginations inherited from our ancestors.—Ver. 18 sq. "Behold here the great goodness of God, who thinks of even the labourers in the city and cares for them, Jas. v. 4" (STARCK).—But every Christian ought to be an upright labourer, as every stone, wherever it is placed, belongs to the building and contributes to its erection.—Ver. 21 sq. The prince protects the holy portion, the centre of the whole land, "on the east and on the west;" by which may be signified, that a state which has comprehended the nature and signification of the Church, both in her eastern and western course, shall stand alongside of her.—Ver. 23 sq. "Let every man be content with the portion of temporal goods which he possesses, for the Lord has apportioned it, Matt. xx. 14" (TÜB. BIB.).—Ver. 29. "Thou rejoicest when thou obtainest an earthly inheritance, which thou often canst possess only a very short time: strive rather for the heavenly inheritance, for the inheritance that fadeth not away, which is reserved in heaven for the children of God, 1 Pet. i. 4" (STARCK).—Ver. 30 sq. The goings-out of the city of God are toward the four quarters of the world; its power, like its mission, extends to all places; yea, our faith is the victory which overcometh the world.—The names of the gates are the names of the tribes; the names of the tribes are the names of the sons of Israel; thus the gates taken together are the whole of Israel—that is, however, Israel in spirit and in truth.—"In this holy city, which represents the Church of Christ, the Lord is always graciously present, who says: Where two or three, etc. (Matt. xviii. 20), and: I am with you always, etc. (Matt. xxviii. 20). Comp. also John xiv. 23. Happy are we when we receive such a name that it can be said of us, The Lord is there! When the Lord dwells in us, then our hope ascends to the New Jerusalem, which cometh down from heaven, etc., Rev. xxi." (HEIM-HOFF.).—"The dream of the patriarch Jacob has been fulfilled: God has a city upon earth, in which all nations are to share. The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, and we beheld His glory, etc. Bethel has by this obtained its fulfilment even to the name. Thus, then, God Himself has set the prophet free from Jerusalem, and the old temple, and the old ordinances, and shown him a higher form of the kingdom of God. Ezekiel proves that he was a true prophet of God by the fact that he withdrew his nation from the service of the flesh, and with plain words, and also in figures, prepared them for Christ," etc. (DIEDRICH).—"The name of the prophet denotes one in relation to whom God is strong, who speaks not from his own heart, but is impelled and guided by a supra-mundane power. We have the verification of this name in the prophecies before us. That holds good of them throughout which the Lord said to Peter: Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but My Father which is in heaven. Not one of His words has fallen to the ground. The whole course of history has verified His saying in ch. xxxiii. 33: They shall know that a prophet hath been among them" (HENGST.).

AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

In the following exposition of the Book of Daniel, the undersigned has occupied an exegetical and critical position, the peculiarity of which will probably not be overlooked, on a careful comparison with the views and methods of other recent expositors. While he has held fast to the authenticity of the book as a whole, although it was difficult for him to change his former opinion respecting the composition of the book, that it originated during the Maccabæan age, and to conform it to the results of the thorough investigations of M. v. Niebuhr, Pusey, Zündel, Kranichfeld, Volck, Füller, and others, which demonstrated its composition during the captivity, he is still obliged to retain his former doubts with respect to the greater portion of Chap. xi. (particularly vs. 5-89). The reasons which determine him to this conclusion, are certainly of an internal character only. They result in the conviction that a particularizing prophecy, embracing the history of centuries, as it is found in that section, forms so marked a contrast to everything in the line of specializing prediction that occurs elsewhere in the prophetic literature of the Old Testament, that only the theory of an interpolating revision of its prophetic contents, imposed on it during the period of the Seleucid persecutions, or soon afterward, seems to afford a really satisfactory explanation of its particulars. Granted, that in the face of the unanimous testimony of all the external witnesses to the integrity of the prophet's text, the subjective nature of a criticism, such as is involved in this conclusion, may be censured; granted, that it may be termed inconsequent, that the intimate unity of the well-planned, well-adapted, and well-arranged work is thus broken through at but a single point; yet the analogia visionis prophetica, which furnishes the motive for our decision, appears to us to be no less a certain, objectively admissible, and most weighty criterion in critical questions like the present, than is the analogia fidei in the domain of Scriptural dogmatics. Nor was the solution of the many difficulties that were encountered, as it resulted from the assumption of an ex eventu interpolation at a single point, permitted to restrain us from submitting the progressive results of our investigation to the careful inspection of Biblical scholars belonging to wider circles, so far as the plan and design of the theological and homiletical Bible-work permitted such a course. [The American reviser has taken the liberty of combating the author's view as to the interpolation of the passage in question.]

In the treatment of a prophetic book like the one before us, it is evident that the homiletic element must occupy a very subordinate place. Nor could it be a principal aim for an exegete to obtain dogmatic results and modes of presenting them, from such a prophet as Daniel. For this reason we have preferred to follow the example of one of our esteemed co-laborers (Dr. Bähr, in his exposition of the Books of Kings), and accordingly we have given the title of "Ethico-fundamental principles related to the history of salvation" to the section ordinarily devoted to that object, and in the same connection we have noticed the apologetic questions that presented themselves, and also have indicated what was suitable for practical and homiletical treatment, in addition to the features designated by that heading.

We have devoted an especially careful attention, as in the case of our former exposition of the Song of Solomon, to the history and literature of the exposition of this prophet, both as a whole and with reference to its principal parts severally. Especially has the history of the exposition of the difficult and important vision of the 70 weeks of years, (chap. ix., 24-27,) been sketched by us as thoroughly as was possible, more thoroughly, we believe, than in any of the recent and latest commentaries on Daniel.

AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

Of the most recent exegetical and critical literature on this prophet, it was unfortunately impossible to notice two works that appeared while this book was in press: the commentary of Keil (in Keil and Delitzsch's Bible-work on the O. T.), and the monograph by P. Caspari, Zur Einführung in das Buch Daniel (Leipsic, Dörffling und Franke).

? May our attempt to add a further new and independent contribution to the exegetical literature on the most mysterious and difficult of all the prophets, which has recently been enriched by somewhat numerous, and in some respects not unimportant treatises, find that tolerant reception, at least on the part of Bible students who share our views in substance, which it may appropriately claim, in view of the unusual difficulty attending the execution of its object.

THE PROPHET DANIEL.

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. THE BOOK OF DANIEL, CONSIDERED AS A PROTOTYPE OF THE CANONICAL APOCALYPSE.

THE peculiarities of the book of Daniel, which explain, on the one hand, its position in the Jewish canon among the historical Hagiographa, and, on the other, its being classed in the Septuagint, Vulgate, and Luther, with the writings of the greater prophets, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, are both internal and external. They arise chiefly from the circumstance that the writer lived and wrought in Babylonia, not as a member of the community of exiled Jews, but as a naturalized Babylonian at the court of Nebuchadnezzar and his successors—not, like Ezekiel, discharging priestly functions among his people, but performing duty as an officer of the state and chief of the Magi. He was thus possessed of honors and emoluments akin to those of Joseph, his patriarchal prototype, at the court of the Egyptian Pharaoh; but his removal, at a later date, from his prominent position, and his death, not long after the overthrow of the Chaldean dynasty by the Persians, prevented his exerting a decisive influence on the welfare of his people. *

The book of Daniel's prophecies owes its origin to a period of the deepest national misery of the people of God—a time of the profoundest degradation and confusion, which finds its only parallel in the condition of Israel, when, wholly separated from its native soil, it languished in Egypt, the ignominious “house of bondage” and oppressive “iron furnace” (Deut. v. 6; iv. 20; 1 Kings viii. 51; Jer. xi. 4); but this earlier period has its counterpart here, not only retrospectively as regards the severity of the judgment and humiliation, but also prospectively as respects the abundance of gracious visitation, and the wonderful displays of the Divine power, love, and faithfulness. Both the humiliation and the glory present in the humiliation are revealed in these prophecies. The first or historical division of the book records chiefly the miracles by which the grace of God was magnified in those who remained faithful during years of apostasy, suffering, and banishment. The comfortless condition and utter degeneracy of the nation are seen principally in the second part, the visions and prophetic pictures of which describe the present and immediate future as a period of severe oppression, universal apostasy, and unquestioned supremacy of the world-powers arrayed against God, at the close of which period the Messianic era of salvation is finally introduced. According to this division the whole consists of two books—one of narratives (chap. i.–vi.), and the other of visions (chap. vii.–xii.)—which are about equal in length. This circumstance forms a marked peculiarity of Daniel, as compared with the other prophetic books of the Old Testament, which sometimes interweave the historical element with the prophetic (e.g., Amos, Isa., Jer., etc.), and at others, either reduce the former to narrow limits (e.g., Joel, Micah, Zechariah, etc.), or bring it into such prominence as to exclude the office of the seer (Jonah). This balance between narrative and prophecy, which exists only in Daniel, has its explanation in the * origin of the book in a strange land and in a time of exile—circumstances which forbade an arrangement in direct and perfect harmony with the form of prophetic literature in general. These circumstances also serve to account for peculiarities in the language of the book; for its composition, to the extent of about one-half in Hebrew, and the remainder (chap. ii. 4 b.-chap. vii.) in the Aramæan or Chaldee idiom, which gradually, and as a consequence of the Babylonian captivity and of the Persian supremacy, became the language of the Palestinian Jews, is due solely to its origin, not only in a time of exile, but among the scenes of the exile, and at the court of the barbarous conquerors. The historical book of Ezra, which appeared immediately at the close of the exile, is the only one of the Old-Testament Scriptures which shares this peculiarity of language, while the prophetic books (e.g., Jeremiah, which originated at the time of the exile and when its author was in constant intercourse with the Babylonians), merely contain isolated Aramæan words or paragraphs (see especially Jer. x. 11).

The peculiar literary traits and theological contents of this book, especially in its second or prophetic part, likewise find their explanation in its origin among the scenes of the captivity. The prophecies of Daniel, conveyed generally in the form of dreams and visions, and nowhere enforced by inspired addresses or exhortations, and concerning themselves chiefly, if not exclusively, with the fate of the all-controlling world-power, on the one hand, and, on the other, with the final triumph of the Messianic kingdom of God, are thus distinguished from the earlier prophetic writings by peculiarities which mark the book as the pattern for the so-called apocalyptic prophecies. In ordinary prophecies the people of God had usually occupied the foreground of vision, while the world-powers by which they were threatened, were only noticed incidentally, and made the objects of "burdens" or threatening prophecies, as isolated representatives of the spirit that opposes God. Daniel, on the contrary, takes his position in the heart of that world-power, which had overthrown and subjugated all the nations of the East, and among them the chosen race. From this point of vision he foretells the rise of a new world-kingdom, which shall destroy the present empire, to be followed, in turn, by another and still greater power, and so on to the end, when an eternal kingdom of truth and righteousness shall be established on their ruins, by the direct interference of the God of heaven. The result of all earthly development, and the succession of judgments visited on the enemies of God's people, closing with the Messianic or general judgment, form the subject of this prophecy; and the grandeur of its field of vision, compassing all history and embracing the world, together with the visional clothing of its teaching and the profound symbolism of its eschatological descriptions, constitute the features which stamp it as an apocalypse, in distinction from all earlier prophecy. Within the Old Testament, this form of prophetic writing is approached by the closing chapters of Ezekiel (xl.-xlviii.), but it is directly represented only in the former half of Zechariah (chap. i.-viii.), where the model found in Daniel was probably copied. In the New Testament it is found, if we except certain brief sections in the Gospels and Pauline epistles (the eschatological discourse in Matt. xxiv., xxv., and parallel passages, and 2 Thess. ii.), only in the Revelation of St. John, which is a direct copy and continuation of the prophecies of Daniel.

These peculiarities, as numerous as they are apparent and significant, explain why the book of Daniel was separated [in the Hebrew Bible] from the other prophets and placed among the Hagiographa, when the Old-Testament canon was formed. Its internal features, consisting in an embrace of all history with an eschatological aim, joined to a visional and symbolical dress, which stamp it as the model of all Biblical (and extra-Biblical or apocryphal) apocalypses, would not of themselves have compelled such a separation; since many of the later prophetic writings display clear transitions in matter and form to the field of apocalypses, and permit the distinction between this ripest fruit of Scriptural prophetic development and prophecy in the narrower sense, to appear as the result of the gradual growth. The decisive reason for the disposition made of this book, must be found in its peculiar division into historical and prophetic parts, and in its composition in Hebrew and Aramaic. This appears with irrefragable certainty from its assignment to a place immediately before Ezra, the only other book in the canon which frames in Chaldee a section of considerable extent between the Hebrew portions of its text.

An additional circumstance, which may have contributed to placing the present book among the Hagiographa, was the [presumed] revision of its prophetic portion, apparently by a pious seer of Maccabæan times, who sought to establish as exact a relation as was possible between the prophecy and its historical fulfillment, as observed by him. This later revision, which affected especially the contents of chapters x.-xii., will be considered below, in connection with the question of genuineness and integrity.

of wh. there is no proof but the criticism.

NOTE 1.—With reference to the circumstances of the times—so deplorable in their condition and yet so full of displays of Divine grace and wonderful providences—to which the book of Daniel owes its origin, Hävernicks, in the introduction to his commentary (page 16 et seq.), is especially thorough and instructive. He justly disputes the opinion of Winer, de Wette, Leo (Jüdische Geschichte, p. 183), and others, according to which the situation of the captive Jews was not one of especial hardship. "The shame there inflicted on Israel was not exactly insignificant, when it could inspire pious and faithful men with a holy revenge, and lead them to invoke the Divine indignation on their tormentors! Remember the 137th Psalm and the audacious desecration of the Temple vessels by Belshazzar, as Dan. v. records, which lead to the conclusion that such conduct was of frequent occurrence. Even martyrs to the truth, cheerful and undismayed while testifying that Jehovah alone is God and none beside Him, are revealed in the history of Daniel and his friends (Dan. iii. and vi.); to which event the observation and experience of the wise preacher perhaps refer, when he remarks that 'there is a just man that perisheth in his righteousness' (Ecc. vii. 15).^{*} When we consider the internal state of the nation in this period, we find further abundant reason for complaint, because of Israel's sin and misery. Ezekiel addressed the people with earnest censure, because they listened to his words, but refused to obey them, when he condemned their ways (Eze. xxxiii. 30, sq.), in which they dishonored God among the heathen, and continued to murder, work abomination, and violate chastity, until men asked, 'Are these the people of the Lord, that are gone forth out of His land?' (xxxiii. 26; xxxvi. 20, 21; cf. chap. xxxiv.). Where, indeed, could greater opportunity be found for indulgence in heathen customs by the Israelites, who were at all times excessively addicted to idolatry, than in Babylon, which was notorious as the home of luxury and idolatry? Hence, we must deplore the profound sense of sin, and of being forsaken by God, which is so clearly revealed, not only in the destruction of the temple, and the expulsion of Israel from the holy land, but also in the lack of prophecy (cf. Sam. ii. 9; Ps. lxxiv. 9); and which finds its most striking expression in the prayer of Daniel, uttered before the Lord in the name of the people, toward the end of the captivity.† A different class, who preferred the condition of the exile to the hairy garment of the prophet and the rigorous service of Jehovah, would doubtless enjoy their situation. If there were no other proof of this, it would appear from the fact that many preferred to remain in Babylon at the close of the exile. But the fate of these apostate souls, who, by the Divine decree, were at this exact juncture separated and cast out as dregs from the healthy and pious portion of the nation, was none the less deplorable on that account." . . . Further, page 20: "But the wretched and outcast nation was, and still continued to be, the people of His covenant, and, therefore, despite their low estate, the elect and favorite nation of the Lord. They were not merely to continue until the days of their great destiny were fulfilled, but, for Jehovah's sake, they were to be glorified among the heathen. As, therefore, He had always afforded them miraculous aid in seasons of great tribulation, so extraordinary signs and events, that transcended the ordinary course of nature, now occurred and secured the good of Israel while they alarmed the Gentiles; but at the same time these pointed forward, without exception, to the future realization of the great plan of salvation, whose end is the redemption of sinful man . . . Prophecies and wonders were the gracious means with which Jehovah overwhelmed Israel and compelled it to abide by Him, but through which, also, the determined apostates who would not turn to God, were finally cut out, so that a purified people, which agreed in confessing Israel's God at least in outward form, could return to the land of its fathers," etc.—This view of the time of Daniel and its significance, which is held by orthodox exegetes, with few exceptions (see particularly Auberlen, Der Prophet Daniel, etc., 2d ed., p. 26 et seq.) is rejected

* [These arguments of Hävernicks, however, are not in point to show the general oppression of the Jews in the latter portion of the Babylonian exile. The treatment of the three Hebrew children, and at times of Daniel himself, are only occasional and exceptional instances of Oriental despotism, when aroused by opposition to an arbitrary and universal edict, as the immunity and even honors following evince. The book of Esther contains an apt commentary on these capricious vicissitudes. The reference to the passage in Eccles. is particularly inapposite, as that book belongs to the Solomonic age.]

† [On the contrary it appears that the chastisement of Israel by the captivity, became, as it was intended to be, an effectual cure of outward idolatry. The very sight of the abominations practised by their heathen captors, seems, as in the case of similar close contact with polytheism in Egypt, to have thoroughly disgusted and warned them from all such tendencies. The prayer of Daniel, alluded to by the author, is only a general confession of the past sins of the nation, for which the exile, now drawing near its close, is recognized as the just penalty. The passages in Ezekiel have a much earlier date.]

by rationalists, inasmuch, as has already been remarked, they do not admit that Israel's condition during the captivity was especially deplorable and fallen, nor acknowledge the historical character of the narratives respecting the wonderful displays of Divine power and grace, which are recorded in this book. And yet another collection of prophecies, whose origin in the time of the exile and at Babylon is considered by rationalistic critics to be an incontrovertible fact, substantiates the view in question concerning the conditions of the time which underlie our book, in all its bearings, and in many respects, even in its smallest details. The second part of the prophet Isaiah—whether with the modern critics, we consider it as the “Pseudo-Isaiah” or “the exilian Isaiah,” or admit its genuineness and therewith its thoroughly prophetic character—describes the condition of the exiled nation in Babylon, as well as the striking contrast between their religious and national ruin and wickedness, and the miracles by which the grace of God was magnified in them, in precisely the same colors as does the book of Daniel, and therefore serves to establish the authenticity of the contents of this book in an impressive manner. Isaiah's lamentations because of the turning of many to idolatry (chap. xlvi. 6, etc.; lvii. 5, etc.; lx. 3, etc.); because of unrighteousness, wanton revelry, and violence (chap. lvi. 11; lviii. 2, etc.; lix. 3, etc.); because of the discouragement and lack of faith among even the best of the exiles (chap. lx. 27; xlix. 24; li. 12, etc.; xlv. 9, etc.) and on account of the rebellious disposition and insolent stubbornness of the masses (lxviii. 4, 8, 10; lxiii. 17; lxiv. 7, etc.)—all these merely recapitulate in detail what is briefly comprehended in Daniel's priestly confession and penitential prayer in the affecting language of bitter lamentation.* Furthermore, the manner in which the deutero-Isaiah refers to the marvellous power and majesty of Jehovah, as revealed in wonderful signs of every sort (chap. xlv. 6; xlv. 11), in multitudes of prophecies and promises that have been realized (chap. xli. 21 et seq.; xliii. 9 et seq.; xlv. 7 et seq.; xlv. 19, 21; xlv. 10; xlix. 3 et seq.), and in the humiliation and destruction of heathen idols and their worshippers, touches closely upon the corresponding descriptions in both parts of Daniel, the historical as well as the prophetic and symbolical (see especially chap. ii. 47; iii. 28; iv. 31 et seq.; vi. 27 et seq.; vii. 18 et seq.; ix. 24 et seq.). The relations of God's people to their heathen oppressors and their gods, on the one hand, and to their covenant God, Jehovah, and His displays of grace and promises of deliverance, on the other, are described by both prophets with substantially the same result; and there remains only this difference, that the mode of statement employed by Isaiah, accords with the older usage of spoken and written prophetic language, while Daniel illustrates the fate of kingdoms in the present and future from a decidedly apocalyptic point of view. The following note treats specifically of this important difference between our prophet and his earlier predecessors.

NOTE 2.—The relation of Daniel, as the original representative of Scriptural apocalypse, to the earlier prophets, is considered in an especially instructive manner by Auberlen (Der Prophet Daniel, etc., p. 2 sq.): “The prophets generally occupy an intro-Israelitish standpoint, from whence they view the future of God's kingdom. The congregation of His people constantly occupies the foreground with them, and the world-powers enter their range of vision only as they interfere in the present or immediate future of God's people. . . . The contrary holds with Daniel. Himself separated from the holy land and nation, and living and discharging duty as a high official at the Babylonian and Persian courts, he presents the development of the world-power at the outset as the chief object of his prophecies, and the kingdom of God is relegated significantly to the background. If the other prophets glance occasionally from their post in Zion to the south, the north, or the east, as one or another world-kingdom is presented to their vision, Daniel, from the heart of the world-power, overlooks its entire development, and not until his glance has penetrated through all its changing forms does he rest in Zion, recognizing her affliction and punishment, but also her triumph and exaltation. The prophecies of Daniel no longer relate merely to single and contemporaneous world-kingdoms of greater or less importance; but rather the period of universal monarchies has begun, which rise in succession to universal conquest, and in whose deportment the worldly principle that opposes the reign of God is revealed in steadily-increasing power and hostility. Intimately connected with this is the further peculiarity of Daniel, that his prophecies contain a much greater wealth of historical and political detail than those of all other prophets. While prophecy generally, viewing the near and the distant in perspective, is accustomed to regard the entire future from an eschatological point of view as the coming of the kingdom of God, Daniel, on the contrary, sees spread before him substantially the future history of the world which must transpire before the advent of the kingdom. Hence results the special form of prophecy which is peculiar to him alone. If this were in any case a history of the future, it would be with ~~so~~ him.” The idea, that the notice in detail of the several

features of progress in the future development of the world-power and its relations to God's people, is a final chief peculiarity of Daniel's prophecies, is based principally on the contents of chap. xi., which Auberlen regards as written throughout by Daniel and soon after the captivity. We believe ourselves warranted in holding a different view respecting this chapter, which is the chief support for the assumption of a continued series of the most special predictions, and therefore prefer to accept a revision in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, by a pious apocalyptic investigator. Hence we charge the thorough description of the kingdoms of the Seleucids down to that tyrant, to the account of the modifying agency of this interpolator. We are not led to this view, either by a preconceived opinion that the Spirit of prophecy is incapable of producing such special predictions, or by a one-sided reference to the analogy of the remaining prophetic books of the Old Testament, which contain no such detailed descriptions of the future; but the decisive circumstance which arouses our suspicion concerning the assumption that Dan. xi. is throughout and in all its details a proper prediction, and which even directly forbids it, is the fact that the Revelation of St. John, besides our book the only independent and more comprehensive production of the canonical apocalypse, everywhere presents only ideal pictures of the future. We admit that the prophet, borne by the Spirit of prophecy, would, at the point in question, receive many surprisingly exact disclosures respecting the future history of the God-opposed world-power and its hostility towards the people of God, because we regard Daniel, the "vir desideriorum" (chap. x. 11), as pre-eminent in zeal and successful effort, among the Old-Testament prophets who, according to 1 Pet. i. 11, searched "what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify." But precisely because he was only a searcher of the future and could be no more than this, we are compelled to reject everything that transforms his prophecy from a Divinely inspired picture of the future into a detailed and painfully exact history of the future, and we therefore charge this portion to the account of the reviser. Daniel is and remains for us a "prophetic light for the times devoid of revelation, during which Israel was given into the hands of the heathen," a "light that was designed to illumine the night of five hundred years from the Captivity to Christ and the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, for the understanding ones in Israel" (Auberlen, p. 80); but we cannot assume that the clear prophetic light which emanated from him was intended to penetrate to the smallest corners and most gloomy recesses of the history of God's people which was, for him, yet future.* But if we can assent to Auberlen's description of the canonical apocalypses as prophetic disclosures, intended to "serve the congregation of God's people as lights during the times of the Gentiles (Luke xxi. 24) in which there is no revelation," only on the condition that we conceive their light in an ideal sense, and as corresponding to the fundamental law in the Divine revelation of gradual and mediate disclosure, we are none the less compelled on the other hand to reject decidedly a special feature, admitted by Lücke, Hilgenfeld, and others, into their conception of the idea of apocalypse, a conception which otherwise conforms approximately to that of Auberlen. We refer to the idea of pseudonymity, concerning which Lücke (Einleitung in die Offenbarung Johannis und die sogenannte apokalyptische Literatur, 2d ed., p. 47 sq.) asserts that it is necessarily connected with the other two distinguishing features of apocalyptic prophecy, its eschatological, and its comprehensive character that covers all history, since only later writers who cunningly related the prophecies to the past and invented additions to the older prophets, were capable of such all-embracing vision. The one-sidedness and rashness of this assertion likewise appear from the mode of origin and the literary peculiarities of the Revelation by St. John, this most important and significant of apocalypses, against which no more unjust criticism can be offered than that of a pseudonymic origin; and not less from the notorious authenticity of the former half of the book of Zechariah (chap. i.-viii.), the remaining apocalyptic composition that has been admitted to the Old-Testament canon, and which may be regarded as the earliest imitation of Daniel. We can yield our assent to the charge of forgery as regards this form of writing, in so far only as it applies to the apocryphal apocalypses, and are therefore in accord with Hilgenfeld (Die jüdische Apokalyptik in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung, 1857, p. 5 sq.)—whose view diverges somewhat from that of Lücke—no further than as he excepts the Johannean apocalypse from the canon of Lücke, which stamps pseudonymity as the invariable mark of apocalyptic literature; but to this exception we add the two apocalypses of the canonical Old Testament.† For the more special consideration of the relations of

* [To those far removed from all influence of the prevalent rationalism of German criticism, the insidious tincture of which, notwithstanding the author's disclaimer, is evident in his conclusion on this point, the ascription of any portion of the book of Daniel to a later nameless writer on such purely subjective grounds, must appear altogether gratuitous. The business of the interpreter is, not to prescribe what God was likely to cause a prophet to predict, but to accept and expound accordingly what historical and substantial testimony has delivered to us as the actual words of prophecy. There is no more evidence of a pseudo-Daniel than of a pseudo-Isaiah.]

† [The inconsistency of the author's position here is palpable, if we correctly apprehend his somewhat involved statement of it. The Revelation of St. John, if not the apostle's, is of course under a fictitious name, and the 11th chapter of Daniel, if not that prophet's, is equally pseudonymical, whoever may be conceived as the interpolator. The distinction in this respect between a whole work and a part only is too nice to escape the odium of a "pious fraud."]

Daniel to the apocryphal and pseudepigraphical apocalypses, which were mainly framed on its model, see below, § 11.*

NOTE 3.—With respect to the Chaldaic idiom in Dan. ii.–vii., which we represented above as a principal reason for leading the framers of the canon to assign to Daniel a place among the Hagiographa, and in the immediate neighborhood of Ezra, we remark in general, (1.) that this dialect, which gradually became the current language of the Palestinian Jews, was the eastern-Aramæan or Babylonian, a purely Shemitic idiom, which, as the popular tongue of the Babylonians, must be carefully distinguished from the אַרְמֵיטָא mentioned in Dan. i.

4, the latter being the court language of Nebuchadnezzar and the Chaldaean dynasty, and comprehending numerous Aryan or Turanian elements. This follows from Dan. ii. 4; Isa. xxxvi. 11; and Ezra iv. 7, where documents and speeches in this dialect are designated as such by the term אַרְמֵיטָא (Luther [and English version]: "Syriac," rather Aramaic), while the "tongue of the Chaldeans" (לְכַשְׁדִּי) mentioned in Dan. i. 4 is not again referred to, and is clearly distinguished from the ordinary Aramæan language as a peculiar dialect, current among the warrior and priestly caste then dominant in Babylon (possibly identical with those perpetuated in the Assyrio-Babylonish cuneiform inscriptions) by the manner in which it is there introduced; for Daniel and his companions would hardly have been obliged to undergo a regular course of instruction in the common Aramæan or Babylonian language, as it should be called, instead of Chaldee, which is less exact. Compare below, on chapter i. 4. (2.) The Aramæan of chapters ii.–vii. includes numerous Hebraisms, as the Hebrew of the remaining chapters Chaldaizes many expressions; a circumstance that can hardly be explained, except on the supposition of an intermingling of both dialects in the popular language, which may have begun at the time of the frequent Assyrian invasions, at first among the ten tribes, and later gradually extended also to Judah, and to which the strongly Aramaizing Hebrew of the prophet Ezekiel, most intimately related to the Hebrew of Daniel, bears testimony. (3.) The co-existence of the Hebrew and Aramæan, as dialects spoken and understood by the people, is substantiated further by the circumstance that our author could venture to express most of his narratives and predictions in the latter tongue; a feature that is repeated only in the book of Ezra, which was written a century later, while Isaiah (nearly two hundred years before Daniel) admits no Aramaic expressions into his text in a passage which would have afforded a suitable opportunity (chap. xxxvi. 11; cf. 2 Kings xviii. 26), and even Jeremiah contents himself with employing a brief Aramaic sentence (Jer. x. 11; compare the use of single words in Aram. in earlier books, e.g., Gen. xxxi. 47; 2 Kings v. 12). (4.) The Aramaic idiom of Daniel corresponds closely to that of the book of Ezra and of Jer. x. 11, both in its grammatical and its lexical features. Its wealth of older words (e.g., מְשַׁרְפָּרָא instead of the later מְשַׁרְפָּר, עֲלֹהֵי for the later אֲעָלִי, מְחַלְחֵלִי for the later מְחַלְחֵל, etc.) and its general grammatical peculiarities (where the forms, לְחֹן, לְכֹן, instead of the apparently more ancient לְחִם, לְכִם, which are found in Ezra, form the only exceptions) create the impression of a much higher antiquity than is represented by the otherwise closely related Chaldee of the Targums, which were composed about the beginning of the Christian æra. (5.) Of the seven notorious Parseisms, or words derived from the Persian, which are found in the Aramaic portion of our book, only אֲזַדָּא occurs in the Targums, while it has two others (פִּזְזִי and פִּרְזִי) in common with the Chaldaizing Hebrew of the book of Esther and the Chaldee of Ezra, and a fourth (פִּזְזִי) occurs at least in the Chald. Ezra. There is thus in this respect also a more remarkable lingual relationship between Daniel and Ezra, than between them and the Chaldee Targums, and the position assigned to our book between Esther and Ezra on the forming of the canon, is fully justified by this consideration. We shall endeavor to show, in connection with the question of genuineness, that the weight of these lingual peculiarities, which point so decisively to the composition of this book during the period immediately preceding and following the captivity, is in no wise diminished by the occurrence in its Chaldee text of several phrases evidently derived from the Greek. We were only concerned in this connection, to show that the lingual peculiarities of the book formed a principal motive for its collocation with the Hagiographa, instead of its being placed in the series of prophetic books. Compare Hengstenberg, Die Authentie des Daniel, etc., p. 297 sq.; Hävernick, Einleitung ins A. T., II. 2, 482 et seq.; Zündel, Kritische Untersuchungen über die Abfassungszeit

* [Auberlen (Daniel and Revelation, Clarke's ed., p. 77 sq.) notices several other "materialistic differences between the Apocalypses of the Old and of the New Testament," growing more or less directly out of the different position occupied by the people of God at their respective times. Those who have insisted that the Antichrist of the one is necessarily the Antichrist of the other, have therefore interpreted the symbols as having precisely the same significance, have unduly overlooked these differences in the standpoint and design of the two prophets.]

des Buches Daniel, p. 239 et seq. Concerning its place after Esther and before Ezra, compare in addition, Delitzsch, Art. "Daniel," in Herzog's Real-Encycl., III. 272: "The book of Daniel stands between Esther and Ezra, because Esther, for a sufficient reason, is the last of the five Megilloth (festival volumes), and because the principal contents of Daniel belong to the time before Ezra and Nehemiah." Accordingly, this book was regarded as belonging among the historical Hagiographa (in view of its really historical character throughout the first half), and it was placed at the head of these books, because of its lingual relationship with Ezra, and also because of its pre-eminently holy and inspired character. This arrangement is not chronological, indeed, for in this respect the Chronicles should precede, and Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther follow in their order. But considerations of a different nature prevailed, on the whole, in the collocation of these final constituents of the Old-Testament canon. The following section will illustrate one of the leading considerations which enable us definitely to understand the position of this book, in connection with its remarks on the call of Daniel to the prophetic office.

§ 2. THE PERSONAL RELATIONS OF THE PROPHET.

The name Daniel (דָּנִיֵּאל, chap. i. 6; also defective, דְּנִיֵּאל in Ezek. xiv. 14, 20; xxviii. 8), which signifies "judge of God, judge who pronounces judgment in the name of God," * belongs to two persons besides our prophet in Old-Testament history, of whom one was a son of David (1 Chron. iii. 1), and the other a Levite of the house of Ithamar. The latter flourished but little later than our prophet, according to Ezra viii. 2; Neh. x. 7, and has, on that account, been identified with him by the Septuagint in the apocryphal additions to the book of Daniel, as well as by several recent critics. The difference in time is, however, too considerable to admit of this opinion; and the fact that among the contemporaries of the priest Daniel were found a Mishael (Neh. viii. 4), Hananiah, and Azariah (Neh. x. 3, 24), must be regarded as a mere accident, from which, in view of the notorious frequency of these names, the conclusion cannot be drawn, that the Daniel of our book, together with his three pious associates, are the creatures of a fictitious collocation and pre-dating of those persons, who lived almost a century later (compare the arguments against Bleek in note 1).

According to chapter i. 3, Daniel seems to have been of royal descent, and therefore born at Jerusalem. The passage in chapter ix. 24, however, will hardly serve in proof of this (Harenberg and other expositors), since Jerusalem might have been termed the "holy city" by Daniel, even if he belonged to any other city or tribe of the holy land. † He was, at any rate, of high birth, and, together with three other noble Jewish youths, was in early life transported to Babylon in the first deportation under Jehoiakim, in order to become a page at the Chaldean court. ‡ Here their Hebrew names were changed for others of Chaldean origin, and Hananiah received the name of Shadrach, Mishael that of Mesbach, and Azariah that of Abednego, while Daniel was known as Belteshazzar (בֵּלְשַׁצְצָר). This name, if explained solely according to the Shemitic analogy, seems to be synonymous with "Beli princeps," or "princeps, cui Belus favet" (בֵּלְשַׁצְצָר), and therefore likewise indicates the princely rank of Daniel. That he bore in addition the probably Persian name of Sheshbazzar, by which Zerubbabel was known at the court of Cyrus (Ezra i. 8), rests on an unsupported Rabbinical tradition, which is found in Rashi and several later writers, and which seems to have grown out of a false etymological interpretation of שֵׁשְׁבַצַר as = "who was in six-fold tribulation."

The instruction in the wisdom of the Chaldee magicians and in the manners of the court, which Daniel received in Babylon under the supervision of the chief eunuch, Ashpenaz, did

* So Gesenius and Dietrich, in the Handwörterbuch, explain, in connection with many older expositors, while Fürst interprets the name by "judge through God," and a majority render it "God is my judge" (e.g., Hävernick, with reference to Gen. xxx. 6), or also, "God is judge" (e.g., Reinke, Die massianischen Weissagungen, etc., iv. 1, 167).

† The Jewish tradition found in Pseudo-Epiphanius, De vit. prophet., c. 10, which locates the birth-place of Daniel in Βελσάβηρ τῇ ἀνωτέρῃ πλεονὶ Ἰερουσαλὴμ, or, by another reading (preferred by Beland, Palæst., p. 694), in Βελσάβηρ τῇ ἀνωτέρῃ, is of no historical value, and perhaps originated in the desire to place the birth of the prophet, who, on the authority of Ezra, viii. 2, was held to be a Levite, in a Levitical city (see Josh. xxi. 22).

‡ ["The history of that period, in Kings and Chronicles, seems to warrant the supposition that the Jewish lads in question were hostages, who were drawn from the upper classes of society at Jerusalem, in order to secure the quiet and submission of the Jewish king and his nobles in their tributary condition."—Stuart.]

not prevent him from observing the injunctions of the Mosaic law in regard to food and drink, with conscientious care, and from astonishing the officials who had him in charge by the almost miraculous effects produced in his appearance through this ascetic course, in which his three friends participated (chap. i. 8-10). But marked as were these effects of his piety, his fame was increased still further by the extraordinary proofs of his prudence, wisdom, and learning, which he manifested at an early period; especially in the interpretation of dreams, visions, etc. This extended his reputation beyond the bounds of Babylon before he had attained maturity, and must even have made his name proverbial among his countrymen at least, as designating a marvel of wisdom.* Only thus can we explain the fact that Ezekiel, his contemporary, although considerably older in years, refers to Daniel in several passages of his prophecies (which were brought to a close in B. C. 572, that is, about the middle of the captivity), as a model of pious wisdom, and in two instances classes him with Noah and Job, the great wise men of antiquity (Ezek. xiv. 14, 28; xxviii. 3; compare note 2).

That Daniel was not merely trained under the oversight of the chief eunuch, or chief palace official ("prince of the eunuchs") of Nebuchadnezzar, but also himself became a eunuch in the proper sense, and was trained in that capacity, is an ancient Jewish tradition, which appears to rest on a combination of Dan. i. 3 et seq. with the prophecy of Isaiah to Hezekiah (Isa. xxxix. 7, where כְּרִיסִים was held to designate actual eunuchs). It is, however, without any historical support, either in the book of Daniel itself, or in other Old-Testament records; and Ezek. xiv. 20 seems even to directly contradict this tradition, since it ascribes sons and daughters to him, as it does also to Noah and Job. But it could not be otherwise than welcome to the ascetically disposed Jews of later times, as well as to many church fathers and Roman Catholic expositors, to discover in Daniel a eunuch, even though an involuntary one, and an example of perpetual virginity. Hence the Targums report this tradition (on Esther iv. 5, in connection with the mention of Hatach, the Persian eunuch who was appointed to serve Esther), as do others of the more ancient rabbins (Pseudo-Epiphanius, Vita Prophet., c. 10, ἢ ἀνὴρ σώφρων ὥστε δοκεῖν τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις εἶναι σπάδοντα). Of later rabbins, e.g., Rashi ad Dan. i. 21 (but not Ibn-Ezra, ad Dan. i. 8); of church fathers, Origen (Hom. iv. in Ezek.), Jerome (Adv. Jovin. i. 1; Comm. in Jes. xxxix. 7; in Dan. i. 8), John Damascenus (De fide orthod. iv. 25); of later Roman Catholics, Cornelius à Lapide, Huetius, and others, hold to this tradition. [It is also strongly confirmed by the well-known usages of Oriental courts, in which eunuchs are admitted to privileges allowed to none others, especially in personal offices near the king. Haman, indeed, was not of this class in the book of Ezra, but Nehemiah was doubtless such in the Persian court. In the light of this circumstance, the dietetic regimen imposed upon Daniel and his three companions had a sanitary reason, and their voluntary temperance may actually have had a good effect during their period of convalescence after the operation. The reference to Daniel in Ezekiel does not so explicitly allude to children as to invalidate this conclusion, being merely an implication of kindred.]

After three years of training and instruction, in which early period the apocryphal narrative in the interpolated Daniel of the Septuagint places the celebrated decision in favor of Susannah, who was unjustly condemned to death, as an instance of the extraordinary wisdom of the youthful prophet, Daniel and his three companions entered on their duties at the court of Nebuchadnezzar. † Through the miraculous aid of the enlightening grace of God, he was enabled to interpret a remarkable dream of the king, in consequence of which he was promoted to the royal favor, as was Joseph at the court of Pharaoh, until he became the most influential official in the province of Babylonia, and chief of the caste of magians (chap. ii. 48 et seq.). He appears to have occupied this important position until the close of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, although the narrative of the persecution of Daniel's friends and fellow-worshippers, contained in chap. iii., and that of his interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's second dream and of the madness of that king, which is found in chap. iv., warrant the opinion that his glory was not without an occasional but transitory eclipse in the course of that protracted period. e?

† ["This custom of taking young men of the finest parts from a captive or subject race to fill responsible positions about the king has prevailed in many despotic governments, and is essentially the usage of the Turkish empire to this day. It finds its motives (1.) In the fact that such monarchs need men about them of the very first abilities; (2.) In the difficulty they would experience in getting young men of such ability among their own people, who might not, by virtue of their social position or connections, become dangerous to the throne."—Cowles.]

Under Belshazzar, the son and (possibly not immediate, but rather third or fourth) successor of Nebuchadnezzar, Daniel regained the royal favor and influential position of which he had been temporarily deprived. After having been entirely forgotten, he succeeded in interpreting an extraordinary appearance which had alarmed the king, but the prophetic meaning of which, relating to his approaching overthrow by the Persian world-power, none of the magians were able to reveal. The great honors with which Belshazzar rewarded him immediately before his fall (enrobing in purple, placing a chain of gold about his neck, and proclaiming him the third ruler in the kingdom) remained to him under the first Medo-Persian ruler, Darius the Mede (Cyaxeres). This monarch appointed him one of the three princes who were placed over all the one hundred and twenty governors of his kingdom; and he even thought to place him over his whole realm (as minister of state or grand-vizier) chap. vi. 1-4. For this reason, the other princes and governors, moved with envy, sought to destroy Daniel by bringing his steadfast adherence to the faith of his fathers into conflict with the established religion of Persia, or rather with an extraordinary decree of the king, which provided that during the space of one month the honor of Divine worship should be rendered only to him, the ruler of the kingdom. As Daniel persisted in the regular discharge of his religious duties, and, according to the custom of pious Jews, offered prayer at an open window, and with his face turned toward Jerusalem, three times in each day, he became subject to the fearful penalty imposed by the king, of being devoured by lions. The wondrous care of God, however, preserved him unharmed through the night which he spent in their den, and, in consequence, he rose still higher in the favor of the king, while his accusers were thrown into the den, and perished by the death they had designed for him. When Cyrus assumed the sole government over the Medo-Persian world-kingdom, after the two years' reign of Darius the Mede, the dignities and honors of Daniel were continued to him. He therefore survived the expiration of the Babylonian Captivity and the beginning of Israel's return to the holy land (see chap. i. 21), which ensued on the accession of that king, "the anointed of the Lord" (Isa. xlv. 1); and although the book of his prophecies records nothing of his agency in restoring his people to their land, his indirect influence was probably not unimportant. The closing series of his prophecies (chap. x.-xii.), which disclose the future history of Israel down to the erection of Messiah's kingdom on the ruins of the world-powers, testify that in spirit he cherished a warm sympathy for the physical and moral welfare of his people.

He died probably soon after receiving and recording these final revelations, which he himself places in the third year of the reign of Cyrus; but when, and under what circumstances, his death occurred is unknown. The attempts to state his circumstances at the close of life, together with the time and manner of his death, which are found in Jewish and Arabic authors, and also in church fathers, are based on empty traditions which are wholly without support. We class among these the statement of Josephus (Antiq. Jud. x. 11, 7) that Daniel immortalized himself as early as the reign of Darius the Mede by building a splendid royal castle of marble at Ecbatana, which was still standing and in the charge of a Jewish priest in the time of Josephus; * also the Jewish-oriental legend, perhaps derived from Dan. i. 21, and Ezra viii. 2, concerning his return to Palestine among the first exiles under Zerubbabel (D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient., p. 288); further, the statement of Pseudo-Epiphanius, that he died at Babylon and was buried in the royal tomb; the statement, perhaps, of later origin, but more widely circulated than the one last mentioned, which is held by Abdul-faraj and Benj. of Tudela, that he died in Shushan—a tradition upon which rests the still practised adoration of the reputed tomb of the prophet in that city, in which Jews and Christians are said to participate, as well as Moslems (see Ausland, 1853, p. 960); and finally the Romish tradition, which is to the effect that Daniel died as a martyr, and which commemorates him on the 21st of July (cf. Stadler and Heim, Vollst. Heiligen-Lexikon, vol. i., p. 722 ss.).

The above historical notices concerning Daniel show, that by reason of his relations to the Babylonian, and later to the Medo-Persian dynasties, as well as on account of his growth to maturity and continued dwelling and labors in a foreign land, he occupies an entirely exceptional position among the Old-Testament prophets—a position that makes it seem really doubtful whether the prophetic office was his proper and chief vocation. In any case, he appears as much a Chaldean wise man as an Israelitish prophet, and thus intervenes between the Old-Testament prophetism and the position of the Divinely enlightened seers among the nations that bordered on Israel, who were supernaturally chosen to be the bearers of Messianic prophecies, as in the case of Balaam in the time of Moses, and the Eastern magi on the threshold of New-Testament times. For this reason chiefly, it would seem, he was regarded by the framers of the canon as not belonging to the class of prophets in the narrower sense, but as more directly included among the writers of the Hagiographa (compare note 3).

NOTE 1.—Bleek, in Einleitung ins A. Test., 2d ed., p. 610, remarks with reference to the persons mentioned in Ezra viii. 2, and Neh. viii. 4; x. 3, 7, 24, under the names of Daniel, Mishaël, Hananiah, and Azariah: "This coincidence of names with those of the heroic believers represented in our book may be accidental, but nevertheless is remarkable, since it exists with reference to the entire four, and the names Daniel and Mishaël occur but rarely elsewhere. The time, indeed, in which the four contemporaries of Ezra and Nehemiah flourished is later than that of Daniel and his friends, as about 160 years elapsed between the third year of Jehoiakim and the reading of the book of the law by Ezra; but still, it is not unreasonable to suppose that the composer of this book (who, according to Bleek, lived and wrote in the time of the Maccabees, about B. C. 167) borrowed the names of his faithful heroes from those four men. We cannot tell whether a more intimate acquaintance with their history and experience in Babylon led him to select their names." (Similarly De Wette, Einleitung ins A. T., p. 360 et seq.) To us the supposition of Bleek seems about as vague a combination as the familiar attempts of Strauss to find in the names of Gospel history, Jacob, Joseph, Mary, and Elizabeth, mythical reproductions of the corresponding names in the primitive Scripture history, or to find the origin of the historical Lazarus in the Gospel of St. John, in the purely imaginary person of this name in the parabolical narrative found in Luke xvi. 19 et seq. (Leben Jesu, etc., 1864, p. 477 et seq.). The impossibility of identifying the four contemporaries of Ezra with our prophet and his friends appears from (1) the fact that, according to Dan. i. 21, which passage could not possibly have been known to the mythical writer, Daniel lived only to the beginning of the reign of Cyrus; (2) that the names Azariah, Daniel, and Hananiah, which are enumerated in Neh. x. 2-28, among the great number of names of leaders, priests, and Levites, who engaged to observe the law, became so unimportant and are so widely separated that only the most reckless arbitrariness or chance could associate them precisely as intimate companions, who filled a distinguished position at the royal court of Babylon as wise men and confessors; (3) that the name Mishaël (Neh. viii. 4), in the list of those who stood on the left hand of Ezra while he read the law, occupies a less isolated position; (4) that the identity of Daniel, of the sons of Ithamar, who is mentioned in Ezra viii. 2, with the priest or Levite of the same name, who is noticed in Neh. x. 7, is, at any rate, extremely doubtful, since their surroundings are wholly dissimilar; (5) that what is recorded in chap. i. and iii., particularly the report concerning the Babylonian names conferred on them (chap. i. 7) bears too thoroughly the stamp of historical reminiscence to admit of the hypothesis of a later invention, for the purpose of exalting those obscure names, which were almost forgotten among the number of names in the book of Nehemiah.

NOTE 2.—The three-fold reference of Ezekiel to Daniel has been regarded by many modern critics as irreconcilable with the historical existence of a magian and prophet of this name, since in two instances (chap. xiv. 14, 20) Ezekiel places Daniel between Noah and Job, and since he clearly seems to treat him as a personage belonging to the earliest antiquity in those passages as well as in chap. xxviii. 3. On this account, they have either questioned the genuineness of these passages in Ezekiel (e.g., Bernstein, in Tzschirner's Analekten, i. 3, p. 10), or given up the historical character of the exilic Daniel, and considered him a purely poetic invention like Job, or a wise man belonging to the patriarchal or primitive period of Israelitish history. The latter hypothesis especially has been received with favor, and has been variously developed by Bleek, Hitzig, Ewald, and Bunsen. According to Bleek (in Schleierm. u. Lücke's Theologischer Zeitschrift, III. 1822, p. 283 et seq., and in Einkl. ins A. T., p. 608 et seq.), we are not led by the manner in which he is mentioned to think of a person who shared in the Babylonian captivity with Ezekiel, but much rather, to conceive of a long-familiar personage of primitive times, who was historically connected with events in the experience of Israel, or, which is more probable, since we know no more concerning him, who was like Job, a mere product of the poetic fancy. From the manner in which Ezekiel refers to him, it is barely conceivable that he should have been, as the Daniel of our book is represented, a Jewish exile and contemporary with Ezekiel." De Wette (Einkl. ins A. T., p. 361) and Von Lengerke (Das Buch Daniel ausgeh., p. xciii. et seq.) likewise limit the choice to either a "man belonging to the gray antiquity" or to a purely imaginary personage. Hitzig, on the other hand, regards the Daniel of Ezek. xiv. as not, indeed, created by the writer, like Job, but still as the "child of tradition" like Noah and Melchizedek, and finds an intimate correspondence, amounting almost to identity, of our Daniel with the mysterious royal and priestly personage of the latter, who is assumed to be a junior contemporary of Noah—a relation which exists especially in respect of his name (דניאל, "divine judge," nearly synonymous with מלכיצדק, "king of righteousness." Kurzweil: ezeget. Handbuch zu Daniel, p. viii.). Ewald, again (Die Propheten des Alten Bundes, vol. II., Appendix, p. 562 et seq), considers the Daniel mentioned by Ezekiel as having been descended from one of the ten tribes, and as having lived and prophesied at the heathen court of Nineveh, a hundred years before the Babylonian Captivity. To this participator in the Assyrian captivity were attributed prophetic oracles respecting the world-kingdoms, by an unknown Jewish author of the times of Alexander the Great or the earliest Seleucids, which were modified by a later writer, in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, from whom they received their present form. Bunsen (Gott in der Geschichte, I. 514 et seq.) agrees in the main with the first part of this hypothesis. The historical Daniel lived at the royal court in Nineveh soon after the deportation of the Israelites by Shalmaneser; the fantastic representations of animals on the palaces of Nimrud and Khorsabad, which have become known to us through the researches of Botta and Layard, served as models for his visional descriptions of the world-kingdoms under the form of various imaginary animals, in chapters vii. and viii.; and the originator of the present book transformed the prophet of Nineveh by mistake into a Babylonian. Compare below, § 4, note 1. Two earlier opponents of the genuineness of this book, Bertholdt and Kirmss, endorse the opinion of Ewald and Bunsen, that Daniel was a real person of historical times; but instead of assigning this wise man, whom Ezekiel celebrates, to an earlier age, they make him the contemporary of that prophet, living at the court of Babylon. The author of this book, who belonged to a much later period, and derived his entire knowledge of Daniel from Ezekiel, merely clothed him in a mythical dress, etc. (Bertholdt, Daniel, etc., I. p. 7; Einkl. ins A. T., p. 1506; Kirmss, Commentatio historico-critica exhibens descriptionem et censuram recentiorum de Daniel libro opinionum, Jen. 1828, p. 59 et seq.); in like manner also Winer in the Realwörterb., Art. "Daniel" (I., p. 247).

The more recent defenders of the genuineness of Daniel's prophecies are in immediate correspondence with the arguments raised by these latter critics in support of the possibility of Daniel's contemporary existence with Ezekiel, despite the peculiar manner in which he is mentioned in Ezek. xiv. and xxviii. Hengstenberg especially (Die Authentie des Daniel, p. 70 et seq.) shows in a most discerning way that the chronological difficulty is of no importance, since Daniel must have been thirty years old when Ezekiel xiv. was composed, and since the rewards and honors conferred on him by Nebuchadnezzar must have been received at least ten years before that period; and further, that the book of Daniel itself (in such passages as chap. i. 17, 20; ii. 47; iv. 5; v. 11) testifies to the extraordinary and early-developed wisdom, by which this pious youth was distinguished, and with reference to which Ezekiel was already enabled to point the contemporary king of Tyre to him as a model of exalted wisdom and Divine illumination (chap. xxviii. 3). The position assigned to Daniel between Noah and Job in chapter xiv. 14 and 20, proves nothing whatever concerning his patriarchal age; rather, Job is placed at the end of the series because he was a less suitable example for the immediate purpose of Ezekiel, than Noah and Daniel, the preachers of righteousness in the midst of a godless world. In general agreement with this view of Hengstenberg are, Hävernick (Komm. zu Eszechiel, p. 206 et seq.; Neue Untersuchungen über Daniel, p. 23 et seq.; Einkl. ins A. T., ii. 2, 455), Kliefoth (Das Buch Ezechiel übersetzt und erklärt, p. 177 et seq.; and Das Buch Daniels, p. 31 et seq.), Delitzsch (in Herzog's Real-Encykl., s. v. Daniel), and Zündel (Krit. Untersuchungen, etc., p. 258 et seq.). These later apologists, however, justly declare Hengstenberg's explanation of the circumstance that Daniel is placed between Noah and Job to be inadequate, and therefore endeavor to find a more appropriate explanation of this fact, which at the first blush seems so strange. Hävernick and Kliefoth assume a climax: "Noah saved himself and his family; Daniel was still able to provide for his friends, chap.

ii. 17, 18; Job, despite his uprightness, could not even save his children." Delitzsch explains the arrangement of names by assuming that Ezekiel "mentions first a righteous man belonging to the ancient world, next, a righteous man belonging to the present world, and lastly, a righteous man who belongs to the ideal world;" for Job is "presented to the eyes of Israel as a righteous man only in the book of Job, which, although not without a historical basis, is not historical, but rather poetical and didactic." Finally, Zündel seeks to explain this arrangement of names by the observation, that Daniel occupied a "thoroughly analogous central and universal position among his contemporaries," so to speak, as a mediator between God and His people, by virtue of which, as formerly did Noah and Job, he presented his uprightness and piety before God, in a reconciling and atoning way, when His anger was aroused because of the sins of His people. None of these attempts at explanation are entirely satisfactory to us; but that of Delitzsch seems to be the most adequate and plausible, because the most simple and unconstrained. But may not euphonic considerations have contributed to the arrangement of the three names נח, דניאל, ואירב, in like manner as such considerations appear to have prevailed in other enumerations of proper names? e. g., of the three sons of Noah (Gen. vi. 9; ix. 18, etc.), among which Ham, although the youngest of the three, is always placed before Japheth; of the three daughters of Job (Job xlii. 14), etc. As examples of the neglect of chronological order in the enumeration of names, compare, in addition, Eccles., chap. xlix., where Josiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Zerubbabel, Joshua, and Nehemiah (vs. 16-20) are placed before Enoch, Joseph, Seth, Shem, and Adam; also Heb. xi. 32 (Gideon, Barak, Samson, Jephthah, David, Samuel); Jude v. 9 et seq. (Moses, Cain, Balaam, Korah, Enoch); Matt. xvi. 14 (John the Baptist, Elijah, Jeremiah). The last of these examples is especially instructive, since it shows that living persons might be classed with persons of similar character belonging to the earliest antiquity without any regard to chronological sequence. [The fact that Daniel is thus associated by Ezekiel, a nearly contemporary writer, with an undoubtedly historical personage, Noah, has always been held to be a strong proof of his actual existence. The same holds true of Job, as mentioned in the same connection. Compare James v. 11. Indeed, the introduction of a purely mythical name in such a matter-of-fact connection would be irrelevant and nugatory.]

NOTE 3.—On the peculiarity of the prophetic character of Daniel, as constituting a principal reason for referring this book among the Hagiographa, see Delitzsch, p. 272: "The book of Daniel was placed among the Hagiographa, because he was not a prophet by virtue of his office and calling, although, like David and Solomon, he possessed the gift of prophecy." Origen remarks correctly: "Non si quis prophetat, ideo propheta est. Ac profecto si quis propheta est, is quidem prophetat, sed vero qui prophetat, non continuo etiam est propheta." The genuineness of the book is therefore not compromised by its position among the Hagiographa.* Compare also Auberlen, Daniel, p. 80 et seq.: "We may also refer to his instruction in the wisdom of the Chaldean Magi; for the Holy Scriptures show that the mysterious knowledge and arts of the heathen were not an empty boast, e. g., in the case of the Egyptian sorcerers who opposed Moses. The wise men who were led by the star to seek after the new-born king of the Jews, were such Chaldean Magicians, which clearly shows that they were not deprived of all truth, and in connection with which we may even inquire whether a tradition may not have been transmitted among them which had emanated from Daniel, their chief, who had received such remarkable disclosures concerning this king of the Jews, reaching even to the time of his appearing? The circumstance, that in his youth he was instructed during three years in this wisdom of the Chaldeans, doubtless had the effect on the prophet himself, to develop the prophetic tendency which was natural to him, and to make him at home in these mysterious regions (chap. i. 4, 5, 17). It must have afforded him an education similar to that which Moses derived from his training at the Egyptian court, or that drawn by the modern theologian from the study of philosophy. He learned, however, nothing of importance from the Chaldeans, but rather soon excelled them all ten-fold in wisdom." Further, compare the same, page 34 et seq., where, conforming to the Rabbins, the isolated position of Daniel, the apocalypticist, among the other Old-Testament prophets, is explained and interpreted to mean that while he did not possess the רוח נביא or proper prophetic Spirit, he nevertheless partook of the רוח הקדש or "Holy Spirit," which was shared also by the remaining writers of the Hagiographa, for which reason his proper place was among this class, and not among the prophets. Compare also the definitions which are quoted in that connection from Witsius (Daniel was endowed with the gift of prophecy indeed, but not with the prophetic office); from Bengel (Daniel was "the politician, chronologer, and historian among the prophets"); and from M. Baumgarten (Daniel was "the official seer of Jehovah in the world-kingdom").—See infra, § 6, note 1.

* Kliefoth (Das Buch Daniels, p. 48) assents to this, and observes, that in addition to the fact that, "according to his office Daniel was not a prophet, but an officer of the state," "his book contained prophecies concerning the world-power," and further, that, "in view of its historical matter, his book is a historical document for the period during which Israel languished under the world-power of Babylon and Media."

§ 3 CONTENTS AND FORM OF DANIEL'S PROPHECIES.

The first or historical division (chap. i.-vi.) of the two which compose our book according to § 1, p. 1, has already, so far as its principal features are concerned, been analyzed in the preceding paragraph, which narrates the leading events of the prophet's life in exact chronological order. The second or prophetical division (chap. vii.-xii.) contains the prophetic elements of the book, but not so exclusively as not to interweave occasional historical and biographical notices with its predictions (see especially the mention of Daniel's illness, chap. viii. 27; of his fasting, mourning, and prayer, chap. ix. 1 et seq.; x. 2 et seq.; of his visions on the banks of the Tigris, chap. x. 4 et seq.; xii. 5). Nor are prophecies entirely wanting in the historical division; for besides the interpretation of the dream relating to the lycanthropy of Nebuchadnezzar (in chap. iv. 16-24), which is equivalent to an actual prophecy or special prophetical prediction, and also besides the interpretation of the mysterious writing on the wall of Belshazzar's banquet-hall, which likewise testifies to Daniel's prophetic endowments (chap. v. 17-28), the leading features of the narrative in chapter ii., relating to the interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's first dream by Daniel, form a prophecy of the specifically apocalyptic kind in their reference to the history of kingdoms and of the world. The great image composed of gold, silver, brass, iron, and clay, the so-called image of the monarchies, together with the stone that destroys it, which were seen by Nebuchadnezzar in his dream, and afterward by the prophet, in a night vision, were interpreted by Daniel by virtue of Divine inspiration, to signify a succession of world-kingdoms that should precede the kingdom of Messiah or of God, commencing with the reign of Nebuchadnezzar himself. The golden head of the image represented the existing kingdom of Nebuchadnezzar with its exalted power and greatness. Upon it should follow a second and inferior kingdom, and a third, that should bear rule over all the earth with the power and hardness of brass; afterwards a fourth, strong as iron, which should crush and destroy all things; and finally a divided kingdom, partly of iron and partly of clay, i. e., partly strong and partly brittle, which, though seeking to combine its several parts, should yet fail to develop into a united whole. In the time of this divided kingdom, God Himself would establish a kingdom on the earth, which, like the destroying stone, should overturn and crush all the world-kingdoms in order to flourish on their ruins forever (chap. ii. 37-45).*

* [Kell (Commentary on Daniel, Clarke's tr., p. 84) ingeniously traces the logical position of the chapters in this historical portion as follows. He regards chap. ii.-iii. as comprising, after the introductory chap. i., the first part of the book, containing "the development of the world-power," and remarks that "this part contains in six chapters as many reports regarding the successive forms and the natural character of the world-powers. It begins (chap. ii.) and ends (chap. vi.) with a revelation from God regarding its historical unfolding in four great world-kingdoms following each other, and their final overthrow by the kingdom of God, which shall continue for ever. Between these chapters (ii. and vi.) there are inserted four events belonging to the times of the first and second world-kingdoms, which partly reveal the attempts of the rulers of the world to compel the worshippers of the true God to pray to their idols and their gods, together with the failure of this attempt (chaps. iii. and vi.), and partly the humiliations of the rulers of the world, who were boastful of their power, under the judgments of God (chaps. iv. and v.), and bring under our consideration the relation of the rulers of this world to the Almighty God of heaven and earth and to the true fearers of His name. The narratives of these four events follow each other in chronological order, because they are in actual relation bound together, and therefore also the occurrences (chaps. v. and vi.) which belong to the time subsequent to the vision in chap. vii. are placed before this vision, so that the two revelations regarding the development of the world-power form the frame within which is contained the historical section which describes the character of that world-power." The second part of the entire book, as distributed by Kell (chap. viii.-xii.), is designated by him as "the development of the kingdom of God"—thus contrasted with the world power of the former section. This latter part Kell analyzes as follows: "This part contains three revelations which Daniel received during the reigns of Belshazzar, Darius the Mede, and Cyrus the Persian, regarding the development of the kingdom of God. After describing in the first part the development of the world-power and its relation to the people and kingdom of God from the days of Nebuchadnezzar, its founder, down to the time of its final destruction by the perfected kingdom of God, in this second part it is revealed to the prophet how the kingdom of God entered against the power and enmity of the rulers of the world, and amid severe oppressions, is carried forward to final victory, and is perfected. The first vision, chap. viii., represents what will happen to the people of God during the developments of the second and third world-kingdoms; the second revelation, chap. ix., gives to the prophet, in answer to his penitential prayer for the restoration of the ruined holy city and the desolated sanctuary, disclosures regarding the whole development of the kingdom of God, from the close of the Babylonian exile to the final accomplishment of God's plan of salvation. In the last vision, in the third year of Cyrus, chap. x.-xii., he received yet further and more special revelations regarding the severe persecutions which await the people of God for their purification, in the nearer future under Antiochus Epiphanes, and in the time of the end under the last foe, the Antichrist" (p. 263).]

This prophecy, which is interwoven with the first or historical part, is closely related to the first prediction of the prophetic part (chap. vii.), and indeed is identical with it in purport. This latter prophecy is also a dream-vision with a succeeding Divinely-disclosed interpretation, but revealed originally and solely to Daniel. The succession of the four world-kingdoms which began with that of Nebuchadnezzar, is in this instance represented by four beasts which rise in succession from the sea: a lion with eagle's wings and the heart of a man, a bear with three ribs in its ravenous jaws, a leopard with four wings and four heads, and a fourth terrible monster with iron teeth and ten horns, three of which were plucked up by the roots, and replaced by "another little horn" with human eyes and a mouth that spoke presumptuous blasphemies (chap. vii. 2-8). The fourth of these kingdoms is now described somewhat differently, and more particularly, as a fearful reign of tyranny, which devoured the earth and destroyed and ruined all things, and from which should proceed in succession = ? ten kings, who are symbolized by the ten horns. Three of these kings are to be superseded by the final monarch, who is represented by the "little horn," and whose madness and blasphemous presumption exceed that of all who have preceded him, so that he speaks blasphemy against the Highest, makes war upon the saints of God, and aims to set aside the law and the holy seasons. The sufferings of the people of God at the hands of this tyrant are limited to three and a half years, at the end of which Divine judgments shall be visited on him through one like the Son of man, who comes with the clouds of heaven, and to whom is committed an everlasting dominion over all nations.

The second prophecy of the second part (chap. viii.) also stands connected in its subject and purport with the image of the monarchies, whose middle and lower parts it develops and illustrates more fully. Under the figure of a contest between a ram and a he-goat, it describes the overthrow of the third by the fourth world-kingdom, together with succeeding events down to the Messianic judgment. A ram with two horns, of which the taller appeared last, pushes fiercely towards the four quarters of the earth, until a he-goat with a notable horn, coming from the west, smites him to the ground, and breaks his two horns. Next, the great horn of the victorious goat is broken, and replaced by four other notable ones, toward the four winds of heaven. Out of one of these comes forth a little horn, which increases mightily toward the south, the east, and Judæa, grows even to the host of heaven and its prince, desecrates the sanctuary, and interrupts the offering of the daily sacrifice during a period of 2,300 evenings and mornings (i.e. 1,150 days, or three and a half years), vers. 3-14. The angel Gabriel interprets this vision to the prophet, and applies it to the Medo-Persian empire, which should be overthrown by the fourth world-power, founded by the king of Græcia (Alexander the Great), and also to the four more important kingdoms of the Diadochi, which should arise out of the Greek world-monarchy, on the early death of its founder. One of these latter kingdoms (that of the Seleucidæ) should become especially hurtful to the people of God and His sanctuary, through the craft and audacity of one of its rulers, until finally the breaking of this offender "without hand," i. e., by the interference of a superior power should come to pass. [For a comparative table of all these prophecies see § 10, Note 3; and for a refutation of the "year-day" hypothesis on which the application of the fourth kingdom exclusively to Papal Rome rests, see § 10, Note 4.]

A third vision (chap. ix.) is vouchsafed to the prophet in connection with his meditating on the meaning of the seventy years, which Jeremiah had predicted should elapse before the rebuilding of Jerusalem. While addressing Jehovah in fervent penitential prayer, in connection with his meditations, and beseeching Him to forgive the sins of His people, and to turn away His fury from Jerusalem (vers. 3-19), the angel Gabriel discloses to him the meaning of Jeremiah's prophecy. The seventy years are to be understood as seventy weeks of years. Four hundred and ninety years were determined, in order to atone fully for the sins of the people, and to reanoint the Most Holy of His temple. The first seven of the seventy weeks of years were to include the period between the utterance of Jeremiah's prophecy and the "anointed prince" (Cyrus); in the course of the sixty-two weeks of years that should follow, the city (Jerusalem) was to be rebuilt, but in troublous times. The last, or seventieth, week of years should begin with the "cutting off of an anointed one," after which the people and their sanctuary were to be devastated by the armies of a tyrant, and the customary offering of the sacred sacrifices and oblations to be interrupted during the half of a week (evidently during the latter half of this final week of years), until, in the end, ruin should overtake the destroyer * (vers. 21-27).

The final vision (chaps. x.-xii.) contains the most thorough and detailed description of the developments of the future. After three weeks of fasting and mourning, an angel, whose clothing and appearance were wonderful (chap. x. 5-11), appeared to the prophet on the banks of the Tigris, and gave him an account of the contests which he was compelled to enter into with the "princes," or angelical protectors of Persia and Græcia, and in which he was aided only by Michael, the angel of God's people (chap. x. 12-xi. 1). To this account he added a representation, full of life and minute detail, of the immediate future, and extending to the time of the tyrannical oppressor of God's people, who has already been frequently described. In this connection he dwells especially upon the conflicts of the kings of a southern kingdom (Egypt) and a northern kingdom (Syria), which were to constitute the principal states that should arise from the ruins of the fourth (Greeks or Macedonian) world-power (chap. xi. 2-20), and more than all, on the insolent, audacious, and blasphemous deportment of the last king of the northern realm, who should ultimately come to a terrible end, after inflicting the most horrible abominations on the holy nation, their sacred city, and its sanctuary (chap. xi. 21-45). After unparalleled tribulation and affliction, deliverance and salvation should come to Daniel's nation, in connection with the resurrection of the dead, which should lead to the exaltation of the righteous, but consign the ungodly to everlasting punishment (chap. xii. 1-8). † After the angel has directed the prophet to seal the prophecy to the time of the end (ver. 4), he supplements it by a final revelation in regard to the duration of the period of severe affliction before the introduction of Messiah's kingdom, which is fixed at 1,290, or, conditionally, at 1,335 days (vs. 7-12). The whole closes with the counsel of the angel to the prophet, to wait patiently until the end of all things, and until his resurrection to eternal life.

The arrangement of the four prophecies of the second part is strictly chronological, so that the order of their succession is parallel with that of the actual events in Daniel's life, as recorded in the first part. The first vision appeared to him "in the first year of Belshazzar" the king, in the form of a dream, which he at once recorded in writing (chap. vii. 1); the second, in the third year of the same reign, "in the palace of Shushan, in the province of Elam, by the river of Ulai,"—where the prophet in his exaltation at least believed himself to be (chap. viii. 1, 2); the third, in the first year of the reign of Darius the Mede, hence soon after the overthrow of Belshazzar (chap. ix. 1, 2; cf. v. 30; vi. 1); and the fourth, "in the third year of Cyrus, king of Persia," on the 24th day of the first month, while the prophet was on the banks of the Tigris, after completing his fast of three weeks (chap. x. 1-4; cf. xii. 5, 6). The first vision is included in the Aramaic portion of the book; the three others, like chap. i. and the opening verses of chap. ii. (vers. 1-4a), are recorded in Hebrew.

In a formal point of view, the marked difference between the prophecies of the second part and those of the first is to be noticed, namely, that in the latter instance the interpretation of the wonderful and prophetic appearance of the vision in Nebuchadnezzar's dream (chap. ii.), and of the mysterious writing, Mene, Mene, Tekel, etc., at the banquet of Belshazzar (chap. v.), was imparted to the prophet immediately through the Divine Spirit, and without the agency of angels; while in each of the four prophecies of the second part angels are employed, either to reveal the purport of the visions seen by Daniel while awake or dreaming (as in the case of the first two, chap. vii. and viii.), or to convey direct disclosures relating to the future, without any previous symbolical vision (as with the final prophecies, chap. ix. and x.-xii.). The prophet, however, is the only narrator, even when he recapitulates (as is the case especially in chap. x. 20-xii. 4) the extended remarks of the angel, his celestial teachers and interpreters. The epistolary form of narration which occurs once in the first part, chap. iii. 31-iv.

* In support of this statement of the contents of chap. ix. 23-27, and especially of the verse last mentioned, compare the exegetical remarks on that passage. [For counter arguments, see the additions thereto.]

† [See, however, the exegetical remarks on this last particular.]

34 (but which is not rigidly adhered to in that connection, since Nebuchadnezzar, the writer of the letter under our notice, is referred to in the third person, in chap. iv. 25-30), is not found in the second part.

NOTE.—In opposition to the division of the contents of this book into historical and prophetic-visional parts, which we have adopted, Auberlen (p. 38), and in connection with him Keil (Einkl. ins A. T., 2d ed., p. 389 et seq.), and also Kranichfeld (Das Buch Daniel, p. 2 et seq.), contends that chap. vii. should be included in the first part. The reasons adduced by the last mentioned exegete, as "material" in contrast with ours as merely "formal," are, first, the prophetic-visional elements which enter also into the first part, and particularly into chap. ii., and secondly, the identity of language in chap. vii. with chapters ii.-v., which forbids a wider separation between chapters vi. and vii. as contrary to the intention of the author. But the visional constituents of the first part are extremely meagre when compared with the far greater proportion of the narrative elements in this division; and the chronological difference between chapters vi. and vii. is decidedly more important than the affinities of language between chap. vii. and the five chapters that precede it. The dream-vision recorded in chapter vii. dates back to the reign of Belshazzar, the last (or one of the last) of the Babylonian kings, while the historical contents of the preceding chapter belong to the Medo-Persian period; hence the time of chapter vii. and also of chap. viii. corresponds to that of chapter v., while chapter vi. is contemporary with chapter ix. Since the general arrangement, both of the pre-eminently historical chapters of the first part, and of the chiefly visional contents of the second, is strictly chronological, the distribution of the entire book into the categories of history and prophecy seems to have been the leading idea by which its editor (whom we regard as identical with its author) was governed, while the identity of language in chapter vii. and the preceding chapters sinks into a merely accidental feature. The following section may serve to show the most probable explanation of this feature. For the present, we are only concerned to show that the arrangement adopted by us, even if it were based more on a formal than a material principle, conforms fully to the idea and design of the writer, and is therefore with justice retained by a majority of modern expositors—even by Zündel (p. 39 et seq.), Reusch (Einkl. ins A. T., 3d ed., p. 109), and others.

§ 4. UNITY OF THE BOOK OF DANIEL.

The integrity of this book may be conclusively shown, despite the occasional attempts essayed by recent critics to represent it as a compilation of several historical and prophetic fragments of various origin; for, as has been shown in § 3, the contents of the two principal divisions form a harmonious and closely-connected whole, which must have emanated from a single author. This author is frequently designated as one and the same person—as Daniel—particularly in chap. vii. 1; xiii. 1; ix. 2; x. 1; xii. 4; and he is mentioned either in the third person (chap. vii. 1; x. 1) or in the first (chap. vii. 2 et seq.; x. 2 et seq.). The same interchange of the first and third persons is found elsewhere in writings of the Old Testament that have emanated from a single author, e.g., Isa. vii.; xxxvi.-xxxix., etc. The fact that Daniel is mentioned exclusively in the third person throughout the first six chapters is sufficiently explained by the historical and descriptive character of this first main division, which merely reports occasional expressions by Daniel, of greater or less extent (e.g., chap. ii. 15, 20, 28, 30; iv. 16 et seq.; v. 17 et seq.; vi. 22 et seq.), but generally represents other persons as speaking and acting. The absence from this part of the formula, "I, Daniel, saw," or "I, Daniel, said," could only hold as an argument against the unity of the book, in case other discrepancies and contradictions of importance existed between the contents of the two parts. Such contradictions, however, do not occur. It is not impossible to reconcile chapter i. 21 with chapter x. 1, or chapter vi. 1 with chapters ix. 1 and xi. 1, etc., as the exposition of those passages will show in detail. The historical part is rather connected with the prophetic in manifold relations, and their chronological parallelisms especially bear the marks of design on the part of the composer. The series of remarkable events in his life, which are first recorded, is designed as a historical introduction, or scaffolding, for the prophetic visions which follow. But within the historical part itself, chapter i. is intimately connected, as an introduction, with the five chapters that follow. Daniel's prophetic power and skill in interpreting dreams, are remarked in chap. i. 17, 20, evidently with reference to the tests to which they were to be exposed, chap. ii. 4, 5. The mention of the three friends in chap. i. 6 et seq.

paves the way for the narrative respecting their official stations and confessorship (chap. ii. 49; iii. 1 et seq.). The statement that Nebuchadnezzar removed the sacred vessels of the temple from Jerusalem is a preparation for the history of their desecration by Belshazzar (chap. ii. 5 et seq.).

Nor does the diversity of language, as between the Chaldee of chapters ii.-vii. and the Hebrew of the remaining chapters, involve a multiplicity of authors; for, aside from the fact that a transition from the Hebrew to the Chaldee, exactly similar to that in Dan. ii. 4, occurs in Ezra iv. 7, the idea of a variety of authors becomes impossible in view of the intimate relation of the Hebrew chapter i. to the succeeding Aramaic sections, which has just been noticed. The last (chap. vii.) of the Aramaic portions, again, is so closely connected in its leading features with the Hebrew sections that follow—and especially with chapter viii. which is introduced by the indication of time, in a manner entirely analogous to chap. vii. 1—that the discrepancy of language in this case also appears evidently as a feature of secondary importance. The contrast between the use of the Hebrew in the introductory and the five closing chapters, and of the Chaldee in chapters ii.-vii. can appear as other than accidental, only as the latter sections seem to have been reduced to writing at an earlier period than the former. They were probably recorded during the Chaldean supremacy or immediately afterward, whereas the Hebrew sections that enclose them were probably added at a considerably later date, and in the time of the Persian rule. This hypothesis (first assumed by Kranichfeld) of a gradual completion of the book, or of the framing of the Chaldean sections, which originated during the exile proper, between the Hebrew portions, chaps. i. 1-ii. 4 and viii.-xii., that date in the Persian period, is favored by the note in chap. i. 21, which implies the later composition of the introduction, but more especially by the circumstance that the Chaldee fragments, without exception, convey the impression that they were recorded in the style of chronicles, immediately after the events transpired to which they relate. They also seem to indicate that the author employed this language for such journalistic minutes, as being more familiar, in view of his culture (compare § 2), while he adopted the Hebrew at a later period, perhaps because he had in the meantime acquired a sufficient readiness in its use, or because the different circumstances of the times subsequent to the captivity might lead him to regard the sacred language of the law and the earlier prophets as more appropriate for his purpose of instructing and edifying his theocratic compatriots. We therefore assert the integrity of this book with reference to all its leading divisions, and as being the work of a single author; but in the closing section of the second part, in the especially detailed prophecies of chapters x.-xii., we detect the hand of a later interpolating reviser of the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, for reasons which have been generally indicated (§ 1, note 2), but the more detailed elaboration of which must be reserved for the exposition (see especially on chap. xi. vs. 5 and 40, etc.). Such interpolations are apparent more particularly in chapter xi. 5-39 (e.g., vs. 5, 6, 8, 14, 17, 18, 25, 27, 30-39).

NOTE 1.—J. D. Michaelis, Bertholdt, and Eichhorn (at least in the earlier editions of his Einleitung), among those who reject the integrity of this book, find a considerable number of independent compositions contained in it, which are said to have been written at different times and by various authors. Of such compositions Michaelis enumerates eight, Eichhorn ten (in vol. III. of his Hebräische Propheten, p. 428 et seq., at least five), and Bertholdt nine. The latter refers the first (chap. i.) of these "Danielana," as he calls them, to the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus; the second (chap. ii.) to that of Ptolemy Philadelphus; the third (chap. iii. 1-30) to a somewhat later date; the fourth (iii. 31-iv. 34) to the age of the first Asmonæans; the fifth, sixth, and seventh (chaps. v.-viii.) to the same period, under Antiochus Epiphanes; the eighth (chap. ix.) by a priest at Jerusalem, to a date but little later; and the ninth (chap. x.-xii.) to a still later time. The composers of the later sections are said generally to have known the earlier writers, and to have continued their work, in which effort they even imitated their predecessors in the use of single words and phrases. But despite their care numerous contradictions crept into the separate parts, so that, for instance, chap. i. 21 is opposed to x. 1; chap. i. 1, 5 to ii. 1; chap. ii. 48, 49 to v. 11-14, etc. (Bertholdt, Daniel i. 83 et seq.). The impropriety of such a mutilation of Scripture was soon understood, and was pointed out, with convincing arguments, especially by Bleek (in Schleiermacher's Theol. Zeitschrift, 1822, No. 3, p. 241 et seq.; compare his Einleitung ins A. T., p. 585 et seq.).

Hävernicks (Einl. II. 2, p. 448 et seq.), and De Wette (Einleitung in das A. T., § 256). Hence Eichhorn, in the third and fourth editions of his Einleitung, contented himself with the assumption of merely two authors, of whom the one composed chap. ii. 4-vi. 29, and the other, chap. vii-xii., together with the Hebrew introduction, chap. i. 1-ii. 3, in each case long after the captivity. The two-fold authorship is also asserted by Sack (Christl. Apologetik, 1829), Herbst (Histor.-krit. Einl., published by Welte, 1840 and later, ii. 2, § 34), F. Speil (Zur Echtheit des B. Daniel, in the Tüb. Theol. Quartal-Schrift, 1868, p. 194), Reusch (Einl., p. 110), and several others, inasmuch as they regard the visional part of the book, beginning with chap. vii., as genuine, but claim that the narrative of Daniel's life and of the circumstances of his time, contained in chap. i.-vi., was added by a later hand, and based upon a revision of certain genuine memoranda, which were left by the prophet at his death. Hence, we are to distinguish between genuine originals, written by the prophet himself, and a later compilation which belongs to the Maccabean period or to the age immediately preceding, and in which the author possessed the skill to imitate the prophet's mode of thought and expression, thus producing the impression of a united apocalyptic whole. Such an origin of the book cannot be branded as wholly impossible; but the impression of closely connected, systematic, and designed unity which it makes, in respect to both its form and matter, appears to favor the view stated above, by which the first and second editor constitute a single personage, identical with the prophet Daniel, and by which the whole appears as the work of one mind, despite its gradual production in the period immediately before and after the close of the exile (compare the following note).

Three additional hypotheses concerning the origin of the book deserve attention, which likewise proceed on the assumption of a two-fold authorship, or of a distinction between a genuine original and a later interpolating revision, but which differ greatly among themselves. According to the editor [Lange] of this Bible-work (Einl. in das A. T., in the remarks preliminary to the exposition of Genesis, vol. I., p. 88 [of the Am. ed.]), the book, which otherwise originated entirely with the captive prophet Daniel, received two extensive additions in its final sections, at the hands of an apocalypticist of the Maccabean period, who was led to make these interpolations in view of the severe trials of the time. These additions comprise chap. x. 1-xi. 44, and xii. 5-18; hence the predictions which relate specially to Antiochus Epiphanes and his time, and which bear pre-eminently the stamp of vaticinia ex eventu. The professed interpolation of 2 Pet. i. 20-iii. 8 from the epistle of Jude, which the editor has endeavored to establish, in vol. I. of his Geschichte des apostolischen Zeitalters (p. 152 et seq.), more thoroughly than this asserted addition to Daniel, is adduced as an analogous instance; but it does not seem to be sufficiently demonstrated, despite the manifold advantages it would afford to the apologist. We are obliged to prefer the view of a mere interpolating revision of chapters x.-xii. by a pious apocalypticist of the Asmonæan period, and to hold to the probable insertion of several brief passages, which cannot in our day be clearly distinguished, instead of accepting the introduction of the lengthy section, chap. x. 1-xi. 44, together with that in chap. xii. 5-18. A later inventor of the entire prophetic imagery of chapters x. and xi. would display an incredible talent in his imitations of the prophet's literary style. Moreover, the writer of Ecclesiasticus (about B. C. 180) seems to have recognized passages like chap. x. 13, 20, as original with Daniel, and to have imitated them as such; also the Septuagint. See below § 6, note 2, and compare the exegesis of the chapters in question.* The view of Ewald (Die Propheten des A. Bds., 1st ed., II. 562 et seq.) is peculiar. According to him, the prophet Daniel lived at the heathen court of Nineveh as early as the Assyrian captivity, about B. C. 700. A Jewish contemporary of Alexander the Great invented prophecies relating to the world-kings, and attributed them to this wise man of the Assyrian period, while another Jew, living in the time of the Maccabees, added further embellishments to the book as he found it. Somewhat more definite and thoughtful is Bunsen (Gott in der Geschichte, I. 514 et seq.). The Daniel of Assyrian times, who lived at Nineveh under Pul and Sargon, about the middle of the 8th century B. C., left behind him figurative prophecies concerning the destruction of Asshur (the winged lion) by the Babylonian empire (a devouring bear; cf. chap. vii. 2 et seq.); these ancient oracles, together with legendary records concerning the personal fortunes of Daniel, and particularly his deliverance from the den of lions, were transmitted, either verbally or in writing, until a writer of the Maccabean period gave them their present form, in connection with which work, however, he committed the grave historical error of transferring the prophet to the period of the Babylonian captivity, and of substituting the Babylonian monarchy for the Assyrian, and the Medo-Persian for the original Babylonian (cf. above, § 2, note 2). Neither Ewald nor Bunsen are able to furnish any positive proof in support of these strained, artificial, and fantastic views. The assertion that the later Jewish writers constantly substituted Babylon for Asshur is entirely arbitrary and incapable of proof; and the removal of Daniel to "the great river which is Hiddekel" can no more be considered a mere echo of the history of Daniel in Nineveh, than the imaginary winged creatures with human visages

can be regarded as dark allusions to the colossal statues on the palaces of Nimrud. In our exposition of the related passages we will aim to show that both these features may be adequately explained on the assumption of a Babylonian career in the case of the prophet. Bunsen, however, appears to have subsequently given up his arbitrary view, in favor of the general pseudo-Daniel tendency-hypothesis (see the prefaces in vol. I. of his Bibelwerk, p. liv.); while the view of Ewald appears unchanged in the recent 2d edition of his Propheten des Alten Bundes (vol. III. p. 812 et seq.).

NOTE 2.—In support of the opinion laid down in this section, that the book was composed at different times by Daniel himself, compare Kranichfeld, Das Buch Daniel (Einl., p. 4): "For the rest, the Chaldee fragments in their present state, without an incorporated introduction and conclusion, cannot in themselves have formed a separate work. Their formal and abrupt character produces rather the impression of an occasional composition in the manner of a diary, which was undertaken at different times, and perhaps in connection with corresponding events of the exile in the Chaldean period, while the conception of the Hebrew introduction may have fallen, agreeably to the remark in chap. i. 21, in the time of the Persian supremacy. Presuming the genuineness of the book, the overthrow of both the Chaldean and the Persian dynasties in Babylon would therefore have occurred between the composition of the several Chaldee fragments and that of the Hebrew section, chap. i. 1–ii. 4; and a very different condition of affairs, having an especial significance for Israel, would meanwhile have been introduced. This would also be sufficient to account for the choice of the Hebrew dress of chapters viii.–xii., and, in general, to establish their subsequent composition, which is now more than ever a question of interest." Compare the same writer, p. 53 et seq.: "The composition of the Chaldee fragments accordingly belonged to a time in which the heathen oppressors as such, and the measures of the heathen tyranny, were everywhere prominent; and it is natural that a theocratical writer of this period should fix his gaze on these features, and clothe his narrative in a form likely to be effective among the Chaldean population, and serviceable to oppose their hostile and insolent measures, as well as that he should attempt this in the Chaldean language, which was current among the oppressors." With the close of the exile a new range of vision opened before the theocrat. The oppressive tyranny which was before his leading thought, is no longer prominent in that character; the hitherto passive people of the theocracy is now roused to a more active concern for its national interests. Appropriate as was the Chaldee tongue before the dawning of the new period, the language of his people and of the fathers, which the writer employs, in common with the prophets after the exile, to convey his supplemental and additional matter, is no less appropriate after that period has begun. With his attention fixed upon his people, the prophet now gave its final and united form to his book, during the first year of the sole reign of Cyrus, as has been noticed above. The Chaldee portions, which were composed during the captivity, and whose form was due to that circumstance, received their place in the book in connection with this final revision; and there was no reason why the existing Chaldee material should be rendered into Hebrew for the benefit of his compatriots, who were familiar with the language of Babylon, especially as the Chaldee dress itself contributed not a little to the vivid representation of the circumstances described."

We accept, in all its essential features, this hypothesis respecting the composition of our book as being highly probable and attractive;† but instead of finding in a designed reference to the Chaldean oppressors the motive which induced the prophet to compose in Aramaic the portions (chap. ii.–vii.) belonging to the exile, we would adopt the more simple and natural view, that during that period he was accustomed to employ the Chaldee tongue, with which he was chiefly familiar; and that, in his written productions especially, he availed himself of its use, to the exclusion of all others. This does not involve the admission that he may not already at that time have acquired, by means of reading and study, that marked familiarity with the sacred language and literature of his people, which chap. i. 17, 20 (cf. with i. 4) seem to imply. In this connection we would also venture the supposition with respect to the "occasional journalizing notes" of events belonging to the Chaldean (and Median) period, as found in chap. ii.–vii., that Daniel employed with design the chronicling style of the older

* [On the contrary, such a state of oppression, if it existed at the time (of which there is no evidence), would have rendered the foreign tongue odious, and therefore been the strongest possible reason for avoiding it. Such was certainly the effect at a later date, when Antiochus sought to introduce the Greek language and customs. In the Roman period, too, we know that the comparatively mild rule of the conquerors made the Jews only cling the more tenaciously to "the sacred tongue," at least for all their religious works.]

† [We beg leave, however, to dissent almost entirely from Kranichfeld's views on this head. A far more natural and sufficient reason for the insertion of the Chaldee portions of the book is found in the fact, stated or implied in their respective contents, that they were extracts, taken verbatim and as such from the Babylonian state records. The supposition that the whole book was originally written in Chaldee, and these parts alone left untranslated, is destitute of a particle of confirmation, either in the narrative, the style of the composition, or the usage of the contemporary Jewish writers. Especially the insinuation that Daniel was so ignorant of his mother tongue, that he was obliged to learn it in mature life by a slow and imperfect process, as the author a few sentences further on presumes, is contrary to all the probabilities in the case.]

prophets, which regarded all the facts to be related from a strictly theocratical point of view, and by which their supernatural features were rather intensified and idealized, than simplified and reduced to sober events of common occurrence. Compare § 9, Note 1.

§ 5. AUTHENTICITY OF THE BOOK.

a. Review of the Attacks on, and Defence of, its Genuineness.

The most ancient assailant of the genuineness of Daniel's prophecies of whom we have a certain knowledge, was the Neo-platonic Porphyry (died A. D. 304). In his fifteen books "against the Christians," which are known to us only through Jerome so far as they contain attacks on this book, he contends for its composition in Maccabæan times, and for the forged character of its prophecies as mere vaticinia ex eventu.^{*} It is uncertain whether Jewish rabbins who opposed Christianity were his predecessors and instructors in this assertion, or not. A passage in the Talmud, which attributes the "recording" of several books of the Old Testament, and among them Daniel, to the members of the Great Synagogue beginning with Ezra,† affords no support to the opinion that the authenticity of the book was denied in pre-Christian times in Jewish circles, since that "recording" is doubtless not to be understood in the sense of an original composition, but rather as a renewed recording on the authority of an exact tradition, or rather, of a new inspiration. The entire statement is, therefore, merely an empty legend of the sort which is represented by the Jewish tales concerning the marvellous reproduction of the Pentateuch by Ezra, the origin of the Septuagint, etc. The statement of Isidore of Seville (died A. D. 636) that "Ezekiel and Daniel are said to have been written by certain wise men"‡ points back to the same muddy Jewish-rabbinical source. The "wise men" in this case can scarcely be other than the men of the Great Synagogue, and their "writing" of the books of Ezekiel and Daniel cannot designate a forgery in any sense, but must be explained as in the Talmudic tradition referred to. In short, the older period exhibits no definite instance of the rejection of the authenticity of this prophetic book beyond the solitary one of Porphyry; and only the immediate opponents of this writer, as Methodius, Eusebius of Cæsarea, Apollinaris of Laodicea, or church fathers of the age next following, were engaged in the defense of the genuineness of the book, while refuting his objections.

In the 17th century the opponents of its genuineness became somewhat more numerous, but their objections were at first without any scientific value. Spinoza (Tractat. theol.-polit., x. 130 et seq.) held, that only chap. viii.-xii. were genuine; chap. i.-vii. might originally have formed component parts of the annals of the Chaldean reigns, which, together with the final five chapters, were probably collected and published by a later hand. Hobbes (Leviathan, c. 88) doubted whether Daniel himself or a subsequent writer had recorded his prophecies. Sir Isaac Newton (Observations upon the prophecies of Daniel and the Apocalypse of St. John, I. p. 10), whose view was followed, in the main, by Beausobre (Remarques sur le N. Test., I. p. 70), thought that "the last six chapters contained prophecies composed at various times by Daniel himself, while the six former ones were a collection of historical essays by other authors." By this, however, he did not intend to attack the credibility or the inspired character of the book; on the contrary, he declared solemnly that "whoever rejects the prophecies of Daniel, does as much as if he undermined the Christian religion, which, so to speak, is founded on Daniel's prophecies of Christ." If he regarded the first six chapters as not the work of Daniel, it was not because he objected to the wonders recorded in them, as Zündel thinks (Kritische Untersuchungen, etc., p. 2), but because he believed that their mode of presentation indicated one or several authors other than Daniel. It was different, however, with Collins, the deisti-cal contemporary of Newton, and with the somewhat older Jewish atheist Uriel Acosta (about A. D. 1630), who denied the credibility of the book together with its genuineness, but with a bungling criticism that is wholly involved in the prejudices of naturalistic dogmatism.*

Among the representatives of German rationalism, Semler contended himself with a very general denial of the inspiration of the book of Daniel, for the reason that he "could discover no such benefit in it as God always designs to secure to man when he employs very peculiar means for that end" (Freie Untersuchung des Kanon, III. 505). Michaelis and Eichhorn, while contesting the integrity of the book (see above § 4, note 1), endeavored to establish the genuineness of at least the last chapters. Eichhorn did not venture to assert the Maccabean origin of the whole book (in the 3d and 4th ed. of his Einleitung), and consequently its forged character, until Corrodi had declared it to be wholly the work of an impostor of the times of Antiochus Epiphanes, † in his Freimüthigen Versuchen über verschiedene in Theologie und bibl. Kritik einschlagende Gegenstände. Bertholdt now followed with his super-ingenuous mutilating hypothesis, which was wholly based on the assumption of forgery (cf. supra), and later, Griesinger, Gesenius, De Wette, Kirman, Redepenning, Von Lengerke, Knobel, Hitzig, Stähelin, Hilgenfeld, and others. ‡ The greatest scientific ability and judgment in contesting the authenticity of this book, but, at the same time, in breaking the force of the assaults on its integrity, made by Bertholdt and Eichhorn, was displayed by Bleek. § The more recent deniers of the genuineness of the book, with but few exceptions, agree with him in giving up its historical character to a greater or less extent, and in assigning it to the Maccabean period, and regarding its prophecies as catcinia ex eventu—hence, in holding essentially the same critical position which was occupied by Porphyry. The grounds on which their assertions are based are partly internal and partly external in their nature. They are drawn in part from the place of the book in the canon and its relation to the later Jewish apocryphal literature, and in part from its peculiarities of language, the asserted mythical character of its historical part, the chronological difficulties which it is said to present, and the apocalyptic character of its prophecies. In the following section we shall engage in a more detailed examination of these arguments, and in that connection find opportunity to become acquainted with the substantial and enduring services of the more recent defenders of the genuineness of the book. Among them belong, of Protestants, Lüdewald, Stäudlin, Beckhaus, Hengstenberg, Hävernick, Keil, Auferlen, Delitzsch, Zündel, Volck, Kranichfeld, Pusey, Fuller, and others; of Roman Catholics, Jahn, Hug, Herbst, Scholz, Speil, Reusch, and others. |

Among the external grounds on which opponents are accustomed to contest the origin of the book with Daniel, its position among the Hagiographa, in the third and last part of the Hebrew canon, generally forms their chief reliance. That this fact, so suspicious at first sight, is by no means inexplicable, but rather has its adequate explanation in the peculiar prophetic character of Daniel and his writings, as well as in the composition of the book, partly in Hebrew and partly in Chaldee, has already been shown (§ 1, particularly notes 2 and 3, and also § 2, note 3). We confine ourselves in this place to the suggestion that possibly the times of severe trial and of conflict with anti-Christian powers, which the prophet of the exile foretold to his people, might seem to the scribes of the centuries succeeding the captivity to present too great a contrast to the subjects of the other prophets, who dwelt chiefly on the prospects of deliverance that should come to the people of God; and that, consequently, they hesitated to acknowledge the full canonical value of this book,—in like manner as they questioned the canonical authority of Ecclesiastes during an extended period, through the influence of their optimistic hopes for the future (compare note 1). The book, however, is classed with the other three greater prophets in the Septuagint; but the conclusion that it originally occupied this position in the Hebrew Bible as well (so Herbst, Speil, and others contend) does not necessarily follow. Rather, the framers of the Hebrew canon seem to have attached greater importance to the literary and lingual peculiarities of the book than to anything else, and, for this reason, to have regarded its separation from the prophetic literature in the narrower sense, as necessary, however much they might recognize in it the genuine work of a prophet living under the exile.*

That the book was in fact so recognized appears highly probable, in view of the manifold references to its declarations in the later prophetic writings and in several of the Old-Testament apocrypha. Among the prophets after the captivity, whose reference to Daniel is utterly denied by Bleek, Zechariah at least seems to betray an acquaintance with the prophecies of Daniel, his apocalyptic model and predecessor, particularly in the vision of the four horns (chap. ii. 1), and in that of the four chariots (chap. vi. 1), which are referred by several expositors to the four world-kings of Daniel; further, in chap. xi. 8, where the three x { shepherds, who should be cut off in one month by the Lord, are possibly a symbolizing of the first three world-kings of Daniel, and of their overthrow in rapid succession (compare on the authenticity of the book of Daniel, Cambridge, 1864. J. Jahn, Eintl. ins A. Test., II. 624 et seq.; L. Hug, Zeitschrift für das Erzbisthum Freiburg, VI. 150; Herbst, Eintl. mit Zusatz by Welte, II. 2, p. 80 et seq.; Scholz, Eintl. III. 433 et seq.; Speil, De libri Danielis authenticis, Oppolli, 1860, and Zur Echtheit des B. Daniel, in the Tüb. Theol. Quartalschrift, 1863, p. 191 et seq.; Reusch, Eintl., 3d ed., p. 111 et seq.

* [We may remark here, once for all, that a simpler reason for the position of Daniel among the Hagiographa rather than among the Propheta, seems to be the fact that the author was not a prophet in the strictly technical sense of the term; i.e., like John the Baptist (John x. 41), he wrought no miracles, and his predictions were not directly inspired, but only given mediately through angels or dreams, like those of Joseph (Gen. xli. 15, 16). Kell thus expresses it: "The place occupied by this book in the Hebrew canon perfectly corresponds with the place of Daniel in the theocracy. Daniel did not labor, as the rest of the prophets did whose writings form the class of the Nebiyin, as a prophet among his people in the congregation of Israel, but he was a minister of state under the Chaldean and Medo-Persian world-rulers. Although, like David and Solomon, he possessed the gift of prophecy, and therefore was called נָבִיא (Sept. Josephus, N. T.), yet he was not a נָבִיא, i.e., a prophet in his official position and standing. Therefore his book, in its contents and form, is different from the writings of the Nebiyin. His prophecies are not prophetic discourses addressed to Israel or the nations, but visions, in which the development of the world-kings and their relation to the kingdom of God are unveiled, and the historical part of his book describes events of the time when Israel went into captivity among the heathen. For these reasons his book is not placed in the class of the Nebiyin, which reaches from Joshua to Malachi,—for these, according to the view of him who arranged the canon, are wholly the writings of such as held the prophetic office, i.e., the office requiring them openly, by word of mouth and by writing, to announce the word of God,—but in the class of the Ketubim, which comprehends sacred writings of different kinds, whose common character consists in this, that their authors did not fill the prophetic office, as, e.g., Jonah in the theocracy; which is confirmed by the fact that the Lamentations of Jeremiah are comprehended in this class, since Jeremiah uttered these Lamentations over the destruction of Jerusalem and Judah not as a prophet but as a member of that nation which was chastened by the Lord" (Commentary on Dan., Intro., p. 22, 3d, Edinb. ed.).]

note 2). Among the Apocrypha—aside from uncertain analogies, such as exist between Wisd. v. 17 and Dan. vii. 18, 27; Wisd. xiv. 16 and Dan. iii.—at least 1 Macc. i. 57 (“Abomination of desolation,” cf. Dan. ix. 27) and ii. 59 et seq. (the deliverance of Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah from the fiery furnace, and of Daniel from the lion’s den; cf. Dan. iii. 16 et seq.; vi. 21 et seq.), and still more the book of Baruch, may be regarded as unquestionable witnesses for the canonical dignity of our book in pre-Maccabean times. The analogies to the prayer of Daniel (Dan. ix.), which the latter book presents in chap. ii. (especially vs. 6, 11, 15, 19), and its references to Nebuchadnezzar and to “Belshazzar his son,” in chap. i. 11, 12, are the more important and unquestionable as proof, because the Hebrew original, which we are compelled to receive, indicates with tolerable certainty the origin of this book in pre-Maccabean times, and probably as early as the fourth century B. C. Under these circumstances, the fact that Ecclesiasticus, whose Hebrew original likewise indicates its composition before the period of the Maccabees, contains no definite allusions to Daniel, and especially that his name is not mentioned in its enumeration (chap. xlix.) of Israel’s great religious heroes, which includes Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets, is of no considerable importance. This feature may be regarded as purely accidental, and the rather, as the immediate context (chap. xlix. 13 et seq.) mentions Zerubbabel, Joshua, and Nehemiah among the great men of the time immediately after the exile, but omits the name of Ezra; as many of the prominent champions of Israel are not included in the remarkable list beginning with chap. xlv., a.g., Joseph, Gideon, Samson, Jehoshaphat, etc.; and finally, as the silence of Ecclus. in regard to Daniel “is more than balanced by his mention in Ezek. xiv. and xxviii.” (Reusch, p. 112; cf. supra, § 2, note 2). Moreover, the words ἐκείνη ἔνευ κατίστησεν ἡγουμένων in Ecclus. xvii. 17 probably contain an allusion to the angelology of Daniel, and are to be explained in accordance with Dan. x. 18, 20; xii. 1 (Hävernick, Einl. II 2, p. 451). Concerning the Sybilline Oracles as an especially important source of proofs for the authenticity of Daniel, see note 3.

The passage in the Jewish Antiquities of Josephus, Book XI. chap. 8, which relates that, among others, the prophecies of Daniel were shown by the Jewish priests to Alexander the Great, on the occasion of his visit to Jerusalem, and that he was greatly pleased by the oracle respecting the overthrow of the Persian dynasty, which so clearly referred to him, might constitute an important testimony for the genuineness of this book, or for its origin during the exile; but many embellishments and internal improbabilities seem to lower the value of this tradition to a degree that forbids the definite conclusion that the statement concerning the book of Daniel is to be included in the genuine historical kernel of this incident, the essential truth of which, however, is indicated by various considerations (a.g. the noteworthy and certainly historical statement that, at the request of the high-priest, Alexander granted immunity from taxation to the Jews during every seventh or fallow year). So much the more decisive is the testimony of the New Testament in support of the inspired character of the book and of the prophetic dignity of its author, which occurs in the familiar reference of Our Lord to Dan. ix. 27, in his great eschatological discourse (Matt. xxiv. 15: ὅτας οὖν ἴδῃτε τὸ βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως τὸ ῥηθὲν διὰ Δανιὴλ τοῦ προφήτου ἐστὸς ἐν τόπῳ ἁγίῳ—δ’ ἀναγινώσκων νοεῖτω, etc.), and which is paralleled by other unmistakable allusions to Daniel’s expressions in the discourses of Our Lord. Among these we reckon the constantly repeated designation of himself as “the Son of Man,” the adoption of which phrase from Dan. vii. 18 is open to no serious objection, while its identity with Daniel’s בְּנֵי אָדָם is unmistakably revealed, especially in prophetic descriptions, such as Matt. xix. 28; xxiv. 30; xxvi. 64. The prophecy concerning the resurrection of the good and the evil, in John v. 28, 29, likewise, is clearly based on chap. xii. 2, 3, of this book. Among the numerous allusions to our prophet which are found in the writings of the Apostles, we instance merely 2 Thess. ii. 3 et seq.; 1 Pet. i. 10–12 (cf. Dan. iii. and vi.), and the Apocalypse, which latter book is based throughout on the prophecies of Daniel, and therefore vouches, with its entire contents, for the Divinely inspired and canonical character of this book.

NOTE 1.—Kranichfeld, p. 8 et seq., explains in a striking manner to what extent the peculiar theological, or rather eschatological, character of Daniel's prophecies may have been influential in retarding their admission into the canon during the pre-Maccabæan period: "The prophecies of Daniel, in contrast with the oracles of earlier prophets, foretell a period of severe tribulation in the future, which the sufferings of the exile have not warded off; and they predict this far more constantly, positively, and directly than does the book of Zechariah, or any prophecy of the period succeeding the captivity, the aim of the latter being chiefly to comfort and encourage the returned exiles in their discouraging circumstances. There was thus a sufficient reason, in the character of the book itself, to warrant its being received with caution by the age succeeding the exile, and even to justify the temporary ignoring of its claims; for, on the one hand, it contradicted the sentiment of that age, which indulged in exalted hopes of deliverance based on the older prophecies, and, on the other, it had emanated from one who was not even a prophet by a specific call. A similar treatment appears to have been accorded to the book of Ecclesiastes during an extended period, which likewise resulted from its contents, although differing extremely from those of Daniel. In the Asmonæan period, however, the impression produced by the religious and political events which illustrated its prophecies, secured the book a ready reception into the canon, although it was excluded from the second part of the sacred writings, which had probably been closed for centuries, and was limited by traditional usage. This simple explanation, which removes every difficulty in relation to the place of the book in the canon, is not contradicted by the remark of Josephus (Contra Apion, I. 8) concerning the closing of the canon in the time of Artaxerxes, which is, in the main, correct. That statement, as Keil correctly observes (Einkl. § 154), refers to the time of the composition of the sacred writings, in harmony with the fact that neither Ecclesiasticus nor 1 Maccabees (which were composed only two centuries before Christ) found a place in the canon; but it does not preclude the subsequent conclusion of the collecting and receiving into the third section of the canon of older sacred writings." Similar views are advanced, so far as the last question is concerned, by Hengstenberg, Beitr. I. 23 et seq., and Zündel, Krit. Untersuchungen, p. 196 et seq., 214 et seq. Also compare below, § 10.

NOTE 2.—Among older expositors, Jerome, Abarbanel, Kimchi, and Drusius, refer Zechariah's visions of the four horns (ii. 1), etc., and of the four chariots (vi. 1 et seq.), to the world-kings of Daniel, as do Baumgarten (Nachtgesichte des Sacharja), Zündel (Kritische Untersuchungen, 249), Pusey (Daniel, p. 357), Füller, Kliefoth, and W. Volck (Vindiciæ Danielicæ, p. 3 et seq.), among moderns; while Köhler (Nachexilische Propheten, ii. 1) and a majority of later expositors deny the fact of such a relation. Köhler, however, (ibid., II. p. 138) agrees with Von Hofmann, Ebrard, Kliefoth, Zündel, and Volck (l. c., p. 26) in referring the "three shepherds," Zech. xi. 8, to the first three world-kings, and assumes, in addition, a relation of the prophecy against Javan, Zech. ix. 13, to Dan. viii. 8 et seq. But the correspondence of these latter passages, if it is to be accepted at all, is of minor importance, because the chapters Zech. ix.-xi. possibly originated with a prophet Zechariah, who flourished before the exile, and therefore may be older than the Daniel of the captivity. Compare, however, the arguments adduced to the contrary by Hengstenberg, Beitr. I. 366 et seq.; also by the editor of this Bible-work, in vol. I. of the Old Test., p. 44 [Am. ed.].

NOTE 3.—In relation to the references in Ecclesiasticus to Daniel, see Zündel, p. 188; and the same, p. 191 et seq., concerning the much clearer and more important references in the book of Baruch, where the opinion of Dillmann, as stated in his essay on the formation of the Old-Test. canon (Jahrb. f. deutsche Theol., 1858, p. 480), is quoted: "The book of Baruch, by no means a contemptible after-piece of prophetic literature, may have been in circulation in its Hebrew form as early as the fourth century B. C.;" and where, at the same time, it is shown most clearly that the pseudo-Baruch was undeniably acquainted with the book of Daniel, and imitated many of its features, particularly the prophet's prayer, Dan. ix. Hengstenberg, p. 288 et seq., Hävernick, Einkl. II. 2, 459 et seq., and Pusey, in his Commentary, p. 370, show that the echoes of this book found in 1 Maccabees (which are so clear and unmistakable, that scholars like Bleek, De Wette, and Grimm [on 1 Macc. i. 57] have acknowledged this occurrence) are entitled, despite the composition of the book toward the close of the second century B. C., to rank as indirect testimonies for the origin of Daniel prior to the Asmonæan period. Concerning Ecclus. and its omission of Daniel from the βιβλος πατριων, chapters xlv.-l., see Hävernick, p. 451 et seq.; Herbst, Einkl. II. 2, 88; Keil, Einkl., p. 452; Hengstenberg, p. 21 sq.; Kranichfeld, p. 10, etc. Some of these writers, however (e.g., Hävernick, Keil, Hengstenberg, together with Bretschneider and others), go too far when they reject the passage, chap. xlix. 12, as not genuine, and thus exclude all mention of the twelve minor prophets as well; for there is no sufficient reason to suspect that verse on critical grounds (cf. Bleek, Einkl., p. 589). It has been pointed out, especially by Hävernick (Einkl. l. c., p. 457 et seq.) and Zündel (p. 173 et seq.; cf. p. 140 et seq.), that the Alexandrian version of the Old Testament in general, and of Daniel in particular (cf. infra, § 11), which probably originated in the second century B. C., reveals many traces of the existence of our prophetic book prior to the Maccabæan age; that, for instance, its rendering of Deut. xxxii. 8, ὅτε διεμέριζεν ὁ ὑψίστος ἐθνη, ἐστῆσεν ὁρία ἰθὺν κατὰ ἀριθμὸν ἀγγέλων θεοῦ, seems to rest on Dan. x. 18, 20, like the passage, Ecclus. xvii. 17, which is cited above; and that citations from its version of Daniel occur in the first book of Maccabees (i. 57), as well as in the Sibylline oracles (iii. 396, 613, etc.); facts that argue with great force the origin of this Greek version in the Asmonean period, and therefore, at the very time to which the negative criticism assigns the original Daniel itself. The testimonies drawn from the Apocrypha are, with rare exceptions, surpassed in importance and evidential force by the agreement of the Sibyllines with Daniel, since the unanimous consent of competent scholars, such as Bleek, Lücke, Friedlieb, and others, ascribes the composition of the portion of the Oracula Sibyllina in question (lib. III, v. 85-746) to an Alexandrian Jew, and dates it in the first half of the second century, or, more probably, about 160 B. C. The correspondence of many of these verses to passages in our prophetic book, or rather in its Alexandrian version, cannot be questioned; and the supposition ventured by Bleek, that both (pseudo-Daniel and the pseudo-Sibyllines) sprang from a common source of a more ancient time, is merely an arbitrary evasion to hide his embarrassment. Compare Sibyll., lib. III, v. 396 ss.: 'Πίσαν ταν γε διδοῖς, ἣν καὶ κήφει βορολοῖος. 'Εκ δέκα δὲ κεράτων· παρὰ δὲ φωνὴν ἄλλο φερέσκει. . . . καὶ τότε δὲ παραφύμενον κέρασ' ἄρξει, with the Sept. at Dan. vii. 7, 8, 11, 20;—also Sibyll., III. 613: πάντα δὲ συγκόψει καὶ πάντα κακῶν ἀναπλήσει, with Sept., Dan. vii. 23, 24.

NOTE 4.—Hengstenberg (p. 258 et seq., 277 et seq.) is especially thorough and profound in his examination of the testimony of Christ and the apostles, and of Josephus in Ant., XI. 8, 5. He may attempt too much in seeking to establish the historical character of all the details connected with the perhaps somewhat legendary narrative respecting the incident by which Alexander became acquainted with Daniel's prophecies; but his statements convey the decided impression that the narrative in question is not a pure invention without any foundation in fact. He quotes, on page 288, the significant judgment of H. Leo respecting the credibility of this account (as expressed in his Vorlesungen über die Geschichte des jüdischen Volks, p. 200, which, as is well known, breathe anything rather than a believing spirit): "The entire narrative contains nothing that is really improbable. An armed resistance on the part of the high-priest would have been madness; he may therefore have gone out to meet Alexander in peace. It is also well known that Alexander sought to impress the Asiatic world with the belief that he was in league with the gods of the nations whom he had conquered. It has been considered improbable that Alexander should not have hastened from Gaza directly to Egypt; but to go from Gaza to Egypt by way of Jerusalem involved at most an additional journey of a few days, and Judæa was not a point to be disregarded in an expedition to Egypt. It would be unwise to leave this mountain region in the rear, in the possession of an enemy." See also Zündel, p. 238 et seq., where the hypercritical objection of Hitzig, "The book was not produced, and if it had existed at the time, it would certainly have been shown" (Heidelberger Jahrb., 1832, II., p. 235), is justly regarded as an indirect testimony for the trustworthiness of the account by Josephus.

c. Examination of the INTERNAL reasons against its genuineness, and more particularly of those derived from peculiarities of language and style.

It has already been repeatedly shown that the lingual structure of this book—the transition into Chaldee, chap. ii. 4, the essential identity of this idiom with the Chaldee of Ezra, the Hebraisms and Parseeisms contained in it, and finally, the marked Chaldaizing tendency of the Hebrew portions, similar to the style of Ezekiel—that all this corresponds fully with the assumption of an author who flourished at the Chaldean court of Babylon, and who was of Jewish birth, but educated in the customs and wisdom of the Chaldeans (see § 1, note 8, and § 4, note 2). It is only necessary, in this connection, to refer to the Greek expressions, which have been regarded as proving the later origin of the work in an especially decisive way. Bertholdt was still able to enumerate ten such expressions, but the more recent opponents of the genuineness of the book find the number reduced to three or four, as the result of a careful word-criticism. All of these are names of musical instruments, such as might easily have been introduced at Babylon by commercial intercourse, even prior to the exile. They comprise the terms פסנתרין = ψαλτήριον, סוףפיה = συμφωνία, קיתרה = κιθάρα, and סבבא = σαμβάκη, all of which occur in the history of Daniel's friends and the fiery furnace (chap. iii. 5, 7, 10, 15). But even among these the third is possibly of Oriental origin, and the last almost certainly so. The σαμβάκη or λαμβάκη (also λαμβάκη) of the Greek was, according to Athenæus (Deipnosoph. iv. 182; xiv. 634), a Syrian invention, and the Shemitic סבבא (related to סבב, "to interweave") seems therefore to be the primitive form, from which the Græcized σαμβάκη is derived. קיתרה may possibly be the Persian Si-tareh, "six-stringed," and may stand related to κίθαρα, which is to be derived from the same source, as a sister rather than as a mother. Pareau, Hengstenberg, Hävernicks, Haneberg, and others, have even attempted to trace the two remaining terms to a Shemitic source, and have accordingly derived קִנְיָה from קנה, "a reed," and פִּסְתָּרִי from פֶּסֶט, "a hand," and נָתַר, "to leap" (therefore, "strings that are played by hand"). But excessive difficulties stand in the way of such an etymology, particularly the Greek sound in the endings of the two words (פִּסְתָּרִי seems to be singular rather than plural), and the circumstance that συνφωνία, if not ψαλτήριον, occurs in the classics as the name of an instrument, as may be seen in the passage Polyb. Fragm., 31, t. 4, and as may be concluded from the Italian designation of the bagpipe, zambogna or sampogna, which is probably derived from that source. On the other hand, the assumption that the instruments of the Greeks were in use among the Chaldeans early in the sixth century B. C., or even in the seventh and eighth, involves no difficulty whatever. It would seem strange, rather, if no traces of commercial intercourse with the Greeks at about the middle of the sixth century B. C. were found in Babylon, the primitive "city of merchants" (Ezek. xvii. 4, 12; cf. Josh. vii. 21), since the Assyrian kings Esar-haddon, Sargon, and Sennacherib were involved in either friendly or hostile relations with the Greeks of Asia Minor, as early as the eighth century B. C. Further, "Javan" is mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions of Sargon among the nations who were tributary to Assyria; according to Strabo, xiii. 8, 2, a Greek, the brother of the poet Alcæus, served in the armies of Nebuchadnezzar as a mercenary, or, more probably, as the leader of a band of Greek mercenaries; the Ionian philosopher, Anaximander, displays considerable knowledge of the Orient in his map of the world, which was prepared in the same period; and finally, commercial relations of considerable importance were maintained between the lands of the Euphrates and the Greek colonies of Asia Minor, certainly in the eighth century B. C., and possibly, through Phœnician channels, as early as the days of Homer (see notes 1 and 2).

It appears, therefore, that no unanswerable objection against the origin of this book during the period of the captivity can be established on the ground of its peculiarities of language; nor do the remaining literary peculiarities, such as the method in which the prophet refers to himself and his personal relations, afford the slightest reason to doubt its composition by Daniel. "The honorable references to Daniel (chap. i. 17, 19; v. 11 et seq.; vi. 4; ix. 23; x. 11) are analogous to many expressions employed by the Apostle Paul concerning himself, e.g., 1 Cor. xv. 10; 2 Cor. xi. 5 et seq.; xii. 2 et seq.; and they are necessary, either to complete the historical representation, as in the case of the predicate 'greatly beloved,' applied to him by the angel in chap. ix. 23; x. 11, or in the honorable mention of his name to Belshazzar by the queen, chap. v. 11, 12; or they belong to passages which aim to honor God, who had endowed his servant with miraculous wisdom (i. 17 et seq.; vi. 4). Consequently, they contain no trace of Pelagian self-laudation which could militate against the opinion that the book which bears his name was composed by himself" (Keil, Einl., p. 452 sq.).—Nor does the religiously moral deportment of the prophet, as it is described by himself in this book, afford a proof in any other direction against its composition in the period of the exile. His custom of observing three seasons of daily prayer, as mentioned in chap. vi. 11, his frequent fasts (chap. ix. 3; x. 3, 12), and the strict abstinence from profane food of himself and his youthful friends (chap. i. 8 et seq.), do not necessarily indicate a period subsequent to the exile, and even as late as that of the Asmonæans, as is abundantly shown by passages like Psa. lv. 18; Ezra viii. 21 et seq.; ix. 3 et seq.; Neh. i. 4; ix. 1; Zech. vii. 3; viii. 19; Hos. ix. 3, 4; Ezek. xxii. 26; xlv. 23; xxxiii. 25, etc. His dogmatic position no more requires an explanation based on the condition or experiences of God's people after the exile, than such ascetic habits, or the exalted value, which, according to chap. ii. 18; ix. 3; x. 2 et seq., he attaches to prayer and intercession, oblige us to regard him as involved in the narrow-minded legal and work-righteous conceptions of the later Judaism. His description of the Messiah and his kingdom—in contrast with the apocryphal literature of the period after the captivity, from which Messianic ideas and hopes are almost entirely wanting—is intimately related to the predictions of the older prophets, and especially of Isaiah (cf. Isa. ix. 4 et seq. with Dan. vii. 13 sq.). The relation between the expected founding of Messiah's kingdom and the general resurrection of the dead, which he indicates in chap. xii. 2 et seq., corresponds to the older prophetic descriptions in Isa. xxiv.; lxvi. 22-24; Ezek. xxxvii., but finds no analogy in the later apocryphal literature, unless we except 2 Macc. vii. 9 et seq., which passage, however, is probably based on Dan. xii. as its model. Nor does the angelology of the book present any specific feature which points to a period later than the exile; much less does it indicate that its teachings result from the influence of the religious thought of Persia on Judaism. Rather, they are closely related, on the one hand, to the angelology of Ezekiel and Zechariah (cf., e.g., Ezek. ix. 10; also i. 26, and Zech. i.-vi.), and, on the other, they are rooted in the much older views and experiences of the time before the exile; e.g., the idea of protecting spirits of single states is founded in Isa. xxiv. 21; that concerning princes of the angels (chap. x. 13, 20; xii. 1), doubtless in the familiar account in the book of Joshua respecting the "captain of the Lord's host" (Josh. 14). Therefore, in this direction also, the literary character of the book reveals nothing that indicates an anti-Daniel or a pseudo-Daniel (cf. note 3).

NOTE 1.—Delitzsch observes, p. 274, on the relationship of the Hebrew of Daniel to that of Ezekiel, that "the Hebrew of this book is closely related especially to that of Ezekiel, whose book may be, and doubtless is, included among the ספרים in chap. ix. 2; and it is a surprising accident that it conforms somewhat to Habakkuk also, whom tradition associates with Daniel." The following expressions are adduced in support of the former correspondence, by Hävernick (N. krit. Unters., p. 97 et seq.) and Keil (Einkl., p. 446): the vocative אֲדָם בְּנֵי, chap. viii. 17; נֹרָא, brightness, xii. 3, cf. Ezek. viii. 2; נִשְׁבַּח, to render liable to penalty, i. 10, and דָּוָב, debt, Ezek. xviii. 7; נִשְׁבַּח for נִשְׁבַּח, x. 21, cf. Ezek. xiii. 9; נִשְׁבַּח, x. 5, cf. Ezek. ix. 2, 3; מִן־בָּרֶכֶת, royal food, i. 5, and בָּרֶכֶת, food, Ezek. xxv. 27; מְלִיץ, polished, x. 6, cf. Ezek. i. 7, etc. With reference to the relation of the Aramaic of Daniel to that of Ezra, and to the Chaldee of the Targums of a later age, consult Hävernick and Keil, as above, and cf. supra, § 1, note 3. It is the peculiar merit of Pusey to have established, in his profoundly learned commentary, the high antiquity of the Chaldaism of Daniel, in comparison with that of the Targums and the rabbins, by his examination of numerous individual forms, and especially of the many asserted Hebraisms of this book.

NOTE 2.—On the question whether the musical instruments of the Greeks may have been known to the Babylonians, and even to the Assyrians, consult Delitzsch, p. 274; Auberlen, p. 12 et seq.; Kranichfeld, p. 48 et seq., and the passage cited by the two former from Joh. Brandis, Ueber den histor. Gewinn aus der Entzifferung der assyrischen Inschriften, 1856, p. 1 et seq., where the observation is made, in relation to the commercial intercourse of the ancient Greeks, that "the extended commerce of the Greek colonies would frequently lead their merchants to Assyrian countries, since they penetrated even to the inhospitable steppes on the Dnieper and the Don. Their most important enterprises were probably connected with the Assyrian provinces of Asia Minor, and above all with the countries on the coasts of Pontus and along the Mediterranean Sea, doubtless including Lydia also, where the Assyrian supremacy seems to have been maintained during more than five hundred years, and almost to the close of the eighth century B. C. These nations must also have met in Cyprus, where the Greeks traded at an early period, and where the Assyrians had firmly established themselves. We are obliged to be content with a supposition that Greeks came as far as Assyria proper, in the capacity of merchants; but Greek soldiers certainly accompanied Esar-haddon, the first among the Assyrian rulers to form a corps of mercenaries (Abydenus in Euseb., Chron. Armen., ed. Aucher l., p. 53), on his marches through Asia," etc. Compare also the interesting work by Brandis, Das Münz-, Mass- und Gewichtswesen in Vorderasien bis auf Alexander d. Gr., 1867. Respecting the Greeks as the musicians καὶ ἐκκλησίαν in the world, see Auberlen, as above: "Attention may also be directed to the fact that the Greeks, as the patrons of art, occupied a position in the ancient world similar to that conceded to the Italians in the modern; and how many are the musical terms which we Germans have adopted from the Italians! Poetry and music flourished at first precisely among the Greeks of Asia Minor, and prior to the ninth century B. C., about the middle of which Homer lived there, according to the not improbable statement of Herodotus (II. 53). Greek artists were employed by the Lydians, among whom music was likewise cultivated, so that the Greeks adopted the Lydian key from them. But Lydia was not merely dependent on Assyria to a greater or less extent, down to the close of the eighth century, but afterward maintained intimate relations with Babylon," etc. Concerning the ψαλτήριον or Psalterion, compare, in addition, the remark of Kranichfeld: "It may be observed, in relation to the objection that the ψαλτήριον is mentioned only by later writers among the Greeks, that the argumentum ex silentio raised, on that ground, against the earlier existence of that instrument, is sufficiently met by the probable representation of a

113. ψαλτήριον on the monuments of Sennacherib, cf. Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, c. 20, p. 454. The persons who there welcome the Assyrian leaders with dances, songs, and plays, are preceded by five musicians, three of whom carry harps with many strings, a fourth has a double flute, and the fifth is furnished with an instrument which Layard compares to the Santer of Egypt = פסנתרין (Gesenius, Thea., p. 1116). It consists of a number of strings which are stretched on a resonant frame, and corresponds to the description of the psalterium furnished by Augustine (on Psa. xxxii.)."

NOTE 3.—With reference to the feasibility of reconciling the religious-ethical representations of this book with the hypothesis of its origin during the captivity, see Hengstenberg, p. 137 et seq.; Hävernick, Neue krit. Unters., p. 32 et seq.; and Oehler in Tholuck's Literarischer Anzeiger, 1843, Nos. 49 and 50, and particularly p. 388 et seq. The dependence of Daniel's angelology on that of Zoroaster has been frequently asserted, since it was first stated by Gesenius, Bertholdt, Winer, and others; but Martin Haug, of Bombay, decidedly advocates the opinion, in his Essays on the Sacred Language, Writings, and Religion of the Parsees (Bombay, 1862), that the religious development of Judaism was independent of that of Parseeism, without, on that account, attempting to deny to them a common source, as an explanation of their manifold analogies (compare Ausland, 1862, p. 937; 1865, p. 1079 et seq.). The simple circumstance that a scholar so thoroughly acquainted with the Zend religion and literature, should hold to this opinion, may serve as a warning to receive with caution such views of their relations as are above referred to. The opinion of Max Müller, as expressed in his philosophical meditations on religion (Chips from a German Workshop, London, 1867), agrees fully with that of Haug; while E. Rénan (De l'Origine du Language, p. 230; Vie de Jésus, p. 15 s.) and Fr. Spiegel (Genesis und Avesta, in Ausland, 1868, No. 12 et seq.) assert a direct adoption from the religious writings of the ancient Persians of many theological and angelological conceptions by the later Judaism after the time of the Achæmenidæ. Hilgenfeld also (Das Judenthum im persischen Zeitalter in the Zeitschrift für wissenschaftl. Theologie, 1866, No. 4, p. 398 et seq.) and Alex. Kohut, Ueber die jüdische Angelologie und Dämonologie in ihrer Abhängigkeit vom Parsismus (taken from the Zeitschrift der deutsch-morgentl. Gesellsch., Vol. IV., No. 3) Leipzig, 1866, advocate the same view. But the sober investigations of men of the most diverse tendencies agree in reaching substantially the same result, namely, proving that at most a few names of angels remain to a profounder and more unprejudiced criticism, as elements of the Jewish angelology which are really derived from Parseeism, and that even these names are not chiefly of Aryan, but of Shemitic and even genuinely Hebrew origin—as is especially true of those found in Daniel (Michael and Gabriel). Compare Reuss (Histoire de la théologie Chrétienne au Siècle apostolique, I., 92 et seq.), Dillmann (Jahrb. für deutsche Theologie, 1858, p. 419 et seq.), Hävernick (Vorl. über die Theologie des A. Ts., 2d ed., published by H. Schultz, p. 92 et seq.; 118 et seq.); Hofmann (Schriftbeweis, I. 281, 291 et seq.); A. Köhler (Nachzeitliche Propheten, II. 23 et seq.); Haneberg (in Reusch, Theol. Literaturbl., 1867, No. 3, p. 72). See the exegetical notes on chap. viii. 10, 15, and compare the instructive treatise of Erich Haupt, Ueber die Berührungen des A. Ts. mit der Religion Zarathustras (Treptow on the Rhine, 1867), which argues positively against the adoption from Parseeism of any religious conceptions whatever in the canonical portions of the O. T.

d. Examination of the internal evidences against its genuineness, based on HISTORICAL DIFFICULTIES.

The charges raised against the book of Daniel, on the ground of asserted contradictions of the accounts of extra-biblical history respecting the Babylonian and Medo-Persian Kingdoms, are either historico-social in their nature, or politico-historical. They relate either to the antiquities of those kingdoms, or to their chronological relations and changes of dynasties.

1. The former class of difficulties, namely those affecting the social progress and customs of the times, lie within the domain of the history of civilization and morals. They arise from the deportment of Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar toward the oneirocritical magicians on the one hand, and toward Daniel on the other (chaps. ii. and v.); further, from the colossal size and ugliness of the image which was to be worshipped, and from the cruelty of the punishment imposed on the friends of Daniel, because of their refusal to obey the decree which required such worship (chap. iii.); from the lycanthropy of Nebuchadnezzar, as not substantiated by extra-biblical historians (chap. iv.); from the alleged incredibility of the statement that king Darius issued a decree ordaining that divine honors should be paid exclusively to him; and from the assumed funnel-like shape of the lion's den into which Daniel was thrown (chap. vi.). All of these difficulties are merely such in appearance. An observer who understands the spirit of the ancient as well as the modern Oriental despotism (of which the case of Theodore of Abyssinia, with his whims and fluctuating views, may serve as a late example), and especially who at the same time remembers the tendency of the Babylonian and Medo-Persian rulers to syncretistic arbitrariness and mingling of religions, will not deem it strange that Nebuchadnezzar should address to his magicians the unreasonable demand, not merely to interpret his dream, but even to recall its contents, which were forgotten by him, and that he should condemn them to death when they failed to satisfy his demands, while he rewarded Daniel, who accomplished the task, with the highest honors and emoluments. Such an observer will not be surprised to find the king, in chap. iii., directing a monstrous idolatrous demonstration against the God of Daniel and his friends, and consigning the latter to so glorious a martyrdom; nor to behold, in chap. v., the striking contrast between the blasphemous insults and excesses of Belshazzar at the first, and the favor afterward bestowed by him on Daniel; nor yet, in chap. vi., the similar change in the disposition of Darius as revealed in his conduct. That, by Divine retribution, the arbitrary and passionate temper of Nebuchadnezzar should develop into madness, and result in the infliction, during several years, of a mental disorder of the most terrible nature, is no more surprising than are any of the various cases of lycanthropy recorded in the annals of psychiatry, among which that of the Armenian king, Tiridates III., is the most familiar and historically important. Traces of this awful episode in the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, although not found in other historians of ancient times, may yet be shown with sufficient clearness in the Babylonian Berosus and in Abydenus (see note 1). With regard to the less important details which have excited criticism, as being legendary or at least suspicious, it may be observed that the description of the idol in the plain of Dura (chap. iii. 1 et seq.), which reached a height of sixty cubits, corresponds substantially with the descriptions transmitted through other channels of uncouth colossal images, such as the coarse and excessively fanciful art of ancient Oriental heathendom was accustomed to erect to the honor of its gods. The non-appearance of Daniel and the other magicians before Belshazzar (chap. v. 7) is sufficiently explained by the Oriental custom of removing the priests from office with every change of rulers. The decree of Darius, limiting the ascription of divine honors during an entire month to himself (chap. vi. 8 et seq.) agrees fully with the statements of Herodotus, Xenophon, and Plutarch, respecting the deifying of kings among the ancient Medes and Persians. And finally, the designation of the lion's den by ܕܢܝܢ or ܕܢܝܢܐ (chap. vi. 8, 18) does not necessitate the view that it was "a funnel-shaped cavern or cistern," since the term in question is applied in the Syriac, not merely to dungeons, but also especially to the dens or cages of wild beasts (cf. the exegetical remarks on the several passages cited in this connection).

2. The following difficulties and alleged contradictions or anachronisms belong to the domain of political history and chronology :

(1.) According to the statement in chap. i. 1, that "In the third year of Jehoiakim came (כִּנְזָר) Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, unto Jerusalem and besieged it," our book seems to place the first siege and capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar as early as the third year of Jehoiakim. This contradicts Jer. xxv. 1, 9 (cf. xlv. 2; xxxvi. 9), where the arrival of Nebuchadnezzar before Jerusalem appears to be placed in the fourth or even the fifth year of Jehoiakim's reign; and it also conflicts with Dan. ii. 1, where the second year of Nebuchadnezzar is given as the time in which Daniel interpreted the monarch's dream, and thus attained to great distinction, whereas the conquest of Judæa and the transportation of Daniel and his friends, together with other prisoners, to Babylon, and the instruction of the Hebrew youth (according to chap. i. 5, 18) during three years in the wisdom of the Chaldeans, all transpired several years before. The only adequate solution of this two-fold difficulty is found in the hypothesis, that Dan. i. 1 does not relate the arrival of Nebuchadnezzar before Jerusalem, but merely his departure for that place, or the beginning of his march (כִּנְזָר as in Jon. i. 3; cf. Gen. xiv. 5; xlv. 7; Dan. xi. 13, 17, 28); and also that the designation of Nebuchadnezzar as king, in chap. i. 1, 3, 5, is to be regarded as proleptical, his position at that time being that of a military leader and representative of his father Nabopolassar, while his accession to the throne was delayed about two years later. From this hypothesis results an interval of more than three years between the removal of Daniel to Babylon, and his elevation to the headship of the magian caste (see note 2).

(2.) According to chap. v., Belshazzar seems to be the successor, or, at least, one of the successors, of his father Nebuchadnezzar on the throne of Babylon, while ver. 30 represents him as the last ruler before the introduction of the Medo-Persian dynasty. The extra-biblical authorities, however, mention four kings of his family who succeeded Nebuchadnezzar (Evil-merodach, Neriglissar, Laborasorarchad, and Nabonidus), none of whom bears the name of Belshazzar. Of the two methods possible for the solution of this difficulty, the one identifies Belshazzar with Evil-merodach, and the other with Nabonidus. The former is the more probable one, because the relation of chap. vi. 1, to v. 30 by no means requires that the subjection of Babylon to the Medo-Persians should have immediately followed on the death of Belshazzar; and further, because Nebuchadnezzar is mentioned as the father of Belshazzar in chap. vii., while the profane sources call Evil-merodach a son of Nebuchadnezzar, but not Nabonidus, the last Chaldean king (see note 3). Moreover, the two years of the reign of Evil-merodach, mentioned in Jer. lii. 31, may be easily reconciled with the statement in Dan. viii. 1, that a vision was seen by Daniel "in the third year of Belshazzar;" for it might be said that Belshazzar-Evil-merodach reigned two years even if he lived until about the middle of his "third year." *

(3.) It is said that chap. vi. 1 implies that the monarch who overthrew the Chaldean dynasty, and established the Medo-Persian rule in Babylon, was not Cyrus, but "Darius the Mede." But since, according to chap. vi. 29 (cf. i. 21), the author had knowledge of Cyrus as the successor of this Darius, there can be no doubt that by the latter name he designates the Cyaxeres II. of Xenophon, who was the son of Astyages and uncle of Cyrus, and consequently the sovereign whose reign, according to Æschylus, Xenophon, Abydenus, and Josephus, intervened between the last Median king Astyages and the founding of the Persian Achæmenidean dynasty by Cyrus. It follows, that the narrative of Herodotus, which relates that Cyrus defeated his Median grandfather Astyages near Pasargardæ, and became his immediate successor, has its source in an inexact or incomplete tradition, from whence the father of history derived his facts in relation to the Persian as well as the Babylonian kingdom (see note 4).

NOTE 1.—With reference to the mention of diseases and the actual occurrence of lycanthropy, compare generally Bartholinus, De morbis biblicis, c. 13; Rich. Mead, Medica sacra, c. 7; J. D. Müller, Diss. de Nebuchadnezzaris metamorphóse ad Dan., c. iv., Lips., 1747; Freind, Historia medic., p. 380 (where the important testimony of Oribasius, physician to the emperor Julian, is given, showing the occurrence of this disease in his time); Forestus, Observationes

* [A better solution of the difficulty is proposed by Rawlinson (Herodotus, i. 424, Am. ed.), as being suggested by the recently discovered inscriptions on the Babylonian monuments. "According to Berosus, Nabonadius was not in Babylon, but at Borsippa, at the time when Babylon was taken, having fled to that comparatively unimportant city when his army was defeated in the field (apud Joseph., Contra Apion, i. 21). He seems, however, to have left in Babylon a representative in the person of his son, whom a few years previously he had associated with him in the government. This prince, whose name is read as Bil-shar-urur, and who may be identified as the Belshazzar of Daniel, appears to have taken the command in the city when Nabonadius threw himself for some unexplained reason into Borsippa, which was undoubtedly a strong fortress, and was also one of the chief seats of Chaldean learning, but which assuredly could not compare, either for magnificence or for strength, with Babylon, and Belshazzar, who was probably a mere youth, left to enjoy the supreme power without check or control, neglected the duty of watching the enemy, and gave himself up to enjoyment." "Two difficulties stand in the way of this identification, which (if accepted) solve one of the most intricate problems of ancient history. The first is the relationship in which the Belshazzar of Scripture stands to Nebuchadnezzar, which is throughout represented as that of son (verses 2, 11, 13, 18, etc.); the second is the accession immediately of 'Darius the Mede.' With respect to the first of these, it may be remarked that although Nabonadius was not a descendant, or indeed any relative of Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar may have been, and very probably was. Nabu-nahit, on seizing the supreme power, would naturally seek to strengthen his position by marriage with a daughter of the great king, whose son, son-in-law, and grandson had successively held the throne. He may have taken to wife Neriglissar's widow, or he may have married some other daughter of Nebuchadnezzar. Belshazzar may thus have been grandson of Nebuchadnezzar on the mother's side. It is some confirmation of these probabilities or possibilities to find that the name of Nebuchadnezzar was used as a family name by Nabu-nahit. He must certainly have had a son to whom he gave that appellation, or it would not have been assumed by two pretenders in succession, who sought to personate the legitimate heir to the Babylonian throne." The second objection, respecting the immediate succession of "Darius the Mede," is elsewhere considered, and applies not particularly to this identification.]

The last work contains many interesting examples of insanity, in which the patients believed themselves transformed into dogs, wolves, bears, cats, etc., and were able to imitate the calls of those animals with surprising exactness. Important historical examples of this character are: Lycaon (Pausan., VIII. 2; Ovid, Metam., I. 216); king Tiridates III. of Armenia, the persecutor of Gregory the illuminator about A. D. 300 (Moses of Chorene, Hist. Armeniaca, I. III., ed. Whiston, p. 256 et seq.; M. Samueljan, Bekehrung Armeniens durch Gregor. Illuminator, nach national-historischen Quellen bearb., Vienna, 1844; S. C. Malan, The Life and Times of S. Gregory the Illuminator, the Founder and Patron Saint of the Armenian Church, Translated from the Armenian, London, 1868;—cf. the Basle Missions-Magazin, 1832, p. 530); Latronianus, a persecutor of Christians in the time of Diocletian, who was temporarily bestialized because of his cruelty (see the acts of the martyrs, s. vv., Epictetus and Astion, in the Acta Sancta, Jul., T. II. p. 538); Simon of Tournay, an Aristotelian philosopher in Paris about A. D. 1200 (who is said to have received a roaring voice like a beast, in punishment of a blasphemy publicly uttered against Christ, Moses, and Mohammed; see Schröckh, Kirchengesch., vol. XXVI., p. 380); Simon Brown, an English dissenting minister, 1738 (who, while in a melancholy state of mind, believed himself, during a considerable period, to be changed into a beast, although in other respects he was rational and in the possession of his faculties; see Stäudlin and Tzschirner, Archiv, etc., vol. III., p. 562 et seq.); a prince of Condé, who at times believed himself transformed into a dog (Schubert, Symbolik des Trauma, 3d ed., p. 166); an English boy at Norwich, about A. D. 1603, whose disease assumed the form of lycanthropy (Reitz, Historie der Wiedergeborenen, II. 56 et seq.). Compare also the fabulous accounts of werewolves, i.e., persons who rage with wolfish cruelty and rapacity against their fellow men, in Görres, Die Christl. Mystik, vol. IV. 2, p. 472 et seq.; also Waitz, Anthropologie der Naturvölker, vol. II., p. 180, concerning the belief of the African nations in the disease marafinas, i.e., lycanthropy. *Among the profane testimonies to the lycanthropy of Nebuchadnezzar, that of the inscriptions on the Babylonian monuments (which, so far as they date back to that king, indicate the interruption of his great building enterprises during a considerable period; see Rawlinson, Bampton Lectures, V., p. 166 and p. 440, n. 29), is not sufficiently positive and clear. The statement of Berosus (in Josephus, Contra Apion, I. 20): Ναβουχοδονόσορος μὲν οὖν μετὰ τὸ ἀρξασθαι τοῦ προειρημένου τείχους, ἐμπέσων εἰς ἀρρώστιαν, μετῴληξεν τὸν βίον, βασιλευκῶς ἔτη τεσσαράκοντα τρία, is likewise very indefinite, and leaves room for the opinion that it refers to a disease not at all unusual in its character, which immediately preceded the death of Nebuchadnezzar (although the mention of the ἀρρώστια which preceded his death can hardly be accidental and without significance with Berosus, whose narrative in other cases is always as concise as possible. Cf. Kranichfeld on the passage, p. 204 et seq.). The Chaldean tradition concerning the wonderful close of Nebuchadnezzar's life, as reported by Abydenus (in Euseb., Prepar. Evang., IX. 41; cf. Chron. Armen., I., p. 59), contains, on the other hand, a positive although frequently clouded and distorted testimony to that fact. It states that Nebuchadnezzar, after concluding his wars of conquest, "ascended to the summit of his royal palace, where he was seized by one of the gods" (ὡς, ἀναβὰς ἐπὶ τὰ βασιλῆην, καταρχήσειν θεῷ σφεδῇ). "With a loud voice he said, 'I, Nebuchadnezzar, foretell your misfortune, which neither Bel, my ancestor, nor the queen Beltis, can prevail on the fates to avert! The Persian mule shall come, being in league with your own gods, and shall bring you into bondage; the Mede, the pride of the Assyrians, shall be his helper! Would that a whirlpool or a flood (χάρυβδιν τινα ἢ θάλασσαν) might sweep him previously away and utterly destroy him! Or that, at any rate, he might be driven by other ways through the desert, where there are neither cities nor human paths, but where only wild beasts and birds roam about—that he might wander in solitude among rocks and precipices! And would that I had met a better end before this knowledge was imparted to me!' After this prophecy he immediately became invisible" (Ὁ μὲν θεσπίσις παραρχήσιν ἡφάνιστο). We have here, clearly, a specifically Chaldean version of the same tradition, whose original form appears in Dan. iv. The prophecy respecting the impending overthrow of the Chaldean kingdom appears to have been taken from the mouth of the Hebrew prophet, and ascribed to the great king himself, as being suddenly overwhelmed by the gods (as a נִבְּלָה, cf. Jer. xxix. 26; 2 Kings ix. 11). The banishment of the king while controlled by a bestializing mania is represented as a mysterious disappearance; and the popular tradition seeks to escape the typical allusion to the humiliation and punishment of the proud Chaldean kingdom, which is conveyed in that insanity—in that disgraceful, though temporary, degradation of its ruler, by invoking the fate which actually came upon Nebuchadnezzar, on the head of the Medo-Persian, the hated national foe. The popular wit of the ancient Orientals, which delighted to ridicule Cyrus as the Πέρσης ἡμίονος (cf. Herodotus I. 55, 91), may have been not altogether without influence in bringing about this peculiar perversion, or rather reversal, of the original prophecy, as is suggested by a comparison of Abydenus, as quoted above, with Dan. v. 21 (נִבְּלָה, "a wild ass"). NOTE 2.—The most simple solution of the historical difficulty in chap. i. 1, and that which has the greatest exegetical support, has been indicated above. It may be found in Perizonius, Origines Egyptiacæ et Babylonica, II., p. 430, and more recently in Hengstenberg, p. 54 et seq.; Delitzsch, p. 275; Keil, Eint., § 133, p. 440; and substantially, in Kranichfeld, p. 16 et seq. (but cf. infra, No. 2). It regards the verb בָּרַח as not designating the arrival of Nebuchadnezzar before Jerusalem, but as merely indicating his departure from Babylon (for the feasibility of this interpretation cf. the proof-texts cited above, to which may be added Num. xxxii. 6; Isa. vii. 24; xxi. 15, and many others; see Gesenius and Dietrich under בָּרַח, No. 3). Further incidents in the campaign, whose beginning is thus indicated are: the victory of Nebuchadnezzar over Pharaoh-Necho near Carchemish, or Circesium, on the Euphrates (an event which, according to Jer. xlvi. 2, transpired in the course of the fourth year of Jehoiakim); the pursuit of the defeated Egyptians by the Chaldeans in a southerly direction (Jer. xlvi. 5 et seq.); the arrival of the victor before Jerusalem, and the taking of the city, which followed soon afterwards (2 Kings xxiv. 1 et seq.; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 6 et seq.), and probably near the close of the fourth year of Jehoiakim, with which was connected the first deportation of captive Jews, and of a portion of the vessels of the temple, to Babylon. In the following year, and some time after the departure of the Chaldeans, the fast was proclaimed, of which Jeremiah remarks (xxxvi. 9) that it was observed in the ninth month of the fifth year of Jehoiakim. It may therefore, in analogy with Zech. viii. 19, be regarded as an anniversary of mourning, commemorative of the fall of the city in the preceding year, instead of being considered a prophylactic, penitential fast, designed to secure deliverance from the impending danger of Nebuchadnezzar's arrival, and thus as similar to those described in Joel i. 14; 2 Chron. xx. 3, 4, etc. (as Hitzig, Schmiedler, and others, hold). This simple and natural combination of events is contradicted by no statement whatever, in relation to the history of Jehoiakim and his time, whether found in this or any other prophetic or historical book. The passages Dan i. 2 and 2 Chron. xxxvi. 6 (Heb. text) do not actually state that Jehoiakim was carried to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar after his capture of Judæa; but if this were the case, their statements would by no means conflict with the account in 2 Kings xxiv. 1, according to which Jehoiakim became the tributary of Nebuchadnezzar during three years after his first subjugation, and afterwards revolted from him anew. Neither the brief sketch in Chronicles, nor the subject of Daniel, which is not specially concerned with the fortunes of that king, would require the mention of the return of Jehoiakim to his capital soon after his transportation (see on chap. i. 2); and in view of his undecided character, his revolt, after three years of vassalage, may be readily accepted, despite the fact that he had felt the proud Chaldean's power but a few years before. Nor will it be surprising that 2 Kings xxiv. 11 et seq. relates another taking of Jerusalem and deportation of many Jews so soon after the first as the reign of king Jehoiachin or Jeconiah, if we regard this second deportation (6-7 years later than the first; cf. 2 Kings xxiii. 36, with xxiv. 8) as the punishment which Nebuchadnezzar was compelled to inflict on the Jews, because of Jehoiakim's revolt, but which was not executed until some time after it was decided on, and thus affected the son and successor, before he had attained his majority, instead of crushing the father (cf. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 8-10). Finally, the designation of Nebuchadnezzar as king while engaged in his campaign against Necho and the allied Jehoiakim (Dan. i. 1),—while the successful interpretation of the dream by Daniel, which transpired, according to chap. ii. 1, in the second year of that monarch's reign—must date at least three years later, involves no contradiction whatever, if we regard the title in the first instance as proleptical. There would be no impropriety in applying it to him as joint ruler with his father and leader of his armies, even during the life of Nabopolassar, — especially if we remember that Berosus (in Josephus, contra Apion., I. 19) makes Nebuchadnezzar to achieve his great victories over the "satraps" of Egypt, Cœle-Syria, and Phœnicia, before the death of the aged Nabopolassar, and to hasten to Babylon to assume the sole government, only after receiving the tidings of his father's death (B. C. 605 or 604, and soon after the first capture of Jerusalem). Jer. xxv. 1, also, in harmony with Dan. i. 1, when correctly understood, represents the fourth year of Jehoiakim as the first of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, inasmuch as he regards the leader of the Chaldeans as the king of Babylon after his victory over Necho, whether he might be for the time the commander-in-chief and co-regent, and also the prospective successor to the throne, or not. But a comparison of Jer. lli. 31 with 2 Kings xxv. 27 shows clearly that this prophet was by no means unacquainted with the correct chronology of Nebuchadnezzar's reign (beginning with the death of Nabopolassar). This method of reconciling Dan. i. 1, with all the remaining data affecting the chronology, is so satisfactory in all respects, that we are led to reject every other combination as decidedly as we do the course of the negative criticism which finds the statements of this book in general to conflict with history, and which, therefore, despairs especially of being able to reconcile the passage chap. i. 1 with the statements in Jeremiah, Kings, and Chronicles (Bertholdt, Kirnss, Bleek, De Wette, Hitzig, etc.). Among the methods of arrangement which differ from ours we reckon:

admits indeed that Nebuchadnezzar possessed all the territory west of the Euphrates after his victory over Necho, but fixes the conquest of Judæa fully three or four years later (in the 8th year of Jehoiakim); a perversion of history that resulted probably from a misunderstanding of Jer. xxii. 18, 19, and against which Keil and Thenius (on 2 Kings in many places), Hitzig, Graf, Hasse (De prima Nebuchadnezzaris adv. Hierosol. expeditione, Bonnæ, 1856), and others have justly declared themselves.

(2.) The view of Kranichfeld, who does not date the capture of Jerusalem three or four years after Nebuchadnezzar's victory near Carchemish, but still one year later, or "not earlier than the ninth month of the fifth year of Jehoiakim," because that author believes himself compelled to regard the fast mentioned in Jer. xxxvi. 9, as having preceded the fall of the city; a hypothesis which is opposed by the fact that it fixes the transportation of Daniel and other Jewish youths to Babylon, and the beginning of their three years' course of instruction in the wisdom of the Chaldeans, before the capture of Jerusalem—thus involving an inherent improbability, and conflicting directly with Dan. i. 2 et seq. (cf. the exegetical remarks on that place).

(3.) The assumption of Kleinert (in the Dorpatser theol. Beiträge, II. 128 et seq.); Hoffmann (Die 70 Jahre des Jeremia und die 70 Jahrwochen Daniels, Nuremberg, 1886, p. 16 et seq.; Weissagung und Erfüllung, I. 297 et seq.), Hävernick (Neue krit. Unters., p. 62 et seq.), Oehler (in Tholuck's Literar. Anzeiger, 1849, p. 395 et seq.), and Zündel (p. 20 et seq.), that Jerusalem was taken by Nebuchadnezzar a year before the battle of Carchemish. What Keil has remarked (Eintl., § 133, p. 440) will suffice to refute this view: "This combination is untenable, because it cannot be reconciled with Jer. xxv. In that passage the fourth year of Jehoiakim is mentioned, beyond the possibility of being mistaken, as marking an epoch for the theocracy and for all the nations of Western Asia, in which the Lord would bring Nebuchadnezzar and all the tribes of the north against Jerusalem, that the land of Judæa might become a wilderness and its inhabitants, together with all neighboring nations, be subjected to Babylon during seventy years (chap. xxv. 9-11). So emphatic a prophecy in the mouth of Jeremiah would be utterly incomprehensible, if Jerusalem had been taken by Nebuchadnezzar and Jehoiakim been made tributary a year previously, while in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, which the prophet so strongly emphasizes (xxv. 3 et seq.), nothing of moment had transpired, and even later in the reign of Jehoiakim nothing had occurred beyond his revolt from the Chaldeans some years afterward, by which he became involved in hostilities with bands of Chaldeans, Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites (2 Kings xxiv. 2). But this view becomes wholly untenable from the consideration that, at a time when the Egyptian king, who had advanced towards Carchemish at the beginning of Jehoiakim's reign, was doubtless in possession of that fortress, Nebuchadnezzar could not possibly pass by this hostile force and proceed to Judæa, while exposing Babylonia to so powerful a foe. But had this been possible, and, incredible as it is, had it actually occurred, it is certain that Pharaoh-Necho would not have permitted him quietly to operate in the rear of his army and overcome Jehoiakim his vassal; nor would Nebuchadnezzar, after conquering Jerusalem, have returned to capture Carchemish and defeat his principal enemy, instead of proceeding to Egypt, and making an easy conquest of the country, which was deprived of its defenders. But aside from this, the method under consideration is irreconcilable with the extracts from Berosus furnished by Josephus (Ant. X. 11, 1; contra Ap., I. 19)." Views exactly similar are expressed by Hitzig, p. 3, and Kranichfeld, p. 17 et seq.

NOTE 3.—Is the Belshazzar of chap. v. the same as Evil-merodach, the son and immediate successor of Nebuchadnezzar, or is he identical with Nabonidus, the last Babylonian king prior to the Persian invasion? The latter alternative, which is advocated by Jerome (Comm. in Dan., V. 1) and more recently by Hengstenberg, Hävernick (in his Commentary), Auberlen, Keil, and in substance also by Pusey (with the distinction, however, that he considers Belshazzar as the son and co-regent of Nabonidus), is supported (1) by the fact that according to Herodotus, I. 191, and Xenophon, Cyrop., VII. 5, 15 et seq., Babylon was taken by the Persians while a luxurious banquet was in progress, and (2) by the circumstance that Herodotus, I. 188, calls Labynetus (=Nabonidus) a son of Nebuchadnezzar, with which the introduction of the queen-mother in chap. v. 10 (possibly the Nitocris of Herodotus, or the Amuheer of Alexander Polyhistor), and the express mention of Nebuchadnezzar as the father of Belshazzar in chap. v. 11, would seem to correspond. But the following considerations militate against this view, and favor the alternative which identifies Belshazzar with Evil-merodach: (1) Both the Babylonian historians, Berosus (in Josephus, Ant., X. 11, 1, and contra Apion., I. 20) and Abydenus (in Euseb., Prepar. Ev., IX. 41, and Chron. Arm., p. 28, ed. Mai) agree, in contrast with Herodotus, in representing Nabonidus, the last Babylonian king, as a usurper and throne-robber of non-royal descent, who conspired with a number of others to deprive Laborasoarchad, the youthful grandson of Nebuchadnezzar, of his throne and life, and who afterward fell into the hands of the Persians, not at the taking of Babylon by Cyrus during a royal banquet, but some time after the capture of his capital. They relate that, having been defeated in the open field, he threw himself into the fortress of Borsippa, where he capitulated to Cyrus after the fall of Babylon, by whom he was exiled to Carmania (or, as Abydenus states, he was made governor of that province). That these traditions of Berosus and Abydenus by no means owe their origin to a boastful tendency, representing the Chaldean national interests in a one-sided manner, but as certainly comprehend a part of the truth, as do the accounts of Herodotus and Xenophon, has been shown by Kranichfeld, as cited above, in the clearest and profoundest manner.* The identity of Daniel's Belshazzar with Evil-merodach is confirmed (2) by the repeated mention of Nebuchadnezzar as his father (נב, chap. v. 11, 13, 18, 22), which could, in every case, be applied to a more distant relationship, e. g., grandfather and grandson, only by a forced interpretation;† and further (3) by the circumstance that, according to Berosus (Josephus, as above), Evil-merodach also died a violent death, having been murdered by his brother-in-law Neriglissar (cf. Dan. v. 80). No arguments against this identification can be drawn (a) from the relation of Dan. v. 80 to vi. 1—since these passages are not necessarily connected (see exeget. remarks); nor (b) from Dan. viii. 1, where a "third year of Belshazzar is mentioned, while Berosus and the Ptolemaic canon limit the reign of Evil-merodach to two years—since these latter authorities may have slightly postdated the years of that reign, i. e., may have included the first year, as being incomplete, in the reign of Nebuchadnezzar; and in fact the canon of Syncellus appears to assign three years to the reign of Evil-merodach; nor (c) from the prophetic descriptions in Isa. xxi. 5, and Jer. li. 39, which predict that Babylon should fall in its dissipation, but by no means assert that it should meet this fate while a banquet or carousal was in progress; nor finally (d) from Jer. lii. 31, and 2 Kings xxv. 27, where the immediate successor of Nebuchadnezzar is called Evil-merodach, as in profane authorities;—for the anomalous name in Dan. v. may be readily explained on the ground of the very general custom of Oriental sovereigns to bear several names (cf. M. v. Niebuhr Gesch. Assurs und Babels, p. 20 et seq., where reference is made to Sargon=Shalmaneser,‡ Asshur-danipal=Kineladan, and many others), and nothing is more probable than that Evil-merodach bore, in addition to his proper name, a title containing the name of the god Bel, which title was similar to the appellation that Daniel himself, according to chap. i. 5, was compelled to assume. And it is probable that the prophet designedly avoided the real name of the king, when writing of Evil-merodach, on account of that homonymy (see on chap. v. 1 and 12). Beyond this, the fact that the name Belshazzar occurs as belonging to Chaldean kings is substantially established by the notice deciphered on the cylinders of Mugheir by Oppert and Rawlinson, which refers to a "Belsarussur, son of Nabomit or Nabumtuk" (see Zeitschrift der deutsch-morgenl. Gesellsch., viii. 598; Athenaeum, 1854, p. 841); although the identity of this Belsarussur with the Belshazzar of Daniel, which is asserted by Rawlinson and Pusey (Daniel the Prophet, p. 402), appears to be highly improbable, since this son of Nabonidus cannot be shown to have been either of royal rank nor descended from Nebuchadnezzar. This method, which identifies Belshazzar with Evil-merodach, is supported by Marsham (Canon chron., p. 596 et seq.), Hofmann (Die 70 Jahre des Jeremia, etc., p. 44 et seq.), Hävernick (Neus krit. Unters., p. 71 et seq.), Oehler (in Tholuck's Anzeiger, as above, p. 398), Hupfeld (Exercit. Herodot., spec. II., Rintel, 1843, p. 46), Schulze (Cyrus der Grosse, in the Stud. u. Krit., 1853, No. 3), M. v. Niebuhr (Geschichte Assurs und Babels, Berlin, 1857), Röckerath (Bibl. Chronologie, Munster, 1865, p. 128), Zündel (Krit. Unters., p. 29 et seq.), Kranichfeld (p. 24 et seq.), Fuller (Der Prophet Daniel, p. 12), A. Schencher (Assyrische Forschungen, in Heidenheim's Vierteljahrsschrift, etc., Vol. IV., No. 1), Kliefoth (p. 146 et seq.), and others. §

* See especially p. 35 et seq.: "The remarkable incident of the mysterious writing (chap. v. 5 et seq.), which raised Daniel to be the third ruler over the kingdom, and which of itself would have aroused attention and excited remark, the interpretation which connected two events as contemporary, and the fact that some of the events foretold in the mysterious writing actually came to pass the same night—all these taken together might, in the course of time, give rise, even among the natives, to the legend that the remaining facts contained in the writing and its interpretation transpired in that night as well; and this might occur still more easily among foreigners, in view of the clouded form which the tradition would naturally assume among them, as, e. g., in the case of the Persians. Whether the recollection of the writing and interpretation were preserved or not would probably not modify the legend. In this way the Persian and Median tradition might easily conceive of the natural son of Nebuchadnezzar, who was murdered in that night, as being also the last Chaldean king, and could therefore designate him by the name Δαβύρρος, which is found to correspond with the name of the last king in Berosus—Ναβόνιδος. In addition to the name which Herodotus gives to the king in question in agreement with Berosus, such a confusion of two distinct facts by the tradition is confirmed by the circumstance that these authors, in contrast with Xenophon, speak of a battle which preceded the taking of Babylon, and further, that Herodotus does not allude to the presence of Nabonidus, nor to his death, on the occasion of the fall of the city—thus agreeing with Berosus, who relates that that king had retreated towards Borsippa. Thus the facts in relation to the fall of the Chaldean dynasty, as they are preserved in Berosus, were thrown together and commingled with the statements of Daniel, concerning the wonderful writing (in which the end of the king and of his empire were co-ordinated); and this cloudy tradition is before us in the accounts of Herodotus and Xenophon, while the correct account, as it is given in Dan. v., forms the transition from the sketch in Berosus, to the form which it assumed in Herodotus and Xenophon."

‡ [The cuneiform inscriptions show that Sargon was Shalmaneser's son and successor.]

§ [It is beset, however, with many insuperable difficulties, the chief of which are cited and but imperfectly met in the

Together with the hypothesis of Pusey, already referred to, we are compelled to reject that indicated by Hofmann (Die 70 Jahre, etc., p. 44) and adopted by Delitzsch (p. 278) and by Ebrard (Die Offenb. Joh., p. 55), which identifies Belshazzar with Laborasoarchad, the nephew of Evil-merodach and son of Neriglissar (and by descent from him, or rather from his consort, the grandson of Nebuchadnezzar). This view becomes untenable, because it is opposed by the expression, "Nebuchadnezzar, thy father" (נְבֻכַדְנֶצְרַר אָבִי), in chap. v. 11, by the brief reign of the child Laborasoarchad, extending, according to Berosus, only over nine months (cf. with this Dan. viii. 1), and finally, by the impossibility of substituting Nebo-Shadrach for Laborasoarchad, and Bel-Shadrach for that; for, according to Isa. xli. 1, Bel and Nebo are not the same, but different divinities.

NOTE 4.—The identity of Darius the Mede (chap. vi. 1) with the Cyaxares of Xenophon, the son of Astyages and father-in-law of Cyrus, as well as his co-regent for a time, may be still more positively established than that of Belshazzar (chap. v. 1) with Evil-merodach. Even the critical opponents of this book generally acknowledge the reign of such a Cyaxares, as intervening between the Median Astyages and the Persian Cyrus, and thereby recognize the truth of Xenophon's account, despite its being found in the Cyropædia—a work which so largely bears the character of a romance (Bertholdt, Gesenius, Von Lengerke, and even Hitzig; also Holtzmann, in the Deutsch-morgenl. Zeitschr., VIII. 3, 547, etc.). The existence of this second Cyaxares, as the immediate predecessor of Cyrus, is attested, not merely by numerous statements in the Cyropædia (I. 4, 7; 5, 2, 5; III. 8, 20; VIII. 5, 19; 7, 1), but also by Æschylus in his Πέρσαι, v. 762-65: Μῆδος γὰρ ἦν ὁ πρῶτος ἡγεμὼν στρατοῦ (Astyages), Ἄλλος δὲ κείνου παῖς (Cyaxares) τὸν ἔργον ἔσσυτο Τρίτος δ' ἂν αὐτοῦ Κύρος, εὐδαίμων ἀνὴρ, etc., and by Abydenus, in Euseb., Præp. Evang., IX. 14, where the prophecy of Nebuchadnezzar concerning the fall of Babylon as quoted above (Note 1), declares with reference to Cyrus, that "the Mede, the pride of the Assyrians, should be his helper" (οὗ δὲ συνπαῖτος ἔσται Μῆδος, τὸ Ἀσσυρίων ἀσχημα), and in addition, by Josephus (Ant., X. 11, 4), who states that the Greeks gave "another name" to the son of Astyages—the Darius of Daniel—which was doubtless Kvaḡáps, as transmitted by Xenophon. Nor can the circumstance that Herodotus does not mention this Cyaxares, and makes Cyrus the immediate successor of his grandfather Astyages, reflect doubt on the existence of this intervening king, since the remark of Gesenius (Thesaur., p. 350) holds good of Herodotus as a writer of the earlier Assyrio-Babylonian and Medo-Persian history: "Solere Herodotum prætermisiss mediocribus hominibus ex longa rerum serie nonnisi unum alterumque memorare reliquis eminentiorem, ut aliunde constat et ipsa Babylonica historia docet, ex qua unius Nitocris regina mentionem injicit, reliquos reges usque ad Labynetum, ne Nebuchadnezzare quidem excepto, silentio transit." The only real difficulty connected with the identification of the Median king in chap. vi. and the Cyaxares of the Cyropædia consists in the name Darius (דָּרְיוֹשׁ) given to the former. It is to be observed, however, in relation to this circumstance:

(1.) In general, the bearing of two names is no more remarkable among the Ancient Median and Persian kings, than among the Assyrio-Babylonian; for the two-fold language and literature which all these nations employed promoted the use of various names to designate one and the same person, as did also the custom of connecting honorable appellatives with the proper names of kings and other eminent persons; cf. note 3.

(2.) The names דָּרְיוֹשׁ = old Persic Dárjauus, and Kvaḡáps = the Pers. or Med. Uvakshatara, appear to be related in one sense, inasmuch as the former seems to be synonymous with "holder, or governor" (ἰσχυρὸς, sceptrum tenens), and the latter with "direct," or "actual ruler," and the one to be of Persian origin, the other of Median (Delitzsch, p. 278).

(3.) Both names, and especially the latter, appear to have been stereotyped royal honorary titles, and, accordingly, to have been conferred on various persons; for

(a.) Cyaxares I., the father of Astyages and ally of Nabopolassar and conqueror of Nineveh (639-604), bore this name.

(b.) Consequently it must have descended to Astyages himself; for, according to Dan. ix. 1, the father of Darius the Mede was named Ahasuerus, the Hebrew form of which, אֲחַשְׁוֵרֶשׁ, is analogous in sound with the Persian Uvakshatara, and also with the Greek Kvaḡáps. But further

(c.) Cyrus himself appears occasionally to have borne the name of Cyaxares or Uvakshatara as an honorary title; for, according to Holtzmann (Deutsch-morgenl. Zeitschrift, as above), an old Persian cuneiform inscription contains the names Cyrus (Qurus) and Uvakshatara in immediate consecution: "Ego Cyrus Cyaxares," which may be synonymous with "Ego Cyrus imperator" (cf. Niebuhr, Gesch. Ass. und Bab., p. 214, note 4), but can scarcely be rendered by "Ego Cyrus Cyaxares, sc. filius," as Holtzmann suggests. Finally,

(d.) The name Cyaxares corresponds also to Xerxes, as is indicated by the Pers. form Kshjársa or Kshjársa, an abbreviation or contraction of Uvakshatara; also by the Hebrew

דָּרְיָוֶשׁ; and since a Persian king is designated, in Ezra iv. 6, by the latter name, who can hardly be any other than Cambyses, in view of the chronology; and further, since the Ahasuerus of the book of Esther is the same as Artaxerxes I. Longimanus (instead of Xerxes, as most moderns since Scaliger hold), according to the opinion which prevails in the Septuagint, Josephus, and the ancients generally, and which has not been refuted,* we may regard the name Cyaxares-Xerxes as being in fact a standing title, which descended from the last Median kings to all the Achæmenians. Similarly, the early Median kings seem generally to have borne the name Ajis-Dahaka or Ashdahak (i.e., dragon) since both Deioces, who founded Ecbatana about 700 (Herod. I. 102), and Cyaxares I., who, according to Berosus and Abydenus, was also called Astyages (i.e., Ashdahak), and also Astyages, the father of Cyaxares II., were designated by this title. The descent of names to others also finds its parallel among the rulers of other ancient Oriental kingdoms, e.g., of Armenia, Cappadocia, Pontus, and even among the Egyptians after Ptolemy (cf. Niebuhr, as above, pp. 32, 44, etc.). It might possibly be shown that the name Darius (Darjauus) belongs to this class of standing royal titles among the Persians, from the designation of the golden coins of that kingdom as Darica. This designation dates back, indeed, to Darius Hystaspis, according to Herodotus, IV. 166, but according to Suidas, Harpocration, and the scholiast on Aristophanes' Ecclesiaz., it traces its origin "to an older king of that name"—who, however, is not necessarily the same as Daniel's Darius-Cyaxares (as also the reference in the Chron. Armen. of Eusebius, p. 58: "Darius rex de regione depulit aliquantulum," need not be applied to the Darius of this book). But in any case, it is clear from what has been stated, that the difference between the names Cyaxares and Darius does not compel us to assume a difference between the persons who are thus designated by Xenophon and Daniel, and that all other views become superfluous in proportion as the identity of the two becomes probable. Of such we mention that of M. v. Niebuhr (pp. 91, 223), which identifies Darius, Dan. vi. 1 et seq., with the last Median king Astyages, who is said to have subjugated Babylon after the death of Belshazzar or Evil-merodach, and to have been deprived of his Median kingdom in the following year by Cyrus, so that Babylon again became independent; that of Kleinert (in the Dorp. Beiträge), which assumes that Darius the Mede was a natural son of Cyaxares I., and younger brother to Astyages, while Cyaxares II. was his nephew and shared in his government; and that of Schulze (Cyrus der Grosse, in the Stud. u. krit., as above, p. 685), which is also favored by Zündel (p. 86 et seq.), by which Cyaxares II., who is held to be identical with Darius the Mede, was not the son, but a younger brother of Astyages, and therefore a son of Cyaxares I. (Ahasuerus, Dan. ix. 1), whom Xenophon erroneously transformed from a Cyaxarides into an Astyagides, by which error the great-uncle of Cyrus was converted into his uncle. The correct view is advocated by Josephus (supra), Jerome on Dan. vi. 1, and among moderns, Offerhaus (Spicilegia histor.-chronolog., lib. III., Gron., 1739, p. 265 ss.), Jehring (Bibliotheka Bremensis, VIII. 580 ss.), Gesenius (Thesaur., I. 349 et seq.), Winer (Realw., I. 250), Hengstenberg (p. 48 et seq.), Hävernick (Comm., p. 203 et seq.; Neue krit. Unters., p. 74 et seq.), Keil (p. 457), Delitzsch (p. 278), Kranichfeld (p. 39 et seq.), Auberlen (pp. 16, 212), Fuller (p. 141), and Kliefoth (p. 160 et seq.).† In relation to the passage, chap. vi. 2 (the 120 satraps of Darius), which apparently conflicts with the view advocated above, see the exegetical remarks on that place, where also the effort of Ebrard (Die Offenb. Johannes erklärt, p. 55 et seq.), and several others, to identify Darius with the Nabonidus of Berosus will be sufficiently considered.

§ 9. AUTHENTICITY OF THE BOOK (Concluded).

e. Examination of the INTERNAL reasons against its genuineness, which are based on its MIRACLES and PROPHECIES.

The narration of miracles and prophecies by Daniel is no more irreconcilable with the view that the book originated with him than are the historico-chronological difficulties which are asserted to be insuperable; for

(1.) The miracles recorded in the first part, and particularly the preservation of the three men in the flames of the fiery furnace (chap. iii.), the appearance of the mysterious hand upon the wall (chap. v. 5), and the deliverance of Daniel from the den of lions (chap. vi.), present no features whatever which fundamentally distinguish them from other miracles of the Old-Testament stage of revelation, or which mark them as the invention of a later period. On

* [But this identification of the Ahasuerus of Esther with Artaxerxes Longimanus instead of Xerxes is beset with so many difficulties that it is now almost universally rejected.]

† [On the ground of the superior authority, however, of the other Greek historians over the single testimony of the romance of Xenophon, this identification of "Darius the Mede" with Cyaxares II., or even the existence of the latter, is still strongly contested by many writers on classical history, who do not seem to allow the passage in Daniel sufficient weight in the discussion.]

the contrary, the principal periods of Old-Testament development in its earlier stages, and especially the Mosaic period and that of Elijah and Elisha, that is to say, the primitive stages of the legal and prophetic periods, abound with incidents of a still more extraordinary character; e.g., the passages through the Red Sea and the Jordan; the pillar of cloud and of fire; the writing of the law on tables by the hand of God (Ex. xxxi. 18; xxxii. 16); the consuming of Nadab and Abihu by fire from the Lord (Lev. x. 1); the feeding of Elijah at the brook Cherith by ravens (1 Kings xvii. 4); the destruction of Ahaziah's captain and his fifty in the presence of Elijah (2 Kings i. 10 et seq.); Elisha's raising of the dead and providing of food; the floating iron in the Jordan, etc. If the Divine economy of revelation required such miracles for the founding of the theocracy, for the attestation of its principal bearers and supporters, and for the inauguration of the prophetic institution, why should it not require them at this juncture, when the continuation of the theocracy was endangered by an oppressive heathendom, which was to be feared the more, because of its sensual, luxurious, and syncretistic character, and when a large portion of the people had yielded to these evil influences to an extent that threatened the utter absorption of the worship of Jehovah by the conglomerate religions of Babylonia and Medo-Persia? The critical epoch at the close of the captivity required—with an urgency almost equal to that which existed in the opening period of the Old Covenant—that Jehovah should display his power in the face of the proud world-kings and their scornful rulers, who laid claim to Divine honors and even to deification, and that He should thus at once confirm the tottering faith of His followers by appearing as the same faithful and living God of the covenant, and crush the insolent daring and silly superstition of those tyrants, by demonstrating His right to rank as the King of all kings, and as the Lord of heaven and earth. Wonders of a similar character, although not so striking and extraordinary as those in Daniel, had been wrought by the principal representative of the prophetic office, as early as the age of Isaiah and Hezekiah, while Shalmaneser and Sennacherib were bringing like oppression and temptations to bear on the faithful ones among the people of God (e.g., the retrogression of the shadow on the dial of Ahaz; the healing of Hezekiah, etc.). Toward the close of the exile such Divine self-attestations were repeated, but in increased measure; and the agent was again the leading prophet of the time, who thus became the analogue and successor of Isaiah. These facts will be the less surprising when we reflect that it was now important to make a profound impression, not only on the members of the theocracy, but likewise on their oppressors, the heathen rulers; an impression such as the miracles of Moses were designed to produce on Pharaoh, and such as actually was produced in the case of the Chaldean and Medo-Persian antitypes of Pharaoh—unless, indeed, the statements relating to repeated acts of homage rendered to Daniel's God by Nebuchadnezzar and Darius (Dan. ii. 46 et seq.; iii. 28 et seq.; iv. 31 et seq.; vi. 29 et seq.), and also that concerning the public recognition of the supreme divinity of Israel's God by Cyrus in the edict of liberation (Ezra i. 1-4), which is supported by other historical authorities, are to be remanded to the realm of myths and fables—a conclusion which, in the latter instance, only the most radical hyper-criticism could reach. This comparison with the Mosaic period affords the only valid basis on which to form a proper estimate of the age of Daniel, with its peculiar national conditions and its miracles, since the sufferings and trials of that period, which assailed the faith of God's children and threatened the further existence of the theocratic community, were met, like those of the captivity, on foreign soil, in the house of bondage and the land of misery. The sufferings, together with the inducements to idolatry, of the time of the Judges, were experienced by Israel on its own domestic soil; the afflictions of the period subsequent to the exile, e.g., in the times of Ezra and of the Maccabees, likewise befell God's people while dwelling in the land of their fathers, and for that very reason were less dangerous to their religious and national life, than were the sufferings during either of those seasons of tribulation and persecution, which were undergone in "a strange land" (Psa. cxxxvii. 4). It is, therefore, decidedly impertinent and unhistorical to allege, as do the opponents of the genuineness of this book, that it owes its origin solely to a supposed analogy between the periods of the captivity and of the Asmonæans, and to ascribe to this invented Daniel the design of exhibiting the humiliations experienced by Nebuchadnezzar and Darius

Medus, in consequence of the Divine miracles and of the gracious strength and unyielding firmness of the theocratic witnesses to the truth, as a warning to Antiochus Epiphanes, the imitator of the religious tyranny of those monarchs. A certain typical analogy between Nebuchadnezzar and Antiochus may readily be granted; but the fundamental difference, or rather contrast, between these two periods of persecution, that Israel suffered during the one while in captivity, and during the other while domiciled on its native soil, is none the less apparent. The inability of Israel to resist the oppressors with armed force, and also the necessity for God to interfere with his wonder-working power, resulted immediately from the conditions of the former instance; while in the latter case the nation could struggle for its country, its sanctuary, and its faith, and therefore required no other miracles than those of warlike enterprise and of devoted courage that even courted martyrdom, such as are described in the Maccabean books (see note 1).

(2.) Nor can the prophecies contained in this book be made to serve as witnesses against its genuineness; for, despite their visional form throughout (which, however, they bear in common with the former half of Zechariah, with numerous portions of Ezekiel, and even with extended sections of older prophetic books, e.g., Amos, Isaiah, etc.), they exhibit the general characteristic features of Old-Testament prophecy everywhere, since they relate to the conditions and requirements of the time, are steadily possessed with the idea of the triumph of God's kingdom in its conflict with the world-powers, and develop this conflict in harmony with its growing intensity down to the time of the final Messianic triumph and judgment, in descriptions that become more and more minute as they progress. The book describes this Messianic period during which the Deliverer is to appear, as immediately connected with the resurrection of the just and the unjust to their final judgment (chap. xii. 1-8); and it assigns that event to a time that follows closely on the death of a raging Antichrist, whose description seems to be largely met in many traits belonging to Antiochus Epiphanes (see chap. xi. 21-45). But it does not follow from this that its author was a contemporary of that king, who described the historical events from the captivity to his time in the style of prophecy; since this feature is merely another illustration of the general law of prophetic visional perspective. At the farthest, certain of the more detailed predictions of the section (chap. x. and xi.) relating to the development of the world-powers after the fall of the Persian kingdom, might, as has already been observed (§ 1, note 2, and § 9), be regarded as the later additions of an apocalyptist living in the time of Antiochus, who sought to give a more definite form to the prophecy of Daniel. Aside from these external and unessential singularities, there is included in the prophetic contents of the book nothing connected with the development of the world-kingsdoms until the advent of the Messiah; that might not have been foreseen and predicted by a Divinely-enlightened seer in the closing period of the captivity. Although such a seer had witnessed the supplanting of but one great world-kingdom by another, and although the extended range of observation which he enjoyed might reveal in the more distant political horizon but a single additional power in the progress of development; still nothing is easier to conceive than that, by the enlightening influence of the Holy Spirit, a long succession of world-monarchies, previous to Messiah's kingdom, should open to his vision, and that he should symbolically represent this succession of powers by certain figures taken from the products of Babylonian and Medo-Persian culture and art, as in the visions of chap. vii.-x. Nor do the attempts to reach a more exact chronological exposition of the development represented by the succession of these kingdoms, which are found more especially in the last four chapters of the book, involve any feature that does not suggest a parallel, on the one hand in the earlier prophets (e.g., Isa. vii. 8; xxiii. 15; Jer. xxv. 11 et seq.; xxix. 10), and on the other, in the mathematical studies of Babylonian astronomers, and the attempted application of these to (astrological) calculations of the future. The indefinite character which probably attached to these symbolico-chronological descriptions of the future in their original form, did not correspond to the historical succession of events as such, and may have been now and then removed by the hand of the later reviser in order to give place to features harmonizing more exactly with the facts. But, upon the whole, even these chapters contain far more prophecy of an ideally descriptive character than of detailed historical prediction, calculated to excite the suspicion of a composition subsequent to the event; and the book, therefore, bears the character of a work whose origin during the captivity, and whose inspired prophetic nature are decidedly more probable than its forged and simulated composition in the Maccabæan age. Especially is the mention by Peter of an anxious looking for the period in which the Messiah should appear (1 Pet. i. 10-12), as a characteristic of the inspired prophets of the Old Covenant, more directly applicable to this work than to any other prophetic book in the canon (see notes 2 and 8).

NOTE 1.—In relation to the miracles of the time of Daniel, as demanded by the oppressed condition of Israel (see § 1, note 1), and especially the remarks of Hävernicks there quoted, compare further, Hävernicks, Nous brih. Unters., p. 85: "Without such a revelation of Jehovah, the theocracy would have been involved in heathendom, or absorbed by it. Jehovah's signs and wonders showed, despite the presence of the powerful world-kingsdoms, that He still was the King of kings, and through them the question of the continued existence of the theocracy was really decided." See ibid., p. 87, for the fact that the Asmonæan period, on the contrary, was characterized by an absence of miracles: "In the Maccabæan period the forsaking of the nation by God was manifested precisely in a manner that excluded miracles. The dead form remained to the people in petrified traditions; but the freshness and life of the old theocratic and prophetic spirit was wanting. This consciousness (that the ancient prophetism with its miraculous power must first be revived) finds expression in the monuments of that time with sufficient clearness. The first book of Maccabees has not a single reference to miracles; the disheartened age cannot even expect them," etc. See, further, Kranichfeld, who observes, in correspondence with the parallelism above established between the miracles of Daniel and those of Moses and Elijah, "Precisely the periods of an especially hopeless condition of the theocracy are found to present suitable conditions for the intervention of the Scriptural miracle, designed, as it is, to strengthen the theocratic consciousness." The assertion of Hitzig, that a susceptibility of the human mind and disposition for the usual influence of especially wonderful events, i.e., a faith in them, could not have been developed during the "night of the exile," is without either historical or psychological support. If there was ever a night of discouragement for Israel, it was in the circumstances of the Egyptian period, as described in Exod. vi. 9, 12; yet that period contained the germ of a far-reaching exaltation of faith and trust, such as is frequently found in intimate connection with resignation and a gloomy sense of both outward and spiritual oppression. The 137th Psalm, as an example of the actual current of theocratic thought, may serve to indicate, that during the "night of the exile" as well, complaints and tears might consist with an internal profound and glowing excitation which longs for the Divine Deliverer. It has already been remarked that the descriptions relating to the circumstances of the captivity, in the second part of Isaiah's prophecies, represent an apparently hopeless demoralization of the religious and national spirit as coexistent with the strengthening and elevation of the theocratic consciousness by means of miracles. The extent to which the prophetic office of Ezekiel—the prophet of the opening period of the captivity—corresponds, in view of the conditions of the time, and of his personal traits, with that of Daniel, the prophet of the closing period, and also the significant contrast between them, are remarked by Hävernicks, as cited above: "While the duty of influencing the captives during the exile through the word is devolved mainly on Ezekiel, everything in the position of Daniel unfolds a different field of activity, viz.: to defend the rights of the people of God in their relations to the heathen. This peculiar duty constituted a man of action (like Moses, Elijah, etc.), who opposed the superior Divine wisdom to the confused wisdom of men, and brought the deeds of victorious kings into contrast with the more powerful energy of God. His relation to Ezekiel is therefore complementary, and thus becomes a truly glorious testimony to the grace of God," etc. Keil, pp. 459, 461, shows the injustice of the charge occasionally raised against the author (e.g., by Von Lengerke, Dan., p. LXII.), that he is guilty of a "useless expenditure" or "needless accumulation" of miracles. As the really miraculous is confined to the three wonders mentioned in chapters iii., v., and vi., there can be no reason for the assertion of such an accumulation of wonders or rage for miracles on the part of the author, especially when compared with the far greater number of the miracles of Moses or Elisha. But it has already been observed in § 4, note 2, as a characteristic peculiarity of Daniel's method of narration, that he does not avoid the recognition of the Divine power and grace, as displayed in miracles, but rather avails himself of every opportunity afforded by his experience to call attention to the hand of Providence, and to place the events of his time in the light of a childlike believing and theocractical pragmatism. It must be reserved for the detailed exposition of the historical part to illustrate more specifically this peculiarity, in which the books of Esther and of Chronicles likewise participate, and which we would characterize as the theocratic chronicling style of the captivity and the succeeding period (see the observations on chap. iii.).

NOTE 2.—In opposition to the assertion of Lücke, that the apocalyptic character of our book as a prophecy, necessarily involves its pseudonymy, see above, § 1, note 2. It is important, in view of the assertion by Bleek (Einl., § 259), that "the especially definite character of the predictions extends precisely to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, and no farther," to observe the many obscure, indefinite, and ambiguous features which are found in the prophecies in the second part of the book, and which indicate with sufficient clearness that the position of the writer was that of a seer who looks forward, and whose descriptions are therefore only ideal, instead of that of a prophetic historian who recalls the past. Compare Kranichfeld, p. 58: "The prophecies of the book of Daniel, in their descriptions, are never independent of the course of history as such, and nowhere bear the character of absolute, unconditioned, and therefore miraculous predictions. They do not contain a single paragraph (?) which, when viewed entirely apart from its fulfilment, might not be considered as merely the independent development of a theocratical thought, or complexity of thoughts, founded on historical facts. For this reason detailed descriptions of the course of future events are met with which do not fully correspond to the actual history; and this is as readily conceivable as it is natural. The critics have no difficulty about explaining away such differences, which become especially prominent on a comparison of the description of the last heathen kingdom and its final conformation in the times of the Seleucidae and the Maccabees (chap. x. and xi.); and the product of such arbitrary interpretation is ranged with the remaining occasional correspondences of the prophecy with the course of history, which are natural, because they have their basis in religious and ethical truth. The resultant caricature of Scriptural prophecy, similar to that presented in the later so-called apocalypse of Judaism, the Jewish Sibyls, the book of Enoch, the 4th book of Esdras, thus, in the end, becomes a certain prize." The opinion here expressed is correct in all its essential features, and will bear modifying only in the single statement relating to the alleged unexceptionally ideal character of the descriptions of the future, contained in chapters x. and xi. We regard it as exceedingly probable that in this connection, but only here, occasional vaticinia ex eventu were interpolated by a later hand, and doubtless by a theocrat of the time of Antiochus Epiphanes; for the congruity between the prophecy and the facts by which it is fulfilled, is frequently more apparent than the fundamental law of Old-Testament prophecy appears to warrant (cf. § 1, note 2). None of the special predictions which are usually cited as being analogous to Dan. x., xi.—whether Isa. vii. 8 (possibly an interpolated passage), Isa. xlii. 1-14; xxi. 1-10; Jer. xxv. 11 et seq.; xxix. 10; or Ezek. xxiv. 25-27, etc.—do, in fact, compare with Dan. xi. in point of remarkable and often directly particularizing correspondence between prophecy and fulfilment; cf. Auberlen, p. 71 et seq.; Hengstenberg, p. 178 et seq.* The decidedly eschatological character of chap. xii. 1 et seq., may be insisted on, as a special argument against the assertion that the book was written from the point of view which prevailed in the Maccabæan age, and that, more particularly, its final chapters were composed "immediately after the death of Antiochus Epiphanes became known" (Bleek). That passage does not merely assign the beginning of the future Messianic period to the time immediately following the death of Antichrist (xi. 45), but also its close, and may therefore have originated with a prophet belonging to an earlier age, who saw the anti-Christian tyrant as a vision of the distant future (cf. similar perspective descriptions of the future, following upon gloomy prophecies of evil, in Amos ix. 11 et seq.; Mic. vii. 12 et seq.; Isa. xi. 1 et seq., etc.), but can hardly have emanated from a designing forger of the troubled times of the Asmoneans. To employ this passage as a proof of the origin of the book under Epiphanes, or to postpone the composition of the closing chapters, x.-xii., until even after the death of that tyrant, is to manifest a gross misapprehension of the nature of Messianic prophecy—its complex and apotelesmatic character, its necessary co-ordinating of the near and distant future in perspective vision (cf. Delitzsch, p. 286). Compare infra, on chap. vii. 8; ix. 24 et seq.; and see the exegetical remarks in general, which may serve to explain in detail how difficult it is to adapt this book to the Maccabæan period, in the character of a pseudo-prophetic work.

NOTE 3.—With reference to the difficult, but, for the exegesis of this book, exceedingly important question, "Which world-kingsdoms of the last pre-Christian time correspond to the four characteristic figures of Daniel's monarchies (chap. ii. 31 et seq.; vii. 2 et seq.)?" we offer the preliminary remark, that the interpretation by which the fourth kingdom represents the Roman supremacy—an interpretation which was accepted by Josephus and a majority of the church fathers, and which has become traditional and is in almost universal favor—does not to us seem to meet the sense of the prophet.* Nor can we, with Ephraem Syrus, Hitzig, Ewald, Delitzsch, and others, find in this fourth kingdom the Macedonian or Grecian empire of Alexander the Great, together with the kingdoms of the Diadochi, which sprang from it; but instead, the divided nature of the fourth kingdom (chap. ii. 41) appears to us to symbolize only the empire of the Greek Diadochi after Alexander, while the kingdom of Alexander himself must be considered as the third. See above, § 8 [also § 10, Notes 3 and 4]; and compare the exegesis of chap. ii. 40 et seq. See ibid. in relation to the number four and its symbolical meaning as applied to the world-kingdoms. Meanwhile compare Kranichfeld, p. 57: "It is an unquestionable peculiarity of Daniel that he attempts to cover this period by four of such kingdoms; but the general application by the Hebrews of the number four to extensions of time or space is equally unquestioned (cf. the four winds, Dan. vii. 2; viii. 8; the four quarters of the heavens, four ages of the world, four principal metals, etc.). If we therefore consider the composer of the book to have been a person who estimated the political condition of his time and its consequences understandingly and naturally, and at the same time clung decidedly and immovably to his faith in the realization of the Messianic hopes which rested on previous prophecies, it will be evident that the Messianic period would present itself to his mind as connected with the fourth, i.e., extreme development of heathen supremacy, which was so significant to the reflections of a scholar as such; and this conception would be as natural as that, for instance, of Isaiah and Jeremiah, in whom the predominance of religious and theocratic thought, together with the corresponding subordination of political interests as such, produced an association of the Messianic period with the fall of Babylon," etc. See the same author, p. 58, in relation to the peculiarly definite character of the chronological predictions of Daniel: "There is not a single prediction relating to a definite point of time, in the prophecies of Daniel, which is not the expression of an idea that would be perfectly intelligible to a theocratic contemporary of the writer. The manner in which he determines a point of time might, indeed, seem to be somewhat peculiar; but this consists merely in the astronomically arithmetical measurement of a current conception of time, which reminds us of Babylon, the cradle of astronomical as well as astrological definitions, and which, by its union with the thoroughly Babylonian feature presented in the use of animal symbols, and with the grotesquely descriptive style of the narrative in general, harmonizes with the Babylonian origin of the book."

* [We need hardly point out to the student how purely conjectural and subjective is this supposition of the interpolation of certain parts of these wonderful prophecies, nor how fatal to the genuineness of the book as a whole is such an admission. Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus. Who is to draw the line of distinction between the authentic and the spurious parts? None is apparent in the text, and if interpreters are allowed to pick and choose for themselves what they conceive it likely that God would have revealed, and what they may be free to attribute to later hands, the whole ground is virtually conceded to Rationalism. The true explanation of the minuteness of the prophecies in chap. xi. of Daniel lies in their intimate connection with the nearer future of the chosen people, and the fact that Antiochus Epiphanes, being the first foreign persecutor of the Jewish religion as such, is set forth as the type of all coming Antichrists.]

§ 10. DESIGN OF THE BOOK OF DANIEL.

According to the opponents of the genuineness of this book, who assign it to the Maccabean period, its author aimed merely to exhort and comfort, and even invented the contents of the first or historical part for this purpose. Both the narratives relating to the heroic faith and steadfastness of Daniel and his friends, when exposed to the threatenings and persecu-

* [Dr. Pusey, the latest scholarly advocate of this reference of the fourth kingdom to Rome (pagan rather than papal), offers the following special considerations in its favor (p. 69 et seq.): 1. "Even an opponent (De Wette, in the Hall. Encycl. s. v. Daniel) has said, 'It is in favor of this interpretation [of the 4th empire as Roman] that the two feet of iron can be referred to the eastern and western emperors.' But so is the 8d empire described by the plural 'breasts' (חֲסִימִים) and arms," where the Medo-Persian coalition affords but a faint parallel. 2. "The ten horns are explained to be kings or kingdoms which should issue out of it. 'And the ten horns out of (i.e., going forth from) this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise.' Throughout these prophecies the king represents the kingdom, and the kingdom is concentrated in its king. The kings, then, or kingdoms, which should arise out of this kingdom must, from the force of the term as well as from the context, be kings or kingdoms which should arise at some later stage of its existence, not those first kings without which it could not be a kingdom at all." The force of this reasoning is somewhat difficult to perceive, and its whole validity is destroyed by the Masoretic accents of the text quoted, which should be translated thus: "The ten horns [are] the kingdom thence, [namely] ten kings [that] shall arise." 3. "These ten horns or kingdoms are also to be contemporaneous. They are all prior in time to the little horn which is to arise out of them. 'Another shall arise after them, and is diverse from the rest.' Yet the ten horns or kingdoms are to continue on together until the eleventh shall have risen up; for it is to rise up among them and destroy three of them." The inconclusiveness of this argument is palpable. Antiochus certainly was later than his predecessors, but of the same line, and he displaced three of them. 'The correspondence is as perfect as could be desired; far more so than on any other scheme. 4. "The period after the destruction of that power [the eleventh horn], and of the whole fourth kingdom which is to perish with him, is indicated by these words: 'And the rest of the beasts (the other kingdoms), their dominion was taken away, yet their lives were prolonged on' to the time appointed by God. The sentence seems most naturally to relate to a time after the destruction of the 4th empire; for it continues the description." This was exactly true of the Maccabean deliverance, which for the first time effected the independence of the Jews from Antiochus, who was but the sequel and climax of the long subjugation ever since the captivity. If the theory in question has no better support than these arguments, it is weak indeed. Its main prop, as to pagan Rome, is the superficial resemblance in the extent and power of the latter—which is at once dissipated when the prophecy is viewed from the stand-point of the Jewish martyrs; and as to papal Rome, its great bulwark is the year-for-a-day interpretation, with the overthrow of which it utterly falls. The subject is argued at length by Dr. Cowles, Commentary on Daniel, p. 354 et seq.].

tions of the Babylonian tyrants, and the apocalyptic visions of the second part, were designed to admonish the compatriots and contemporaries of the writer to "emulate these men in their unconquerable faith, as shown in their public and disinterested confession of the God of their fathers, and to remind them that this only true God would, at the proper time, know how to humble and destroy those who, like Antiochus Epiphanes, should exalt themselves against Him in their reckless pride, and should seek to cause His people to renounce His service, as well as how to secure the final victory to his faithful and steadfast adherents" (Bleek, Einleit., p. 602). The book, if really composed in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, would certainly correspond to this design but imperfectly. The hortative and typical bearing of many of its marvelous narratives upon the sufferings, temptations, and religious duties of Israel in a later age, would not have been at all understood. Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar, and Darius would hardly have been recognized as types of that Seleucidian tyrant, since their relations to the theocracy were wholly different from his. The latter aimed at the complete extirpation and annihilation of the worship of Jehovah, and would never have consented to even a temporary recognition of the supreme power and majesty of the Covenant God of the Old Dispensation, such as was secured from each of those rulers; and the cordial relations which Daniel maintained throughout the exile towards the Chaldean and Medo-Persian heathendom, as chief of the Magian caste, and as an influential political officer and confidential adviser of their heathen rulers, would certainly have exerted a forbidding influence on the narrow-minded, illiberal, and fanatically-inclined Jews of Maccabæan times, instead of encouraging them, quickening their faith, and inspiring them with the zeal of martyrs. With the exception of three men in the fiery furnace, not a single really suitable example would have been presented to the martyrs of this period for their encouragement and comfort, while, at the same time, the prophetic portions of the book would have been burdened with much that was superfluous, obscure, and incomprehensible, and therefore with much that contradicted its design (cf. the note 1 below).

On the other hand, everything reveals a definite plan, and is adapted to a practical end, which is easily apprehended when it is examined from the position of the nation during the exile and immediately afterward. The Chaldee fragments, chap. ii.-vii., which were recorded first, are seen in this light to be a collection of partly narrative and partly prophetic testimonies to Jehovah, as the only true God, in contrast with the vain gods of the Babylonians. These fragments were designed to strengthen the faith of the captives, and this design is indicated by the unvarying manner in which each section closes, viz.: by an ascription of praise to Jehovah, which generally falls from the lips of one of the heathen sovereigns himself (see chap. ii. 47; iii. 28 et seq.; iv. 34; v. 29; vi. 26 et seq.; vii. 27). The Hebrew text was composed somewhat later, and was designed directly and solely for Israel, which appears, not only from the absence of doxologies expressive of the triumph of the faith in Jehovah over the worship of idols, at the end of the several paragraphs, but also from the fact that, aside from the historical introduction to the book as a whole (chap. i. 1-ii. 4), it contains only prophecies, which are, moreover, exclusively of a comforting nature. They are designed "to comfort the Hebrew people in the trying political circumstances under which they are either newly engaged in arranging their affairs in Palestine, or are still languishing in the land of the exile. In view of the fact that to the human understanding the duration of this trying condition is unknown, they present the assurance that the continued and increasing tribulations, which must keep pace with the moral corruption of heathendom, are designed by God for the purifying of the faithful (cf. chap. xi. 35; xii. 10), and cannot be imposed a single day beyond what He has determined" (Kranichfeld, p. 60); and with a view to afford a still more effectual comfort and encouragement, they contain repeated references to the Messianic period of salvation (chap. ix. 25 et seq.; xii. 1 et seq.; cf. vii. 13 et seq.), that long predicted glorious conclusion at which the history of God's people must arrive after passing through many previous clouds and shadows, and which contains in and of itself the assurance that Israel shall be saved out of every affliction, however great.

From their connection with these comforting prophecies, the older records relating to the marvelous displays of Divine power and grace as witnessed by Daniel and his companions, receive an additional significance, as examples tending to encourage, comfort, and quicken the faith of Israel in succeeding ages, and serving, especially in the more sad and troublous seasons, as shining way-marks and guiding stars through the dark nights of a condition in which God had apparently forsaken them, although they were originally recorded for a different situation. This comforting tendency of the book, however, did not reveal itself fully, until, as has been shown elsewhere (§ 6, note 1), almost three hundred and fifty years after the captivity, the religious tyranny of the Seleucidæ brought the full measure of the sufferings predicted by Daniel to bear upon Israel. In consequence, this prophetic book, which up to that time had perhaps been partially misconceived, or at least misunderstood and undervalued, attained its rightful position in the public mind; for the sufferings of the time revealed not only the marked keenness of vision displayed by the Divinely-enlightened seer, but also the fullness of consoling power contained in his wonderful narratives and visions. The Maccabæan period served, therefore, to fully demonstrate the practical design of the book, and thereby to solve its prophetic riddles, to bring to view the depths of wisdom which underlie its meditations on the relations of the world-powers to the kingdom of God, and to secure permanently to its author the honorable rank of the fourth among the greater prophets.

NOTE 1.—Hävernick, Einl., II. 488, shows in a striking manner, the untenable character of the assumption that the book is a fiction of the Maccabæan age, invented to serve a purpose, especially in view of the marked difference between the religious and political circumstances of that time and those prevailing in the captivity: "How marked is the distinction between the heathen kings of this book and Antiochus Epiphanes! Collisions with Judaism occur, indeed, but how different is the conduct of Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar, and Darius the Mede, in relation to the recognition of Judaism and its God! Where is the evidence in this case of a desire to extirpate Judaism, or to inaugurate a formal persecution of the Jews, such as entered into the designs of Antiochus. There can hardly be two things more dissimilar than are the deportment of a Belshazzar or Darius and that of the Seleucidian king." Compare page 487: "That Daniel, together with his companions, receives instruction in the language and wisdom of Chaldæa, that he even appears as the head of the Magian caste, and bears a heathen name, fills political positions at heathen courts, maintains relations of intimate friendship with heathen princes, and even manifests the warmest interest in them (cf. iv. 16)—all these are traits in thorough harmony with the history, and corresponding to the circumstances resulting from the captivity, but not according with the rigid exclusiveness of the Maccabæan period," etc. Cf. Herbst, Einleit., II. 2, 98; Zündel, p. 60 et seq.; Pusey, p. 374 et seq.

[NOTE 2.—We introduce here, as an appropriate connection, some valuable remarks from Keil's Commentary on Daniel (Clark's ed., Intro., § ii., p. 5 et seq.), on Daniel's place in the history of the kingdom of God, so far as these relate to the chosen people of Israel. "The destruction of the kingdom of Judah and the deportation of the Jews into Babylonian captivity, not only put an end to the independence of the covenant people, but also to the continuance of that constitution of the kingdom of God which was founded at Sinai; and that not only temporarily but forever, for in its integrity it was never restored. . . . The abolition of the Israelitish theocracy, through the destruction of the kingdom of Judah and the carrying away of the people into exile by the Chaldæans, in consequence of their continued unfaithfulness and the transgression of the laws of the covenant on the part of Israel, was foreseen in the gracious counsels of God; and the perpetual duration of the covenant of grace, as such, was not dissolved, but only the then existing condition of the kingdom of God was changed, in order to winnow that perverse people, who, notwithstanding all the chastisements that had hitherto fallen upon them, had not in earnest turned away from their idolatry, by that the severest of all the judgments that had been threatened them; to exterminate by the sword, by famine, by the plague, and by other calamities, the incorrigible mass of the people; and to prepare the better portion of them, the remnant who might repent, as a holy seed to whom God might fulfill His covenant promises. Accordingly the exile forms a great turning-point in the development of the kingdom of God which He had founded in Israel. With that event the form of the theocracy established at Sinai comes to an end, and then begins the period of the transition to a new form, which was to be established by Christ, and has actually been established by Him. . . . The restoration of the Jewish state after the exile was not a re-establishment of the Old-Testament kingdom of God. When Cyrus granted liberty to the Jews to return to their own land, and commanded them to rebuild the temple of Jehovah in Jerusalem, only a very small band of captives returned; the greater part remained scattered among the heathen. Even those who went home from Babylon to Canaan were not set free from subjection to the heathen world-power, but remained, in the land which

HISTORY.

I. Babylonian Empire.

This is depicted at its acme under Nebuchadnezzar, who attained the universal sovereignty of Western Asia and Egypt. Griffins or winged lions are a common emblem on the Assyrian sculptures. The empire subsequently degenerated, and, at the same time, became more civilized.

II. Persian Empire.

The original element was Media, where bears abound. Persia was the higher horn and more elevated side. The three ribs are probably Lydia, Assyria, and Babylon, which were successively absorbed by Cyrus. He was victorious in every direction except eastward. The kings following him were: 1. Cambyses; 2. Smerdis; 3. Darius Hytaspis; 4. Xerxes, who first exerted all his resources against Greece.

III. Macedonian Empire.

Copper denotes the mercenary Greeks. The leopard represents their slyness and pertinacity. The four wings are indicative of double velocity. Alexander marched with unexampled rapidity. He was the sole ruler of his dynasty. His dominions were divided, shortly after his premature death, between, 1. Ptolemy, in Egypt and the Mediterranean coast; 2. Seleucus, in Asia; 3. Lysimachus, in Thrace; 4. Cassander, in Greece.

IV. Syrian Monarchy.

This was of a mongrel character, the native Oriental element corresponding to the clay, and the foreign Greek to the iron. These were combined in all sorts of affinities. The ten toes may symbolize the numerous satrapies which fell to the share of Seleucus. This dynasty is depicted as fierce, from contrast with the lenient governments preceding, and especially from its intolerance towards the Jewish religion.

1. Seleucus Nicator was originally Ptolemy's general at Babylon, but soon managed to secure not only the entire East, but also the province of Syria (including Palestine). 2. Antiochus Soter was engrossed with subduing the Gauls. 3. Antiochus Theos made peace with Ptolemy Philadelphus by marrying Berenice, his daughter; but soon repudiated her in favor of Laodice, his former wife, who revenged herself by poisoning him and killing her rival with her infant.

Berenice's brother, Ptolemy Euergetes, avenged her death by invading Syria, carrying away immense spoil.

4. Seleucus Callinicus attempted to retaliate by attacking the Egyptian provinces (translate, ver. 9, "And he (the king of the north) shall come into the kingdom of the king of the south"), but was forced to retire with defeat. 5. Seleucus Ceraunus, his son, renewed the attempt, but was slain; and his brother, 6. Antiochus the Great, pushed the campaign to the border of Egypt.

This roused Ptolemy Philopator, who assembled an army, with which he totally routed Antiochus at Gaza; but he then concluded a truce with him.

Fourteen years afterwards, Antiochus returned with the spoils of his Eastern campaigns to renew his designs against

31 Thou, O king, sawest, and behold a great image. This great image, whose brightness was excellent, stood before thee; and the form thereof was terrible.

32 This image's head was of fine gold,

his breast and his arms of silver,

his belly and his thighs of brass,

33 His legs of iron, his feet part of iron and part of clay.

CHAP. II.

37 Thou, O king, sawest a kingdom, a power, and strength, and glory. 38 And whosoever the children of men dwell, the beasts of the field and the fowls of the heaven hath he given into thine hand, and hath made thee ruler over them all. Thou art this head of gold.

39 And after thee shall arise another kingdom inferior to thee, and another third kingdom of brass, which shall bear rule over all the earth.

40 And the fourth kingdom shall be strong as iron: forasmuch as iron breaketh in pieces and subdeth all things: and as iron that breaketh all these, shall it break in pieces and bruise.

41 And whereas thou sawest the feet and toes, part of potters' clay, and part of iron, the kingdom shall be divided; but there shall be in it of the strength of the iron, forasmuch as thou sawest the iron mixed with miry clay.

42 And as the toes of the feet were part of iron and part of clay, so the kingdom shall be partly strong and partly broken.

43 And whereas thou sawest iron mixed with miry clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men: but they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron is not mixed with clay.

CHAP. VII.

2 Daniel spake and said, I saw in my vision by night, and, behold, the four winds of the heaven strove upon the great sea.

3 And four great beasts came up from the sea, diverse one from another.

4 The first was like a lion, and had eagle's wings:

I beheld till the wings thereof were plucked, and it was lifted up from the earth, and made stand upon the feet as a man, and a man's heart was given to it.

5 And behold another beast, a second, like to a bear, and it raised up itself on one side, and it had three ribs in the mouth of it between the teeth of it: and they said this unto it, Arise, devour much flesh.

6 After this I beheld, and lo another, like a leopard, which had upon the back of it four wings of a fowl; the beast had also four heads; and dominion was given to it.

7 After this I saw in the night visions, and behold a fourth beast, dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly; and it had great iron teeth: it devoured and brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with the feet of it: and it was diverse from all the beasts that were before it;

and it had ten horns.

CHAP. VII.	CHAP. VII.	CHAP. VIII.	CHAP. VIII.	CHAP. XI.
17 These great beasts, which are four, are four kings, which shall arise out of the earth. 19 Then I would know the truth of the fourth beast, which was diverse from all the others, exceeding dreadful, whose teeth were of iron, and his nails of brass; which devoured, brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with his feet. 20 And of the ten horns that were in his head,	23 Thus he said, The fourth beast shall be the fourth kingdom upon earth, which shall be diverse from all kingdoms, and shall devour the whole earth, and shall tread it down, and break it in pieces. 24 And the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise:	2 Then I lifted up mine eyes, and saw, and, behold, there stood before the river a ram which had two horns: and the two horns were high; but one was higher than the other, and the higher came up last. 4 I saw the ram pushing westward, and northward, and southward; so that no beast might stand before him, neither was there any that could deliver out of his hand; but he did according to his will, and became great. 5 And as I was considering, behold, a he-goat came from the west on the face of the whole earth, and touched not the ground: and the goat had a notable horn between his eyes. 6 And he came to the ram that had two horns, which I had seen standing before the river, and ran unto him in the fury of his power. 7 And I saw him come close unto the ram, and he was moved with choler against him, and smote the ram, and brake his two horns: and there was no power in the ram to stand before him, but he cast him down to the ground, and stamped upon him: and there was none that could deliver the ram out of his hand. 8 Therefore the he-goat waxed very great: and when he was strong, the great horn was broken; and for it there came up four notable ones toward the four winds of heaven.	20 The ram which thou sawest having two horns are the kings of Media and Persia. 21 And the rough goat is the king of Grecia: and the great horn that is between his eyes is the first king. 22 Now that being broken, whereas four stood up for it, four kingdoms shall stand up out of the nation, but not in his power.	2 And now will I show thee the truth. Behold, there shall stand up yet three kings in Persia; and the fourth shall be far richer than they all: and by his strength through his riches he shall stir up all against the realm of Grecia. 3 And a mighty king shall stand up, that shall rule with great dominion, and do according to his will. 4 And when he shall stand up, his kingdom shall be broken, and shall be divided toward the four winds of heaven; and not to his posterity, nor according to his dominion which he ruled: for his kingdom shall be plucked up, even for others besides those. 5 And the king of the south shall be strong, and one of his princes; and he shall be strong above him, and have dominion; his dominion shall be a great dominion. 6 And in the end of years they shall join themselves together; for the king's daughter of the south shall come to the king of the north to make an agreement: but she shall not retain the power of the arm; neither shall he stand, nor his arm: but she shall be given up, and they that brought her, and he that begat her, and he that strengthened her in those times. 7 But out of a branch of her roots shall one stand up in his estate, which shall come with an army, and shall enter into the fortress of the king of the north, and shall deal against them, and shall prevail. 8 And shall also carry captives into Egypt their gods, with their princes, and with their precious vessels of silver and of gold; and he shall continue some years than the king of the north. 9 So the king of the south shall come into his kingdom, and shall return into his own land. 10 But his sons shall be stirred up, and shall assemble a multitude of great forces: and they shall certainly come, and overthrow, and pass through: then shall he return, and be stirred up, even to his fortress. 11 And the king of the south shall be moved with choler, and shall come forth and fight with him, even with the king of the north: and he shall set forth a great multitude; but the multitude shall be given into his hand. 12 And when he hath taken away the multitude, his heart shall be lifted up; and he shall cast down many ten thousands: but he shall not be strengthened by it. 13 For the king of the north shall return, and shall set forth a multitude greater than the former, and shall certainly come after certain years with a great army, and with much riches.

the Egyptian provinces, and, with the assistance of a party of the Jews, he defeated the Egyptian general at the sources of the Jordan, beleagued and captured the remainder of the Egyptian force in Zidon, and got full possession of Palestine. He now concluded a hollow alliance with Ptolemy Epiphanes, giving him his daughter Cleopatra, with the Palestinian provinces as a dowry, hoping that she would favor his purposes, an expectation in which he was ultimately disappointed. He then turned his arms against the Greek colonies of Asia Minor and the Aegean till checked by the Romans under Scipio, who compelled him to sue for peace on the most humiliating terms. He was killed while attempting to plunder a temple in his own dominions. 7. Selucus Philopator was engrossed with efforts to raise the enormous fine imposed by the Romans upon his father as the price of peace, and was at length assassinated by his minister, 8. Heliodorus, who held the throne a short time, although, 9. Demetrius Soter, son of the last king, was rightfully heir, and, 10. Ptolemy Philometor was entitled to the Palestinian provinces by virtue of his mother's dowry right.

11. ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES, brother of Selucus, artfully and quietly secured the succession, expelling Heliodorus, and ignoring the claims of his nephews Demetrius and Ptolemy. (Daniel styles him "vile," in contrast with his surname "Illustrious," and notes the Hellenizing corruptions of his reign in Judaea, as detailed below.) The guardians of the latter prince resenting this, a struggle ensued, in which Antiochus twice defeated the Egyptians in a pitched battle on their own borders. He then pretended to make a truce with them, but only used it as a cover for entering Egypt with a small force, and seizing quietly upon the capital and other points. On his return from his second campaign into Egypt, he endeavored to carry out the scheme of introducing Greek customs among the Jews. In a third campaign he continued his successes, and in a fourth he was likely to capture Alexandria and reduce the whole Egyptian power, when he was peremptorily ordered to desist by the Romans. On his way home he vented his chagrin at this interference upon the unhappy Jews, in whose quarrels he meddled, deposing the high-priest, abolishing the sacrificial offerings, interdicting the ritual, and bitterly persecuting all who refused to apostatize to paganism. The Temple remained closed to all but heathen victims for three years and a half (1290 days), and was shortly afterwards rededicated on Dec. 25, B.C. 165 (making 1835 days), six and a half years (2300 days) from the first act of profanation in the removal of the legitimate pontiff. Antiochus's disregard for even the native deities is evident from his renewal of his father's attempt to plunder the temple of the Syrian Venus. Yet he made the most violent efforts to introduce the worship of Jupiter Capitolinus.

The remainder of his reign is obscure, owing to the nearly total loss of the ancient records concerning it. We have therefore but slight intimations of the final expedition against Egypt, etc., referred to by Daniel as being so successful. It is certain, however, that the last act of his reign was a campaign in the north-eastern provinces, and that he perished miserably (one account says as a raving maniac) as he was hastening to the support of his generals, who had been defeated by the Jewish patriots and zealots. The Maccabees had raised the standard of civil and religious liberty in Judaea, and, after a long and severe struggle, the Jews secured their independence. This they retained for a century, a period of great political and spiritual prosperity in general, which Daniel and the other prophets speak of in such glowing terms as being introductory to the Messianic times, the Gospel "kingdom of Heaven," never to end.

34 Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay, and brake them to pieces. 35 Then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold, broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshing-floors; and the wind carried them away, that no place was found for them:

and the stone that smote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth.

44 And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever. 45 Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it brake in pieces the iron, the brass, the clay, the silver, and the gold, the great God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter: and the dream is certain, and the interpretation.

8 I considered the horns, and, behold, there came up among them another little horn, before whom there were three of the first horns plucked up by the roots: and, behold, in this horn were eyes like the eyes of man, and a mouth speaking great things.

and of the other which came up, and before whom three fell; even of that horn that had eyes, and a mouth that spake very great things, whose look was more stout than his fellows.

11 I beheld them, because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake,

I beheld even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame.

12 As concerning the rest of the beasts, they had their dominion taken away: yet their lives were prolonged for a season and time.

9 I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool: his throne was set upon wheels as burning fire.

10 A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him: thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: the judgment was set, and the books were opened.

12 I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him.

14 And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed.

15 But the saints of the Most High, which shall not pass away, and possess the kingdom forever, shall not be destroyed.

the Lord had given to their fathers, servants to it. Though now again the ruined walls of Jerusalem and the cities of Judah were restored, and the temple also was rebuilt, and the offering up of sacrifice renewed, yet the glory of the Lord did not again enter into the new temple, which was also without the ark of the covenant and the mercy-seat, so as to hallow it as the place of His gracious presence among His people. The temple worship among the Jews after the captivity was without its soul, the real presence of the Lord in the sanctuary; the high priest could no longer go before God's throne of grace in the holy of holies to sprinkle the atoning blood of sacrifice toward the ark of the covenant, and to accomplish the reconciliation of the congregation with their God, and could no longer find out, by means of the Urim and Thumim, the will of the Lord. When Nehemiah had finished the restoration of the walls of Jerusalem, prophecy ceased, the revelations of the Old Covenant came to a final end, and the period of expectation (during which no prophecy was given) of the promised Deliverer, of the seed of David, began.

If the prophets before the captivity, therefore, connect the deliverance of Israel from Babylon, and their return to Canaan, immediately with the setting up of the kingdom of God in its glory, without giving any indication that between the end of the Babylonian exile and the appearance of the Messiah a long period would intervene, this uniting together of the two events is not to be explained only from the perspective and apotelesmatic character of the prophecy, but has its foundation in the very nature of the thing itself. The prophetic perspective, by virtue of which the inward eye of the seer beholds only the elevated summits of historical events as they unfold themselves, and not the valleys of the common incidents of history which lie between these heights, is indeed peculiar to prophecy in general, and accounts for the circumstance that the prophecies as a rule give no fixed dates, and apotelesmatically bind together the points of history which open the way to the end with the end itself. But this formal peculiarity of prophetic contemplation we must not extend to the prejudice of the actual truth of the prophecies. The fact of the uniting together of the future glory of the kingdom of God under the Messiah with the deliverance of Israel from exile, has perfect historical veracity. The banishment of the covenant people from the land of the Lord, and their subjection to the heathen, was not only the last of those judgments which God threatened against His degenerate people, but it also continues till the perverse rebels are exterminated, and the penitents are turned with sincere hearts to God the Lord and are saved through Christ. Consequently the exile was for Israel the last space for repentance which God in His faithfulness to His covenant granted to them. Whoever is not brought by this severe chastisement to repentance and reformation, but remains opposed to the gracious will of God, on him falls the judgment of death: and only they who turn themselves to the Lord, their God and Saviour, will be saved, gathered from among the heathen, brought in within the bonds of the covenant of grace through Christ, and become partakers of the promised riches of grace in His kingdom."

[NOTE 3.—As a conspectus of Daniel's entire series of prophecies respecting the world-kings, showing their complete harmony and mutual illustration, as well as their exact accordance with history, we insert (on pages 44-47) a table of all the passages, taken from McClintock and Strong's Cyclopædia, s. v. Daniel.]

[NOTE 4.—Dr. Cowles, in his Commentary on Daniel (N. Y. 1871), devotes an Excursus (pp. 459 sq.) to the consideration of that theory, generally called the "year-for-a-day" view, which results in applying the prophecy of the fourth kingdom of Rome, and especially the Papacy. His arguments are perfectly conclusive to candid minds. As the work is easily accessible we forbear to quote or abridge his remarks. § 11. THE ALEXANDRIAN VERSION OF THE BOOK OF DANIEL, AND ITS APOCRYPHAL ADDITIONS.

The Alexandrian translation of this book was, during a long time, supposed to be no more in existence, because the church, as far back as the time of Eusebius of Cæsarea and Pamphilius, had adopted the version of the Jewish proselyte Theodotian, which was considerably more exact and free from errors.* The genuine Septuagint text of Daniel was not published until 1772, when Simon de Magistris, a Romish priest of the oratory, published it from a Codex Chisianus. The editions by J. D. Michaelis (1773-4) and Segaar (1775) served to farther introduce and multiply this version. H. A. Hahn finally published a truly critical edition (1845), for which he had availed himself of a Syriac-Hexaplarian version published in 1788 by Cajetan Bugati, from a Codex Ambrosianus. This hexapla offers a Septuagint text corrected after Theodotian, as Origen had prepared it for his Hexapla, while the text edited after the Cod. Chisianus represents the genuine and unadulterated language of the Alexandrian version, as it had stood in Origen's Tetrapla beside the unchanged text of Theodotian (cf. Delitzsch, p. 286).

The Alexandrian version of this book probably originated before, or at any rate about, the middle of the second century before Christ, and therefore at the time in which the opposing criticism finds the Hebrew original to have been written (cf. § 6, note 3). The numerous departures from the original which this version presents, and which consist in the change of words and phrases (e.g. I. 8, 11, 16; II. 8, 11, 28; VII. 6, 8, etc.), in part of abbreviations and omissions (e.g. III. 31 et seq.; IV. 2-6; V. 17-25; 26-28), and finally, also in extensions of the text (e.g. IV. 84; VI. 20, 22-29), are by many critics traced to a Hebrew or Chaldean text diverse from the original, upon which this version is based (e.g. Michaelis, Bertholdt, Eichhorn). But they owe their existence, more probably, to the labors of the translator, since they are merely interpretations or paraphrases, designed to clear up the text, to indicate the connection, or to simplify or intensify the wonderful (cf. Hävernicks, Kommentar, p. xlvii et seq.; De Wette, Bibl., § 258; Keil, § 137).

Nor do the longer interpolations inserted into the book of Daniel, in both the Alexandrian and Theodotian's versions, and generally bearing the name of apocryphal additions to Daniel, contain any feature that could compel the assumption of a Hebrew or Chaldean original on which they are based. Their lingual features testify rather to an original composition in the Greek (particularly the paronomasias or plays on Greek words, which were remarked by Porphyry,—such as σχῖνος, σχῖσιμπρῖνος, πρίσι, which can scarcely be traced back to Hebrew paronomasias that were copied by the translator *), which is therefore accepted by Michaelis, De Wette, Bleek, Hävernicks, etc., while other critics contend that these fragments were wholly, or in part, translated from a Hebrew or Aramaic original. (The latter include not merely Roman Catholics, as Dereser, Welte, Haneberg, Reusch, but also Protestants, among whom are Bertholdt, Eichhorn, Delitzsch [De Habacuci propheta vita atque aetate, 1844, p. 52 et seq.], Fritzsche [Ezeget. Handbuch zu den Apokryphen, I. 111 et seq.], Zündel, etc.) This hypothesis of a Shemitic original may be justified, at most, with regard to two of these additions (the prayer of Azariah, and the song of the three children), but not with reference to the two that remain. These latter fragments (the history of "Susanna and Daniel," and that of "Bel and the dragon") bear a decidedly legendary character, being designed to glorify Daniel, and involving many improbabilities, and even impossibilities. They are therefore regarded, and with justice, as being of still later origin than the other component parts of the Greek Daniel. In the Alexandrian version they compose the closing sections of the book (chapters xiii. and xiv., by the modern arrangement of chapters), but are introduced with formulas (e.g. chap. xiv., or Bel and the dragon, with the puzzling superscription: ἐκ τῆς προφητείας Ἀμβακούμ υἱοῦ Ἰησοῦ ἐκ τῆς φυλῆς Δαὶν), the peculiarity of which is of itself sufficient to indicate their origin subsequently to the time of Daniel, whether an otherwise unknown prophet pseudo-Habakkuk be regarded as their author, or their origin be ascribed to one or several Jewish or Hellenistic writers. In Theodotian's translation these additions are organically incorporated with the Book of Daniel, Susanna being placed before Chap. i. as belonging to the history of the prophet's youth—the "prayer of Azariah" and the "song of the three children" being inserted between vs. 23 and 24 of chap. iii. (similar to their position in the Sept.), while only "Bel and the dragon" is consigned to the end of the book after chap. xii.

The question relating to the time and place in which these apocryphal fragments were composed cannot be solved, and we can only venture the supposition that the four emanated from different authors. This appears in the case of the "prayer of Azariah" and the "song of the three children" (chap. III. 24-45 and 51-90), from the circumstance, that in the former (v. 38) the temple is represented as destroyed and its services as having ceased, while the other fragment presumes the existence of both these institutions (vs. 54, 84 et seq.). Of the two remaining additions, that relating to Susanna (possibly containing a grain of historical truth belonging to the age of the canonical book of Daniel) seems to have been composed at an early day, and without any reference to the canonical Daniel; while "Bel and the dragon," or the "Prophecy of Habakkuk, the son of Jesus, of the tribe of Levi," appears to have been written, with special reference to Dan. vii., by a Palestinian author of a much later time. All of these apocryphal appendages to the questions relating to Daniel furnish a very important testimony in attestation of the superior historical rank and genuine prophetic character of the canonical Daniel, inasmuch as their artificial stamp and legendary tone present a contrast to the far more sober and credible contents of that book, analogous to the familiar contrast between the apocryphal and the canonical Gospels, which serves so strongly to endorse the credibility of the latter. These remarks will also apply to the contrast between Daniel and the pseudonymous apocalypses of the last Jewish, or pre-Christian age, e.g. the "Sibylline Oracles," Enoch, and the "Fourth Book of Esdras," whose partial dependence on our book has already been considered (§ 6, especially note 8), and which are unquestionably the earlier or later products of an apocalyptic and simulated authorship, like that of the unknown originators of the additions to our book.

* Jerome, Comm. in Dan. Proph.: "Sed et hoc nosse debemus, inter cetera Porphyrium de Danielis libro nobis obferre, idcirco illum apparere confictum, nec haberi apud Hebræos, sed Græci sermonis esse commentum: quia in Susannæ fabula continetur, dicente Daniele ad presbyteros, ἀπὸ τοῦ σχῖνος σχῖσαι, καὶ ἀπὸ τοῦ πλινθίου πλινθίαι, quam etymologiam magis Græco sermoni convenire quam Hebræo, cui et Eusebius et Apollinarius pari sententia responderunt: Susannæ Deliquit, et Draconis fabulas non contineri in Hebræico, sed partem esse prophetiæ Habacuc filii Iesu," etc.

NOTE.—In relation to the apologetic importance of the apocryphal supplements to chap. iii. 18 and 14 in the Greek Daniel, compare Delitzsch, p. 186: "How favorable is the testimony for the historical and prophetic character of the canonical book, which results from its contrast with these apocryphal legends!"—and also Zündel, p. 187: "These apocryphal additions to Daniel therefore, did not all originate at the same time, or in the same place; but one appeared on Grecian (?) soil, another on Palestinian, and a third perhaps on Babylonian. They were translated before they were received by the Septuagint (without exception?—see above); and prior to their reception, they had been partially gathered, and ascribed to a spurious Habakkuk. . . . If Daniel, therefore, was not composed until B. C. 168, how could the translation in question, together with these additions, have existed as early as B. C. 180? Even though an unusually rapid formation of legends be assumed, from the oldest, relating to Susanna, to the latest αἰνέσις τῶν τριῶν παιδῶν, how is it possible to conceive the contrast between the original work and the oldest forgery, as developed within the limits of a single generation? And from the earliest forgery again, down to the latest, would not a considerable contrast have arisen here, e.g. between the προσευχή and the αἰνέσις? . . . And beyond this, their being translated and collected! All these considerations compel us to assume a period, covering many generations, between the origin of the book of Daniel and its Alexandrian version."—See ibid., p. 184 et seq., and especially p. 187, on the relation of the Jewish apocalypses of the pre-Christian period to Daniel: "A pre-Christian, or, upon the whole, a progressive development, cannot be asserted in connection with these apocalypses; for, with the exception of the Sibyllines, none of them was sufficiently important to give rise to imitations. They did not spring from each other, but are co-ordinate, and the only connection among themselves consists in their imitating the earlier prophets, and in their tendency to describe the facts of history in an apocalyptic manner. But on the other hand, nearly all of them contain imitations of Daniel. The "Book of Enoch" treats of the interpretation of the number seventy in his seventy regents; Esdras's eagle with wings and feathers is evidently the fourth [? first] beast of Daniel; and the person who incessantly inquires why the covenant people is afflicted, is merely a copy of Daniel while mourning because of the delay in the fulfilment of prophecy (chap. ix. and x.). The numbers of Daniel in chap. viii. are almost completely restored in the Ascensio Jesaja, which also paints the coming of the Lord with Daniel's colors," etc.

The apocryphal additions to Daniel are found also in the ancient Coptic version, which is not without importance for textual criticism. They have been published by Henry Tattam, in vol. II, p. 270 ss. of his Propheta majores in lingua Aegyptiaca dialecto Memphitica s. Coptica (Oxon, 1852).

FIRST (HISTORICAL) PART.

CHAPTERS I.-VI.

1. Introduction. The Early History of Daniel and his Three Associates.

I. 1-21.

- 1 In the third year of the reign of Jehoiakim king of Judah came Nebuchad-2 nezzar king of Babylon unto Jerusalem and besieged it.¹ And the Lord gave Jehoiakim king of Judah into his hand, with [and] part of the vessels of the house of God, which [and] he carried [them] into the land of Shinar, to the house of his god;² and he brought the vessels into the treasure-house³ of his god.²
- 3 And the king spake⁴ unto Ashpenaz the master⁵ of his eunuchs, that he should bring [to bring] certain of the children of Israel, and of the king's seed,⁶ and of the 4 princes;⁷ children⁸ in whom was no blemish, but [and] well-favoured,⁹ and skilful¹⁰ in all wisdom, and cunning¹¹ in knowledge, and understanding¹² science, and such as had ability¹³ in them [in whom was ability] to stand in the king's palace, and whom they might teach¹⁴ the learning¹⁵ and the tongue of the Chaldeans.
- 5 And the king appointed them a daily provision¹⁶ of the king's meat,¹⁷ and of the wine which he drank; so nourishing [, and to make grow] them three years, that [, and] at the end thereof they might [should] stand before the king.
- 6 Now [And] among these [them] were of the children of Judah, Daniel, Hana-7 niah [Chananyah], Mishael, and Azariah; unto whom [and to them] the prince of the eunuchs gave [assigned] names: for he gave [and he assigned] unto Daniel, the name of Belteshazzar; and to Hananiah, of Shadrach; and to Mishael, of Meshach; and to Azariah, of Abed-nego.
- 8 But [And] Daniel purposed in¹⁸ his heart that he would not defile himself with the portion of the king's meat,¹⁹ nor [and] with the wine which he drank: therefore [and] he requested of the prince of the eunuchs that he might not defile 9 himself. Now [And] God had brought [gave] Daniel into favour and tender 10 love²⁰ with [before] the prince of the eunuchs. And the prince of the eunuchs said unto Daniel, I fear my lord the king, who hath appointed your meat [food] and your drink:²¹ for why should he see your faces worse liking [more gloomy] than the children²² which are of your sort?²³ then shall [, and should] ye make me endanger my head to the king?
- 11 Then [And] said Daniel to [the] Melzar, whom the prince of the eunuchs 12 had set over Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah: Prove thy servants, I beseech thee, ten days; and let them give us pulse to eat,²⁴ and water to drink.
- 13 Then [And] let our countenances be looked upon before thee, and the countenance of the children²⁵ that eat of the portion of the king's meat;²⁶ and as thou 14 seest [shalt see], deal [do] with thy servants. So he consented [And he 15 hearkened] to them in [as to] this matter, and proved them ten days. And at the end of ten days their countenances appeared [countenance was seen to be good] fairer and [they were] fatter in [of] flesh than all the children²⁷ which did

- 16 eat the portion of the king's meat." Thus [And the] Melzar took away the portion of their meat," and the wine that they should drink and gave them pulse."²
 17 [And] As for these four children," God gave them knowledge and skill in all learning" and wisdom: and Daniel had understanding in all visions [every vision] and dreams.
 18 Now, [And] at the end of the days that the king had said 'he should [to] bring them in, then the prince of the eunuchs brought them in before Nebuchadnezzar. And the king communed [spake] with them: and among them all was found none like Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah: therefore 20 [and] stood they before the king. And in all matters [every matter] of wisdom and understanding, that the king inquired of them, [then] he found them ten times better than" all the magicians" and astrologers" that were in all his realm.

GRAMMATICAL AND LEXICAL NOTES.

וַיִּצָר עָלֶיהָ, and pressed upon it, namely, with the usual military appliances.—² אֱלֹהֵיהֶן, his gods, probably referring to the Babylonian polytheism, in contrast with the true God above, הָאֱלֹהִים, store-house, some room connected with the temple of Belus.—⁴ וַיִּצָר, and said, in the Chaldaizing sense of commanded.—⁶ רֹב, chief, principal or head man.—⁸ זֶרַע הַמְּלָכֻתָּה, seed of the kingdom, namely, of Judah.—⁷ הַפְּרִיָּהִים, the nobles, a Persian word denoting the aristocracy.—⁹ יְלָדִים, youths, or lads, between infancy and adolescence.—¹⁰ כְּדָבָר, good of appearance, i.e., handsome.—¹¹ מְשֻׁבְּרִים, intelligent, i.e., of quick natural parts.—¹² יָדָעוּ, knowing, i.e., by acquired information.—¹³ מְבַרְכֵי, considerate, i.e., of attentive habits.—¹⁴ בָּנָה, vigor, i.e., physical strength, and perhaps including mental energy.—¹⁵ הִלְלֵם, and to teach them, i.e., cause them to be instructed. This clause is to be connected in construction with the preceding הִלְלֵם, ver. 8.—¹⁶ סֵפֶר, book, i.e., the formularies or written mysteries.—¹⁷ פֶּתִיבָּה, a word (or matter) of a day in its day, a regular ration from day to day.—¹⁸ פֶּתִיבָּה, delicacy, a Persian word denoting luxurious viands.—¹⁹ וַיִּשָּׂם עָלָהּ, assigned upon, i.e., imposed this as a conscientious duty.—²⁰ רַחֲמֵי, mercies, i.e., kind consideration of his scruples.—²¹ מִשְׁתָּרֵכֶם, is regarded by the Grammarians as an instance of an epenthetic ר in the sing., or perhaps an older form of the construction in which the final ן has given place to a cognate letter.—²² כְּגִבְרָתָם, according to your circle, i.e., in point of age and rank. There is, however, possibly an allusion to their emaciated condition. Eunuchs are constantly represented on the Assyrian monuments as being of fuller habit than other men.—²³ מִן הַזֵּיתִים וּמִן הַפְּרִיָּהִים, of the seed-fruits, and we will surely eat, i.e., exclusively vegetable diet.—²⁴ עָשָׂר יָדָיו עָלָהּ, ten hands (parts) above, ten-fold superior to.—²⁵ הַמְּסֻבִּים, is generally explained by the lexicographers as derived from הִסְבֵּה, a style, hence scribes, the Magian isopropammatists. Perhaps it signifies horoscopes.—²⁶ מְשֻׁבְּרִים, from מְשֻׁבֵּה, to whisper incantation, hence are magicians in the broad sense.—²⁷ חַיֵּה, was alive and influential in that official capacity.]

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

Verses 1, 2. The transportation to Babylon, by Nebuchadnezzar.—In the third year of the reign of Jehoiakim. We have already shown, in the Introd., § 8, note 2, that this does not conflict with Jer. xxv. 1, 9.—Came Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, unto Jerusalem, and besieged it, i. e., he departed for Jerusalem, in order to besiege it; he began his expedition against Jerusalem, which resulted in the siege of that city. For the view that בָּא is here to be taken in the sense of "departing," see the Introd., § 8, 2, a.—Instead of וַיִּצָר, to straiten, besiege, we generally find elsewhere הִצָּר with the dative, e. g., Deut. xxviii. 53; 1 Kings viii. 37.—The form of the name נְבוּכַדְנֶצַּר is the one in general use among the later Hebrew writers (of 2 Kings xxiv. 1; xxv. 1; Ezra ii. 1; v. 12, etc.). Jeremiah (xxv. 1; xxxix. 1, 11; xliii. 10) and Ezekiel (xxix. 18) have נְבוּכַדְנֶצַּר, which corresponds more exactly to the older rendering Nabukudurr-uur, as found in the Babylonian cuneiform inscriptions, and also to the nearly identical Persian form Nabukhad-raçara, which occurs at Behistan (see Oppert, Journ. Asiat., 1851, p. 416; Expédition en Mésopotamie, ii. 257 ss.). The name certainly comprehends, as its first element, the name of the Chaldaean god Nedo, = Mercury (נְדוֹ, Isa. xli. 1), and it seems also to include the terms kadr, "might," and çar = שָׂר, "prince" (compare Gesenius, Thesaur., p. 890; Oppert, l. c.). The name is rendered with either n or r by Greek authors; for while Strabo (15, i. 6) writes Nabokodrosos, Berosus (in Josephus contr. Ap., i. 20, 21) has Nabonchodrosos, and the Sept.

Ναβουχοδονόσορ. Instead of נְבוּכַדְנֶצַּר, however, our book elsewhere has uniformly נְצַר, omitting the euphonic נ; cf. נָ, chap. iii. 25; vii. 15, instead of נָ, chap. iii. 6, 11, etc.; iv. 7.

[According to Ptolemy's chronological canon of the reigns of the Babylonian kings, Nebuchadnezzar became king near the close of B.C. 605, whereas his expedition in question, falling in the third year of Jehoiakim, occurred late in B.C. 607, and the capture of the city, in Jehoiakim's fourth year, fell about the middle of B.C. 606. It appears, however (Josephus Antiq. x. 11, 1), that his father, Nabopolassar, during his own lifetime, and near the close of his reign, had sent him to repel Pharaoh-Necho at Carchemish, and on his way back, Nebuchadnezzar captured Jerusalem, as related by Daniel. While he was engaged in this campaign, his father died, and he hastened back to Babylon in order to assume the reins of government. By the Jews, therefore, his reign is naturally reckoned from the date of this conquering expedition, although he did not actually become full king at Babylon till a year or more later.]

Verse 2. And the Lord gave . . . into his hand, i.e., into his power. Compare Gen. ix. 2, 20; Ex. iv. 21; 2 Sam. xviii. 2; also Ps. xcv. 7, etc. The designation of Jehovah simply as "Lord" (אֲדֹנָי) is not confined to later writers, a.g., Ezra x. 3; Neh. i. 11, but occurs as early as Gen. xviii. 27; Judges xiii. 8; Ps. xvi. 2; xxxv. 23, etc.—Jehoiakim, king of Judah. Jehoiakim reigned eleven years, according to 2 Kings xxiii. 36; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 5, while the conquest by Nebuchadnezzar here referred to can hardly have taken place later than the fourth year of this reign (see Intro. § 8, Note 2, and particularly what is there remarked in opposition to Kranichfeld). Hence it is impossible to consider the passage before us as describing a conquest which put an end to the rule of Jehoiakim, but rather an event which resulted in his becoming the vassal of Nebuchadnezzar; or, more correctly, of Nabopolassar, who was yet living. Similarly, what follows does not assert an actual banishment of Jehoiakim, but merely his temporary removal to Babylon, and perhaps not even this.—And a part of the vessels of the house of God, i.e., of the sacred vessels of the temple, which are again mentioned in chap. v. 2 et seq.—מִקְצֵתָם, instead of which several manuscripts have מִקְצֵתָם (cf. Theodotion's ἀπὸ μέρους), is compounded of מִן and קָצַת, and the preposition מִן, and, therefore, its literal meaning is "from the end," "on expiration," in which sense it occurs in vs. 5, 15, and 18 of this chapter. In this place, where it serves to designate a quantity instead of denoting time, it evidently expresses the idea of an integral part, a considerable part, like the Chaldee מִקְצָה מִן in chap. ii. 42, and like מִקְצֵתָם in Neh. vii. 70. In explaining this meaning it is not necessary to assume (with Hitzig) that מִקְצָה may here be equivalent to "a part," for the word bears this sense in no other instance. The word, rather, indicates that the store in question, from end to end, has contributed a share, and throughout its extent some portion has been taken away. Hence "from the end of the vessels of the temple" signifies merely a portion of all its vessels. Cf. Kranichfeld on this passage; Gesen.-Dietrich s. v. מִקְצָה. [Fürst, however (Heb. Lex. s. v.), adopts the simple explanation that מִקְצָה is merely an alternative form of מִקְצָה, and this is certainly corroborated by the form מִקְצֵתָם, chap. i. 18, where two prepositions cannot be tolerated.] This view is also essentially established by 2 Chron. xxxvi. 7: וַיִּמְעֹל בָּרֶחַק יְהוָה חֲבִירָא נְבוּכַדְנֶצַּר לְבָבֶל. Which he carried into the land of Shinar; rather, "And he caused them to be brought to the land of Shinar,"—to Babylonia, which province is here called by the ancient name that occurs outside of Genesis (see Gen. x. 10; xi. 2; xiv. 1), only in the elevated language of the prophets, a.g., in Isa. xi. 11; Zech. v. 11.—The suffix in מִקְצָה "and he caused them to be taken away," can hardly be taken (as do Hävern. and others) as referring exclusively to the sacred vessels, the mention of which immediately precedes this sentence; for the following words refer to them again, and thus distinguish them as a particular of the collective object of the verb מִמֶּנָּה. We are not obliged, however, to include the king Jehoiakim among those who were carried away with the sacred utensils; for while the narrative in its progress postulates the presence in Babylon of Jewish youths belonging to the royal and to noble families, it never implies the presence of the king himself (cf. vs. 3, 6; also v. 13); and while it is related in 2 Chron. xxxvi. 6, that Nebuchadnezzar bound Jehoiakim "in fetters, to carry him to Babylon," it is not expressly stated that he executed that purpose. The Sept. (καὶ ἐνήγαγεν αὐτὸν ἐν χαλκαῖς πέλαις; καὶ ἀνήγαγεν αὐτὸν εἰς Βαβυλῶνα) first imposed this sense on the passage, because they felt compelled to assume an actual deportation of Jehoiakim, followed by his return to Jerusalem at a later period—an opinion which was shared by the writer of the 8d Book of Esdras and the Vulgate, and by several rabbins of the Middle Ages, a.g., Ibn-Ezra. While the passage before us does not directly contradict this assumption, which represents the fate of Jehoiakim as very similar to that of Manasseh (2 Chron. xxxiii. 13), it does not necessarily compel its adoption.

* [Stuart, on the contrary, insists that the following clause compels us to understand the same object of מִן in both cases; but he overstrains the particle מִן by the rendering "the same." The English Auth. Version interprets in a similar manner. But the latter clause certainly implies a distinction between the objects carried away, some of which were deposited in a particular spot. The author is, therefore, correct in understanding the associates of the king to be included generally under the mention of his name, but not himself particularly; he is inconsistent, however, a little farther on, as we shall see, in destroying the whole foundation of this distinction, in the interpretation of the last clause of the verse.]

Jehoiakim may be included among the transported Jews who are designated by the plural suffix in יְהוֹיָכִים; but, on the other hand, the suffix may, in addition to the temple-vessels, simply designate a band of noble Jews, whom the conqueror carried away as hostages, and to which the youth referred to in v. 3 et seq. belonged—hence those יְהוֹיָכִים, whose presence may be gathered from the collective singular יְהוֹיָכִים, to which reference has already been made (Kranichfeld; cf. Ibn-Ezra, Maldonat, Geier, and others; also Bertheau in Kurzgefasstes exeg. Handbuch sur Chronik, p. 427).—To the house of his god—rather “to the dwelling-place of his gods.” בְּיַת אֱלֹהֵי is probably to be regarded as in opposition with אֲרָץ אֱלֹהֵי; for the sacred vessels of the temple at Jerusalem, as has been shown, formed only a part of the object in יְהוֹיָכִים; and, besides, if בְּיַת אֱלֹהֵי in this place were intended to designate the temple of Nebuchadnezzar’s god (or gods), usage would require the particle אֶל in order to manifest the object towards which the motion is directed (see Gen. xxxi. 4; Isa. xxxvii. 23; Zech. xi. 18). The correct view is stated by Hitzig and Kranichfeld, who refer to Hos. viii. 1; ix. 15; Ex. xxix. 45; Num. xxxv. 3, etc., in support of the tropical signification, which takes בְּיַת in the sense of “land or dwelling-place.” [Keil, however, shows the inaccuracy of this criticism, on grammatical grounds. Moreover, in this way the distinction evidently intended between the different classes of objects transported, is wholly taken away; the persons were merely removed to Babylon, but the utensils were lodged in a heathen temple, as they before had belonged to Jehovah’s. The parallel history, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 6, 7, states all this explicitly. Daniel here merely rehearses the facts in a general way, but is nevertheless careful to mention the disposal, both of the captives, of whom he was himself one (chap. ii. 25), and the vessels, which afterwards became so important in his narrative (chap. v. 2, 23).] Whether the genitive אֱלֹהֵי be translated “of his gods” (cf. chap. ii. 47; iii. 29; iv. 6, 15) or “of his god,” is unimportant. In the latter case, the reference is to Bel, the chief divinity of the Babylonians; cf. Isa. xli. 1; Jer. i. 2; li. 44.—And he brought the vessels into the treasure-house of his gods (or “his god,” viz. Bel). On בְּיַת אֱלֹהֵי, treasure-house ταμειον, compare Mal. iii. 10; Neh. xiii. 5, 12, 13, where the treasury of the second temple is the subject of remark. There is no contradiction between this passage and chap. v. 2 et seq. where the sacred vessels are profaned by Belshazzar, and thus appear to have been stored in his palace. Belshazzar was not Nebuchadnezzar, and it is conceivable that the son could trample in the mire what his father and predecessor had valued and reserved (cf. Ephr. Syr. on this passage). Nor is there a contradiction of 2 Chron. xxxvi. 7; the statement in that passage: “And he put them in his palace” (בְּיַת־בְּלִיָּצָר; A. V. “temple”), is merely less exact than the one before us; [or rather, perhaps, בְּיַת־בְּלִיָּצָר is then used in its frequent signification of temple, as all the older versions render, and the suffix “his” designates it as that of his favorite deity].

Verses 3, 4. The selection of youthful Jews of noble rank for service at the royal court. And the king spake unto (commanded) Ashpenaz, the master of his eunuchs. אֲשֶׁנַּז, a name, whose formation is very similar to that of אֲשֶׁנַּז, Gen. x. 3, but not to be identified with it on that account (as Hitzig suggests) without further inquiry. It appears to be of Indo-Germanic origin, and, according to Rödiger, is compounded of the Sanscrit aśa, “horse,” and nasa, “nose.” It is, therefore, equivalent to “horse-nose.”—רֹב כְּרִיסִים, the chief of the eunuchs (Sept. ἀρχιεunuχος; Vulgate, praepositus eunuchorum), an important and influential officer of the palace at Oriental courts, as may be shown from the position of the Kiash-Aga at the Turkish court in our day. However, neither he nor his subordinates are to be regarded as actual eunuchs, but rather as ordinary chamberlains (Luther: “oberster Kämmerer”). Compare Gen. xxxvii. 36; xxxix. 1, 7, where Joseph’s master at the court of Pharaoh is called כְּרִיסִים, although he was married; also 1 Sam. viii. 15; 1 Kings xxii. 9; xxv. 19, etc., in all of which the rendering of כְּרִיסִים by “chamberlain” or court-official is adequate. However, the subordinates of Ashpenaz, mentioned in the passage under consideration, may be regarded as actual eunuchs (as also those in Esth. i. 10, 12, 15; ii. 3, 14; iv. 5), without necessitating the conclusion that Daniel and his associates also became eunuchs, on their being placed under his supervision. Only a grossly carnal conception of the facts narrated in this chapter, and of Isaiah’s prophecy, Isa. xxxix. 7 (where כְּרִיסִים likewise means [or may mean] an official generally) could lead to this opinion, which is entertained by a number of Jewish and older Christian commentators, e.g., Josephus, Antiquit., x. 11; the Targum, on Esther iv. 5; Rashi, on Dan. i. 21; Origen Homil. iv. on Ezek.; Jerome, adv. Jovin. i. 1; and Joh. Damascenus, De fide orthod. iv. 25.* It is not even possible to argue from the relations of Daniel to the master of the eunuchs, as indicated in this passage, that the prophet always remained unmarried (as Pseudo-Epiphanius De vit. prophet., c. 10, Cornelius a Lapide, Huetius, and others, suggest). See the Introd., § 2.—That he should bring certain of the children of Israel—i.e., to choose of the children of Israel, viz.: of the Jews, who had been carried to Babylon as hostages, cf. v. 2. The more comprehensive phrase, “the children of Israel,” is justified by the fact that the theocratic state under Jehoiakim included all of the tribes of Benjamin and Levi, and at least fragments of several other tribes, especially of Simeon (2 Chron. xv. 9), in addition to the leading tribe of Judah.—And of the king's seed, and of the princes—rather, “of the royal seed, as well as of the number of nobles.” Instead of this correlative view of the two ’s—the only correct view—which is found in Von Lengerke, and in Hitzig, and others, Bertholdt, without reason, adopts the designative (either—or), while a majority, including Hävernicks, take the first ’ (before וְיָרֵעַ, which, however, is wanting in several of Kennicott's and De Rossi's manuscripts,—but the authenticity of which is not, on that account, to be questioned) in the sense of “and indeed,” “namely,”—hence as marking the use of an emphatic apposition. Our view is supported by parallel passages, such as chap. vii. 20; viii. 13, etc.—The term הַפְּרָתִימִים, “nobles,” “magnates,” which occurs only here and in Esth. i. 3; vi. 9, seems to be borrowed from the Persian, and to be equivalent to the Pehlevi pardom, “the first,” “the noble,” cf. the Sanscrit prathamā, Zend frathema, Greek πρώτος. Its derivation from the Greek πρότιμοι, essayed by Bertholdt, as well as the opinion which prevailed among older expositors, that the word is of Hebrew origin, and perhaps related to פָּרַח, inevitably, are to be decisively rejected. The corresponding term in Hebrew is אֲדִירִים, the strong or powerful ones: Ex. xv. 15; Ezek. xvii. 13; 2 Kings xxiv. 15.—Verse 4. Children in whom was no blemish, i.e., no physical fault; hence, of faultless beauty; compare 2 Sam. xiv. 25. (Cf. the form מֵאֲדָרִים in the Kethib in this place with Job xxxi. 7.) Corporeal soundness and a handsome form were considered indispensable among the ancient Orientals (cf. Curtius, vi. 5, 20), for those who were destined for court service,—a view which is still shared by the Turks; see Ricaut Gegenwärt. Zustand des türk. Reiches, i. 13.—The indefinite וְיָרֵעַ does not admit of a definite conclusion respecting the age of the youths, and particularly of Daniel. The remark in Plato, Alcib. i. § 37, however, according to which the training of the Persian youth by the παύδαγγοι βασιλείων began with the 14th year, has a certain importance for speculations on this question, which is enhanced by the statement of Xenophon, Cyrop. i. 2, that none of the ἐπηβοι might enter the service of the king before they attained their 17th year. What is said in v. 5 concerning a period of three years during which Daniel was in training, corresponds remarkably with these statements.—Skillful in all wisdom. The intellectual qualifications are immediately connected with the physical. Hävernicks, Hitzig, and others, are correct in taking מִשְׁכִּילִים in the sense of “discerning, understanding,” rather than “versed, or experienced,”—as denoting aptitude rather than habitus. “וְיָרֵעַ, as כָּל indicates, is the objective wisdom, which is displayed in the various fields of knowledge, and, according to v. 17, is contained in books” (Hitzig)—hence scientific, as distinguished from the purely practical wisdom, which elsewhere is generally referred to.—Cunning in knowledge, and understanding; literally “knowing knowledge” (יָדַעַת יָדַעַת) and “understanding thought” (וְיָרֵעַ מִדָּעַת). On מִדָּעַת “thought” (elsewhere “knowledge”), compare Eccles. x. 20, and on both phrases compare chap. ii. 21; Neh. x. 29.—And such as had ability in them to stand in the king's palace, literally “who had power (כֹּחַ, here [perhaps] ability, talent; compare viii. 7; xi. 15) to stand in the king's palace” (לִצְבֹּר בְּהֵיכַל הַמֶּלֶךְ),—for which לִצְבֹּר is not to be substituted). “To stand in the king's palace” is the same as “to stand before the king” (cf. Gen. xviii. 8; xli. 46; Deut. i. 38, etc.), i.e., to await his commands, to serve him. See below, v. 17, and compare the absolute הַעֲמָדִים, the servants, in Zech. iii. 7; also Esth. v. 2.—And whom they might teach the learning and the tongue of the Chaldeans; literally, “and to teach them the learning,” etc. וְיָלְמְדוּ depends on the verb וְיָמָקְר v. 3, and is co-ordinate with וְיָלְמְדוּ in the same verse, as the preceding אֲתִנָּח indicates.—כְּסֵף, “writing,” does not in this place denote the art of writing, but the learning of the Chaldeans; compare כְּסֵף v. 17, which can only be equivalent to all learning, “all literary knowledge.” Further, לְשׁוֹן כְּסֵפִים can hardly signify the Aramean idiom which begins with chap. ii. 4, but designates the original Chaldean, which was of Japhetic origin, or tinged with Japhetic elements—as Michaelis, Bertholdt, Winer, Hävernicks, Lengerke, Hengstenberg, and others, hold.* That the noble Jewish youths should be compelled to learn the Aramean dialect, which, according to 2 Kings xviii. 26 et seq. (Isa. xxxvi. 11), was the official language both at the Assyrian and the Babylonian courts, admits, indeed, of an easy explanation; since the Jews of that time were but slightly acquainted with that dialect (cf. 2 Kings, in the above mentioned place), and since youth especially, of whatever rank, could not have been instructed in this language, which was indeed related to the Hebrew, but was nevertheless a foreign tongue. The view which identifies the “tongue of the Chaldeans” with the official Aramean of the court, is untenable because of the circumstance that the latter is introduced in chap. ii. 4 by the term אֲרָמִית (cf. Isa. xxxvi. 11; Ezra iv. 7), and is thus clearly distinguished from the ordinary language of the כְּסֵפִים. (See notes on that passage, and compare Introd. § 1, note 3.) Verse 5. The provision for the selected youth, and their training. And the king appointed them a daily, etc. “Them,” i.e., those who should be selected, but whom the king did not yet know. כֹּחַ, to ordain, appoint, assignare, compare v. 10.—דְּבַר יוֹם בְּיוֹמוֹ, literally, “matter of the day in its day,” i.e., a daily supply, or ration. Compare Jer. lii. 34, where the same expression is used with reference to the daily food of the captive Jehoiachin; also Ex. v. 13, 19; Lev. xxiii. 7, etc.—Of the king's meat,—of which, according to Oriental custom,

not only noble guests (cf. Jer. as cited above), but also all the servants and officials were accustomed to partake, compare 1 Kings v. 2, 3; and concerning the custom in question at the Persian court, see Athenæus, iv. 10, p. 69; Plutarch, Probl. vii. 4. — בשר "meat," really delicacies, luxurious food, is of Persian origin,—a composite word formed out of bag, "tribute" (cf. Sanscrit bhaga, "allowance," "ration"), and the preposition pañi, "towards, to," (= Sanscrit prati, Greek πρὸς, πρός)—and hence is equivalent to "apportioned food," which sense is also expressed by the Sanscrit pratihaga, which designates the daily proportion of fruits, flowers, etc., required by the rajah in his household. Cf. Gildemeister in the Zeitschrift für Kunde des Morgenlandes, iv. 214.—And of the wine which he drank, properly "of the wine of his drinking," his banquet. יין is to be taken in the singular in this place, as well as in vs. 8 and 10.—So nourishing them three years, rather, "and (commanded) to instruct them three years"—properly "educate," "bring up" [but literally, "to make great"—perhaps referring primarily to their physical culture]. The infinitive לְלַמֵּד with a copulative וְ certainly does not depend on יין in v. 8; but rather is to be regarded as governed by יָמָיו, from whose signification the idea of commanding, ordaining, is Zeugmatically derived. Compare לְלַמֵּד in v. 11; also Jonah ii. 1.—That at the end thereof they might stand before the king, i.e., after the three years had expired. "To stand before the king" is "to serve him," cf. v. 8. ["Standing was the position of waiters in readiness to do their master's will."—Stuart.]

Verses 6, 7. The names of Daniel and his associates, and their changing.—Now among these were of the children of Judah, hence, belonging to the most prominent tribe, after which the entire nation was usually called, even at that early period. The four youths are here shown to be Jewish יְהוּדָיִם (v. 8); but it does not follow from this passage that all of them, and Daniel in particular, were, in addition, of royal family (מִמְלֶכְיָהוּ, v. 8).^{*} The royal descent of Daniel can only be conjectured; that Zedekiah was his father, as is stated by Josephus, is a mere supposition. Compare Intro. § 2, where the names Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah have been sufficiently considered (cf. also note 1 to that §). Verse 7. Unto whom the prince of the eunuchs gave (other) names, rather, "and the prince . . . gave them." The changing of names as a sign of entrance into the condition of subjection to a ruler, is a frequently attested custom of Oriental and classical antiquity. Compare Gen. xli. 45 (Joseph); 2 Kings xxiii. 34 (Eliakim); 2 Kings xxiv. 17 (Matthanianah = Zedekiah); the re-naming of pupils

by their preceptors, e.g., 2 Sam. xii. 25 (Solomon = Jedediah); Mark iii. 16 (Simon = Peter); and respecting this custom among the Greeks and Romans, Theodoret, on our passage; Chrysostom, Opp. v. 286, etc. ["But while the kings referred to only had their paternal names changed for other Israelitish names, which were given them by their conquerors, Daniel and his friends received genuine heathen names in exchange for their own significant names, which were associated with that of the true God."—Kell.] For he gave unto Daniel the name of Belteshazzar, etc.; rather, "and he called Daniel Belteshazzar." The four new names of the youths doubtless contain, without exception, a reference to the divinities of Babylon. This is apparent in the name בִּלְטַשְׁצָר (cf. chap. iv. 5),—with which the royal name בִּלְטַשְׁצָר is probably identical—whether, as a majority hold, we find the name of the god בֵּל in it, and explain its composition perhaps by Bel's princeps (which the expression of Nebuchadnezzar himself in chap. iv. 5 seems to endorse), or prefer Hitzig's more artificial interpretation = Päld tschäqara, "nourisher and devourer." נְדָרְיָהוּ likewise (for which the scriptio plena, chap. iii. 29, is נְדָרְיָהוּ) is certainly equivalent to "adorer of Nego," which divinity is probably not the same as Nebo (Saadia, Hitz., Kranichf., and others), but a reptile god, and perhaps the familiar dragon of the apocryphal book Bel and the Dragon—since the comparison of the Sanscrit nāga, serpent, with this name, which was first essayed by Rödiger, affords a more likely conception than the transmutation of ב into ג. But שָׂדֶרְשָׁר, which may be identical with שָׂדֶרְשָׁר, Zech. ix. 1 (cf. Köhler, Sacharia, 2d pt., p. 18) also seems to designate a divinity, and possibly, in case it is based on the root שָׂדֶר or שָׂדֶר, "to move in a circle," the sun-god. מִישַׁל may be the same as the Sanscrit mischak, "stag," and therefore denote a god likewise belonging to the sideral domain; whether the sun-god be again intended, as Hitzig supposes, must remain doubtful (but see Hitzig on this place).

Verses 8-10. Daniel's request, and the refusal of the master of the eunuchs to entertain it. But Daniel purposed in his heart. So the A. V. and Luther, literally, but less agreeable to the sense of וַיִּשֶׁטַח עַל לִבּוֹ than "he was concerned," as Bertholdt properly renders it. That he would (better "should") not defile himself with the king's meat. The Sept. renders וַיִּשֶׁטַח עַל לִבּוֹ וַיִּשֶׁטַח עַל לִבּוֹ וַיִּשֶׁטַח עַל לִבּוֹ; cf. ἀλυγμάρτα, Acts xv. 20. The reason for the refusal of the סָדֶנָה, i.e., the ordinary food of the king, as well as of the wine from his table (cf. v. 5), by Daniel and his associates, arose doubtless from the heathenish custom of consecrating each meal, by offering a portion to the gods.^{*} In order to prevent their being involved

^{*}[Much less does it follow "that the other youths of noble descent, who had been carried away along with them, belonged to other tribes" (Kell ad loc.), for (as the same commentator immediately adds), "the names of Daniel and his three companions only are mentioned, because their history recorded in this book brings them specially under our notice,"]

^{*}[That the special reason for their abstinence was not the Levitical distinction of "clean" and "unclean" animals, is evident from their rejection of the wine likewise, which the Mosaic law allowed. In addition to the reason assigned by our author, we suspect some sanitary

in idolatry by partaking of food which had been thus dedicated to the gods (cf. 1 Cor. x. 18-20), they avoided especially those kinds of food which were commonly offered to the gods, hence those prepared from flesh, wine, or flour. The vegetables, such as pulse, cabbage, etc., of which alone they were willing to partake, were indeed also prepared by the heathen cooks of the king, and were even unclean in themselves, as having been grown on heathen soil (Am. vii. 17; Hos. ix. 3, 4); but, since offerings or libations were never taken from them, they were not specially sacred to the gods, and hence, might be used by pious Jews, without any essential defilement of conscience. Compare Hävernick and Hitzig on this passage, and against Von Lengerke especially, who thought to find here the χορτάδες τροφή, 2 Macc. v. 27; and, therefore, a proof of the composition of the book in the time of the Maccabees; see Hävernick, Neus krit. Unters., p. 47. ["Daniel's resolution to refrain from such unclean food flowed from fidelity to the law, and from steadfastness to the faith that man liveth not by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord" (Deut. viii. 8)."] —Kell. Verse 9. Now God had brought Daniel into favor and tender love with the prince of the eunuchs; literally, "and God gave into favor . . . before the prince," etc. וְהָיָה לְדָוִד is exactly the Greek ἐδόκεν εἰς ἔλεος καὶ ἰσχυρῶς (Theodot.). On this subject compare Gen. xxxix. 21; also Neh. i. 11; 1 Kings viii. 50. —Verse 10. I fear my lord, the king, etc. The prince of the eunuchs does not, in these words, positively refuse the favor which Daniel seeks, but intimates that in order to avoid the royal displeasure, he must render at least a formal and apparent obedience to the command he had received; aside from this, he shows his readiness to exercise every possible forbearance towards his wards. The remark in verse 9 that God had brought Daniel into the favor of the prince is, therefore, by no means in conflict with the tenor of this reply. —For why should he see, etc. The same turn as in Cant. i. 7, where the poetical לֹא יִרְאֶה stands for לֹא יִרְאֶה, and where, similarly, the question expresses the sense of an emphatic negation (cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 4; Ezra vii. 23). —Your faces worse liking, etc. וְעַתָּה, properly "sad, lowering, of a peevish appearance" (Gen. xl. 6; cf. רָעָה, xl. 7), here implying a meager and decayed appearance, exactly like the Greek συνθρομβός, Matt. vi. 16. ["וְעַתָּה is to be understood before וְהָיָה לְדָוִד, according to the comparatio decurtata frequently found in Hebrew; cf. Psa. iv. 8; xvi. 84, etc."] —Kell. —Then shall ye make me endanger my head to the king; properly, "and ye shall endanger." וְהָיָה לְדָוִד [and ye cause to forfeit, a Chaldaizing Piel from וָרָבַח, is co-ordinated with וְהָיָה לְדָוִד, and like it depends on וְהָיָה לְדָוִד; therefore: "for why should he see . . . and ye endanger my head," etc. On the phrase "to endanger the head," compare Iliad. iv. 162, ἀπορίσαι σὺν κεφαλῇ, and the German, "den Kopf vorsetzen."

Verses 11-16. Daniel's abstemiousness, and its consequences. Then said Daniel to Melsar.

וְהָיָה לְדָוִד, as the prefixed article shows, is not a proper name, but an appellative, and probably designates an official. It can, however, scarcely mean a pedagogue or president of alumni, as Hitzig suggests, but rather a "butler" or "steward," as appears from the nearly identical Persian melsar, "vini princeps" (according to Haug a compound word from the Zend. madhu = μέθυ, "drink," and çara = κάρα, "head"); compare ἀρχιποικῆλος, John ii. 8, 9), —[and וְהָיָה לְדָוִד, Isa. xxxvi. 2]. Verse 12. Prove thy servants, I beseech thee, ten days. The number ten, which was constantly employed as a round number (cf. verse 20; Zech. viii. 23; 2 Kings xx. 8, et seq.; and generally my Theologia Naturalis, i. 713 et seq.), was the more suitable in this case, as it was "sufficiently large to leave traces of the change of food in the appearance of the young men, yet not too great for a mere experiment" (Hitzig). —Give us (only) pulse to eat. Concerning וְהָיָה לְדָוִד, vegetables, pulse, see on verse 8. —Verse 13. And as thou seest, deal with thy servants; i.e., according to the result of thy observations. On וְהָיָה לְדָוִד with וְהָיָה לְדָוִד, see Ewald, Lehrbuch, § 224, c. —Verse 15. Fatter in flesh. The youth themselves, and not merely their faces, are the subjects of this predicate; for neither וְהָיָה לְדָוִד nor וְהָיָה לְדָוִד can be regarded as plurals. The plural וְהָיָה לְדָוִד can nowhere be pointed out, and finds no support in Eccl. xi. 9 (cf. the exegetical notes on that passage, and also Hävernick on Daniel, p. 36). —Verse 16. Thus Melsar took away the portion of their meat, and the wine that they drank; better, "and the steward (henceforth) took away their appointed food and wine." וְהָיָה לְדָוִד is "not introductory, but in connection with the participle expresses the duration" (Hitzig). The continuation of their treatment on this wise by the steward is remarked in order that the improvement in the condition of the youth, already mentioned as apparent in verse 15, may be more strikingly brought out. —On the question whether the narrative aims to represent this fact as miraculous, as well as concerning its ethical importance, see the dogmatico-ethical considerations [below].

Verse 17. The great endowments of Daniel and his companions. —As for these four children, God gave them knowledge and skill, etc.; properly, "And God gave . . . to these four," etc. Luther's rendering, "And the God of these four gave them," is inexact. On the precedence of the remote object in the nominative, followed by a personal pronoun in the dative (here לָהֶם), compare the examples adduced by Ewald, § 309, a, b. —In all learning and wisdom. —וְהָיָה לְדָוִד, as in verse 4, "literary knowledge, acquaintance with literature, erudition" (Theodot., γραμματική). —And Daniel had understanding in all visions and dreams. It was,

cause, arising from an apprehension of the stimulating effect of the highly-seasoned food, especially if they were under surgical treatment.]

For this opinion there is the shadow of reason in the ridiculous.

therefore, his acquaintance with oneirocritics that distinguished him above his companions, who must also be regarded as wise and highly cultured. This was clearly a miraculous gift, which was intimately connected with his χάρisma προφητικόν, but must not be confounded with it; for the skill to interpret the dreams and visions of others, is certainly different from the gift of seeing prophetic dreams and visions in person. Still, as the second half of the book shows, the possession of the latter faculty by our prophet presumed the existence of the former; just as in the New Testament the divinely-bestowed power to interpret tongues and prove spirits goes hand in hand with the power to speak in tongues and prophecy, in the case of the truly great bearers of the Divine Spirit, e.g., St. Paul (1 Cor. xiv. 6 et seq.), St. Peter (Acts v. 3; viii. 20; x. 10, etc.).—חֲבִירֵי בָּכָל־דְּחַיִּין is the same construction as in verse 4: מַשְׁבִּירִים בָּכָל־דְּחַבְּתָם; compare Ewald, § 217, 2. בָּכָל, however, does not belong only to דְּחַיִּין, but also to דְּחַבְּתָם following. "All visions and dreams" are all possible ones, of every imaginable kind.

Verses 18–20. Favorable issue of their examination before the king. Now at the end of the days. Von Lengerke's rendering, "and toward the end of the time," is incorrect.—לְהַבְרִיִּם, "to bring them," viz.: into the presence of the king. Hence not the same as הַבְּרִיָּא in verse 3.—The prince . . . brought them in before Nebuchadnezzar. Them—not merely the four (verse 17), but, as may be inferred from ver. 19, all those Israelitish youths, verse 18.—And among them all was none found like Daniel, etc., either in physical beauty, or in marked mental excellencies.—Therefore stood they before the king, i.e., they became his servants. "זָמַר is inceptive; they entered the royal service, and continued in it afterwards" (Hitzig).—Verse 20. And in all matters of wisdom and understanding; literally, "the discernment of wisdom" (הַדְּמַת בִּינָה), something like מִשְׁפָּט, Num. xxvii. 11; cf. Ps. l. 24).

וְהַדְּמַת, however, is here, as in verse 4, employed exclusively in the sense of objective wisdom, which is essentially the same as science; while בִּינָה is "the subjective interior of this wisdom, the mind which shines through it." דָּבָר is here equivalent to a special point, matter, object; cf. Ps. xxxi. 9; Judg. xix. 24; Jer. xiv. 4, etc.—That the king inquired of them. וַיִּבְרָךְ. The perfect refers back to the examination instituted by the king, verse 19, not forward to later questions, which he addressed to them.—Found them ten times better. Compare Gen. xxxi. 7, 41; Lev. xxvi. 26; Zech. viii. 23; Ecc. vii. 19.—Than all the magicians and astrologers that were in all his realm; rather, "than all the learned (in literature) magicians that were," etc. חֲרָטִים, by reason of the probable derivation of the word from חָרַט, stylus, represents those who are versed in writings, scribes (scarcely persons who are clever, discerning, as Hitzig prefers, because of its assumed derivation from the Zend khratumat, the Rabbinical קְרִיטָן). The learned Egyptian priests were designated by this term (Gen. xli. 8, 24; Ex. vii. 11, 22, etc.), while Herodotus (ii. 36) calls them ιερογγραμματοειδεις, and the Sept. sometimes terms them εξηγηται (Gen. xli. 8, 24), and again σοφισταί (Ex. vii. 11). Unlike chap. ii. 2, 27; iv. 4, etc., where the Chartummim are mentioned as a special class beside the Ashaphim and other wise men, the word, though not connected with the following, serves in this place merely to enlarge the conception of the predicate. חֲרָטִים, the more special term designates (in virtue of the undeniable sameness in sense of its root טָרַח with טָהַח and טָהַח) "breathers, whisperers," i.e., conjurers, who murmured their magic formulas in an aspirated whisper. Whether they are to be specially regarded as "snake-charmers" must remain undecided, in view of the fact that the relation of this word to the term aspic is not established, and is possibly no more than an accidental similarity in sound. Compare, on the other hand, the Arabic naphathu, "to breathe mysteriously on coiled knots" (Freitag, Lexic. Arab. s. v.).

Verse 21. Preliminary conclusion of the introduction. And Daniel continued (thus) even unto the first year of king Cyrus. הָיָה, which is neither to be identified with, nor exchanged for הָיָה (the latter is advocated by Kirmss and Hitzig among others, who substitute וְהָיָה for וְהָיָה), expresses, in connection with עַד, the sense of attaining to, or of existing until the inauguration of an event. But "to live until the first year of the reign of Cyrus" is by no means equivalent to dying in that year. In this case the passage would contradict the statement found in chap. x. 1, and, therefore, would be in evidence against the original unity of this book (compare Introd. § 4). It is clear that the particle עַד in this place does not refer to the close of the prophet's life, but simply designates a highly important period of time, up to which he lived and approved himself as the possessor of the exalted gifts of wisdom, prophecy, and interpreting dreams (verse 17). The special mention of the first year of Cyrus as such a period, "has, on the one hand, the objective reason that a really new era, for the Jews especially, and one to which the most remarkable prophecies (Isa. xlv. 28; xlv. 1) referred, began with him; and, on the other, the subjective reason, that this sharp separation into great historical periods is general in Daniel, and, in addition, that a longing for the deliverance of his people must be regarded as a controlling disposition of his nature" (Hävernick). Compare Hengstenberg (Beitr., p. 65, 314 et seq.), and Maurer on this passage, who regards עַד הָיָה, etc., correctly, as simply showing that Daniel lived through the whole period of the exile as a highly esteemed wise man at the Chaldean court.* We need not, however, adopt Ewald's view, who assumes that the words דָּנִיֵּאל הָמֶלֶךְ have been lost after דָּנִיֵּאל; "Thus Daniel lived at the royal court until," etc., with which he connects the venturesome hypothesis that Daniel and his companions dwelt in a separate building of the palace, which was specially intended to serve as "the royal academy (!)."—The Hebrew form of the name דָּנִיֵּאל evidently corresponds better with the ancient Persian in the cuneiform inscriptions (Qurus, Qurus), than the Greek κύρος. Its interpretation by "sun," which is found as early as Ctesias (Plut. Artax. i. p. 1012) and in the Etymol. M. (cf. the Sanscrit sūra, sūra; Zend hware; modern Persian khur), is not entirely certain. See the Zeitschrift für Kunde des Morgenl. vi. 158 et seq.; 350 et seq.

ETHICAL DEDUCTIONS CONNECTED WITH THE SCHEME OF REDEMPTION, APOLOGETICAL REMARKS, AND HOMILETICAL HINTS.

1. The dogmatic and ethical significance of the early history of Daniel and his companions consists chiefly, and it may even be said exclusively, in the proof of resolute faith and obedient devotion to God, which they displayed by abstaining from the royal provision at the Babylonian court. Our admiration is not enlisted in behalf of the abstinent diet, the fasting, the mortification of self, on the part of these youth, but finds something grand and morally important in the active trust in God, and the faithful obedience to God, that are displayed in those self-denials. They did not abstain from the use of the delicacies of the royal table, during the whole period of their training, from a spirit of desperate ascetic bravado, or because of a super-legal dread of God's creatures, which, in themselves, are not objectionable (1 Tim. iv. 4); nor yet because, like the Buddhists of India, they scrupled to destroy animal life in any form; but from the truly religious motive of remaining faithful and devoted to their covenant God Jehovah (see above, verse 8), and to avoid their being implicated, to any degree whatever, in the idolatrous practices of their heathen masters. Their abstemiousness has, therefore, essentially the same ethical value as that of the Rechabites, who refused to drink wine, from motives of religious obedience to the vow of their ancestor (Jer. xxxv.); or, as the conscientious abiding of the Nazarite by his sacred vow, which imposed similar denials on him, and which might cover the whole period of life (Samson, John the Baptist), or a definite time of longer or shorter duration (St. Paul, Acts xxi. 24 et seq.; Aquila, Acts xviii. 18). A further analogy to the course of these youth in Babylon will be found in the case of the Jews at Rome, whom Flavius Josephus mentions in chap. 8 of his autobiography. Our wonder and emulation are not excited in any of these instances by the avoiding of certain indulgences, but rather, by the disposition of faithful submission to the wholesome discipline of God. This it is, that marks their course as the effect of a strong, rather than weak faith, which thus becomes an example for the Christians of all ages. Several of the older expositors already recognized this, on the whole, although their extravagant estimate of the value of ascetic self-denial of any sort, prevented them from reaching a really unprejudiced and truly evangelical conclusion upon the subject. On the request of Daniel to Melzar, verse 12, to prove him and his companions during ten days with pulse and water, Jerome remarks, that it was a striking evidence of his faith: "Incredibilis fidei magnitudo non solum sibi corpulentiam polliceri esu villoris cibi, sed et tempus statuere. Non est ergo temeritatis, sed fidei, od quam regias dapes contempserat." Similarly Theodoret on that passage: "Οὐδὲν τῆς εἰς θεὸν πίστεως ἰσχυρότερον, καὶ δὴ τοῦτο πολλὰ χόθεν καὶ ἀλλαχόθεν ἐστὶ μαθεῖν, οὐχ ἥκιστα δὲ καὶ ἐκ τῶν τοῦ θεοπεσίου Δανιὴλ ῥημάτων· τὸ γὰρ πιστεῦσαι τε καὶ θαρρῆσαι, ὥς τῆς θείας ῥοπῆς ἀπολαύσεται, καὶ μὴ ἐσθίον — εὐπρετέστερος καὶ περικαλλέστερος φανήσεται καὶ μείζων· ποίην εὐσεβείας ὑπερβολὴν καταλείπει." Among later writers, see especially Melancthon, who remarks correctly: "Danielis temperantiam fuisse opus confessionis, et quidem hanc abstinentiam præceptum fuisse lege Dei, non humanis traditionibus. Ergo abstinēbat Daniel, ut testaretur se non abdicere doctrinam, in qua sola exstabat verbum Dei, et abhorrere ab aliis gentium traditionibus." also Calvin, who remarks on the words of Daniel, verse 11 et seq.: "Tenendum est etiam illud, nempe non temere, neque proprio motu hoc dixisse, sed instinctu Spiritus Sancti. Fuisse enim non solertia, sed temeritas, si Daniel sibi fabricasset hoc consilium, et non fuisse certior factus a Domine de felici eventu. Non est igitur dubium, quin hoc habuerit ex arcana revelatione, feliciter et ex voto cessurum, si permetteret minister ipsum et socios vesci leguminibus." And further: "Sciamus, hoc esse verum experimentum frugalitatis et temperantiae, si possimus esurire, ubi Deus nos ad inopiam et egestatem cogit, immo etiam si sponte possumus abdicere delicias, quæ nobis essent ad manum, sed nostro exitio. Nam hic subsistens in leguminibus et aqua esset valde frivolum, quia major interdum in emperantia se prodiit in leguminibus, quam in optimis quibusque et lautissimis cibis." Note further, what Chr. B. Michaelis says concerning the contrast, indicated in verse 18, between the majority of the youth designed to be pages to the king, who partook unhesitatingly of the prescribed fare, and the strict abstinence of Daniel and his three friends: "Hi ergo, licet et ipsi Judæi essent (verses 3, 4, 6), tamen in observanda lege divina minus religiosi fuerunt. Tanto laudibilibior fuit Danielis sociorumque ejus pietas et in patria religione constantia."

2. The course of the self-denying youth will also appear as an effect of faith, from what is said in verse 15 respecting their surprisingly robust and handsome appearance. Whether this consequence of their vegetable diet is to be regarded as something miraculous, or as a purely natural result, may be questioned. The phenomenon can hardly pass for absolutely miraculous; for the traveler Chardin, in a manuscript remark on that verse, observes, "I have noticed that the Kechichs (i. e., monks) have by far a fresher and more healthful color than others, and that the Ar-

menians and Greeks, though they frequently fast, appear healthy, lively, and handsome" (compare Burder, in Rosenmüller's Alt- u. Neu-Morgenland, iv. 840; also Harmer, Observations in the East, i. 357); and it is conceivable that an unrestrained indulgence in luxurious food might rather detract from the beauty of the remaining youths, than enhance it, especially if it were accompanied by the debaucheries and excesses which are so common among the pages at Oriental courts (Lüdecke, Beschreibung des türk. Reichs, i. 52 et seq.; Hävernick, Komment., p. 87). Still, there is something extraordinary, indicative of Divinely supernatural co-operation, in the fact that at the end of three years the appearance of Daniel and his companions excelled that of all the other youths in fullness and beauty, and not less in the additional fact that they excelled these latter in point of intellectual qualities and scientific acquirements. Cf. Hävernick, "At the same time, it would be partial to ignore the Divine assistance; it was God who enabled his servants to find favor with their overseer, who gave them progress in Divine wisdom and understanding, and who did not forsake them in this instance. Only by this reference to God, which is certainly found in our narrative, can the believer comprehend its true bearing. Hence it is unwise, and the mark of a merely carnal exposition, to become involved in far-fetched and physiological explanations and calculations, such as are found in Aben-Ezra, no less than to ignore the Higher power, from which come all good and perfect gifts."

8. As an apologetical question of some importance, it must be remarked that what is related in this chapter concerning the abstinence and strict observance of the law at the heathen court of the Chaldean king, by Daniel and his associates, is but poorly adapted to stamp the narrative as a fiction of Asmonæan times, in which the author seeks to beget trust in God on the part of his readers (Hitzig), or to warn them against partaking of unclean food (Bertholdt, Von Lengercke, etc.). The pious Jews of the Maccabæan period not only scrupulously avoided the flesh which was sacrificed to idols by their heathen oppressors, but everything that emanated from them, even to their arts and sciences. Daniel, Hananiah, etc., are, on the contrary, represented as distinguished adepts in all the wisdom of the Chaldeans, and at the same time, as filling official stations at the court of the Babylonian

king, or even as members of the order of the magi (cf. chap. ii. 13, 48 et seq.). But while this latter feature shows a striking resemblance between the experience of the leading character and that of Joseph in Egypt; while especially the patronage of the youth Daniel by the prince of the eunuchs, as well as his high endowment as an interpreter of dreams, reminds us strongly of Joseph; we are yet compelled to reject the opinion that the whole is merely an artificial copy of the early history of that patriarch, because nothing is recorded, either of an ascetic refusal of food or drink on the part of Joseph, nor yet of his being trained with especial reference to service at the court of Pharaoh, or of a careful instruction in foreign wisdom and learning. With respect to the latter point, indeed, Moses, rather than Joseph, would serve as an example (see Acts vii. 22). Compare also Jerome (on verse 8): "Qui de mensa regis et de vino potus ejus non vult comedere, ne polluat, utique si sciret ipsam sapientiam atque doctrinam Babyloniorum esse peccatum, nunquam acquiesceret discere, quod non licebat. Discunt autem non ut sequantur, sed ut judicent atque convincant. Quomodo si quispiam adversus mathematicos velit scribere imperitus uav̄quatos, risui pateat, et adversum philosophos disputans, si ignoret dogmata philosophorum. Discunt ergo ea mente doctrinam Chaldeorum, qua et Moyses omnem sapientiam Egyptiorum didicerat."

4. The Homiletical treatment will, of course, seize on the chief and fundamental ethical principle of the section, as indicated above, under 1, without regard to subordinate details. Thus, perhaps: "Not dainty food, but the blessing of God develops beauty and strength. All wisdom, even in worldly concerns, is a gift of God, and the fear of the Lord is the beginning of this wisdom also" (Starke, after the Bibl. Tubing.). —Or: "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God" (Deut. viii. 3; Matt. iv. 4). —Or: "It is a good thing that the heart be established with grace; not with meats" (Heb. xiii. 9), etc. Compare Melancthon: "Daniel in aula nec minis nec contemptu, nec illecebris voluptatem aut potentia victus est, ut deficeret a vero cultu. Hanc constantiam pauci imitantur, sed qui imitantur habebunt ingentia premia corporalia et spiritualia, sicut inquit testas: Glorificantes me glorificabo, etc." (2 Sam. ii. 20)."

2. The vision of the monarchies, or Nebuchadnezzar's dream concerning the four world-kingdoms, and its interpretation by Daniel.

II. 1-49.

- 1 And in the second year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, Nebuchadnezzar dreamed dreams, wherewith [and] his spirit was troubled,¹ and his sleep brake
- 2 from him.² Then [And] the king commanded³ to call the magicians, and the astrologers, and the sorcerers, and the Chaldeans, for to shew [tell] the king
- 3 his dreams. So [And] they came and stood before the king. And the king said unto them, I have dreamed a dream, and my spirit was troubled¹ to know the dream.

- 4 Then spake the Chaldæans to the king in Syriac [Aramaic], O king, live for ever! tell thy servants the dream, and we will shew the interpretation.
- 5 The king answered and said to the Chaldæans, The thing [word] is gone from me: if ye will not make known unto me the dream, with [and] the interpretation thereof, ye shall be cut in pieces,* and your houses shall be made a
- 6 dunghill [sink]. But [And] if ye shew the dream, and the interpretation thereof, ye shall receive of [from before] me gifts and rewards [largess], and great honour: therefore shew me the dream and the interpretation thereof.
- 7 They answered again, and said, Let the king tell his servants the dream, and we will shew the interpretation of it. The king answered and said, I know of certainty that ye would gain the time, because ye see the thing [word] is
- 9 gone from me. But [, that] if ye will not make known unto me the dream, there is but one decree for you; for [and] ye have prepared lying and corrupt words [a lie and a corrupt word] to speak before me till the time be changed;* therefore tell me the dream, and I shall know that ye can shew me the interpretation thereof.
- 10 The Chaldæans answered before the king, and said, There is not a man upon the earth* that can shew the king's matter: therefore there is no king, lord, nor ruler, that asked such things [a matter] at any magician, or astrologer, or Chal-
- 11 dæan. And it is a rare thing [And the matter] that the king requireth [asketh is weighty]; and there is none other that can shew it before the king except the gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh.
- 12 For this cause the king was angry and very furious, and commanded* to
- 13 destroy all the wise men of Babylon. And the decree went forth that [, and] the wise men should be slain [were about to be killed]; and they sought Daniel and his fellows to be slain.
- 14 Then Daniel answered with* counsel and wisdom to Arioch the captain of the
- 15 king's guard,* which was [who had] gone forth to slay the wise men of Babylon: he answered and said to Arioch the king's captain, Why is the decree so hasty
- 16 from the king? Then Arioch made the thing known to Daniel. Then [And] Daniel went in, and desired of the king that he would give him time, and that he would shew [even to show] the king the interpretation.
- 17 Then Daniel went to his house, and made the thing known to Hananiah,
- 18 Mishael, and Azariah, his companions; that they would desire [even to request] mercies of the God of heaven [the heavens] concerning this secret, that Daniel
- 19 and his fellows should not perish with the rest of the wise men of Babylon. Then was the secret revealed unto Daniel in a night-vision. Then Daniel blessed the
- 20 God of heaven [the heavens]. Daniel answered and said, Blessed be the name of God* for ever and ever [from everlasting and to everlasting]; for wisdom
- 21 and might are his." And he¹¹ changeth the times and the seasons: he removeth kings, and setteth up kings: he giveth wisdom unto the wise, and knowledge to
- 22 them that know understanding. He¹¹ revealeth the deep and secret things: he
- 23 knoweth what is in the darkness, and the light dwelleth with him. I thank thee, and praise thee, O thou God of my fathers, who hast given me wisdom and might, and made known unto me now¹² what we desired of thee: for thou hast now made known unto us the king's matter.
- 24 Therefore Daniel went in unto¹³ Arioch, whom the king had ordained [appointed] to destroy the wise men of Babylon: he went and said thus unto him, Destroy not¹⁴ the wise men of Babylon: bring me in before the king,
- 25 and I will shew unto the king the interpretation. Then Arioch brought in Daniel before the king in haste, and said thus unto him,¹⁵ I have found a man of the captives [children of the captivity] of Judah that [who] will make known
- 26 unto the king the interpretation. The king answered and said to Daniel, whose name was Belteshazzar, Art thou able to make known unto me the dream which I have seen, and the interpretation thereof?
- 27 Daniel answered in the presence of [before] the king, and said, The secret which the king hath demanded [asked], cannot the wise men, the astrologers, the magicians, the soothsayers, shew [the wise men . . . cannot show] unto the king;
- 28 but [yet] there is a God in heaven [the heavens] that revealeth secrets, and

- maketh known to the king Nebuchadnezzar what shall be in the latter days [what is it that shall be in the end of the days]. Thy dream, and the visions
- 29 of thy head upon thy bed, are these [is this]; (as for thee, O king, thy thoughts came into thy mind upon thy bed what should come to pass [what it is that shall be] hereafter; and he that revealeth secrets maketh known to thee what
- 30 shall come to pass [what it is that shall be]: but [and] as for me, this secret is not revealed to me for any wisdom that I have [is in me] more than any living, but for their sakes that shall make known the interpretation [but in order that the interpretation may be made known] to the king, and that thou mightest know the thoughts of thy heart:)
- 31 Thou, O king, sawest, and, behold, a "great" image. This great image, whose brightness was excellent, stood [a great image—this image was large, and its brightness excessive—rising] before thee," and the form thereof was terrible.
- 32 This image's head [This was the image: Its head] was of fine "gold, his breast [its breasts] and his [its] arms of silver, his belly [its bowels] and his thighs
- 33 [its thighs] of brass [copper], his [its] legs of iron, his [its] feet part [of them]
- 34 of iron and part [of them] of clay. Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which [and it] smote the image upon his [its] feet, that were
- 35 of iron and clay," and brake them to pieces [crushed them]. Then was [were] the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold, broken to pieces together," and became like the chaff of [from] the summer threshing-floors; and the wind carried them away, that [and] no place was found for them: and the stone that smote the image became [was for] a great mountain, and filled the whole [all the] earth.
- 36 This is the dream; and we will tell the interpretation thereof [its interpretation we will tell] before the king.
- 37 Thou, O king, art a king of kings [the kings]: for the God of heaven [the heavens] hath given thee a [the] kingdom, [the] power, and [the] strength, and [the] glory."
- 38 And wheresoever the children of men dwell [in every place that the sons of man are dwelling], the beasts [living thing] of the field, and the fowls [bird] of the heaven [heavens], hath he given into [in] thy hand, and hath
- 39 made thee ruler [rule] over them all. Thou art this [the] head of gold. And after thee shall arise another kingdom inferior to [earthward from] thee, and another third kingdom [a kingdom the third another] of brass," which shall
- 40 bear rule over all the earth. And the fourth kingdom [a kingdom the fourth] shall be strong as iron: forasmuch as iron breaketh in pieces and subdueth all things [the whole]; and as iron that breaketh all these, shall it break in pieces
- 41 and bruise. And whereas thou sawest the feet and [the] toes part [of them] of potter's clay and part [of them] of iron, the kingdom shall be divided [a divided kingdom it shall be]; but [and] there shall be in it of the strength of the
- 42 iron, forasmuch as thou sawest the iron "mixed with miry clay. And as the toes of the feet were part [of them] of iron and part [of them] of clay; so the
- 43 kingdom shall be partly "strong, and partly [part of it shall be] broken. And "whereas thou sawest iron mixed with miry clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men [man]; but [and] they shall not cleave one to another
- 44 [this with this], even as iron is not mixed with clay. And in the [their] days of these kings shall the God of heaven [the heavens] set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other [another] people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it "shall
- 45 stand for ever. Forasmuch as thou sawest that the [a] stone was cut out of the mountain without [upon not with] hands, and that it brake in pieces the iron," the brass," the clay," the silver," and the gold;" the great God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter [what it is that shall be after this]: and the dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure.
- 46 Then the king Nebuchadnezzar fell upon his face, and worshipped Daniel, and commanded that they should offer [to offer] an oblation and sweet odours unto
- 47 him. The king answered unto Daniel, and said, Of a truth it is that your God is "a God of gods, and a Lord of kings, and a revealer of secrets, seeing [that]

48 thou couldst reveal this secret. Then the king made Daniel a great *man*³² and gave him many great gifts, and made him ruler over the whole [all the] province of Babylon, and chief of the governors over all the wise men of Babylon. Then [And] Daniel requested of the king, and he set Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, over the affairs of the province of Babylon; but [and] Daniel sat in the gate of the king.

GRAMMATICAL AND LEXICAL NOTES.

[יָדָהּ לְעַצְמוֹ, beat itself to and fro, was agitated with conflicting thoughts and feelings.—³ הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, was become upon him, a Chaldaizing sense of the verb, like our colloquial "was all over with him".—⁴ הָיָה מְאֹד, said, in the Chaldean sense.—⁵ הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, this ye shall be made, i.e., "chopped into mince meat;" probably a Babylonian form of punishment like "killing by inches".—⁶ הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, be turned, i.e., pass by.—⁷ הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, the dry ground, an emphatic term for the world.—⁸ הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, returned in answer.—⁹ הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, the executioners, such being in Oriental courts an important part of the royal body-guard.—¹⁰ הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, the God, like הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, i.e., the true God.—¹¹ הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, for (I say) his it is, i.e., each of the preceding qualities.—¹² הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, is emphatic, and He. The pronoun is understood with the following clauses.—¹³ הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, and now; the position makes these terms emphatic; q. d., at once, promptly in this emergency.—¹⁴ הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, upon, seems here to denote the abruptness of the interview, q. d., came upon.—¹⁵ הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, mayest thou not destroy.—¹⁶ הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, The הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד following is expletive, like ετι before direct quotations.—¹⁷ הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, one, i.e., a single one, standing alone and conspicuous.—¹⁸ הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, huge or colossal; a different and stronger term than the הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד immediately following.—¹⁹ הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, in front of thee; a stronger term, like the Heb. הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, than הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, so frequently used in the context.—²⁰ הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, good, i.e., pure.—²¹ הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, the iron and the clay, i.e., the materials just described. The art. is emphatic, as in the following verse.—²² הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, like one thing, all at once; denoting suddenness as well as simultaneity.—²³ With these epithets compare the similar terms in the (spurious or late) doxology at the close of the Lord's Prayer.—²⁴ הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, is rather copper, the simple metal; for zinc, which is a component of brass, was anciently unknown.—²⁵ הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, The article here, though present, as in all the preceding verses, should not be expressed in English, as it merely indicates the material.—²⁶ הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹד, in part (lit. from the end); a different expression from the partitives elsewhere used in this connection.—²⁷ The הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹD connective is wanting in the text, but is supplied in the Masoretic margin.—²⁸ The הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹD, is, is emphatic=itself.—²⁹ The הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹD is an emphatic copula=as is.—³⁰ הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹD, lit. magnified Daniel, i.e., promoted him.]

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

Verses 1-3. Nebuchadnezzar demands an interpretation of his dream by the Magi. And in the second year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, i.e., in the second year of his sole reign, which, as remarked in §8, note 2, of the Introduction, must have commenced some time after the fourth—perhaps in the sixth—year of the reign of Jehoiakim. The time, therefore, is about four years later than that mentioned in chap. i. 1, and soon after that designated in chap. i. 18. The three years of the training of Daniel and his companions had expired, perhaps by only a few weeks or months, and their reception into the number of the royal officials, as well as among the magicians, in the broader sense of the term, was of recent occurrence, when the remarkable event transpired which is here recorded, and which raised the four Jews to a far more exalted position in the royal favor. There is, therefore, no conflict, either with those passages of chap. i. nor with Jer. xxv. 1, where "the first year of Nebuchadnezzar," does not designate the first year of his sole reign, but of his joint rule. Compare Hengstenberg, p. 60 et seq., who is correct, in opposition to those who find here essentially a chronological error (Berth., Bleek, Hitz., etc.); and also, as compared with the less suitable modes of reconciliations attempted by several, a. g., Wieseler (Die 70 Wochen, etc., p. 8 et seq.), who places the event narrated in this chapter before the expiration of the three years of Daniel's training, and therefore before chap. i. 18-20, thus regarding it as a supplementary attestation and illustration of the statement in chap. i. 20 (also Fuller, p. 83 et seq.); Hävernick (Neue krit. Unters., p. 64), who places the facts stated in chap. i. 1 et seq. altogether at the beginning of the third year of Jehoiakim, and assumes in addition, that Nebuchadnezzar became king a whole year later; from which it follows that 38-39 months may have elapsed between the taking of Jerusalem and the transportation of Daniel (chap. i. 1 et seq.), and the time of Nebuchadnezzar's dream. Ewald's opinion that הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹD has been lost from after הָיָה מְאֹד מְאֹD, which would give the twelfth instead of the second year of Nebuchadnezzar, is likewise superfluous.*—The copula in

* [It would be very natural for a Jewish writer, looking at events from the Palestinian point of view, as Jeremiah, to date occurrences according to the actual arrival of Nebuchadnezzar as apparent sovereign in Syria, although in reality only a viceroy in place of his father. A precisely parallel reckoning occurs in Luke iii. 1, with reference to the association instead of the sole reign of Tiberius, as chronologists are now

וְנִבְחַדְנֶצְצָר probably indicates that verses 1-4a were written immediately after chap. i. and doubtless for the purpose of connecting this introductory section more closely with the Chaldaic fragment, chap. ii. 4b-49, which, together with the narratives in Chaldee that follow, may have already existed in manuscript form. Compare the Intr. § 4.—Nebuchadnezzar dreamed dreams. ["It has justly been regarded as a significant thing, that it was Nebuchadnezzar, the founder of the world-power, who first saw in a dream the whole future development of the world-power (and even its final overthrow). . . . This circumstance also is worthy of notice, that Nebuchadnezzar did not himself understand the revelation which he received, but the prophet Daniel, enlightened by God, must interpret it to him."—Keil.] The plural חֲלֻמוֹת is used in this place with reference to the several contents of the dream, which, according to verse 81, comprises a number of scenes: (1) The sight of the great image; (2) its destruction; and (3) the growth of the stone which caused its ruin, until it became a gigantic mountain. The dream thus manifested its confused, mysterious character, that dissolved into indefiniteness. The plural may, therefore, with a certain propriety be taken as a plural of unlimited universality, which serves to prepare the way for the singular that follows in verse 3, in so far as it designates the whole of the confused and complex nature of the dream, among whose visions the image of the monarchies and its fate, were prominent in importance and in the impression they produced (cf. Hävern. and Maur. on the passage). The rabbinical interpretation, which refers the plural to the dream and its explanation, is certainly to be rejected (e. g., Jos. Jacchiad.); and also the unauthorized identification of חֲלֻמוֹת with חֲלֻמוֹת (Sept., Vulg., Luther, etc.; and also Hävernick, who endeavors to define this as a plural of intensity, supporting his view by a comparison with חֲלֻמוֹת, Prov. i. 20; ix. 1, which is certainly not plural).—Wherewith his spirit was troubled. Verse 8, and also Gen. xli. 8 (where the awaking of Pharaoh from his dream is described) employ the Niphal חֲלַם in the same sense that the Hithpael in this place bears, viz.: as indicating the alarm of one who has been frightened by a dream; compare Psa. lxxvii. 5, נִקְרַעְתִּי "I am so troubled" (properly, "I am bruised, beaten," contundor), and also the Greek raparresdhai. "The Hithpael intensifies the conception of internal disturbance contained in the Niphal, so that it implies that its outward expression could not be mistaken" (Kranichf.).—And his sleep brake from him, or "and his sleep was over for him." So, properly, the Sept., Vulg., Luther, Berth., etc., and, in general, a majority of expositors. On the Niphal חֲלַם, in the sense of being past or completed, compare chap. viii. 27, and especially Mic. ii. 4. The phrase "His sleep went from him" (chap. vi. 19; Est. vi.

1) conveys a somewhat different idea. חֲלַם, "over him," or "for him," expresses, as frequently with conceptions of emotional activity, the sense of the dative in a more circumstantial and emphatic manner; cf. chap. iv. 24; vi. 19; x. 8, and see Gesenius' Thesaurus, p. 1027, 8. a. Hävernick renders it incorrectly: "His sleep came on him heavily;" for the statement that the king was greatly troubled does not admit of the other, that a heavy slumber had seized on him. Rather verse 8 shows clearly that the desire to recall his dream, hence such an effort to recollect as would necessarily banish sleep, formed the real cause of his disturbance.—On the phenomenon that Nebuchadnezzar should have a dream of prophetic significance, and then forget it (with reference to many of its details, if not entirely) consult the dogmatico-ethical considerations, No. 1.—Verse 2. And the king commanded to call the magicians, etc. This is exactly similar to Gen. xli. 8, to which record the writer seems designedly to have conformed in expression. Of the four classes of wise men here remarked (חֲכָמִים, verse 27), the Chartumim and Ashaphim have already been mentioned, chap. i. 20 (see on that place). The חֲכָמִים, mentioned as a third class, are clearly "enchanters;" cf. חֲכָמִים (properly "to mutter words of incantation," Sept., φαρμακιστῆς) 2 Chron. xxxiii. 6, and חֲכָמִים (φαρμακός) Ex. vii. 11; Deut. xlviii. 10. The term designates, in correspondence with its harsher formation, a stronger and more passionate mode of incantation than חֲכָמִים—an apparent and observable enchantment, as distinguished from the mere breathing of magical formulae. The further mention of the חֲכָמִים, Chaldeans, in connection with the Chartumim, etc., and therefore, as a special class of wise men coördinate with the others, involves no abuse or carelessness of expression, but rather corresponds fully with the statement of Herodotus (I. 181), that the Chaldeans were the priests of Bel, and with that of Diodorus (II. 24), that the Babylonians termed their priests Chaldai. Those designated in this place as חֲכָמִים are therefore the sacerdotal wise man (cf. Hesychius, s. v. Χαλδαίος, where the Chaldeans are distinguished as a γένος Μάγων), who, it is probable, were specially occupied with astronomy, the aboriginal science of the nations about the Euphrates and the Tigris, whose founder was supposed to be Belus, the chief divinity of the Chaldeans (Pliny, H. N., vi. 30: "Belus—inventor sideralis scientia"). As astronomers, they were probably classed with the astrologers, the חֲכָמִים, who are mentioned in connection with them in chap. iv. 4; v. 7, 11, and instead of them in verse 27 of this chapter (see on that passage). The nationality of these Chaldeans was clearly different from that of the great mass of the Babylonian populace; for while these, the original inhabitants of Shinar, were pure Shemites, the former had adopted many Aryan elements into their language and customs. The Chaldeans, after inhabiting Babylonia for centuries, as a kind of priestly caste, attained to political supremacy through Belshazzar or Nabopolassar, whom Diodorus, II. 26, designates as pretty well agreed. Daniel on the other hand, writing at Babylon, although by courtesy he applies the general title "king" to Nebuchadnezzar, while yet but a deputy, is exact in his statement of the years of the reign itself.]

ἐκισχυράτων τῶν ἱερῶν οὐκ Βαβυλωνιοὶ καλοῦσι Χαλδαίους, hence through one of their superior priests (about B. C. 637). They retained this pre-eminence until the taking of Babylon by Cyrus, hence, about a century; but this probably did not exlude the primitive Babylonian priesthood from its place beside the sacerdotal class of the dominant nationality, either in regard to office, or to consideration. Thus we may explain why the Chaldeans are only co-ordinate with the other classes of magicians in this place and in the passages of chap. iv. and v. which have been mentioned, and also understand the fact that the official language (according to verse 4) was not the Chaldean, but continued to be the Aramaean (primitive Babylonian). The Chaldeans, Nabopolassar and Nebuchadnezzar did not, therefore, found a one-sided, intolerant, sacerdotal dynasty; they had rather, so far as this was possible, become thorough Babylonians, or, in other words, Aramaeans. The Chaldeans, however, must have formed the potior pars of the whole body of the wise men at the court, for no other supposition will explain why the entire corps are designated sometimes as חֲכָמֵי בָבֶל, and at others as חֲכָמֵי מִדְּבָר, in the following account (verses 4, 5, 10, cf. verses 11, 12, etc.). Compare Hitz. and Kranichf. on this passage, and see infra, on verse 4.—For to show the king his dreams. All of the four classes of wise men just mentioned were therefore to co-operate in interpreting the dream, "because in this important matter the facts and opinions were to be settled by various methods, and possibly, to be placed on record. The several classes of wise men supplemented each other on such occasions, and assisted each other mutually by their peculiar methods. Thus, the priests might propitiate the gods and invoke their aid, by sacrifices; the conjurers might contribute to the increase of prophetic ability, as might also the enchanters, e.g., by the use of narcotics, etc. In this way the Egyptian wise-men were constantly employed in individual cases as a σύνθημα, according to Diodorus, II. 80." (Kranichf.)—Verse 3. My spirit was troubled to know the dream. A constr. pragnans, which signifies, "My spirit has become troubled (cf. on verse 1), and desirous to know the dream." The king clearly desires to have his dream rehearsed, and not merely to learn its meaning. The words חֲכָמֵי מִדְּבָר may certainly imply the latter, but it appears definitely from verses 5 et seq., 9 et seq. 26, and 36, that he is more immediately concerned to recover the dream itself. The reason was, without doubt, that he had really forgotten it, or, as is frequently the case with intricate dreams, many of its particulars had escaped his memory, and he retained only a general undefined impression of having seen something fearful, monstrous, and alarming, in his dream. A total forgetting of the dream cannot be supposed in this case, since it was not possible for the king to be so greatly troubled as to lose his sleep about a dream which he had forgotten entirely (verse 1). Nor can it be assumed that he really recollected the dream, and had merely pretended that he no longer remembered it (H. Gaon in Ibn-Ezra, Hengstenberg, Hävernick); for the writer would hardly have left unnoticed a representation of this nature, which aimed to test the magicians; and, in addition, the rage of the king, as described in verse 12 et seq., is too furious to be pretended. [On the other hand, Keil justly contends (with the majority of interpreters) that he had not essentially forgotten his dream. "It is psychologically improbable that so impressive a dream, which, on awaking, he had forgotten, should have yet sorely disquieted his spirit during his waking hours. 'The disquiet was created in him, as in Pharaoh (Gen. xli.), by the specially striking incidents of the dream, and the fearful, alarming apprehensions with reference to his future fate connected therewith' (Kran.). According to verse 9, Nebuchadnezzar wished to hear the dream from the wise men that he might thus have a guarantee for the correctness of the interpretations which they might give. He could not thus have spoken to them if he had wholly forgotten the dream, and had only a dark apprehension remaining in his mind that he had dreamed. In that case he would neither have offered a great reward for the announcement of the dream, nor have threatened severe punishment, even death, for failure in announcing it. For then he would only have given the Chaldeans the opportunity, at the cost of truth, of declaring any dream with an interpretation. 'The Magi boasted that by the help of the gods they could reveal deep and hidden things' (Hengst.)." It is very probable, however, that while the king retained a lively recollection of the main features of the dream, he might have forgotten some of the particulars, which, if rehearsed again, he would be able to recognize. This justifies the whole proceeding.]

Verse 4. The reply of the magicians. Then spake the Chaldeans to the king in Syriac, i.e., Aramaic. חֲכָמֵי אֲרָמַיִת, the Aramaic dialect of the Babylonians, which was still prevalent at the court of the Chaldean rulers, Nabopolassar, Nebuchadnezzar, etc., and which was distinguished from their Chaldean idiom, including numerous non-Shemitic elements, by its purely Shemitic character, and especially by its near relationship to the Aramaean of the Syrians. Hence, the Sept. and Theodotion translate Συριακή, the Vulg. Syriace, and Xenophon (Cyrop. VII. 5, 31) states directly that the Babylonians spoke Syriac. The reason for Daniel's express statement that the Chaldeans addressed the king in Aramaic (note the verb דַּבֵּר, corresponding to the adverb; cf. Isa. xxxvi. 11) consists simply in the fact that he desired to call the attention of his Hebrew readers to the contrast between the nationality of the חֲכָמֵי מִדְּבָר, i.e., the majority of the wise men who were summoned before the king, and the purely Shemitic language, which they were obliged to employ (cf. on verse 2). It is wrong to look for the reason of their use of Aramaic, with Palmblad, Hävernick, and others, in their desire to hide the confession of their ignorance from the turba adstantium. This might rather have been accomplished by the use of Chaldean, while the Aramaean was familiar to all present as the language of the court and nation. Compare supra on chap. i. 4, and also the correct remark of Fuller (p. 37): "While the language

+ { of the Chaldeans was the language of science, this (the Aram.) was the language of popular intercourse.—O king, live for ever. This was an introductory formula of the address to the king (cf. chap. iii. 9; v. 10; vi. 7, 22), attested as a general Oriental formula of greeting by 1 Sam. x. 24 (Saul); 1 Kings i. 31 (David); Neh. ii. 3 (Artaxerxes); Ælian, V. H., I. 31 (βασιλεὺς Ἀραξέπην, δι αἰώνος βασιλεύεις); Curtius, R., VI. 5 (Alexander the Gr.); Judith xii. 14 (Holofernes).—On the Keri כְּדָרָא, and similar omissions of ך in the Keri, verse 26; iv. 16; v. 10, etc., see Hitzig and Kranichf. on this place.

Verses 5, 6. Renewed demand by the king, connected with a stern menace. The king . . . said to the Chaldeans, כְּדָרָא. The uncontracted form כְּדָרָא, a stat. emphat. plur., from כְּדָרָא, lies at the foundation of this

Kethib, as well as of the Keri כְּדָרָא; compare Winer, Gramm. des bibl. und targum. Chaldæism., § 32, No. 3.—The thing is gone from me, rather, "the decree is made known by me," i.e., it is my settled purpose, I say it with all emphasis. The words כְּדָרָא כְּדָרָא should probably be rendered in this way, as Hitz. and Kranichf. suggest; for (1) this view only is consistent with the repetition of the formula in verse 8, as well as with the parallel כְּדָרָא כְּדָרָא, chap. iii. 29; iv. 8; (2) כְּדָרָא, which is found only here and in verse 8, is most readily explained by comparison with the Persian azda or azanda, which is found in inscriptions, and is equivalent to publication, science, what is known; (3) the rendering which makes כְּדָרָא correspond to קִרְיָא, קִרְיָא, "standing fast" (Pesh., Ibn-Ezra, the rabbins in Saadia, Winer, Hengstenb.), which is closely related to the one under consideration, is untenable from the fact that an assurance of the fixed and irrevocable character of the royal decree would here be out of place, and that an identification of the root קד with the Arabic vazada, "to be firm," seems rather precarious; (4) the identification of כד with כח, abūt (verses 17, 24; vi. 19, 20), from which arises the sense, "the word has gone out from me" (Gesen., Hävern., Von Lengerke, etc.), is opposed by the extreme improbability that the two forms are identical in meaning, since an interchange of ד and ח is exceedingly rare, and especially because Daniel always employs the form with ד in other places; (5) finally, the view, "the word has escaped my recollection," which was formerly common, and which is found as early as Theodotion and the Sept. (cod. Chis.) (ὁ λόγος ἀπ' ἐμοῦ ἀνέστη), the Vulgate (sermo recessit a me), Luther, Dereser, and others, but which here, and much more in verse 8, contradicts the whole context, and does not consist with the only admissible sense of כְּדָרָא = word, command, is wholly untenable; for the term nowhere in this chapter, not even in verse 23, signifies the dream of the king, but always his decree, his demand. [Moreover, "the punctuation of the word כְּדָרָא is not at all that of a verb, for it can neither be a participle, nor the 3d pers. præter. fem." (Keil), but it is the fem. of an adj. כָּדָר, or (as Fürst thinks), an adverbial form of the same. The meaning firm, however, which the author rejects, seems to us more suitable and better corroborated than any other.]—Ye shall be cut in pieces. אֲחַדְכֶם יִפְּסֶה, to be made pieces (Sept. διαμερίσονται; cf. ἐγὼ ποιῶν, 2 Macc. i. 16, and διχοτομεῖν, Matt. xxiv. 51); a cruel punishment in vogue among all the nations of antiquity, and especially among the Chaldeans (Eze. xvi. 40; xxiii. 47); compare chap. iii. 29.—And your houses shall be made a dunghill. Similarly chap. iii. 29, and also Ezra vii. 11, where the form כְּדָרָא is used instead of Daniel's כְּדָרָא.

This term, derived from the Pael כָּדָר = כָּדָר, to soil, defile, indicates the extremely disgraceful nature of the threatened penalty; the houses are to be changed into dunghills, by being razed to the ground and covered with animal and human ordure—just as Jehu turned the temple of Baal into a sink, 2 Kings x. 27. See the proofs of the frequent use of this method of disgrace and punishment in the East, adduced by Hävern.ck.—Verse 6. Ye shall receive of me gifts and rewards, and great honors; rather, "great treasures." The second of the terms here employed, כְּדָרָא, "reward" (compare the plural כְּדָרָא, "gifts," chap. v. 17, and the Targ. Jonath., Jer. xl. 5; Deut. xxxiii. 24) is satisfactorily explained by its derivation from כָּדָר, and specially from a Palpel form כְּדָרָא, faciliates suas contemnit, prodegit. It is not necessary, therefore, to refer with Berth., Eichhorn, etc., to the Greek νόμισμα in its elucidation, nor with Haug (in Ewald's Jahrb. d. bibl. Wissenschaft, 1853, p. 160), Gesen.-Dietr., etc., to institute a comparison with the old Persian ni-bag-ud, "presentation," nor, above all, with the Sanscrit namas, "present, gift," as Hitzig attempts. Ewald prefers כְּדָרָא, and the translation of this term by official stations, or promoting to office (for which he refers to the old Persian and also to chap. v. 16)—which, however, is opposed to the entire body of exegetical tradition.—Therefore shew me the dream, etc. כְּדָרָא, therefore (composed of the demonstrative adverb כֵּן and the preposition כִּי), is found in this signification in verse 9, and chap. iv. 24, and in the Hebrew of Ruth i. 13. On the other hand it signifies "but rather" in verse 30, and "but" in Ezra v. 12.

Verses 7-9. Repeated refusal of the Chaldeans, and renewed threatening of the king. They answered again. אֲנִי־כְדָרָא, an adverb from כְּדָרָא, "the second one," chap. vii. 5.—And we will shew the interpretation, נִתְּנָה נִתְּנָה. The form נִתְּנָה is not to be changed into נִתְּנָה, as Hitzig suggests, but must rather be regarded simply as a Hebrew stat. emphat. for נִתְּנָה, just as (verse 5) כְּדָרָא is used for כְּדָרָא (verse 8, etc.), or כְּדָרָא (chap. v. 7, 15) instead of כְּדָרָא (ibid., verses 8, 16, etc.). Whether the Hebraizing orthography apparent in this and other similar instances is to be placed to the account of Daniel, and to be considered as a peculiar feature of the Chaldee in his time (Pusey, Daniel, p. 46), or whether it originated with later transcribers of Daniel's text, cannot be definitely decided; compare Kranichf. on this passage.—Verse 8. I know of certainty.

יָדָעִי, equivalent to קָשׁוּט, ex veritate, assuredly, verse 47.—That ye would gain the time; literally, “that ye purchase time” (Sept. and Theodotion: καὶρὸν εξαγοράζετε); compare εξαγοράζεισθαι τὸν καιρὸν, Eph. v. 16; Col. iv. 15; also tempus emere, Cicero, Verr. I. 8. The time, i.e., the favorable juncture, the opportunities, which the magicians sought to buy, i.e., to improve, consisted in the fact that the king had forgotten his dream; they aim to improve this circumstance in such a way as eventually to avoid the interpretation altogether.* Their design is therefore properly “to gain time,” to postpone the decision. Thus Gesen., De Wette, Von Leng., Hävernicks, and still earlier, Luther, are correct: “That ye seek delay.” Entirely too artificial is the view of Hitzig and Kranichf., that the favorable circumstances, of which the magicians hoped to avail themselves, consisted in the king's desire to learn the interpretation of the dream; and that they speculated on this desire, in the hope that the king might ultimately be persuaded to disclose to them the dream, etc.—Because ye see that the thing has gone from me; rather, “that my decree is published,” i.e., because ye observe that I am in earnest about the command; compare verse 5. כִּי-קָבַל does not, in this nor any other place, not even in chap. v. 22, signify “despite that,” as Hitzig suggests, but “because,” properly “because that,” propterea quod. The king evidently aims to point out the motive for the artful temporizing and delay of the magicians, namely, the menace with which he has intimidated and frightened them.—Verse 9. But if ye will not make known . . . the dream. כִּי-יָדָעִי, Heb. אֲשֶׁר אֵין, quodsi. The יָדָעִי properly “since,” “therefore,” takes up the subject of the preceding conditional clause, and places it in emphatic correlation to that clause (Kranichf.).—There is but one decree for you; i.e., one and the same sentence of condemnation shall come on all of you (Vulg. correctly, una est de vobis sententia; cf. Luther, “so ergent das Recht über euch”). הֵן, the sentence of condemnation in this passage, is clearly the same in substance as הֵן in verses 5 and 8; the suffix plainly indicates this (דִּי-יָדָעִי, “your sentence,” i.e., that which comes upon you, which concerns you). Von Leng. and Hitzig (following Theodotion) are wrong: “But one thing forms your object,” ye entertain but one design; for הֵן never designates a subjective personal opinion or aim, but rather always an objective norm, which is binding on the individual.—For ye have prepared lying and corrupt words to speak before me. כִּי-יָדָעִי, “falsehood,” and שְׁחִיתוּתָהּ, properly, “corruption,” “baseness,” are in apposition with הֵן. The entire object is, however, placed before the infinitive לֵאמֹר which governs it, on account of emphasis; compare verse 18; iii. 16; iv. 15.—The principal verb is הִזְכִּירְתִּי in the Kethib, the Aphel of וָכֵן. This form, which does not occur in the Chaldee or Syriac, but is found in the Samaritan, expresses the sense of “conspiring” which is here required, as well as the Ithpa. הִזְכִּירְתִּי substituted for it in the Keri (cf. the συμβουλεύει of Theodotion and the composueritis of the Vulg.).—Till the time be changed, i.e., until by the aid of some hoped-for circumstance ye ascertain something more definite concerning the subject of the dream: or, also, until my anger ceases, and I withdraw the demand altogether.—And I shall know that ye can show . . . the interpretation thereof. The future תִּהְיוּנִי expresses the idea of ability, competency; compare Winer, Gramm., § 44, 8, c. (p. 107).

Verses 10, 11. The magicians attempt to establish their declaration respecting the impossibility of gratifying the king's desire. Therefore there is no king, lord, nor ruler, that asked such things; rather, “since no great and mighty king (ever) asked,” etc. כִּי-קָבַל is to be taken here, as in verse 8, in its usual sense of “since,” not as drawing a conclusion, in the sense of “wherefore, for which reason” (Gesen., Von Leng., etc.). It does not, indeed, adduce the actual reason for the assertion that no one could satisfy the royal demand; but it refers to the subjective ground that in all human experience, no king, however great, had imposed such a demand. Compare the similar probatio a posteriori, or a gnorismate, in the familiar passage, Luke vii. 47.—The predicates רַב וְשֵׁלִים are not empty titles after the manner of the Orient (Berth., Von Leng., Häv.), but imply that while the most extreme demands might be expected from precisely the most powerful kings, nevertheless, etc.—Verse 11. Except the gods, whose dwelling is not (to be found) with flesh, or “with men.” בָּשָׂר, flesh, indicates the frailty of created man, encompassed by earthly limitations, as contrasted with the uncreated and divine, which is not confined within these perishable bounds; compare Isa. xxxi. 3; Jer. xvii. 5; Zech. iv. 6; Job v. 4; also John i. 14; 1 Tim. iii. 16, etc. The Chaldeans include themselves in the term flesh, in order to refer excusingly to their imperfection and the limitation of their knowledge, as in no wise deserving of censure.—The fact that the dwelling of the gods is not with men, prevents such intercourse with them, as would admit of man's instruction in their superior knowledge. This is certainly a truly heathenish, but not a specifically Babylonian thought (as Hävernicks supposes). Von Lengerke's supposition that the king must already at this juncture have remarked the prophetic rank of Daniel (cf. Ex. viii. 15) is too far-fetched. On the other hand, the appeal of the wise men to the gods, becomes significant for the progress of the scene, as it might suggest to the king the consideration, so damaging to themselves, that the gods could not conceal their superior knowledge of important secrets from them, of all others, who were professional priests, in case they were not pretended, but real priests of the gods. In other words, the appeal of the magicians hastens the denunciation of the sentence with which they had been threatened.

Verses 12, 13. *The decree for the execution of the appointed penalty. And commanded to destroy all the wise men of Babylon; naturally only those belonging to the capital city, who alone are to be regarded as summoned before the king (verse 2); not those of the whole realm, nor even of the province of Babylon (verse 49; iii. 1). Those remaining magicians, or wise men, who were not inhabitants of Babylon itself, formed, according to Strabo xvi. 1; Pliny, H. N. vi. 20, separate colleges, e.g., in Borsippa, Urchoe, Hipparenum. They differed in certain principles and customs from the Babylonian college, as well as from each other, and therefore, could not be held directly responsible for a mistake or a crime committed by their colleagues in the capital.—Verse 13. And the decree went forth. וְהָיָה, the decree in proper form, the firman (cf. δύγμα, Luke ii. 1); compare verse 9.—That the wise men should be slain. מְהַרְגֵם מְהַרְגֵם probably expresses no more than this; the form of the imperf. partic. מְהַרְגֵם seems to be used as a gerundive, “they were (persons) to be slain, devoted to death;” or—of which, however, there is no other example—the $\dot{\text{ר}}$ coupled with the participle, seems exceptionally to express the sense of design: “sapientes ut interficerentur” (cf. Kranichf. and Maurer on this passage, the one of whom prefers the former explanation, and the other the latter). The execution of the sentence is not to be regarded as having actually begun,* as appears sufficiently from what follows, especially in verses 14 and 24 (contra Hitzig, etc.).—And they sought Daniel and his fellows to be slain; evidently because they were regarded as belonging to the מְהַרְגֵם or מְהַרְגֵם in the broader sense, which could only be the case after they had passed the examination before the king mentioned in chap. i. 19—hence, after completing the three years of their training. It follows from this that the event here recorded did not transpire during that period (cf. on verse 1), as Wieseler holds. At the same time the statement before us indicates that Daniel was not entirely unknown to the king at this time, as might appear from verse 25 et seq. The fact that Daniel and his three fellows had not appeared in person before the king, but were sought for, is easily explained by the considera-* tion that Nebuchadnezzar did not, by any means, summon all connected with the class of magicians in the capital before him (cf. verse 2, where Luther’s “all star-gazers and wise men” is decidedly inexact), but assuredly only the presidents of the several chief classes, the notables and representatives of the whole body.—On the apologetic significance of the circumstance that Daniel and his companions seem, in this place, to be at least connected or affiliated with the order of magicians, if not formal members of it (as Von Lengerke, evidently going too far, supposed) see above, Dogm.-eth. considerations on chap. i., and also Kranichf. on this passage.

Verses 14–16. Daniel prevails on the king to delay the execution of the sentence. Then Daniel answered with counsel and wisdom to Arioch, etc. וְדָנִיֵּאל וְשָׂרָא וְחִיָּהוּ וְיִדְיָהוּ, counsel and wisdom, i.e., words of counsel (cf. וְחִיָּהוּ Isa. xi. 2; Jer. xxxii. 19, etc.) and of wisdom, namely, as concerning the difficult position in which he was placed with the rest of the wise men, and in regard to the proper way to relieve the difficulty (וְחִיָּהוּ, ratio, similar to chap. iii. 12). On וְחִיָּהוּ “to reply,” compare chap. iii. 16; Ezra v. 11. The connection וְחִיָּהוּ reminds us of וְחִיָּהוּ

Prov. xxvi. 16.—The name וְחִיָּהוּ occurs as early as Gen. xiv. 1, as the name of a king of Ellasar. The leading element in its composition seems to be וְחִיָּהוּ, אַרְיָ = Sanscrit arja, “lord,” and, possibly, it may even be directly identified with the Sanscrit ārjaka, “venerabilis.” This person was, therefore, a noble, of decidedly Indo-Germanic race, filling an important office at Nebuchadnezzar’s court. His title וְחִיָּהוּ

chief of the slaughterers (i.e., the executioners), is the Shemitic designation of the same official who was known in the Roman empire as the Praefectus praetoris, and in Turkey bears the title of Kopidshi-pasha, hence a chief of the life or body guards. Besides the execution of capital punishments, warlike functions, up to those of a commander-in-chief, might occasionally be devolved on this officer, as appears from the instance of Nebuzar-adan, 2 Kings xxv. 8 et seq. The office existed, however, even at the court of the Egyptian Pharaohs (see וְחִיָּהוּ Gen. xxxvii. 36; xxxix. 1; xl. 3 et seq.). His extensive influence at the Chaldean court is indicated elsewhere than here (see especially the predicate “the powerful one of the king,” וְחִיָּהוּ verse 15), in 2 Kings viii. 10; Jer. xxxix. 9 et seq.; xl. 1 et seq.; xli. 10; xliii. 6; lii. 12 et seq.—Verse 15. Why is the decree so hasty from the king?—rather, “why this furious decree on the part of the king?” or literally, “why the decree which furious from before the king?” וְחִיָּהוּ the participle of וְחִיָּהוּ which, according to the Targ.

Prov. vii. 13; xxi. 29, is equivalent to וְחִיָּהוּ. “to rage,” is here in the stat. absol. instead of emphat., just as the Hebrew participle when in apposition is sometimes without the article. e.g., * [Kell, however, insists that this must be the meaning of the passive participle here, and renders “the work of putting to death was begun.” This is a straining of the sense. The execution being ordered, and preparations going on for it; it was regarded as virtually, but not actually in progress.]

Cant. xii. 5; Am. ix. 12; Jon. iv. 17. Some, as Hävernick, and others, prefer to translate "hurried," "hasty," in analogy with chap. iii. 29, where מְהֵרָה seems to bear that sense (?); but the ancient versions support the rendering "furious, raging" (Sept. πικρὸς, Theodot. ἀνιδίης, Vulg. crudeles), and the entire situation substantiates this meaning.—The writer, however, does not mention everything that Daniel must have said to Arioch on this occasion; but rather contents himself with faintly indicating that only which served to manifest his counsel and wisdom. The author employs an abbreviated style, as in chap. i. 9, 10 (see on the place); he is not, therefore, to be charged with incongruity (Hitzig), nor is the point in question to be strained by an artificially interpolating exegesis, and perhaps (with Kranichf.) to be regarded as particularly surprising and remarkable.—Verse 16. And Daniel went in, namely, to the king in the palace (cf. 2 Sam. xix. 6), naturally not until announced by Arioch (cf. verse 25), for none were admitted to the kings of the East without such announcement, see Esther iv. 11; Herodotus, I., 99; III., 110, 118. Hence, another abbreviating statement by the author, as also in what immediately follows.—That he would give him time, and that he would show the king the interpretation—and naturally, first of all, the contents of the dream itself. He hopes that God will impart both to him, during the respite that is to be granted. In the construction וַיִּשְׁכַּח לְהַחְזִיקָהּ לְמַלְכָּא "and indeed, to," etc., or "namely, to," etc. The change of construction here is analogous to that in chap. i. 5, where the verb וַיִּשְׁכַּח first governs a simple accusative of object, and afterward a telic infinitive clause with לְ (וַיִּשְׁכַּח לְהַחְזִיקָהּ).

Verses 17-19. God reveals the secret to Daniel. Then Daniel went to his house—evidently because the king had granted the desired respite, which must be assumed in verse 16, without further question. This favor will not seem strange, nor inconsequent (Hitz.), when we reflect that Daniel and his three friends had secured the favor and good-will of the king but recently, on the occasion of their first appearance in his presence (chap. i. 19 et seq.). None were better adapted to soothe the angry king and obtain at least a postponement of the impending punishment, than the handsome and richly endowed Hebrew youth, who had already made so favorable an impression on the monarch, and who probably would have arrested the publication of the decree of punishment, had he been among those magicians that were summoned before the king, according to verse 2; compare on verse 18.—Daniel's house may probably be considered as an official or servant's dwelling, as well as the houses of the other wise men mentioned in verse 5; and moreover, as the context shows, as a residence which he shared with his companions, Hananiah, etc.—Verse 18. To desire mercies of the God of heaven; more accurately, "and indeed in order to implore mercies." The clause וַיִּתְּנֵם לְמַלְכָּא depends on the last preceding verb וַיִּשְׁכַּח, "he made the thing known to them;"

hence the construction is the same as in verse 16 b. The design of the וַיִּשְׁכַּח was to impress the exigency on the prayerful consideration of his friends, and, in fact, a united prayerful consideration in which Daniel himself participated (cf. verse 23). That the execution of the design to pray is not expressly mentioned, and that we have merely Daniel's offering of praise after the secret has been Divinely imparted to him, instead of the supplication of the friends, are additional illustrations of the abbreviating style with which our chapter abounds (cf. verses 14 and 16). A New-Testament parallel is found in the Johannine narrative of the raising of Lazarus, John xi. 40, 41 et seq., where the supplication of Jesus is likewise omitted, and only his thanksgiving after his prayer is heard, is recorded.—The designation of Jehovah as the "God of heaven," which occurs as early as Gen. xxiv. 7, is very general with Old-Testament writers after the captivity, probably in contradistinction from the custom of the Asiatic Orientals of deifying the several stars or zodiacal regions; cf. verses 19, 44; Neh. i. 5; ii. 4; Ezra i. 2; vi. 10; vii. 12, 21; also the related phrase "King of heaven," chap. iv. 34 (A. V. verse 37), and συνέστρης οὐρανόων, 2 Macc. xv. 23. In general see Hävernick, Theologie des Alten Testaments, 2d ed., p. 49.—Verse 19. Then was the secret revealed unto Daniel in a night vision. וַיִּרְוֶהוּ לְלִיכָהּ, as well as וַיִּרְוֶהוּ לְלִיכָהּ, Job iv. 13, is probably not a dream-vision, but a vision generally, and properly a vision seen by night. On the influence of night to promote the higher range and prophetic elevation of spiritual meditation, by which it readily arrives at visions, consult Tholuck, Die Propheten und ihre Weissagungen, p. 52.—Compare also the dogmat.-eth. deductions, No. 2 [below].

Verses 20-23. Daniel's praise and thanksgiving. Hitzig observes correctly, "The leading thought which Daniel wishes to express is placed first, verse 20 a; next the exclamation is justified in b, by the attributes which belong to God, and in verses 21 and 22, by the manner in which they are displayed; finally, verse 23 shows why Daniel felt a desire to utter the specific thought of verse 20 a. Those attributes themselves, verse 20 b, return in verse 23 as belonging to Daniel, conferred on him by God; and thus the prayer is rounded into unity."—[Daniel answered and said, "The word וַיִּשְׁכַּח retains its proper meaning. The revelation is of the character of an address from God, which Daniel answers with praise and thanks to God."—Köl.—Blessed be the name of God for ever and ever. The form בְּרוּךְ, like the related בְּרוּךְ, is to be explained, either by assuming that the particle לְ used as a conjunction (that) has excluded the prefix ו (Gesenius, Abhandlung zur hebr. Gramm., p. 180-194), or that the preformative ו passes over into לְ, as in the later Syriac it passes into: (Beer, Inscriptiones et papyri vet. Semitici, I., 19 et seq.; Maurer, Hitz., Kranichf., etc.). The latter assumption seems the more trustworthy. On the phrase, "for ever and ever" (from eternity to eternity) compare the similar doxologies, Psa. xli. 14; cvi. 48.—For wisdom and might are his. This is almost verbally the same as Job xii. 13. The $\text{לֵךְ בְּלֵאָה הָיָא}$ is an emphatic repetition of the former conditional לֵךְ .—Verse 21. He changeth the times and seasons. Theodotus and the Sept. correctly render καιρὸν καὶ χρόνον , for which Acts i. 7; 1 Thess. v. 1, have the inverse order. לֵךְ is time in general; לֵךְ , the determined time, the appointed period or point of time. Both terms are also connected in chap. vii. 12. The thought that God determines and conditions the change of times refers, like the following ("he removeth kings, and setteth up kings"), to the prophetic subject of Nebuchadnezzar's dream-vision, which had just been revealed to Daniel.—He giveth wisdom unto the wise, and knowledge to them that know understanding. Although Daniel includes himself among these wise and understanding ones, and even has special reference to himself while mentioning them, he utters no offensive sentiment, but expresses essentially the same thought as St. Paul when he writes, "By the grace of God I am what I am" (1 Cor. xv. 10). He traces the wisdom and understanding with which he had just been endowed back to its Divine source, and places himself, as the bearer of such wisdom graciously bestowed by God, in contrast with the heathen magicians, who are without it.—Verse 22. He revealeth the deep and secret things, etc. Compare 1 Cor. ii. 10; iv. 5; Psa. cxxxix. 12.—And the light dwelleth with him, has made its abode with him, as a visiting personage of celestial race; compare the Johannine ἐσκηνοσεν ἐν ἡμῖν of the Logos, as well as what is stated in Prov. viii. 30, respecting the Divine wisdom. לֵךְ (for which, with Hitzig, we are perhaps to read לֵךְ) is often used in the Targums instead of לֵךְ or לֵךְ . Instead of the Kethib לֵךְ , illuminatio, intellectual light, the Keri has לֵךְ , physical light (compare perhaps Psa. civ. 2; 1 Tim. vi. 16). The Kethib, however, is sustained by the corresponding Syriac word, and also by the form לֵךְ , chap. v. 14.—Verse 23. God of my fathers. Daniel addresses Jehovah in this manner, because in contrast with the idols of the heathen, he has just revealed himself again as the same true God, who was known to the patriarchs of his nation.—Who hast given me wisdom and might; namely, wisdom in regard to the understanding of the king's dream and its interpretation, and strength with reference to the danger of impending death, which he was enabled boldly to face.—And hast made known unto me now. לֵךְ , the Chaldee לֵךְ , "and now," connects the requisite special proof with the general statement just made. On the etymology of לֵךְ , probably a contraction of לֵךְ , "at the time," see Gesenius, s. v.

Verses 24-26. The announcing of Daniel to the king. Therefore Daniel went in unto Arioch. לֵךְ shows the direction, like the Hebrew לֵךְ ; cf. chap. iv. 31; vii. 16. The Hebrew, however, also employs לֵךְ occasionally in this sense, e.g., 2 Sam. xv. 4.—He went and said thus unto him. The לֵךְ , "he went in," which is cut off by the insertion of a lengthened clause, is resumed by לֵךְ in an anacoluthic way.—Verse 25. Then Arioch brought in Daniel before the king in haste. לֵךְ , "hastily," properly, "in hasting;" cf. chap. iii. 24 and לֵךְ , Ezra iv. 23, which has the same meaning.—The form לֵךְ , which occurs also in chap. iv. 4; vi. 19, neutralizes (like לֵךְ , verse 9) the harshness of the Dagheesh (required by the omission of a radical) by the substitution of an epenthetic; cf. Winer, § 19, 1. In sense לֵךְ does not differ from לֵךְ , verse 24. Concerning Arioch as the εὐαγγελίστης of Daniel, see on verse 16.—I have found a man of the children of the captivity of Judah (margin), i.e., of the Jewish captives. Arioch here certainly speaks of Daniel as wholly unknown to the king, but this is sufficiently explained by the concealed pride and sovereign contempt, with which he, the dignified Indo-Germanic (verse 14) minister of police, believed himself compelled to look down upon the poor Shemitic prisoner. The etiquette of the Babylonian court, so to speak, and particularly of its military or police division, forbade the leader of the body-guard from recognizing Daniel as one known to the sovereign. The compiler can, therefore, by no means be charged with mentioning in this place what contradicts his former statements, and especially with having already forgotten the fact recorded in verse 16 (Hitz, Von Leng.). The manner in which, for instance, David is introduced as a shepherd totally unknown to Saul and Abner, 1 Sam. xvii. 33, 55, might much more readily lead to the conclusion that the narrative there did not originally consist with that recorded in 1 Sam. xvi., which had brought David into closer relations with Saul at an earlier period (cf. even Keil, on 1 Sam., p. 129 et seq., who admits the strangeness of this contradiction). The marked difference between the discrepancy in that case and the far lighter one in the passage under consideration, shows of itself how little reason there is to assume a multiplicity of compilers, or even a want of skill on the part of the sole author.—Verse 26. The king answered and said to Daniel, whose name was Belteshazzar. This Babylonian name, which the king himself had caused to be conferred on Daniel (chap. i. 7), would naturally be the only one to claim the notice of Nebuchadnezzar.—["The question. Art thou able? i.e., 'Hast thou ability?' does not express the king's ignorance of Daniel's person, but only his amazement at his ability to make known the dream, in the sense, 'Art thou really able?'"—Keil.]

Verses 27-30. Introductory to the statement and interpretation of the dream. The secret . . . cannot the wise men, the astrologers, the magicians, the soothsayers, show unto the king. (On לֵךְ and לֵךְ , A. V. "astrologers" and "magicians," see on chap. i. 20.)

Concerning the נִרְיָן, "star-gazers," who are for the first time expressly mentioned in this place, see notes on verse 2. The word (from נָרַן, "to cut in," "incise;" cf. נִרְיָן, chap. iv. 14) primarily denotes "deciders," viz.: deciders of fate, dispensers of decisive oracles concerning the fortunes of men, hence astrologers. Compare chap. iv. 4; v. 7, 11; also Isa. xlvii. 13, from which passage it appears that the office of the Babylonian astrologers was not confined merely to horoscopy, but extended to every kind of fortune-telling founded on the study of the stars. The Vulg. haruspices is incorrect; for the signification of the Hebrew (and Arabic) נִרְיָן, "to cut in pieces," is foreign to the Aram.

נִרְיָן; and haruspicy as a specifically priestly function would seem rather to belong to the Chaldeans.—Verse 28. But there is a God in heaven that revealeth secrets. These words imply the total inability of the heathen gods as well as of their priests and wise men, to reveal secret things; compare Isa. xli. 22 et seq.; xliii. 8; xlviii. 3, etc.; Am. iii. 7; Hos. xii. 11.—And maketh known to the king Nebuchadnezzar—though that monarch is a heathen; compare the instances of Pharaoh (Gen. xx. 3 et seq.; xli. 16 et seq.), Balaam (Num. xxii. et seq.), the Eastern Magi (Matt. ii. 1 et seq.). The וְהַיְיָ is explicative or particularizing.

It serves to introduce the transition from the general truth to the special case in question.—What shall be in the latter days. בְּאַחֲרֵית הַיָּמִים = Heb. בְּאַחֲרֵית הַיָּמִים, is neither, directly and without qualification, "in the last time" (Hitzig), nor yet "in the course of time, in the future" generally (Maur., Häv.), but, as everywhere in the prophetic language of the Old Testament (not excepting Gen. xlix. 1; Num. xxiv. 14), "in the Messianic future,"—in the future theocratic period of salvation. Kranichfeld remarks correctly: "The writer at the outset of his prophetic announcement characterizes, by the use of בְּאַחֲרֵית הַיָּמִים, the whole matter as in relation to the Messianic destiny of his people."—Thy dream, and the visions of thy head. חֲזוֹן רִיבֶךְ (cf. chap. iv. 2, 7, 10; vii. 1) here designate the dream-visions of the king, not because they were begotten by his head or brain in a purely subjective manner, but because God had originated them in connection with the meditations of his head. The phrase is synonymous with "thy dream" and with the latter forms a hendiadys, by virtue of their connection with וְ; the plural is used because the king had seen a multiplicity of dreams (cf. verses 1, 2), but is subordinated to the singular חֲזוֹן as the leading conception, so that the following דְּבָרָא is exclusively conformed to this; cf. Winer, § 49, 6.—Verse 29. As for thee, O king, thy thoughts came into thy mind (margin, "came up") upon thy bed, i.e., presented themselves, uncalled for as it were;—a strikingly expressive personifying phrase. On the form סִבְתָּ compare chap. iii. 8; vi. 13; Ezra iv. 12.—The רִיבֶכְךָ, "thoughts," are by no means to be directly identified with the "visions of thy head" in the preceding verse; they are, rather, merely the psychical substratum of those visions, the natural soil, as it were, from which the Divine communication sprang forth during the dream (correctly Ephraem, Maurer, Von Lengerke, Kranichf.). The רִיבֶכְךָ at the close of the following verse, again, are probably something different from both the רִיבֶכְךָ here mentioned, and from those "visions of the head." They are, most likely, as the context indicates, the disquieting thoughts which occupied the king after his dream, according to verse 1 (cf. chap. v. 6). The pronoun of the second person אַתָּה (for which the Keri substitutes the later form אַתָּה), which precedes in the nominative absolute, is repeated by the suffix in רִיבֶכְךָ, in a manner similar to that by which the introductory absolute וְאֵנִי, "and I," is resumed by לִי in the next verse; cf. the same construction, chap. i. 17.—Verse 30. Not for any wisdom that I have more than any living. This denies every human agency in the imparting of such superior knowledge to Daniel, and at the same time refers to the design which governed it, concerning which the latter half of the verse is more explicit.—But for the intent that the interpretation may be made known to the king (margin); properly, "that they should make known to the king." The indefinite, impersonal plural יְהוֹדְעוּן (Winer, § 49, 3) was probably used with design, that the person of Daniel might be as little conspicuous as was possible, in accordance with the thought in the former half of the verse. Compare also chap. iv. 28.

Verses 31-35. The subject of the dream, and, more immediately, the general description, in verse 31, of the image observed by the king. Thou O king, sawest, and behold a great image. "Sawest,"—literally, "wast seeing," wast in the condition of one who beholds a vision; cf. Winer, § 47, 1.—וְהִנֵּה, "behold," is a modification of רָא (chap. vii. 5, 6), which, according to some, = the imperative רָא, "behold," but seems rather to be a pronominal form from the demonstr. זֶה = זֶה; see Hupfeld in the Zeitschr. für Kunde des Morgenl., II., 133, 168. The Talmud generally substitutes וְהִנֵּה for either of these forms.—The "image" (צֶלֶם), as the context shows, designates a statue in the human form, an ανδρῆς; also, in chap. iii. 1; cf. Isa. xlv. 13.—This great image, whose brightness was excellent. In the Chaldee the words "this image great and its brightness magnificent" are inserted as a parenthesis into the sentence, "and behold a great image stood before thee." The exceeding brightness of the image results naturally from the metals which compose it.—The form (rather "appearance") thereof was terrible; this on account of its brightness as well of its greatness; compare Cant. vi. 4.—Verse 32. This image's head was of fine gold. Literally, "this image, its head," etc. The position of the absolute וְהָיָה at the beginning of the sentence, is similar to verses 29, 30, and verses 38 b, 37, 42, etc.—The stat. constr. עָלַי ought properly to be repeated before וְיָ, the sign of the genitive; cf. vii. 7, 19; also Pea. xlv. 7; Ezra x. 13, etc.—Verse 33. His legs of iron. On עָלַי, “shanks,” compare Cant. v. 15.—His feet part of iron and part of clay; literally, “of them of iron, and of them of clay.” In the Kethib the masculine suffix is appended to the partitive מֵהֶן; מֵהֶן likewise in verses 41 and 42. The Keri employs, in each of these cases, the form מֵהֶן which the fem. מֵהֶן might lead us to expect, but which must probably be regarded as an easier reading. The masculine suffix in מֵהֶן like מֵהֶן in verse 34, for example, and like the suffix וְהֵן in chap. vii. 8, 19, must either be regarded as a common gender (Hitzig), or these masculine forms must be explained by a more general conception of the subject, or by one modified according to the sense,—in this case by transferring the thought from the figure to the fact to which it relates, i.e., the conception “foot” to the other idea “kingdom,” which is symbolized by it (so Kranichf., following Ewald, Lehrb., p. 784, § 318, a).

—Verse 34. Till that a stone was cut out. Naturally a stone that lay on the side of a mountain, from whence it rolled. This stone enters suddenly and unannounced into the transaction; as often happens in dreams.—Without hands, i.e., without human, but solely through a supernatural and Divine agency; compare viii. 25, וְיָ עָלַי; also Job xxxiv. 20; Lam. iv. 6; Heb. ix. 11.—Verse 35. Then was the iron, the clay, etc., broken to pieces together. עָלַי instead of עָלַי; the lengthening of the preceding vowel compensates for the Dag. forte. The impersonal subject in the plural (“they broke in pieces,” cf. verse 30) refers to the invisible supernatural powers, who effected the appearance of the stone itself and the consequent destination. The several component parts of the image, iron, clay, etc., are in this place recited from below upward, because the stone smote and crushed the feet first.—And became like the chaff of the summer threshing-floors; hence were totally demolished, annihilated without leaving a vestige. Compare Hos. xiii. 8; Mic. iv. 13; Isa. xlii. 15, 16; lvii. 13; Psa. i. 4; xxxv. 5; Job. xxi. 18.—And the stone... became a great mountain. וְהָיָה, mountain, is the Heb. וְהָיָה. On the hyperbolic phrase “to fill the whole earth” (not merely “the whole land,” as Van Ess, and others) compare John xxi. 25, and also the apocryphal parallels in Fabric., Cod. Apoc. N. T., I., 321 seq. The exaggeration, however, holds with regard to the figure only, not to the symbolized reality, see verse 44.

Verse 36. Transition to the interpretation of the dream. We will tell the interpretation thereof to the king. וְהָיָה in the plural, is used because Daniel classes himself among the worshippers of Jehovah, all of whom, as such, have access to the mysteries of Divine revelation. It is therefore an expression of modesty, similar to that contained in verse 30. [Daniel seems specially to refer to his three companions, who had been associated with him in prayer for the Divine aid in recovering and expounding the dream. verses 17, 18, 23.]

Verses 37–45. The interpretation.—Thou, O king, art a king of kings. וְהָיָה, the general title of Oriental sovereigns, e.g., according to the cuneiform inscriptions, among the Persians (cf. Ezra vii. 12); among the Ethiopians of modern Abyssinia (Inscr., 5138); and especially among the Babylonians; compare Ezek. xxvi. 7, where, as here, Nebuchadnezzar is termed a king of kings. For the rest, the form “Thou, O King” is taken up again below, in verse 38 b, by וְהָיָה; for which reason וְהָיָה is really to be regarded as in apposition, and the period extended to the close of verse 38; for verse 37 b (וְיָ עָלַי) is merely a relative clause, and verse

38 a (וְהָיָה עָלַי) is a parenthetical supplement to it.*—The God of heaven hath given thee a kingdom (or dominion), power, and strength, and glory. For the connection of the relative וְיָ with the pronoun of the second person וְיָ, compare, e.g., Ecc. x. 16. On the idea, chap. iv. 19; v. 18.—Verse 38. And wheresoever the children of men dwell, etc. On וְהָיָה, “and wheresoever,” compare the essentially equivalent וְהָיָה, Judg. v. 27; Ruth i. 17; Job xxxix. 30. The inserted adverbial וְהָיָה strengthens the idea of the relation, as in וְהָיָה, etc.—Instead of וְהָיָה “dwelling” (part of וְהָיָה; cf. the Heb. וְהָיָה, “race, generation”) the Keri has here and in chap. iii. 31; iv. 32; vi. 26, וְהָיָה, which form is usual in the Targums.—Beasts of the field and fowls of the heaven. This mention of the animals as also subject to the great monarch, serves to enforce and strengthen the corresponding statement with reference to men; similarly Jer. xxvii. 6; xxviii. 14—which passages Daniel probably had in view; also Bar. iii. 16; Judith xi. 7, etc.—[“Nebuchadnezzar’s dominion did not, it is true, extend over the whole earth, but perhaps over the whole civilized world of Asia, over all the historical nations of his time; and in this sense it was a world-kingdom, and as such, ‘the prototype and pattern, the beginning and primary representative of all world-powers’ (Klief.).”—Kell. “That this method of describing extensive dominion was common to the Shemitic dialects, is evident from Gen. i. 26; Psa. viii. 6–8; comp. Heb. ii. 7. 8.”—Stuart.]—Thou art this head of gold. [In וְהָיָה the וְהָיָה is an emphatic copula, as in verse 47. “It carries a kind of demonstrative force with it, like that of the Greek οὗτος, and is equivalent to Thou art the very or that same.”—Stuart. Strictly,

*[Kell takes the same view of the construction, Commentary, p. 104. The rendering of the whole clause would then be as follows: “Thou, O King, the king of kings (for the God of heaven hath given to thee the kingdom, the power, and the strength, and the glory; and wheresoever the sons of men dwell, the beast of the field, and the fowl of the heavens hath he given into thy hand, and hath made thee ruler over them all)—thou art the head of gold.”]

There is nothing suspicious in the fact that, by this construction a breaking to pieces of "all these,"—i.e., the materials already mentioned, gold, silver, etc.—by the fourth kingdom, is stated; for it does not assert the destruction of all former kingdoms as such, but only the increasing diminution and shattering of their politico-ethnological material. The passage thus merely represents, in general, the separating and destructive influence which, naturally to its own injury, emanates from the fourth kingdom. The way is thus paved for the description which follows, of the divisions, internal confusion, and weakness of that kingdom (verses 41–48).—Verse 41. And whereas thou sawest the feet and toes, part of potter's clay. כְּחֵץ as in verse 33.

The addition of חֵץ, "of the potter," to כְּחֵץ, "clay," strengthens the conception of weakness and lack of power which is implied in that term. The same idea results from the genitive combination כְּחֵץ חֵץ, "miry clay, potsherds," which occurs at the end of the verse; it designates the finished work of the potter (Vulg. testa), which, as sherd, is capable of being easily broken.—The kingdom shall be divided, i.e., a kingdom that contains in itself the principle of an increasing disruption and self-division. The dual number of the legs, which might have been made to indicate such division (especially if the colossus were conceived as standing with widely-extended legs), is, evidently, not regarded by the composer.

Nothing but the mixture of iron and clay forms the symbol of division in his view; and this mixture, according to him, pertains only to the feet, and does not extend to the legs, which are represented in verse 33 a, as composed entirely of iron. This indicates that the division, although its principle was inherent in the iron-kingdom (see on the preceding verse),* should only be thoroughly manifested, and its ruinous consequences become apparent in the course of the development of this kingdom; facts which were very fully realized in the history of the Macedonian empire after Alexander, whose rulers endeavored to maintain the unity of the realm down to the battle of Ipsus, although engaged in many conflicts and bloody quarrels with each other, and which only, from the period of that event, permanently dissolved into a number of kingdoms (originally four, from which, however, a constantly increasing number of smaller independent states was developed). Compare infra.—But there shall be in it of the strength of iron. Luther renders "of the iron's plant," corresponding to חֵץ in the Targums, and to the Syr. nebetu (cf. also Theodot. and rīs pīlēs, and Vulg.: de plantaris). But חֵץ is probably derived from חֵץ in Pa. "to fortify, strengthen,"—and therefore to be rendered firmness, strength (cf. חֵץ, firm, certain, vs. 8 and 45; also chap. iii. 24; vi. 13, etc.), rather than from חֵץ, to plant.—Verse 42. And as the toes of the feet were part of iron, and part of clay. The nominative which precedes is really disconnected (cf. verse 32), but, since it is in comparison with the latter half of the verse, "as," or "just as," it may properly be supplied. The composition of even the toes out of the fatal mixture of iron and clay, indicates the weakness of the feet which support the great colossus, despite the fact that iron enters into its constitution throughout, as a principal element. That Daniel, while mentioning the toes, already refers to the ten kings of the Seleucidæ, who are represented later (chap. vii. 7, 24) as the ten horns of the fourth beast, cannot be certainly shown. At any rate, he follows this thought no further, as will be seen from the fact that while he mentions the toes, he does not premise their tenfold number (cf. Hitzig on this passage, against Hengstenb., p. 211. The latter clearly forces the symbol of the toes too far).—So the kingdom shall be partly strong, and partly brittle (margin). Concerning חֵץ חֵץ, "chiefly, partly," see on chap. i. 2.—Verse 43. They shall mingle themselves with the seed of men; i.e., the several kingdoms, or rather their rulers, shall seek to establish harmony by means of marriage and voluntary relationship (hence in this way of sexual propagation).* On the expression, compare Jer. xxxi. 27; on the subject, chap. xi. 6 et seq. and 17, where the prophet enters more fully into the subject here referred to, of the adoption of the marriage policy, and of its failure.—But they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron is not mixed with clay; properly, "does not mingle itself with clay."

The reflexive Ithpaal of חֵץ designates the process of mixing or uniting itself, while the Pael, employed above in verse 41 b, expresses a passive sense. This involves the idea that the elements of iron and clay might be externally mixed, but could not be internally united, because their qualities do not blend, i.e., they contribute nothing themselves to their coherence and permanent union.—Verses 44, 45. The fifth, or Messianic kingdom. And in the days of these kings; hence, while these kings, the Seleucidæ, Lagidæ, and the other Diadochi, are still reigning; and therefore not without being involved in strife and conflict with them: cf. b, and chap. vii. 13, 25 et seq.; viii. 10 et seq.; ix. 24 et seq.—Shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom. On "God of heaven," compare on verses 18 and 37. The highest and only true God appears there as the originator and supreme lord of all kingdoms (cf. verse 21); but this fifth and last kingdom alone, is, in the full sense of the word and with unqualified truth, a kingdom of specifically divine and heavenly character. This implies its miraculous origin as well as its never-ending duration.—The kingdom (rather, "its dominion"†) shall not be left to other people. This had occurred at the end of each of the former kingdoms; compare Eccles. x. 18. The cessation of such transfers of dominion circumscribes the idea of eternal duration in a realizing manner. The term מְלָכִים in מְלָכִים is evidently no longer used in the same sense as before, but signifies "dominion," "government." The suffix does not refer to the God of heaven as the founder of the kingdom (Theodotion, ἡ βασιλεία αὐτοῦ), but to the kingdom itself. —It shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms. וְהָיָה לִיְהוָה is literally, "and bring to an end"—annihilate them. The Divine kingdom is not merely to destroy the fourth world-kingdom, but also the three that preceded it, inasmuch as all had been incorporated with the former; which is shown by the figure of the stone that crushes the legs of the colossus, and thereby destroys the whole image. All these kingdoms are thus described as arrayed in hostile opposition to the divine kingdom, and as objects of its destructive influence; but this does not prevent the existence of certain gradations in their hostility to God and in their untheocratic tendencies; nor that, for instance, the golden head (Babylon) and the breast of silver (Medo-Persia) show greater favor and ethical approximation to God's people, than the brazen belly, etc. Compare supra, on verse 39.—Verse 45. Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountain, etc. כִּי-כִּי-יָרָא is employed here as in v. 40, in a comparative sense, like כִּי-כִּי, "accordingly," or "forasmuch." From this usage results a closer connection of the former half of this verse (as far as וְהָיָה) with what precedes it. The somewhat loosely connected and abrupt position which the second period, beginning with וְהָיָה, is thus made to occupy, need not deter us from this construction (against Hitzig and Kranichf.), which was employed by all the old translators (and also by Luther, Dereser, Von Leng., Maur., etc.). On the subject compare Matt. xxi. 44; Luke xx. 18, where Jesus clearly refers this Messianic prophecy to himself and his kingdom. —The (rather "a") great God hath made known to the king, etc. "A great God," says Daniel, because he desires to refer to the infinite power of that God, who is not only able to disclose wonderful revelations respecting the future, but also to bring his promises to pass. The mode of expression is not exactly poetical, as Kranichfeld supposes, but generalizing. But compare מְלָכִים with the article, Ezra v. 8. [On the contrary, Keil more justly remarks, "That מְלָכִים means, not 'a (undefined) great God,' but the great God in heaven, whom Daniel had already (verse 28) announced to the king as the revealer of secrets, is obvious." The sign most editions of the Masoretic text, we read מְלָכִים, as the emphatic state simply; but if with others, we read מְלָכִים, as the suffixed state, we must translate its realm or dominion. We may adduce, as an objection to the latter, such a variation in the sense of מְלָכִים in the same verse, as well as the unusual and somewhat tautological application of the pronominal suffix to its own noun as an antecedent, i.e., the kingdom's kingdom.] of definiteness (as the art. in Heb.) is omitted on the general principle that the construction by a qualifying adjective renders the term sufficiently definite, inasmuch as there could be no doubt what deity is referred to.]—What shall come to pass hereafter. וְהָיָה, "after this, hereafter," refers specially to the time of Daniel and Nebuchadnezzar (cf. v. 29), and not merely to the incident in the former half of the verse, as Hitzig contends, in order to find here an additional trace of the composition of this book in Maccabean times.—And the dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure. This is an emphatic affirmation at the close of the truly prophetic character of the dream and of the interpretation that had been submitted. The predicate וְהָיָה with וְהָיָה hardly refers, as Kranichfeld supposes, to the fact that the king had forgotten the particulars of his dream, and now recovered them accurately and perfectly. It is better to hold, in harmony with the preceding context, that Daniel aims to set forth the trustworthiness and prophetic force of the dream, as he afterward certifies the correctness of the interpretation by מְלָכִים, "faithful, trustworthy."

* חֵץ always in Hebr., and often in Chald., signifies the unnatural or violent division arising from inner disharmony or discord: cf. Gen. x. 25; Psa. lv. 10; Job xxxviii. 25; and Leng., Chald. Wörterb., s. v.—Kell.]

* [Kell, however, contends, with Kilef., that the mingling is not solely nor properly on the part of the kings, but is only spoken of the vain efforts of the heterogeneous elements of the fourth kingdom to coalesce by juxtaposition or even by intermarriage among themselves. The general character of חֵץ חֵץ, and especially the fact that no subject for it is expressed in the text, favor the opinion that both references are intended, namely, to the rulers as well as the people.]

Verses 46-49. The influence of Daniel's interpretation. Then the king Nebuchadnezzar fell upon his face, and worshipped Daniel. Evidently כִּי-יָרָא does not here signify a mere προσκύνησις, such as was sometimes offered to men (cf. Gen. xxxiii. 7; 2 Sam. xxv. 23; 1 Kings i. 16; Est. iii. 2), but rather a properly divine adoration (λατρεία), as is shown by the connected religious acts of sacrifice and burning incense. This he offers to Daniel as a great prophet of the highest God (see v. 47), and not because he considered him a god in human form, as the inhabitants of Lystra regarded Paul and Barnabas (Acts xiv. 13 et seq.). For this reason the course of Daniel is unlike that of the apostles on the latter occasion. He no more rejects the homage of the heathen king, than did the high-priest Jaddua, when Alexander the great bowed himself to the earth before him, in order to honor the God of Israel (Josephus, Anti. XI. 8, 5); at any rate, he has not definitely recorded that he protested against it and pointed from himself, the human instrument, to his God—which might, however, be explained on the ground of his abbreviating style (cf. on v. 15 et seq.). [We must not forget that Daniel had already explicitly disclaimed before the king the possession of supernatural powers as of himself (verse 36), and had repeatedly ascribed foreknowledge to God alone (verses 28, 45).] The opinion of Geier, Calov, and others, that Nebuchadnezzar merely worshipped in the presence of Daniel, without addressing his homage to the prophet (—as if כִּי-יָרָא were synonymous with כִּי-יָרָא, must be rejected; and no less the assertion of Hitzig, that the objective aim of the Maccabean compiler is again betrayed in this instance, by the "highly improbable behavior of the king" (! ?). *—And commanded that they should offer an oblation and sweet odours unto him. לִבְנֵה, in the Pael "to pour out, deal out, libare" (not "to dedicate, offer," as Hitzig, with an unnecessary reference to the corresponding Arabic verb, prefers), is zeugmatic in this place, and relates not only to the bringing of the לִבְנֵה, "meat-offering," which included an actual libare, but also the לִבְנֵה, i. e., sweet-smelling savor, offerings of incense, which were connected with all meat-offerings. The offering of incense, therefore, which was really implied in the לִבְנֵה (Lev. ii. 1, 15, etc.), is again explicitly noticed, in like manner as the לִבְנֵה is specially mentioned beside the לִבְנֵה and the לִבְנֵה, in Ex. xxx. 9. On the term לִבְנֵה (literally "satisfaction, pleasantness"), here used elliptically without לִבְנֵה, which is constantly joined to it in the Hebrew (cf. Ezra vi. 10, Chaldee text), see Gesenius-Dietrich in the Handwörterbuch.—The tropical conception of the offering of sacrifice and incense as a purely civic testimonial of honor (Bertholdt) is decidedly improper, and leads to a rationalizing of the passage hostile to both the language and the context. Compare the well-known Persian custom of offering sacrifices to kings as the representatives of Ormuzd, which is mentioned in Curtius, VIII. 5, 6; VI. 6, 2; Arrian, VI. 27.—Verse 47. Of a truth it is, that your God is a God of gods. On לִבְנֵה see above, on v. 8; compare לִבְנֵה, Judg. ix. 15; also Jer. xxii. 18.—לִבְנֵה stands emphatically before the remark, similar to ὁ θεός in the Greek, but has greater significance than the latter. "God of gods" does not, in the mouth of the heathen Nebuchadnezzar, designate the only true God (Von Leng.), but the mightiest of all gods. The phrase here expresses a different sense from chap. xi. 36; Psa. cxxxvi. 2; Deut. x. 17.—Verse 48. Then the king made Daniel a great man. לִבְנֵה the Pael of לִבְנֵה, "to become great" (chap. iv. 8). hence, "to make great, exaltare." ["It is more fully defined by the following clauses."—Keil.]—And made him ruler over the whole province of Babylon; not as Von Leng. supposes, over the whole kingdom, but simply over the province, לִבְנֵה, therefore, as in chap. iii. 2. The bestowal of a formal governorship or satrapy is not implied in the verb לִבְנֵה here, or in v. 38. What really was conferred on the prophet, was probably merely a decisive influence over the administration of the province of Babylon, as is illustrated by v. 49. [Still this civil appointment, in distinction from the literary or professional one immediately added, was tantamount to an official position as recognized vice-regent over the province in which the capital was situated.]—And chief of the governors over all the wise men of Babylon. לִבְנֵה still depends on לִבְנֵה, which verb therefore semantically designates, first his elevation to political power, and then to the dignity of chief priest. לִבְנֵה (related to לִבְנֵה, perichitari, tentare, in the Heb. utilitati esse, officia praestare; cf. לִבְנֵה, minister) is equivalent to "business-manager, president, overseer;" לִבְנֵה is therefore a superintendent or chief praefect, and the "Rab-Signin over all the wise men of Babylon" accordingly seems to have been identical with the לִבְנֵה or "chief magian" mentioned in Jer.

xxxix. 8. On the probable identity of the terms לִבְנֵה and לִבְנֵה and the relation of both to לִבְנֵה, see above on v. 2.—Verse 49. Then Daniel requested of the king, and he set, etc. לִבְנֵה properly, "and (so) he set;" for לִבְנֵה must be joined to the imperfect, in order to express the sense of "that" (Winer, § 44, 4). לִבְנֵה therefore signifies an effectual asking in this passage, a prevailing with the king.—Over the affairs of the province of Babylon. לִבְנֵה, "management of business, administration" (cf. לִבְנֵה, לִבְנֵה, 1 Chron. xxvi. 30). The effect of this "placing over the administration of the province of Babylon," was, evidently, to include the three friends of Daniel among the לִבְנֵה לִבְנֵה, chap. iii. 2. Whatever may have been their official title. But their elevation to the rank of Shiltonim to the king involved no receding on the part of Daniel from the political dignity conferred on him, according to v. 48 (Porphyry, Berth., Hitz., etc.). It rather serves to illustrate the powerful influence of the new royal favorite and councillor. But Daniel was only this, not an actual chief satrap of Babylon, to whom the three friends might have been subordinate. See v. 48, and compare chap. iii. 12, which clearly indicates that Daniel did not belong to the number of prominent civil functionaries of the province of Babylon. [On the contrary, the passage here referred to only shows that Daniel's three friends were, as here stated, the persons directly responsible for the civil functions in a certain district; evidently as subordinates under some single higher officer, who in this case could be no other than Daniel himself—a personage too high for direct impeachment by these officious underlings.]—But Daniel sat in the gate of the king, i. e., within the bounds of his palace, at his court.

Compare לִבְנֵה Est. ii. 1, 9, 21; iii. 2 et seq.; also αὐτοῦ (of the Medo-Persian court), Cyropaedia, VIII. 1, and the Turkish "Porte,"—and generally, Rosenmüller, Altes u. Neues Morgenland, III. 899 ff. Incorrectly Bertholdt and Gesenius (Jesaias, i. 697), "He became intendant of the royal castle,"—on which Hävernick remarks, with justice: "It is hardly conceivable how such nonsense could be imputed to our book." ["The chief ruler of the province had a number of ὑπαρχοι, under-officers, in the province for the various branches of the government. To such offices the king appointed Daniel's three friends at his request, so that he might himself be able as chief ruler to reside continually at the court of the king."—Kell.]

ETHICO-FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES RELATED TO THE HISTORY OF SALVATION, APOLOGETICAL REMARKS, AND HOMILETICAL SUGGESTIONS.

We are compelled, in view of the great importance of the image of the monarchies for a correct estimate of the Messianic and practical bearing of all that follows, to separate our dogmatical and ethical observations on this vision into several sections. Accordingly, we treat first of its form; next of the circumstances of the times, which afforded suitable analogies for its prophetic-historical composition; in the third place, of the symbolism of the image as a whole; fourthly, of the interpretation of the four world-kingsdoms, and especially of the second, third, and fourth; and finally, of the relation of the prophetic vision to the history of the founding and development of the Messianic kingdom—the whole to be followed by practical homiletical remarks.

1. The form of Nebuchadnezzar's vision is distinguished from that of almost all the other prophetic visions of the Old Testament, by the peculiarity, that it is a dream-vision, under which mysterious form its highly important prophetic contents are revealed first to a powerful heathen monarch. The dreams of certain heathen princes of patriarchal times, e.g., of Abimelech, Laban, and Pharaoh (Gen. xx. 8; xxxi. 24; xli. 1 et seq.), present the only analogy to this fact, so far as they were divinely occasioned, and had a direct reference to the fortunes of God's people. But their contents lack the rich, lively dramatic and symbolic character of this vision; and in the double dream of Pharaoh, the single instance where this approximately exists (Gen. xli.), we miss the far-reaching vision that covers all history, and the wealth of Messianic references, by which the dream-vision under consideration is so remarkably distinguished. The observation of Hävernicks (Komm., p. 42 et seq.) respecting the dreams of heathen persons in the Scripture history, although instructive and worthy of approval in other respects, has only a partial application in this case: "We often (?) make the observation in the Scriptures, that whenever it became necessary to magnify the theocracy and the kingdom of God on earth—which could only be aided to accomplish its final destiny by means of miracles,—and whenever the welfare of the faithful required a special interference, revelations were imparted to heathen and unbelievers, and generally by means of dreams. Compare Gen. xx. 8 (where it is expressly stated, with reference to Abimelech, וַיִּבְרָא אֱלֹהִים בְּלִבּוֹ), xxxi. 24; xli.; Judg. vii. 13, 14. At the same time, the Scriptures assign as the reason for such revelations the subjective aim, 'to withdraw man from his purpose, and hide pride from man,' Job xxxiii. 17. This Divine purpose was directly favored by the solemn awe with which the heathen world regarded dreams (ὄνειροι θεῖοι, θεόπεμπτοι), as is proven by the characteristic and probably proverbial expression of Homer: καὶ γὰρ τ' ὄναρ ἐκ Διὸς ἐστίν (Il. I. 63); cf. further,

Il. II. 26 et seq.; Odys. VI. 13 et seq.; xxiv. 11, 12; Herod. VII. 16; also Knapp, Scripta varia arg., p. 108 ss.; Rosenmüller, A. u. N. Morgenl., III. 83 et seq.; Jahn, Einl. ins A. T., II. 391 et seq."—An instructive article in the Evangel. Missions-Magazin, 1863, No. 1, which was written by Ostertag and entitled Der Traum und seine Wirkung in der Heidenwelt, treats of the important part which dreams continually play in the religious life of heathendom, and more especially, when it is aroused and influenced by Christian missionary efforts. Cf. also Delitzsch, Bibl. Psychologie, § 14, p. 283 et seq., and Splittgerber, Schlaf und Tod, nebst den damit zusammenhängenden Erscheinungen des Seelenlebens (Halle, 1866), p. 144 et seq. The two latter distinguish more carefully than Hävernicks, in the above passage, the dreams inspired merely by conscience and those of a divinely caused and presaging character, which were more frequent within the domain of heathendom, from the dreams of revelation in the proper sense, whose occurrence was much less common among gentile nations, being generally limited in the Old and New Testaments to the people of God. Among the former class they reckon, e.g., the dreams of Pharaoh; among the latter, the dreams of Nebuchadnezzar, in chap. ii. and iv. of our prophet.

The important circumstance must be observed, in this connection, that Nebuchadnezzar's dream-vision relating to the four world-kingsdoms was evidently imparted to this heathen monarch while in a state of violent and guilty terror, but in so confused and indefinite a form as to exceed his understanding, and as even to prevent a clear reproduction of its nature by the unaided efforts of his memory. In both respects he was compelled to seek the aid of an Israelitish prophet, as an instrument of the only true God to make known the purport of His revelation (cf. supra, on vs. 1 and 3). This feature is certainly remarkable, but by no means incomprehensible. The heathen experienced but a single impulse in the direction of prophecy; the clearly connected description and analysis of the image of the future which he had seen were reserved for the spiritual art of the theocratic seer. The startling impression which had been made on the mind of the king while dreaming, by the appearance of the bright colossus, its sudden fall, and its total destruction and annihilation predominated to an extent that destroyed his recollection, and left him, on awaking, with a mere sense of having seen something highly important and of great significance for his own future and for that of his kingdom. It was natural that this should at once give rise to the wish to recall the vision clearly, in order to ascertain more fully what it might portend; and that this desire should finally excite such alarm as to banish sleep. His condition is not without many parallels in the history of man's spiritual life. The Egyptian ruler had, indeed, retained the contents of his prophetic dreams, and required Joseph for the purpose merely of interpreting their meaning;—in connection with which the much less startling character of the dreams must be regarded. But in more recent times many instances have been recorded, in which significant dreams were forgotten,—either wholly, or so far as details were concerned,—while they left a powerful impression in the mind of the dreamer. (cf. Reitz, Historie der Wiedergeborenen, I, p. 132 et seq.; Schubert, Symbolik des Trauma, p. 211 [3d ed.]; by the same, Geschichte der Seele, II., p. 94 et seq.; Splittgerber, as above, p. 118 et seq.). And the ancient Roman poet Attius (Cicero, de divinitat., II. 21) has at least described the alarm produced, on the sudden awaking of the subject, by an impressive dream, in a manner which thoroughly recalls the behavior of Nebuchadnezzar as described in this chapter:

"*Rez ipse Priamus somnio mentis metu
Perculeus, curis sumptus suspirantibus
Exacerbat hostilis balneis.
Tum conjectorem pontulat, pacem petens,
Ut se edoceret, obscuro Apollinem,
Quo sese vertant tanta sortis somnium.*"

In view of all this there is nothing in the external form and dress of Nebuchadnezzar's vision that removes it materially beyond the influence of conditioning circumstances, such as are elsewhere apparent in the surroundings of prophetic dream-visions. Consequently the credibility of the narrative cannot be assailed on psychological grounds, nor on any other; and the attempt of Von Lengerke, Bleek, Hitzig, and others, to stamp it as an imitation of the history of Pharaoh and Joseph, designed to encourage and strengthen the faith of the Israelites in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, must especially be rejected, as being decidedly arbitrary, since the peculiarities in the conduct and character of Nebuchadnezzar by far exceed the traits he manifests in common with his precursor Pharaoh, and also with his alleged imitator Antiochus.

2. In regard to the points of connection which existed in the state of the world for the prophetic image of Nebuchadnezzar's dream, see Kranichfeld's observation on v. 10: "It is not recorded, as being unessential, how much information, in regard to his spiritual state at the time of the dream, the king imparted to the wise men, nor yet how much they were able to apprehend themselves in view of the political aspect of the times. The historical point of departure for the knowledge of the dream as a revelation, is found in a consideration that must pre-eminently concern a king as such, at the beginning of a newly-founded realm, and in the presence of a powerful and threatening contiguous state, viz.: the question respecting the fate of his dynasty and of his kingdom." Cf. page 120: "But the political constellation, even in the early years of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, was not of a nature to prevent the writer from recognizing a powerful rival of the Chaldean empire in the Median kingdom. Isaiah and Jeremiah had already pointed to the nations of the north, or specifically to Persia (Elam) and Media as the executors of the judgment that should come upon Babylon, cf. Isa. xiii. 17; 21, 2; Jer. I. 8, 9, 41; li. 11, 28.—Above all, Media stood as a powerful rival to the Chaldean kingdom upon the historical arena, at the time of Nebuchadnezzar's entrance. The Medes were allied with the Babylonians in the destruction of Nineveh, and in that joint undertaking of an earlier period were already able to render powerful assistance; there are even indications that on that occasion the Babylonians saw the direction of their military enterprises principally in the hands of the Medes. They shared with the Babylonians in the possession of the Assyrian empire—the latter taking the western portion, while the former claimed chiefly the regions east and north-east of the Tigris. How greatly Nebuchadnezzar was obliged to dread the power of his neighbor is shown by his fortifications in the north, which were begun soon after his accession to the throne, and prosecuted with vigor during the greater part of his reign (cf. Niebuhr, Gesch. Assyrs und Babels, p. 218 et seq., p. 223); an Elamitic-Median war against Babylon appears to have transpired as early as the 11th or 12th year of his reign."—If to these observations on the relations of Babylon to Medo-Persia, we add the remarks of the same exegete in relation to Javan, i.e., Greece, which was looming up in the distant political horizon of Nebuchadnezzar, and remember, that his western rival and probable successor to the power and greatness of Medo-Persia might be well known to a Chaldean king about B. C. 600—since Sennacherib had already been engaged in a warm contest with an army of Greek mercenaries in Cilicia, about a century before; since further, such mercenaries were accustomed to serve in the Assyrian armies from the time of Esar-haddon, and in the Egyptian from the time of Psammetichus, and since the Lydian kings were involved in exhaustive and bloody wars with the Ionians, Dorians, and Æolians of Western Asia from about B. C. 610 (see Herod., I. 6; II. 152, 163, 169; Abydenna, in Euseb. Armen. ed. Ancher, I., p. 53; Berosus, Fragm. hist. Græca, II., 504 ed. Müller;—cf. supra, Introd. § 7, note 2),—it will be evident that all the conditions were present which could possibly be required for the originating of a dream-vision, by which a Chaldean monarch about B. C. 600 was forewarned of the future overthrow of his dynasty through the agency of warlike neighboring states. More than an external historical occasion or impulse for the dream-vision, was not probably derived by the king from the peculiar state of existing political affairs. All that bears a really prophetic character in his vision is to be traced back to the direct agency of God, which was able to construct a majestic and united vision of the deepest prophetic significance, out of the extremely sporadic and imperfect natural materials that were provided in the range of the king's political observation. Left to himself, Nebuchadnezzar, whether awake or dreaming, could merely have originated certain presentiments, or combinations of political wisdom, which at the best, must remain mere images of the fancy, or acute speculations. If his dream became a picture of the future that embraced the world and displayed the profoundest prophetic truths, a vision that was "certain, and the interpretation thereof sure" (see above, v. 45), this was entirely owing to the all-enlightening and revealing influence of the Divine Logos (John i. 9), who sought to glorify Himself and His prophet at the court of the powerful heathen king, in order thereby to kindle a shining light of Messianic consolation for His faithful ones of that age, as well as for those of the still darker periods of the future. Cf. infra, Ethico-fundamental principles, etc., on chap. viii., No. 3.

3. The symbolism of the image of the monarchies in general, namely, the succession of the four metals, gold, silver, brass, and iron, as also the distribution of these metals over the several parts of a colossal idol or statue in the human form, the contrast between the brittleness and weakness of this image and the world-filling greatness and solidity of the stone which takes its place, etc.; all these, like the fundamental conditions of the vision itself, may find their point of departure, or so to speak, their root, in certain relations and estimates of the time that naturally prevailed in Nebuchadnezzar's kingdom, while the peculiarity of their arrangement is doubtless, as before, to be traced back to the revealing influence of God. An underlying natural basis cannot be mistaken.

a. In the symbolizing of a succession of four world-kingsdoms by a connection of four metals of steadily decreasing value. "A comparative view of the idea of a separation of the course of temporal development into four world-periods, which occurs elsewhere also, is instructive in this connection. We meet it in the Indian transformations within the limits of the four Yuga, in the Græco-Roman conception of four metallic æons (the ages of gold, silver, etc.), and also in the Parsee idea of four trees that have sprung from a single root, composed respectively of gold, silver, steel, and iron.* Hesiod indeed, destroys the number four, by introducing a fifth kingdom between the kingdoms of brass and of iron, which is not of metal, and thus corresponds, in a measure, to the Messianic kingdom of Daniel, namely, the δικαίωτον καὶ ἀρεῶν, θεῖον γένος of the heroes; but irrespective of this feature, the constant and decided combination of the idea of world-periods with the precise number four, remains a noteworthy fact. And although the correspondence that has been indicated, for instance, in the case of Ovid as coming under the influence of Greek conceptions, must in all probability be regarded as based on that idea, and moreover, although the Persian idea of the four metallic trees, which has been referred to, may not have been uninfluenced by the representations of Daniel,—it will still be apparent, that the natural application of the number four to the ages of the world rests upon a profounder reason that inheres in the nature of things, and evidently, upon a natural and simple association with the four stages of human life. This connection of the number four with the periods of human life is especially easy in Daniel, since the four phases of development are illustrated by the image of man, as a personification of heathendom" (Kranichfeld, p. 118 et seq.). To what extent the application, in this case, of the idea of four ages of the world to the succession of Asiatic monarchies, is to be placed to the account of the natural or political meditations of Nebuchadnezzar, and how far it is of supernatural suggestion or positively revealed, cannot, of course, be definitely decided, especially in view of our extremely fragmentary knowledge respecting the scope of religious thought and the philosophy of human life among the Babylonians.

b. The comparison of the successive kingdoms with the several parts of a colossal human or idol image is also probably based on some heathen mode of conceiving and representing things, with which the dream-originating Divine principle of revelation may have connected itself. Daniel himself, indeed, indicates nothing whatever, either in his recapitulation of the dream or in the interpretation, that can show that the form, size, and natural dignity of the several parts (head, breast, belly, legs), contained any special symbolical reference to the character of the four world-kingsdoms; and any attempt to construct such relations between the image and the objects symbolized is exposed to the danger of being involved in useless interpretations and idle pastimes, as may be seen in many older expositors, and even as late as in Starke (on vs. 39 and 41). But at any rate the size and position of the various parts merit consideration as a tertium compar., so far as the first kingdom, which is represented by the head, as the highest and most important, but also the smallest organ, may be conceived of as intensively more, but extensively less considerable, than the succeeding ones; as also each successive organ may signify an aggregation of peoples or states (cf. supra, on v. 39), which becomes steadily more worthless and degraded, from an internal (ethical) point of view, but as regularly increases in size and extent. In one respect, therefore, namely, so far as the decrease of internal moral worth (or dignity, according to the theocratic standard) among the four successive kingdoms is concerned, the symbolism of the various bodily parts yields the same result as that of the metals; while in another respect it leads to a contrary result, inasmuch as it represents these kingdoms as constantly extending their boundaries.

c. The final consideration,—whether the mysterious stone, that descends from the mountain and shatters the metallic image, representing Messiah's kingdom or the fifth world-monarchy, also contains features that may be traced back to the religio-political ideas of the ancient Babylonians, or whether, on the other hand, this closing incident of the whole vision must be regarded as purely supernatural in its character,—can hardly lead to a definite conclusion. Some approach to Messianic ideas and expectations, however, may have been contained in the religious estimate of the world current among that people, as well as in that of the Persians, the Greeks (compare what was remarked above concerning Hesiod and the Zoroastrian myth of the four trees), the ancient Germans and Scandinavians, etc. The stone that crushes the image of the monarchies or world-periods may, therefore, have been a conception taken from the Chaldean or Babylonian circle of ideas, similar in its nature and tendency to those remarkable mythological approximations to the fundamental dogma of Christianity, which have justly been characterized as "mythological foreshadowings of the great truth: 'The word was made flesh'" (Kahn, Lutherische Dogmatik, III. 884; cf. v. Osterzee, Das Bild Christi nach der Schrift, p. 69 et seq.; J. P. Lange, Das Apostolische Zeitalter, I., p. 237 et seq.).

* Cf. Wollheim de Fonseca, Mythologie des Allen Indien, p. 26 et seq.; Hesiod, Ἔργα καὶ ἡμέραι, 106 ss.; Ovid, Metam. I., 89 ss.; and in relation to the old-Persic doctrine of four ages of the world, especially Genesis and Avesta in Ausland, 1868, Nos. 12 and 23, and also Delitzsch, Art. Daniel, in Herszog's Real-Encyclop., p. 276. According to the two latter, the book Bahman Jeshit, for instance, contains the following remarkable statement of the myth respecting the four ages of the world: "... Zerdusht demanded immortality from Ormuzd, then Ormuzd showed to Zerdusht the all-embracing wisdom; whereupon he saw a tree having such a root that four trees had sprung from it, one of gold, another of silver, another of steel, and the fourth of iron. ... Ormuzd said to the holy Zerdusht: 'The root of this single tree, which thou hast seen (is the world), and these four trees are the four times which shall come; this golden one, when I and thou entertain each other, and Cetsap-Shah accepts the law, and the body of the Deos is broken and they conceal themselves; this silver one is the reign of the royal Artashir; the steel one is the rule of Anosheveran-Chowru, the son of Kobat; that of iron the evil reign of the Deos'" (on which, according to the Parsee teaching, the time of the Saviour Sofosha is finally to follow).

4. The historical interpretation of the four kingdoms, or the application of the image of the monarchies to the facts of history in detail, involves no really serious difficulty upon the symbolic principles that have been established, in view of the definite statement by the prophet in verses 37, 38, by which the golden head designates the Chaldean empire of Nebuchadnezzar. The three succeeding kingdoms may therefore be discovered, without leaving room for doubt. They necessarily represent the three phases of development in the great Oriental universal monarchy, which followed next after the Chaldean period; for the prophetic horizon, whether of the king or Daniel, did not embrace the Occident. The four world-kingdoms are developed without exception on one and the same geographical stage, on the soil of the Orbis orientalis, thus harmonizing with the Biblical representation under the symbol of a single colossal human image; and the only world-kingdoms of the Orient that arose after the overthrow of Babylon, and that equalled it in importance, were the Medo-Persian founded by Cyrus, and the Macedonian-Hellenistic, originated by Alexander the Great, the latter of which passed through two stages, viz.: the period of its undivided existence, and that of its constantly increasing division and disintegration under the post-Alexandrian Diadochi. These two, or, by a more correct enumeration three, final forms of the Oriental universal monarchy, are represented with the utmost clearness by the silver breast, the brazen (copper) belly, and the nether extremities which are at first of iron and then of intermingled iron and clay. The breast of silver designates the Medo-Persian kingdom, which first succeeded the golden head, or Babylon. It does not signify Media simply, for (1) at the time when the Median king Cyaxares (=Darius the Mede, see Introd. § 8, note 4) and his nephew and son-in-law Cyrus overthrew Babylon, the Persian tribe had already become so prominent within the Median realm as to warrant the designation of the whole kingdom by the names of both tribes, the Median, which was formerly predominant, and the Persian which had now become its equal. (2) Daniel accordingly refers to the whole world-kingdom which succeeded Babylon as a kingdom of "the Medes and Persians" (chap. v. 28; cf. the exposition of that passage), and even in the section relating to the reign of Darius the Mede (chap. vi. 9, 13, 16) he designates the religious code, which was in force throughout the kingdom, as "the law of the Medes and Persians," thus characterizing it as a sacred ordinance that rested on the common consent of both the nationalities that had united under a single government.* (3) In exact correspondence with this is his representation of the Medo-Persian kingdom, in chap. vii. under the figure of a warlike ram, and his designation of a succession of two dynasties—a Median and a Persian—simply by the growth of two horns from the head of the ram, of which the smaller comes up first (verse 3; cf. verse 20). (4) Consequently, the instances in which he distinguishes Darius, or Cyrus, or succeeding kings, by the titles, respectively, of "king of the Medes," or "king of the Persians," must be regarded as referring, not to a diversity of realms, but simply to a difference of tribal relations among these rulers. (5) Further, the vision of the four successive beasts, which is described in chap. vii. and which is doubtless parallel to that of the four elements in the image of the monarchies, does not accord with the assumption, on which the second beast, a carnivorous bear, represents the kingdom of the Medes, while the third, a leopard with four wings, designates the Persian monarchy, which fact was scarcely distinct from the former (see infra on that passage). (6) Nor does Zech. vi., which is an alleged parallel to the vision before us, warrant a conclusion in favor of the opinion that distinguishes between the Median and Persian kingdoms; for the red, black, white, and grizzled, and bay horses, mentioned in that place, do not designate various lands or kingdoms any more than do the horses with similarly varied colors, which are introduced by the same prophet in chap. i. 7 et seq. (see Köhler, Die Nach-erlischen Propheten ii. 1, 69 et seq., 139 et seq.). (7) Finally, no conclusion in favor of the Median hypothesis can be deduced from the remark by Daniel in verse 39 a, that the second kingdom should be inferior to that of Nebuchadnezzar; for an ethical inferiority of the Persian kingdom to that of the Chaldeans might be readily asserted from a theocratic point of view, inasmuch as it clearly displayed a greater moral and social depravation under its later kings, than the former. Only Cyrus excelled the Chaldean rulers in friendly and benevolent conduct toward the theocracy, while his immediate successors, Cambyses and Pseudo-Smerdis, treated the people of God with greater severity than had any Chaldean king whatever (cf. also the sufferings inflicted on the Jews by Xerxes, according to the book of Esther, and also by Artaxerxes I., according to Ezra and Nehemiah).

But if, in view of these considerations, the

* The force of the expression "the law of the Medes and Persians" (דָּת מֶדֶי וּפָרְסִי), in chap. vi. as an evidence of the union of the two neighboring Iranian nations in a single state as early as the period of the Chaldean supremacy, and perhaps earlier still, has been recognized, e. g., by Kranichfeld, despite his preference for the interpretation which refers the second world-kingdom to Media, and the third to Persia. In a note on page 123 et seq. he contests the assertion of Von Lengerke, that this formula really originated after the time of Cyrus, and is therefore a gross anachronism in the mouth of Daniel, by arguing that the union of the two peoples in a single nation, or at least under a single government, dates considerably beyond the time of Cyrus, and accordingly, that an exclusively Median realm was never in existence. The conformity of this view to the actual historical development of the ancient Iran is shown by Niebuhr, Gesch. Assyriens und Babylons, p. 186; cf. Spiegel in Ausland, 1856, p. 355 et seq.

second kingdom of the image of the monarchies represents Medo-Persia, there can be no further doubt as to the interpretation of the third, which is symbolized by the brazen belly. It must necessarily designate the Macedonian world-kingdom of Alexander the Great, whose grand and rapid introduction, as if borne on the wings of the tempest, is represented in the parallel vision of chap. vii. by the figure of a leopard with four wings, but which receives consideration in this case (chap. ii.), only so far as its ethical and religious inferiority in relation to its predecessors is concerned, and as the remark that it should "bear rule over all the earth" (verse 30 b) characterizes its external greatness. The kingdoms of the Hellenistic Diadochi, which arose from the universal monarchy of Alexander the Great, cannot be included in the third or brazen kingdom, since they present a picture of internal disruption, such as is clearly symbolized by the fourth monarchy of Daniel. The nether extremities of the colossus only, which were at first (in the legs) of iron, but afterward (in the feet and toes) a mixture of iron and clay, can be made to harmonize with the period of the Diadochi. In their interpretation, the legs, which are yet of iron, will probably refer to the time during which the immediate successors of Alexander endeavored at least to maintain the unity of the realm, despite their incessant quarrels and bloody conflicts,—hence down to the battle near Ipsus (B. C. 323-301); while the feet, which are in part of iron, and in part of clay, represent the succeeding state of growing dismemberment and hostile divisions (in which the kingdom of the Seleucids in Syria, and that of the Lagids in Egypt, were alone able to maintain, during a considerable period, a position of commanding power); cf. above, on vs. 41-43. That this torn and corrupted state of the post-Alexandrian Hellenistic empire, so analogous to a putrefying gigantic carcass, and also that the vain attempts to heal the sores by means of intermarriages among the contending princely families, etc., should be already described and prefigured in the visions of a Chaldean king about B. C. 600, can, of course, find an explanation only in the direct operations of the Divine Logos, by which the future is revealed (cf. No. 3). To base these features on a reference to the historical condition of Hellenism during the Chaldean period, to its internal divisions and incurable discords, which were, at that early day, as apparent as was their warlike bravery, and further, to the custom of political marriages among princes, which was already frequently observed (Kranichfeld), seems inadequate, and involves the danger of an exaggerated naturalizing of the prophetic process in question. Nor can the custom of political marriages be shown to have existed in the time of Nebuchadnezzar among the Greeks (with whom we have chiefly to do, in this connection), although it prevailed in Medo-Persia and Egypt. Finally, the fourth kingdom was, at an early period, made to signify the Roman universal dominion, so that its first stadium of unimpaired strength (the legs of iron) represented the period of the republic and the first emperors, and the second, divided and powerless stage (the feet of iron and clay) referred to the later empire, or even to the middle ages and more recent times

(in which, according to Auberlen's exposition of v. 43, the German and Slavio nationalities were intermingled with the Roman); but this interpretation is opposed by many considerations. (1) It ascribes a range of vision over the future to the dreaming king and the prophetic interpreter, which lacks every support based on the actual condition of the times, since, as is well known, the greatness and world-historical importance of Rome were unknown until four hundred years after the captivity. Unlike the sections of the prophecy which relate to Persia and Javan, this would have no foundation in existing relations, but rather, would be of an abstractly supernatural character. (2) The מַלְכוּת mentioned in chap. xi. 30, although already identified with the Romans by the Septuagint and the Vulgate, must rather be regarded as a race of Greek islanders, in view of the constant usage of the word elsewhere in the Old Testament, and more especially, because there is no indication of the identity of these Chittim with the fourth world-kingdom, either in chap. xi. or elsewhere. They are simply noticed in that connection, like the northern and southern kingdoms, as a constituent part of the Javanic or Hellenistic empire. (3) The symbolic details comprehended in the fourth or lowest world-kingdom according to Nebuchadnezzar's vision—the legs of iron, the feet and toes part of iron and part of clay, etc., appear natural and suitable when applied to the development of Hellenism after Alexander, and particularly in the era of the Seleucids and the Ptolemies, while they lead to results of a more or less arbitrary character, with every attempt to demonstrate the Roman hypothesis; e.g., the view of Buddeus, Hengstenberg, and others, by which the two legs of iron designate the eastern and western empires after Honorius and Arcadius, and that of Cocceius, which regards the iron and the clay as indicating the separation of the Roman power into a spiritual and a material kingdom (papacy and empire), etc. (4) That the collocation of the world-monarchy of Alexander and the kingdoms of the Diadochi as forming one and the same מַלְכוּת, a position that becomes necessary on this view, although supported by chap. viii. 21 (where a grouping into a מַלְכוּת has actually come to pass), is yet shown by chap. xi. 4, to be decidedly opposed to the real meaning of the prophet (cf. 1 Maoc. (i. 1 and 7 et seq.)). (5) Finally, the figure of a stone, that destroys the image, is positively false as a representation of the triumph of Christianity over the world-power, if the Roman power be regarded as the fourth and final phase of the development of the latter; for this was not overthrown and destroyed suddenly and at a blow by the kingdom of Christ, like the statue by the stone, but instead, it incorporated Christianity with itself, and continued, as Christianized Rome, to bear rule over the earth during more than a thousand years. It might, therefore, be more properly identified with the stone, than described as a potency inimical to it; but it can, in any case, find no place in the series of pre-Messianic world-kingdoms that were hostile to His reign. [To these arguments we add the marked coincidences between the several visions of Daniel respecting these four great world-powers, as exhibited in the harmonic table inserted in the introduction; and we call especial attention to the almost perfect parallel between the two "little horns" in each case. Now as one of these is admitted on all hands to refer to Antiochus Epiphanes, the other, if identical, is, of course, a constituent likewise of the Syrian empire of the Seleucids, as the fourth Oriental monarchy. The discrepancies alleged by Keil, p. 258 et seq., as arguing a different interpretation of the little horns respectively, will be duly noticed in the exposition of the passages themselves.]

For these reasons we adopt that exposition of the four kingdoms which Bertholdt (Daniel, I. 192 et seq.) has recently advocated with penetration and fairness, after Polychronius, Grotius, Tossanus, Zeltner, and others, had asserted its principal features. We differ from Bertholdt, however, in failing to deduce anything that argues the composition of Daniel's prophecy in the period of the Seleucids and Asmonæans, from the reference of the feet of iron and of clay to the times of the later Diadochi, since, as will be shown more in detail hereafter, we regard the reference of passages like chap. vii. 8 et seq.; ix. 24 et seq. to Antiochus Epiphanes as not conflicting with the authenticity of the book. We accordingly reject the following interpretations, which differ from ours in various particulars:

(a.) That of Bunsen (cf. Introduct. § 4, note 1), which applies the golden head to Assyria, in harmony with the alleged original interpretation by Daniel, the breast of silver to Babylon, the brazen belly to Media, and the iron legs to Persia, but which is thus faulty, not only of a direct contradiction of v. 38 ("thou art this head of gold"), but also of a misconception that conflicts with history, in relation to the intimate connection, and even essential identity of the kingdoms of Assyria and Babylon, which could never have been contrasted as gold and silver, or the lion and the bear (cf. chap. vii. 5 et seq.).*

(b.) That of Hitzig and Redepenning (see above, on v. 39 a), which refers the head and breast to Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar, as the only Babylonian kings whom the author is said to have known, and which is therefore, at least, a partial reproduction of the scheme formerly attempted by the Swede, H. Benzell (Dissert. de quatuor orbis monarchiis, 1745), and by Harenberg, Dathe, and Hesel, to personify the four kingdoms (regarding them as metonymies for four Babylonian kings).

(c.) The view of Ephraem Syrus, Venema, Eichhorn, V. Lengerke, Bleek, de Wette, Kirms, Hilgenfeld, Delitzsch, Kranichfeld (and conditionally, i.e., so far as it conforms to the views under a and b, also of Ewald, Bunsen, and Hitzig), that the head represents Babylon, the breast Media, the belly Persia, and the legs Greece and the Diadochian kingdoms (see for the contrary, above, No. 4).

(d.) The "orthodox" view, which refers the first three kingdoms to Babylon, Medo-Persia, and Greece, but the fourth to Rome and the states which have sprung from it since the empire; early represented by Josephus (Ant. x. 10, 4), by a majority of church-fathers—especially by Jerome, Orosius, and Theodoret; also by all the expositors of the Middle-age church after Walafrid Strabo, and by a majority of moderns, of whom we mention Buddens (Hist. eccles. p. ii. sect. 5, p. 619 ss.), Joach. Lange, Starke, Zeis, Velthausen (Animadversiones ad Dan. II. 27-45; Prag, 1783), Menken (Das Monarchienbild, Brem, and Aurich, 1809), Hengstenberg, Hävernick, Caspari (Die vier daniel. Weltmonarchien, in the Zeitschrift für luth. Theologie und Kirche, 1841, No. 4), Hofmann (Weissagung und Erfüllung, I. 276 et seq.), Keil (Eintl. ins A. T. § 134, p. 443, [also in his Commentary on Daniel]), Gausson (Daniel le Prophète, 2d. edit. 1850, I. 250 ss.), Auberlen (Daniel, etc., p. 42 et seq.), Zündel (Krit. Unters. etc., p. 74 et seq.), Kliefoth, Füller, Gärtner (in their expositions), Pusey (p. 58 ss.), Volck (Vindiciae Dan., p. 7 ss.), [and the monographs added in the Introduction].—For the history of this orthodox churchly interpretation of the image of the monarchies in older times, see Antiquæ et perculgate de quatuor Monarchiis sententia plenior et uberior assertis, auct. J. G. Jano, 1728 (also in Breyer's Histior. Magazin, vol. I, p. 114 et seq.); and in relation to its influence on the conception and representation of universal history during the 16th and 17th centuries, see Meusel, Bibliotheca historica, vol. I, pt. 1, p. 176 ss.*

* [Justice to this popular view of the fourth kingdom of Daniel's prophecies, which applies it to the Roman empire, either as a pagan or a papal tyranny, seems to require a statement here of the principal arguments in its favor. Other considerations will be examined, as well as some of these more in detail, in the exposition of the passages under which they arise.

1. The prominence of the Roman dominion, as being the only really world-wide government after that of Alexander, certainly lends great probability to its selection as the culmination of the previous world-monarchies in comparison with the territorially insignificant realm of the Seleucids. But this argument seems to us to be neutralized by indications in the text itself, especially the fact that Daniel's prophecies in this matter are bounded by the Orient as to their arena of dominion, the chosen people of God and their local heritage being the stand-point from which their influence is measured. The Jews did not come into any severe contact with Rome till after the dawn of the Mæmianic era, and (as the author observes above) Rome itself did not then succumb under the collision. The note of time "in the days of these kings" (ver. 44) cannot be pressed into a corroboration of this synchronism, for then it would cover the whole range of the previous dynasties likewise (see the exposition of that verse). But a most decisive prohibition of the allusion to Rome appears in the continual degeneration of the successive empires from the head downwards, till the fourth has deteriorated into a base metal and even a mandarin alloy. It is true the epithet "strong as iron" well applies to Rome, but it attained its culmination both of force and culture under the early emperors, and there was no subsequent change of government in its decay corresponding to the distinction between the unadulterated metal of the legs and the

* Cf. Zündel, Krit. Unters., p. 82; and generally as respects the continuity of the Assyrian and Babylonian empires and their inseparable connection in point of nationality, religion, and civilization, see the valuable sketch of the results achieved by the latest efforts of Assyriologists: Ninive et Babylone, in the Revue des deux Mondes, 1868, March 15, by Alfred Maury. The old-Babylonian (Chaldean), the Assyrian, and the later Babylonian empires, are in fact but three successive phases of the development of one and the same world-kingdom, despite their changes of dynasties and capitals, as also the Median, the Persian (Achemenidian), the Parthian, and other kingdoms, are successive phases in the manifestation of a single national empire on Iranian soil. Cf. G. Rawlinson, The Five Great Monarchies of the Eastern World, or the History . . . of Chaldaea, Assyria, Babylon, Media, and Persia. London, 1867, 4 vols. Also A. Scheuchzer's Assyrische Forschungen in M. Heidenheim's Deutsche Vierteljahrsschrift für engl.-theol. Forschung, Vol. IV., No. 4 (1868), p. 4 et seq.

5. The relation of the image of the monarchies, when correctly interpreted, to the history

crumbling mixture of the feet and toes. In the case of the Syro-Greek monarchy, on the other hand, all these particulars have their exact counterpart.

2. The difficulties attendant upon the effort to identify with the history of the Seleucid succession the particulars elsewhere given in connection with the fourth empire, especially the list of ten kings and the fall of three of them before the successful one (chap. vii. 24) have been urged in favor of the "orthodox" view. But the Roman interpretation, on the other hand, seems to be beset with equal if not greater difficulties in this point, as will be seen in the exposition of that passage. Chap. xi. of this book is acknowledged on all hands to be a detailed account of the dynasty of the Seleucids, showing that the prophetic ken had it prominently in view; and the little horn of the he-goat (chap. viii. 9) is generally admitted to be Antiochus Epiphanes. It is therefore hard to resist the conclusion that the little horn of the fourth beast (chap. vii. 8) is the same king, and the fourth section of the colossal image (chap. ii. 40 et seq.) the same dynasty. The characteristics make the parallel complete.

3. The violent persecution experienced by the saints under Roman power, particularly in the days of papal supremacy, has been especially thought to justify this scheme of interpretation. But it must be remembered that the Seleucids were the first kings who really oppressed the people of God on account of their religion, and the efforts of Antiochus to exterminate their faith were of the most extraordinary character, not exceeded by the virulence of the Inquisition itself. Moreover, the attempt to apply the prophecies in question to both pagan and papal Rome, weakens the force of the whole interpretation. The effort to find in the pope, as such, an emphatic and direct fulfillment of the "little horn" is indeed sustained by the striking analogy of blasphemous atrocity, but fails to find an equal agreement with many other features of the picture, e.g., the "mingling themselves with the seed of men" (chap. ii. 48; absolutely forbidden by the celibacy of the pontiffs and clergy), the origin in dynastic and territorial revolution ("the sea," chap. vii. 8, and "earth," chap. vii. 17), the pointed reference to the Mosaic cultus and temple (chap. vii. 11), and the whole tenor of the overthrow by civil and military convulsion (chap. xi. 40 et seq.). We may also adduce the gross incongruity of representing any branch of the Christian Church, however corrupt, under these heathen symbols, and as the final foe of God's people.

4. The marked similarity between the visions of Daniel and those of John in the Revelation, extending to details of phraseology as well as of emblem, has naturally led to the belief that they coincide in application. This, however, is a superficial view of their import. In the New Testament we everywhere find the symbols and even the terms of the O. T. used conventionally with a different application and in a wider sense. Thus, in our Lord's eschatological discourse (Matt. xxiv.), the symptoms of the dissolution of Judaism are made premonitions of the end of all things; the whole of Ezekiel's wall over the queen of ancient commerce (chap. xxvii.) is transferred almost literally to the apocalyptic overthrow of the later mistress of the world (Rev. xviii.); the very names, Babylon, Gog, etc., are applied to new places and persons, just as Sodom, Egypt, Zion, etc., had long been current with a metaphorical meaning. It is a great mistake, however, to infer that these N. T. adaptations of types and imagery and language, familiarly drawn from the O. T., necessarily denote the same objects or events. They are rather related as common types of some recurring Antichrist as extensions of one general world-power ever inimical to the cause of spiritual religion. To identify them is to destroy the significance and beauty of the conventional signs by which they are expressed. The shallowness of this method of exposition, as applied to St. John's Apocalypse, has been demonstrated by the futile attempts to make them quadrate with the facts of history.

5. Lastly, the periods assigned in Daniel for the fulfillment of the various prophecies, are appealed to in support of their application to Rome. This seems to us, on the contrary, a fatal argument against the view in question. It is true the same numbers are often used by the Revelator for the length of "the times and seasons" prefigured in his visions, but we have never yet seen any satisfactory adjustment of them to the history of the Roman empire or the papal church. We are strongly inclined to that view which regards them as being conventionally adopted by St. John as representations of longer or shorter periods of indefinite length. But in Daniel they unquestionably denote determinate spaces of time, and for that very reason—as they are all periods of comparatively brief extent (some three and a half years, with the exception of the notable term of 70 weeks, or rather hebdomada; see the exposition of that passage)—they must be limited by the history of

of the founding of Christianity, must be found, in view of the foregoing considerations, in the assumption that the destroying stone represents the kingdom of Christ at the time of its introduction on the historical arena, while the growth of the stone until it fills the earth, indicates its gradual extension over all the countries of the earth. The fulfillment of this closing incident of the prophetic vision as a whole, is therefore not confined exclusively to the initial period of the history of Christianity—as if the stone represented the pre-Messianic Israel, or any other historical agency preparatory to the advent of Christ; nor is it to be referred entirely to the future of Christianity—as if the destruction of the colossus of world-powers had not yet transpired, and the overthrow of the fourth monarchy were reserved for the final judgment or some other eschatological event. The descent of the stone and the overthrow of the image were rather realized in the history of salvation, when Christ, the stone that was rejected by the builders, ground His enemies to powder, and became the elect and precious corner-stone in Zion, upon which all the foes of God's kingdom are henceforth to fall, and by which they are to be shattered and put to shame (Matt. xxi. 42-44; 1 Pet. ii. 6-8; cf. Isa. viii. 14; xxviii. 16). This closing scene of the vision is in the course of being steadily and increasingly fulfilled, inasmuch as, on the one hand, the destruction and dissolution of the world-powers, and on the other, the growth of the stone into a mighty mountain that fills the whole earth, are yet far from their Divinely appointed goal—however surely the world, together with Satan, its head, may have been long since judged in principle by the Spirit of Christ, and however clearly the only true God, who is declared in Christ, may have demonstrated, in a certain measure, his nature as the all-supporting rock, from all eternity in the congregation of His faithful ones (as the "Rock of Israel," Gen. xlix. 24; Deut. xxxii. 4 et seq.,

the Antiochian persecution and the Maccabean revolution. The only escape from this conclusion is by a resort to what is termed the "year-for-a-day hypothesis," which consists in understanding the days in each of the periods in question as put for so many years. It is sufficient to say of this somewhat popular and certainly convenient theory, that it is a conjecture devoid of countenance in Scripture. True, the prophets occasionally make a literal day the type of a literal year, but they never do so without immediately adding the explanation, for the express purpose of preventing such a generalization of the rule. Besides the passages in Gen. i. 5 et seq.; ii. 4; 2 Peter iii. 8 (which would prove too much), the only instances of this usage adduced are Num. xiv. 34; Ezek. iv. 1-6; Dan. ix. 24 (but this is not in point); Rev. ii. 10 (but here the application is a pure assumption); Rev. xi. 3-11 (an equally imaginary case); Rev. xi. 2, 3, and xii. 6, 14 (to include which is a simple petitio principii); Rev. xx. 6 (a rather difficult case—think of a millennium of 365,000 years!). See the exhaustive list by Dr. Pond, in the Math. Quar. Rev. for Jan., 1874, p. 116 sq.; where the learned writer argues that if one part of a vision be a symbol so must the rest, e.g., if the locusts in Rev. ix., be symbolical (which is probably true only so far as they are a type of ruin in general, not any particular form or agency), so must the accompanying number be; ergo, the "5 months" of ver. 5 must denote 150 years—just as if the number might not be symbolical of an indefinite period, as it no doubt is. We conclude, therefore, by reiterating that no clear instance can be adduced of the use of a "day" in Scriptural prophecy for an exact year, where the typical character of the time is not immediately expressed as being limited to that particular case, much less is there any intimation that such a rule is to apply to prophecy in general. To admit such a principle in Biblical interpretation is to abandon all precision in the use of language.]

Isa. xxx. 29; xlv. 8; 1 Sam. ii. 2, etc.; of the "rock of strength," Isa. xvii. 10; "rock of eternities," Isa. xxvi. 4; "rock of refuge," Psa. xciv. 22, etc.).—Here again we are compelled to reject several partial conceptions:

(a.) The identification of the stone or fifth monarchy with the Roman dominion (Grotius), which clearly leads to an improper naturalizing of the passage, so far as it confines itself simply to the earthly relations of the historical Roman empire; but which certainly includes an important measure of truth in so far as it regards the Roman world-power as a Divinely chosen and sanctioned bearer and promoter of the royal Messianic cause at the stage of its introduction (cf. supra, No. 4).

(b.) The one-sided and exclusive reference of the stone to the people of Israel (older Jewish expositors; Porphyry;—see, on the other hand, Jerome on the passage).

(c.) That interpretation of the stone by which it symbolizes merely the person of the Messiah, as distinct from the kingdom founded by Him (Cosmos Indiopleustes, and several rabbins, as Saadia, Ibn-Ezra, etc.; and, after them, especially J. Chr. Beermann, De monarchia quarta, in his Mediat. politica, 1679, where he submits an interpretation of the several kingdoms that is otherwise entirely correct; cf. Bertholdt, as above, p. 215 et seq., in relation to Beermann, and partially against him).

(d.) The reference of the stone, not to the first, but to the second advent of Christ, and also to the erection of the Apocalyptic millennium, which is said to constitute the "fifth monarchy," according to the true and actual meaning of the prophet. This view was held by the Chiliasts (Enthusiasts, Anabaptists) of the 16th and 17th centuries, and especially by the fanatical sect of Quintomonarchists or Fifth-monarchy men in England at the time of Cromwell (see Weingarten, Die Revolutionkirchen Englands, Berlin, 1868, p. 190 et seq.); also by several recent expositors of a subtle-chiliastic tendency, especially Auberlen (p. 42 et seq.; 248 et seq.;—in opposition to him see Kranichfeld, p. 113 et seq.). Several earlier exegeses of pietistic-chiliastic or theosophic temper, e.g., Joach. Lange, Starke, M. Fr. Roos, Mencken, etc., contented themselves with finding a prophetic reference to the millennium in the final destiny of the stone, hence in its development to a greatness that fills and controls the earth, which is entirely admissible in view of the above.

6. The practical and homiletical treatment of this chapter will dwell predominantly on either its historical or its prophetic features. The leading subjects for consideration will be either the answer to Daniel's prayer and his promotion above the heathen wise-men, or the triumph of the kingdom of God over the world-powers.

a. The former theme is immediately connected with the subject of the preceding chapter, since Daniel's promotion and honor were merely additional fruits of the faithful obedience, which had already in that connection been praised as the source and basis of his greatness. Especially suitable texts may be found in the prayer of Daniel and his friends, vs. 16-23, and in the closing verses 46-49. Compare Calvin's observation on v. 16: "Videmus, quo consilio, et qua etiam fiducia Daniel postulaerit, tempus sibi dari. Consilium hoc fuit ut Dei gratiam implo-raret. . . . Non dubium est, quin speraverit Daniel, quod adeptus est, nempe somnium regis sibi revelatum iri. Exponit ergo sociis suis, ut simul postulent misericordiam a Deo." Also Chr. B. Michaelis on the same passage: "Daniel eadem fide, qua postmodum ora leonum ob-strinxit (Heb. xi. 8), hic solutionem somnii, quod neodum noverat, Nebuchadnezzari promittit, certus jam de exauditione precum, quas super hac re ad Deum fusus erat (Jas. i. 6)."—On v. 19 cf.

Jerome: "Somnium regis suo dicit somnio; immo et somnium et interpretationem ejus Dei revelatione cognoscit, quod demones ignorabant, sapientia seculi scire non poterat. Unde et Apostoli mysterium, quod omnibus retro generationibus fuerat ignotum, Domino revelante cognoscunt (Eph. iii. 5)."—On v. 22 see Starke: "If many things in the Word of God are too deep and hidden for thee, the fault is not in the Word, but in thyself. Beseech God to enlighten thy dark heart, and thou shalt understand the depths of God's Word with ever-increasing clearness."—Notice also the evidence of Daniel's profound humility and modesty in v. 23 b: Thou "hast made known unto me now what we desired of thee;" on which Jerome (and after him Theodoret, Calvin, etc.) correctly observes: "Quod quatuor rogant, uni ostenditur, ut et arrogantiam fugiat, ne solus impetrasse videatur, et agat gratias, quod mysterium somni solus audivit."—In treating the closing paragraph, vs. 46-49, notice particularly that it is a heathen ruler, a worshipper of idols, who is compelled to exalt and glorify Daniel and his God. Calvin (on v. 47): "Profani homines interdum rapiuntur in admirationem Dei, et tunc large et prolixe fatentur, quicquid posset requiri a ceris Dei cultoribus. Sed illud est momentaneum: deinde interea manent impliciti suis superstitionibus. Ex-torquet igitur illis Deus verba, quum ita pie loquuntur, sed intus retinent sua vitia, ut facile postea recidant ad pristinos mores, quemad-modum memorabile exemplum postea sequitur. Quicquid sit, voluit Deus ore profani regis gloriam suam promulgari, et illum esse preconem suae potentiae et sui numinis."

b. With regard to the prophetic contents of Nebuchadnezzar's dream as brought out in Daniel's interpretation, vs. 37-44, Melancthon justly comprehends that the political element must in this connection be decidedly subordinate to the religious and Messianic factor, and observes: "Hæc enarratio non tantum est politica de imperiis, sed præbet etiam occasionem Danieli concionandi de toto regno Christi, de novissimo judicio, de causa peccati, de redemptione et instauratione humani generis; cur sit tanta mundi brevitæ; quale sit futurum perpetuum regnum, utrum in hac natura immunda vel alia; qualis sit futurus Redemptor, et quomodo ad hoc regnum pervenitur. Ita hæc brevis narratio complectitur summam Evangelii."—Cf. Calvin (on v. 44):

* Tertullian's assertion (de Jejun., c. 7), with reference to vs. 1-19, that Daniel and his friends fasted during three days, and that for this reason their prayer was heard, has its foundation in the fact that he (or rather the pre-Jeromian Latin version of the Bible used by him) followed an ancient ascetic interpolation of the passage, which is still found in the Septuagint: καὶ παύσας τὰς ἐργασίας καὶ δεύρας, καὶ τιμωρίας ἐργάζεσθαι.—Cf. the similar ascetic extension which the passage 1 Cor. vii. 5 experienced at an early day, by the interpolation of the words τῇ ἡμέρᾳ before τῇ σπορένῃ.

"Summa igitur est: quomodo visuri sint Judaei potentissima imperia, quae malum et terrorem ipsis incutiant, immo reddant fere attonitos, vixit nihil in illis fore stabile vel firmum, quod scilicet contraria sint regno filii Dei. Atque maledictionem denuntiavit Iesaias (c. lx. 12) omnibus regnis, quae non servierint ecclesiae Dei. Quum ergo omnes illi monarchae diabolica audacia erezerint cristas adversus filium Dei, oportuit deleri, et in illis conspicuam fieri Dei maledictionem, quae habetur apud prophetam. Sic ergo contrivit Christus omnia mundi imperia.—Hortatur propheta (Psa. ii. 12) omnes reges terrae, ut osculentur Filium. Quum neque Babylonis, neque Persae, neque Macedones, neque Romani Christo sese subjecerint, immo omnes suas vires contulerint ad ipsum oppugnandum et fuerint hostes petatis, oportuit deleri a Christo regno, Neque etiam hic Daniel ea tantum attingit, quae patent oculis hominum, sed altius attollit mentes nostras, nempe ut sciamus, non alibi veram futuram, in qua quiescamus, posse reperiri, quam in imo Christi (1 Cor. iii. 2). Extra Christum ergo pronuntiatur quicquid splendoris et potentiae est in mundo et opulentiae et roboris, hoc esse caducum et invalidum et nullius momenti."—Starke (after Geier, on v. 44): "All the kingdoms of earth are subject to change, but Christ's kingdom shall endure for ever, and no violence can accomplish its overthrow" (Matt. xiv. 19).—Id. (on v. 37 et seq.): "If God foreknows so exactly all changes in the world-kingdoms, and if He governs them all by His wisdom, should He not know the changes which are to transpire in His church? Should He not control them for good?" (Matt. x. 29, 30).—Menken (Das Monarchienbild, p. 82): "The object for which God created the world, and the end for which He governs it, is the kingdom of God. The kingdom of God is the invisible root which holds and sustains the world-kingdoms, the invisible power which smites and destroys them. Their more or less intimate connection with the kingdom of God decides the duration, the importance, the significance of world-kingdoms. The fate and the history of all the kingdoms of earth, that have no important connection with the kingdom of God, or no connection at all, would be of no value. Whatever may be their history, it is always unimportant, because they exert no influence whatever, or at best a very limited influence, upon the postponing or hastening of the final development of things, upon the supplanting of the world-kingdoms by the kingdom of God."

3. The test of the faith of Daniel's three friends in the fiery furnace.

CHAP. III. 1-30.

- 1 Nebuchadnezzar the king made an image of gold, whose [its] height was threescore cubits, and the breadth thereof [its breadth] six cubits: he set it up in
- 2 the plain of Dura, in the province of Babylon. Then [And] Nebuchadnezzar the king sent to gather together the princes [satraps], the governors, and the captains [pashas], the judges, the treasurers, the counsellors, the sheriffs [lawyers], and all the rulers of the provinces,¹ to come to the dedication of the
- 3 image which Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up. Then the princes, the governors, and captains, the judges, the treasurers, the counsellors, the sheriffs, and all the rulers of the provinces, were gathered together unto the dedication of the image that Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up; and they stood were standing]
- 4 before the image that Nebuchadnezzar had set up. Then [And] a herald cried aloud [with might], To you it is commanded [lit. they are saying], O [lit. The]
- 5 people, nations [nations, peoples], and languages,² That at what time [the time that] ye hear [shall hear] the sound of the cornet [horn], flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer [symphony], and all kinds of music, ye fall down and
- 6 worship the golden image that Nebuchadnezzar the king hath set up: and whoso [lit. who that] falleth not [lit. shall not fall] down and worshippeth, shall the same hour [lit. in it the moment] be cast into the midst of a [or, the] burning
- 7 fiery furnace [lit. oven of fire the blazing]. Therefore at that [lit. in it the] time, when [lit. as that] all the people heard [nations were hearing] the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and all kinds of music,³ all the people, the nations, and the languages, fell [were falling] down and worshipped [worshipping]
- 8 the golden image that Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up. Wherefore at that time certain Chaldeans [lit. men Casdim] came near and accused the
- 9 Jews. They spake [were answering], and said [were saying] to the king
- 10 Nebuchadnezzar, O [lit. The] king, live for ever. Thou, O king, hast made a decree, that every man that shall hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer, and all kinds of music, shall fall down and
- 11 worship the golden image; and whoso falleth not down and worshippeth

- 12 that he should be cast into the midst of a burning fiery furnace. There are certain Jews, whom thou hast set over the affairs [work] of the province of Babylon, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego: these men, O king, have not regarded thee [set account upon thee]; they serve not thy gods, nor worship
- 13 the golden image which thou hast set up. Then Nebuchadnezzar, in his rage and fury, commanded [said] to bring [cause to come] Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. Then they brought these men [these men were brought] before
- 14 the king. Nebuchadnezzar spake, and said unto them, Is it true [of purpose], O Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego? do not ye [, that ye do not] serve my
- 15 gods, nor worship the golden image which I have set up? Now, if ye be ready, that at what time [the time that] ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer, and all kinds of music, ye fall down and worship the image which I have made, well: but [and] if ye worship not, ye shall be cast the same hour [moment] into the midst of a burning fiery furnace; and
- 16 who is that [he] God that shall deliver you out of my hands? Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego answered and said to the king, O Nebuchadnezzar, we are
- 17 not careful [needing] to answer thee [return thee answer] in this matter. If it be so, our God [If it be that our God] whom we serve, is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace; and he will deliver us out of thy
- 18 hand, O king.* But [And] if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve [are not serving] thy gods, nor worship the golden image
- 19 which thou hast set up. Then was Nebuchadnezzar full of fury, and the form of his visage was changed against Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego: therefore he spake, and commanded that they should heat [to heat] the furnace one seven
- 20 times more than it was wont to be heated [lit. above that any one was ever seen to heat it]. And he commanded the most mighty men [lit. men, heroes of might] that were in his army to bind Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, and [so as] to
- 21 cast them into the burning fiery furnace. Then these men were bound in their coats [shirts, or trowsers, or mantles], their hosen [coats, or tunics], and their hats [cloaks, or turbans,] and their other garments, and were cast into the midst
- 22 of the burning fiery furnace. Therefore, because [lit. from that] the king's commandment [word] was urgent, and the furnace exceeding hot, the flame of the
- 23 fire slew those men that took up Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego.* And these three men, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, fell down bound into the
- 24 midst of the burning fiery furnace. Then Nebuchadnezzar the king was astonished, and rose up in haste, and spake and said unto his counsellors, Did not we cast three men bound into the midst of the fire? They answered and said unto the
- 25 king, True,* O king. He answered and said, Lo, I see four men loose [loosed], walking in the midst of the fire, and they have no hurt [harm is not with them]; and the form [appearance] of the fourth is like the Son of God [a son of the
- 26 gods]. Then Nebuchadnezzar came near to the mouth [door] of the burning fiery furnace, and spake, and said, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, ye servants of the most high God, come [go] forth, and come hither. Then Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, came [went] forth of [from] the midst of the fire.
- 27 And the princes, [the] governors, and [the] captains, and the king's counsellors, being gathered together, saw [or, were gathered and saw] these men, upon [over] whose bodies the fire had no power [did not rule], nor was a [the] hair of their head singed, neither were [had] their coats changed, nor the smell of fire had
- 28 passed on them. Then Nebuchadnezzar spake and said, Blessed be the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, who hath sent his angel, and delivered his servants that trusted in him, and have changed* the king's word, and yielded their bodies, that they might not serve or worship any god except their own
- 29 God. Therefore I make a decree [And from me is a decree made], That every people, nation, and language, which [shall] speak anything amiss* against the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, shall be cut [made] in pieces, and their houses* shall be made a dunghill [or, sink]; because there is no other
- 30 god that can deliver after [like] this sort. Then the king promoted Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, in the province of Babylon.

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

Verses 1, 2. The erection of the image, and the command to attend its dedication. Nebuchadnezzar the king made (had made) an image of gold. Properly "made" (בָּרָא), similar to the repeated phrase in the following: "he set it up," instead of "he caused it to be set up" (verses 1 b, 2, 3, 5, 7, 12, etc.), or to verse 24, "we cast three men into the fire," instead of "had them cast in."—The Heb. text does not state when the image was made. According to the Septuagint and Theodotion, who are followed by the Syriac hexaplar version, it was prepared ἐν τοῖς ὀκτωκαιεκάτῳ Να τοῦ ῥοδόποδος, hence at about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem (cf. 2 Kings xiv. 8; Jer. lii. 12), and after the accomplished subjection to Chaldaea of all the nations from India to Ethiopia (cf. the additions in the Sept. to verses 2 and 3). The incident appears at all events to belong to this later period of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, since verses 4 b, 7 b, 29 a, mention many "peoples, nations, and languages," as being subject to him, and it was possibly a feature connected with a feast in commemoration of his victories (cf. Herodot. IV. 88). The impression of Jehovah's power and greatness which he had formerly received in consequence of Daniel's interpretation of his dream, appears therefore to have been long obliterated. He not only causes the colossal image subsequently described to be erected in honor of some Babylonian national god, but with arrogant presumption he challenges a conflict (see verse 15).—An image of gold. עֲצָבָה certainly designates in this place, as well as in chap. ii. 31, a statue in the human form, and more particularly, the image of a god, as appears from verses 12, 18, 28. It was not therefore a statue of Nebuchadnezzar himself. A marked disproportion seems to have existed in its dimensions, on the supposition that it represented an upright human form, since its height is given at sixty cubits, and its breadth or thickness at only six cubits, while the normal height and breadth of a person in an upright posture are as 6 : 1, not as 10 : 1. For this reason the 𐤁𐤍𐤕 has been held to have been in part a mere idol column, similar to the Egyptian obelisks, or, which is certainly more appropriate, analogous to the Amyclæan Apollo, which formed, according to Pausanias (Lacon. III. 19, 2), a slender column provided with head, arms, and feet, in the human form. So Münter, Relig. der Babylonier, p. 59; Hengstenberg, p. 95; and more recently Kranichfeld, who refers to the colossus of Rhodes, the height of which was seventy cubits, also to the Egyptian $\kappa\alpha\lambda\lambda\omicron\sigma\sigma\alpha\iota \mu\epsilon\gamma\alpha\lambda\omicron\iota$ and $\alpha\acute{\alpha}\nu\theta\rho\omicron\phi\gamma\gamma\epsilon\varsigma$ mentioned by Herodotus (II. 175), and to the image of the sun mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxiv. 18), which reached a height of 110 feet, in addition to the Apollo of Amyclæ. [𐤁𐤍𐤕 is properly an image in human likeness, and excludes the idea of a mere pillar or obelisk, for which 𐤁𐤍𐤕𐤍 would have been the appropriate word. Yet . . . as to the upper part—the head, countenance, arms, breast—it may have been in the form of a man, and the lower part may have been formed like a pillar.”—Keil.] We might be content with this, or refer in addition to the remarkably tall and slender forms of individual persons on Egyptian wall-paintings and also on Assyrian and Babylonian sculptures (cf. the copies in Wilkinson’s Manners and customs of the ancient Egyptians, and Layard’s works on Nineveh and Babylon [German by Th. Zanker]—in the latter, e.g., the colossal sitting figure on plate XXII. A), if it were not still more suitable to regard the statement of the height of sixty cubits as a synecdoche, designating both the image and its pedestal, and to allow to the latter perhaps twenty-four, and to the former thirty-six cubits, which assumption clearly results in an entirely well-proportioned shape of the statue. If therefore, the כסא proper was limited to a height of about thirty-six feet, it would compare with the statue of Belus, which, according to Diodor. II. 9, was erected by Semiramis on the summit of the great temple of Bel at Babylon (probably the present "Birs Nimroud"), and attained a height of forty feet; but it can hardly be directly identified (with Bertholdt) with that statue of Bel, nor yet with the one mentioned by Herodotus (I. 183), which measured twelve cubits in height. Not only was it erected outside of the temple area of Babylon, and possibly even at a considerable distance from the city itself (see infra), but it is also extremely questionable whether an image of Bel must be assumed in this case, since the Babylonians were devoted to the zealous worship of numerous gods. Entirely too artificial is the opinion of Hofmann (Weiss. und Erfüllung, I. 277), Zündel, and Kliefoth, that the image was designed by Nebuchadnezzar to represent the world-power he had founded, in harmony with the religious (cosmical) conceptions of heathenism—as indicated (according to Kliefoth) particularly by the numbers six and sixty. —The expression כסא דבר does not compel us to assume that the image was composed throughout of solid gold; for in Ex. xxxvii. 25 et seq. an altar of wood, and merely covered with plates of gold, is designated simply as כסא דבר ; and Isa. xl. 19; xli. 7; Jer. x. 3-5 indicate plainly that the images of Babylonian idols especially were usually composed of wood with an outside covering of gold. The construction of this image by no means, therefore, involved an immoderate expenditure, as J. D. Michaelis supposed; and the gold required to cover its surface may have been less, in weight and value, than the amount required (800 talents) for the construction of the statue of Bel already referred to as mentioned by Herodotus, whose height was twelve cubits, and for the tables and chairs which accompanied it; and also less than the amount expended on the statue of Bel mentioned by Diodorus, which reached a height of forty cubits, and cost, as is reported, 1,000 talents. The relative unimportance of this image, which is thus so easy to conceive, deprives the argumentum ex silentio of all its force, as against the credibility of the narrative, which Von Lengerke and Hitzig have assigned to it, on the ground of its not being mentioned by profane authors. Finally, it is thoroughly inconsequent and ridiculous to discover, with Bleek (in Schleierm., Lücke, etc.; Theol. Zeitschr., 1822, III., p. 259; cf. Bibl. ins A. T. § 265), an imaginary prototype of the $\text{βόλυνγμα ἐρημώσεως}$ of Antiochus Epiphanes, which was assigned by pseudo-Daniel to the era of the captivity; for according to 1 Macc. i. 54, 59, this βόλν was not a statue at all, but an altar of small size, erected on the altar of burnt offerings at Jerusalem (cf. Hengstenberg, p. 86).—Whose height was threescore cubits, and the breadth thereof six cubits.

רוחב , properly "breadth," but here signifying both breadth and thickness, cf. Ex. vi. 3. The cubits (אמה) were probably the royal cubits of the Babylonians (Herod. I. 178), and not smaller than the ordinary cubits (Gesen., Thesaur., p. 112 a.). Instead of πύχυν ἐξήχοντα as a statement of the height, the Septuagint has πύχυν ἐξ , which reading some have endeavored to defend, e. g., Michaelis, Eichhorn, etc.; but is it probably not even an ancient attempt to provide an easier reading, and must be considered merely as the error of a copyist, if not as a typographical error of the Ed. princeps of Simon de Magistris; see Bugati, in Hävernick on this passage.—He set it up (caused it to be set up) in the plain of Dura, in the province of Babylon. אֶרֶץ בָּבֶל , like the corresponding Hebrew term, does not designate a narrow valley enclosed by mountains, but a low and level tract, a plain; hence a majority of moderns read "in the plain of Dura." The location of this plain is not entirely certain; but it was probably east of the Tigris and near Apollonia in the province of Sittacene, where a town by the name of Dura was situated, according to Polyb. v. 52, and Ammian, xxv. 6, 9. The Δούρα (otherwise Dor) near Caesarea Palæst. on the Mediterranean, mentioned in Polyb. v. 66, and the town of that name situated, according to Polyb. v. 48; Ammian, xxiii. 5, 8, near Circesium at the entrance of the Chaboras into the Euphrates, which was too far northward to have been included in the province of Babylon,* cannot possibly be intended here. ["We must, without doubt, much rather seek for this plain in the neighborhood of Babylon, where, according to the statement of Jul. Oppert (Expédition. Scientifique en Mésopotamie, I. 238 ff.), there are at present to be found in the S.S.E. of the ruins representing the former capital a row of mounds which bear the name of Dura; and at the end of them, along with two larger mounds, there is a smaller one named d-Mohattat (= la colline oblique), which forms a square six metres high, with a basis of fourteen metres, wholly built of unburned bricks, and which shows so surprising a resemblance to a colossal statue with its pedestal, that Oppert believes this little mound to be the remains of the golden image erected by Nebuchadnezzar."—Kell.] The Sept., which probably regarded the plain here referred to as identical with the plain of Shinar, Gen. xi. 2, and which could find no town bearing the name of Dura within its limits, has conceived the name אֶרֶץ בָּבֶל to be an appellative, and rendered it by $\text{ἐν πεδίῳ τοῦ περιβάλλοντος}$ (cf. רָאָה , circumire, in orbem ire); in which, however, they were more nearly correct than is Hitzig, who assumes that his pseudo-Daniel adopted the name of the plain from the earlier designation (chap. ii. 45) of the mountain, הַר בָּבֶל .—Verse 2. Then Nebuchadnezzar the king sent to gather together, etc. This service was probably performed by couriers (רָצוּרִים), who were doubtless employed in similar duties at the Babylonian court, as well as at the Persian (Esth. x. 15; viii. 14), and even at the courts of Saul (1 Sam. xi. 7) and of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxx. 6, 10).—The princes, the governors, and the captains. Among the seven classes of officials enumerated, these three are shown to have been more immediately related to each other by the לְפָנֵי הַמֶּלֶךְ before them. Their members were executive officers of superior rank, who combined both civil and military functions in their range of duties, and who may have been substantially on a par with the executive officials connected with the ministry of the interior in a modern state, while the four succeeding classes were probably connected with the departments of finance and justice. (1) The סַטְרַפָּאִים were naturally satraps (cf. kashatrapāwan on the cuneiform inscriptions at Behistun, which, according to Haug [in Ewald's Bibl. Jahrb., v. 153] is equivalent to "protector of the country," and according to Lassen [Zeitschr. für Kunde des Morgenl., VI 1, 18] is synonymous with "guardian of the warriors of the host;" cf. also the Zend shōthrapaiti and the Sanscr. kshathrapa)—the superior executive officers of the several provinces, vice or sub-kings to the sovereign (cf. the מְלִיכֵי , Isa. x. 8; Gen. xiv. 1, 2, with the מְלִיכֵי מְלִיכֵי , Dan. ii. 37, Ezra vii. 12), and therefore mentioned at the head of the body of officials. The fact that the title of these chief administrators of provinces is Persian does not demonstrate that their office was entirely confined to the time of the Achæmenidian Persian empire, or that it was even created by Darius Hystaspis (Herod. III. 89 ss.); for Xenophon (Cyrop. viii. 6, 1) dates its existence back to the time of Cyrus, and Berosus (in Josephus, c. Apion., i. 19; Ant. X. 11, 1) designates Necho already as a σατράπης of Nabopolassar, which is hardly to be considered a gross anachronism, but rather as an indication of the relation of Necho as a vassal to Babylon. Consequently, the author cannot be charged with a historical error, either in this connection, or in chap. vi. 2 et seq., where he refers to the satraps of Darius the Mede. The סַטְרַפָּאִים must be regarded rather, as one of the Persian elements of the writer's Chaldean idiom, the number of which, according to the Introd. § 1, note 3, must have been considerable, even at an early period (cf. on chap. ii. 4); and the early intrusion of such into the language and range of conception among the Chaldeans, is no more remarkable than is the mention of the רַב־בֵּיטָן , Jer. xxxix. 8, as a Chaldean officer. The Septuagint, however, renders the term by σατράπαι only here and in chap. vi. 2, 4, while in vs. 3 and 27 it has ὕπατοι , in Ezra viii. 36 δυνασταί , in Esth. viii. 9 οικονόμοι , and in Esth. ix. 8 ῥηβάνοι . These variations indicate that the conception of a definite office was no longer connected with the title, at the time when that version was made.—(2) According to the observations on chap. ii. 48, the סֹנִיָּן were "superintendents, administrators" generally; in this case naturally not endowed with spiritual functions, but rather performing secular duties under the satraps, and finally employed chiefly in military rather than in civil offices (cf. the סֹנִיָּיִם of Babylon, mentioned together with the בְּלִיָּיִם , Jer. li. 57). The

Septuagint appears to have conceived of these Signin, in harmony with this view, as being "prefects of the host, or commanders of the provinces;" for they render the term in this instance by στρατηγοί (as in v. 3 and often, twelve times in all), while they translate it elsewhere by τοπάρχαι (chap. iii. 27), ὑπομένοντες (chap. ii. 48), or ἀρχοντες .—(3) פְּהָיָה (Heb. פְּהָיָה, from פָּהַיָּה). In view of the probably Indo-Germanic derivation of this term (cf. Sanscr. paksha, "side," Prakr. pakkha, modern Persian and Turkish pasha) it properly designates "those who are stationed on the sides or flanks, adjutants," and then governors, or the representatives of a sovereign in a designated field of administration, provincial prefects. The governors whom Solomon placed over his provinces outside of Palestine, already bore this title (1 Kings x. 15; 2 Chron. ix. 14), also the governors of the Syrian king Benhadad (1 Kings xx. 24); the corresponding officers among the Syrians (Isa. xxxvi. 9; 2 Kings xviii. 24), Chaldeans (Ezek. xxi. 6, 23; Jer. li. 23) and Persians (Esth. viii. 9; ix. 3); and especially the Persian governors of Judæa subsequent to the captivity (Hag. i. 1, 14; ii. 2, 21; Neh. v. 14, 18, etc.) Among the nations last mentioned, who employed satraps as the chief prefects of provinces, the פְּהָיָה was merely a subordinate to those officers (and more purely civil than military in his official character, as appears from the position of Zerubabel and Nehemiah, according to Haggai and Neh. i. c.); but in the kingdoms of Solomon and Benhadad the פְּהָיָה seem to have been equal in rank to the later satraps, and therefore were chief governors. In this place and v. 3 the Septuagint translates τοπάρχαι ; in v. 27, ἀρχιματριῶται (i. e., chief of a nationality).—(4) According to the Sept. the מְדַבְּרֵי are "overseers" generally (ὕπατοι), while most moderns regard them as "chief judges or discerners." Ewald defines them as "chief star-gazers, or augurs of the first-class" (1), and Hitzig, as "directors, upon whom devolves the decision of matters, or magistrates." The term, which occurs only in this place, appears to be a genuine Aramaic compound, from מָדַר , glory, dignity, and בָּרַר , to decide (cf. chap. ii. 27), and therefore probably designates a class of officers with whom rested the final decision, particularly in regard to the economical or financial administration of the provinces [possibly = the modern Oriental viziers]. The class which follows next in order obliges this restriction of the offices of the מְדַבְּרֵי .—(5) מְדַבְּרֵי , "the treasurers." These officers do not probably differ from the בְּלִיָּיִם , Ezra vii. 21 (cf. i. 8), which term signifies γαμφίλακες , "managers of the public treasury" (cf. Sept. δυνασταί), and is possibly related to the Pers. gaitha, modern Pers. genj, "treasure" (cf. gaza). Ewald's assertion that מְדַבְּרֵי is synonymous with מְדַבְּרֵי , vs. 24, 27, and signifies a "bearer of power," or "exalted prince of the empire" (analogous to the old-Pers. chudōr, from chad, "God, authorization"), is without adequate support.—(6) The מְדַבְּרֵי

are clearly the "learned in the law," or the "guardians of the law." The first element of the word is evidently לֹחֵם, "the law" (cf. Pers. data, from da, "to give"), to which the Pers. ending -ōr is annexed. Cf. the Pehlvi word datouber (Armen. datacor), "judges."—(7) The unmistakable connection of לֹחֵם (like No. 4, a hapax leg.) with the Arab. ṣāḥ (cf. the Turkish muftā, chief judge) marks this class of officers as "dispensers of justice, lawyers, judges" in the strict sense (not "praefecti" as the Vulgate has it, or "οἱ ἐν ἐξουσίᾳ," as it is rendered by Theodotion, in each case because of a failure to apprehend the true meaning.—And all the rulers of the provinces; i.e. all the remaining officials who administered the affairs of provinces. On לֹחֵם, "ruler, high official," cf. Eccles. viii. 4, and also the verb לָחַם, chap. ii. 48. The praefect of the body-guard, mentioned in chap. ii. 14, is not necessarily included among these remaining rulers, since only the officers of the provinces are more immediately referred to in this connection (against Kranichfeld). Von Lengerke is guilty of a gross impropriety, when he finds here "another extravagance, since the empire could not in the meantime be left without an administration." It is not necessary to stretch לֹחֵם so unreasonably in this case, as to make it indicate the presence of all the government officials without exception (cf. 1 Sam. xxviii. 4, and generally Kranichfeld on the passage).—To come to the dedication of the image, etc. לִחְוֵה, the feast of dedication, religious dedicatory services, with which were connected sacrifices, the burning of incense, sacrificial feasts, etc. Cf. Ezra vi. 16, where the same expression is employed with reference to the dedication of the second temple.

Verses 3-7. The dedication. And they stood before the image that Nebuchadnezzar had (caused to be) set up. The Keri has קִימִין instead of קָמִין, as it substitutes קִימִין for קָמִין in chap. ii. 38, according to the usage of the Targums.—לְקִבֵּל, "before, opposite," which is employed here and in Ezra iv. 16, instead of the usual Chaldee form לְקַבֵּל (chap. v. 1, 4, 10; Ezra vi. 13), is a Syriasm in the pronunciation, similar to that in קִימִין, Gen. xxxvii. 25, which is used instead of קָמִין.—Verse 4. Then a herald cried aloud. קָרָא and the corresponding verb קָרָא "to proclaim publicly" (v. 29), are not exactly Aramaic adaptations of the Greek terms κηρύσσειν, κηρύττειν (Bertholdt and others), but are without doubt radically related to them, and also to the Sanscr. krus, old-Pers. khresio, "one who calls or screams" (mod. Pers. grī-tan; cf. the German kreischen); while on the other hand, they are also related to קָרָא "to call."—בְּחֵלִל, mightily, with a loud voice, as in chap. iv. 11; v. 7, and as in the Heb. בְּחֵלִל, Psa. xxix. 4; Isa. xl. 9.—To you it is commanded, O people, nations, and languages. אֲמַרְיִן, properly "they say" (are saying), a very common idiom in the

Chaldee, expressing an impersonal sense, or more directly, serving as a substitute for the impersonal passive construction (Winer, § 49, 3). The collocation of עַמִּים ("peoples, nations"), לְשׁוֹנֵם ("tribes," a more limited conception than the preceding; cf. also in the Heb. e.g. Psa. cxi. 6 with Gen. xxv. 16), and לְשׁוֹנֵם ("tongues," "peoples having a common language;" cf. the Heb. לְשׁוֹן Isa. lxvi. 18; Zechar. viii. 23), recurs again in vs. 7, 29, and 31, and, indeed, often in the book of Daniel (v. 19; vi. 26; vii. 14). This formula, which combines in a solemn triad "all the nations in the empire, however distantly related they may be, or however great may be the diversity between themselves or their constituent elements," and which exhorts them to give attention, was probably stereotyped in the official edicts of the Chaldean realm, whose motley aggregate of languages and nations would give rise to such comprehensive phrases more readily than would the character of any other empire of antiquity. The proclamation, of course, is not addressed to all the individuals of the various nations, tribes, etc., but only to their representatives who were actually present. [The proclamation of the herald refers not only to all who were present, since besides the officers there certainly was present a great crowd of people from all parts of the kingdom, as M. Geier has rightly remarked, so that the assembly consisted of persons of various races and languages. עַמִּים denotes tribes of people, as the Heb. עַמִּים, Gen. xxv. 16, denotes the several tribes of Ishmael, and in Num. xxv. 15, the separate tribes of Midianites; and is thus not so extensive in its import as עַמִּים, peoples. לְשׁוֹנֵם, corresponding to לְשׁוֹן, Isa. lxvi. 18, designates (see Gen. x. 5, 20, 31) communities of men of the same language, and is not a tautology, since the distinctions of nation and of language are in the course of history frequently found. The placing together of the three words denotes all nations, however they may have widely branched off into tribes with different languages, and expresses the sense that no one in the whole kingdom should be exempted from the command."—Kell.—Verse 5. At what time ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, etc. As in the case of religious dedicatory festivals among the Israelites (Psa. xxx. 1; Neh. xii. 27; 1 Mac. iv. 54), so at the dedication of this heathen statue, there was no lack of music and song (cf. Ex. xxxii. 18 et seq.). This is an especially natural feature, since the Babylonians, as well as the ancient Assyrians, appear, as a people, to have been unusually addicted to music, in view of the testimony afforded by numerous historical records of a positive character; cf. Isa. xiv. 11; Psa. cxxxvii. 2; Herodotus, I. 191 (the χορὸν of the Babylonians during the capture of their city by Cyrus); Curtius, V. 3 (Alexander welcomed on his entrance into Babylon, by "artifices cum fidibus sui generis—laudes regum canere soliti"). Additional evidence is found in the representations of musicians with various instruments, on the monumental edifices of Nineveh and Babylon.—The names of the six instruments here enumerated are in the singular, not as indicating that only one of each kind was at hand, but as a generic designation of the entire class to which it belonged. Hence, there is no impropriety in rendering them in the plural "the cornets, flutes," etc. [כְּרָנָה, horn, is the tuba of the ancients, the כְּרָן or שוֹפָר of the Hebr.; see Josh. vi. 5. מְשֹׁרֵקִיָּתָא, from כְּרָק, to hiss or whistle, is the reed-flute, translated by the Sept. and Theodotion σφύγξ, the shepherd's or Pan's pipe, which consisted of several reeds of different thickness and length bound together, and according to a Greek tradition (Pollux, IV. 9, 15), was invented by two Medes."—Keil. "It is uncertain whether the horn intended was straight, like the Assyrian, or curved, like the Roman cornu and tubus. The pipe was probably the double instrument, played at the end, which was familiar to the Susianians and Assyrians. The harp would seem to have resembled the later harp of the Assyrians; but it had fewer strings, if we may judge from a representation upon a cylinder. Like the Assyrian, it was carried under the arm, and was played with both hands, one on either side of the strings" (Rawlinson, Five Monarchies, III. 20).] —The harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer. For the opinion that of the names of the four instruments here mentioned, which several expositors hold to be derived without exception from the Greek, probably but two are really taken from that language, see the Introd. § 7. See ibid. note 2. concerning the possibility of an importation of musical instruments and their names from Greece, even prior to the time of Daniel. It is yet to be noticed in this connection: (1) that instead of the Kethib קִרְרָס, which is to be pronounced either as קִרְרָס or קִרְרִים, the Keri has the shortened form קִרְרָס, which appears to have been in general use in later times. The Syriac affords repeated examples of the conversion of the Greek ending α into ס (Gesen. Thes., p. 1215), so that in this direction the derivation of the term from the Gr. κῠραρυς seems certainly to be secured. However, see the Introd., as above.—(2) The σαμβύκη, which Strabo notices (X. 3, 7) as being of foreign origin, and whose invention is attributed by Clemens Alex. (Strom. I. 76) to the Troglodytes, might possibly be explained in analogy with the Sanscrit ṣambuka, "bivalve, muscle." The form סַמְבִּיקָה, however, appears rather to point to the Shemitic root סַבַּךְ, "to weave."—(3) The orthography of פְּסַלְתֵּרִי is not fixed; in v. 7 the name is written with ו instead of ר, and in vs. 10 and 15 it is pointed with ו under פ. The numerous changes of the Greek ending ων into ו which are found in the later Chaldee, and of which סַמְבִּיקָה = σάμβυκον is the most familiar (Gesen. Thesaur., p. 1116), indicate the identity of this instrument with the ψαλτήριον. ["It was an instrument like a harp, which, according to Augustine (on Psa. xxxii. [xxxiii.]) 2 and Psa. xlii. [xliii.]) 4) was distinguished from the cithara in this particular, that while the strings of the cithara passed over the sounding-board, those of the psalterion (or organon) were placed under it. Such harps are found on Egyptian (see Rosellini) and also on Assyrian monuments (cf. Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, plate XIII. 4)."—Keil. "In Egypt they have an instrument, evidently of the same name, santir (Lane, Mod. Eg. p. 77), which is a species of dulcimer, is stringed, and is beaten with two small sticks."—Stuart.]—(4) V. 10 has the softer סִפְסִיָּה instead of סִפְסִיָּה; a form which points back no less certainly than does the more usual term, to the Greek συσφώνια, since the sound υ is intermediate between η and ι. Its rendering by "bagpipe" (Germ. Sackpfeife, Duldsack) has a sufficient support in Polyb. XXXI. 4, in Saadias on this passage, and in the Italian sampogna. In addition, the name συσφώνια (Jerome, "consonantia") is exceedingly suitable for an instrument consisting of two pipes which are passed through a leathern bag, from which their ends protrude equally above and below—the lower of which pipes, when played with the fingers like a flute, emits in screaming tones the sounds breathed into the upper and increased in force by passing through the bag (cf. Winer, Realw. II., p. 123). We must therefore reject its interpretation by קִרְרָב, "Pandean pipes" in the Heb. translation of the passage; further, its rendering as "a drum" by Isidore (Orig. III. 21); the derivation of the word by Hävernicks from קִרְרָב, "a reed;" that by Paulus from קִרְרָב, "a ship," "the covering of a ship" (cf. a resonant frame), etc. [Stuart adduces the instrument called summarah, described and figured by Lane (Mod. Eg., II. 81, 82), still commonly used in Egypt by the boatmen, and giving two symphonious sounds, being double.]—And all kinds of music. A comprehensive supplemental phrase, similar to that which follows the names of the officers in v. 2. [By the addition "this pompous language of the world-ruler and of the herald of his power is well expressed."—Keil.] זִמְרָה does not designate either instrumental music or "song" (Hitz.) as distinct from each other, but music in general; cf. the Sept. and Theodotion: καὶ πάντες γίνουσιν μουσικῶν. The expression therefore does not refer to various melodies, nor to different parts of vocal music; but it does not, on the other hand, exclude such music from the ceremony; cf. the Targ. Gen. iv. 21; Ez. xxxiii. 22.—Ye (shall) fall down and worship the golden image, etc. Kranichfeld observes correctly (on v. 6): "The homage which the king required to be rendered to his god (cf. on v. 14) on the occasion of this great national festival in honor of their victories (cf. on v. 1), was regarded as a test of the loyalty of the officers to the king himself, and especially in the case of those who belonged to subjugated nations. The victory of a heathen king over other tribes and nations was considered a triumph of his gods over their gods (1 Kings xx. 23, 28; 2 Chron. xxviii. 23; Isa. xxxvi. 18-20, etc.); and hostile kingdoms included the gods of their opponents among their foes, and in contrast with the usual tolerance and indifference of heathenism in regard to the worship of the gods, they refused them reverence, so long as neither party believed that its cause was lost. Thus, for instance, the different foes of the Assyrian empire are characterized on an inscription of Tiglath-pileser as those who 'refuse to reverence' the god of Ashur, as the lord of Tiglath-pileser. Opposition to the gods of a kingdom was therefore equivalent to hostility against the realm. The same inscription represents Tiglath-pileser, for this reason, as directly imposing on the conquered nations the worship of Ashur's god; they must prostrate themselves before this offended god, and thus render their tribute (Pusey, Daniel, p. 444 ss.). This will illustrate the baselessness of Von Lengerke's assertion that religious compulsion was unknown among the ancient Asiatic nations, and that they never enforced a recognition of the gods from unwilling persons. What has been remarked, serves to show that, on the contrary, an expression of homage toward the national divinity was always required, and even insisted on, whenever the political supremacy of a realm was in question; and this would be observed especially in the case of officers, upon whose loyalty the security of the realm of such divinity might depend. If Nebuchadnezzar was concerned, on the celebration of the nation's triumph before us, to secure a recognition of his right, as the supreme ruler, to the allegiance of his subjects, and especially to the homage of the officials to whom was entrusted the administration of his empire, it follows that the compulsory requirement to do homage to the national god of his kingdom, was, in this instance, a necessary measure, aiming simply at the preservation of the realm.—Verse 6, And whose falleth not down. . . . shall the same hour be cast into the midst of a burning fiery furnace. כִּי־יָרֵד, quousque, synonymous with כִּי־יָרֵד, chap. ii. 28 (cf. v. 11; chap. iv. 14).

— וּבְהוֹרָה־אֶחָדָה, in the same hour, literally "in it, the hour;" the suffix, which anticipates the connected noun, is annexed to the preposition; cf. vs. 7, 8, 15; iv. 30, 33, and also the instances in which, additionally, the preposition is itself repeated before the noun, e.g. וּבְהוֹרָה־אֶחָדָה, chap. v. 30; cf. chap. v. 12. ["The frequent pleonastic use, in the later Aramaic, of the union of a preposition with a suffix anticipating the following noun, has in the Bibl. Chald. generally a certain emphasis, for the pronominal suffix is manifestly used demonstratively, in the sense, 'even this.'—Keil.] וּבְהוֹרָה־אֶחָדָה, after the Arabic, is literally, "the quickly expiring, the quickly passing," hence a moment, in which sense the term is often found in the Targums (= Hebr. רֵגֶל). In Daniel it always has the meaning of "hour," as appears especially from chap. iv. 16 [19]. [The passage here referred to, however, does not support this later or Rabbinical import to the word, which is therefore here, as elsewhere in Daniel, to be rendered moment.] The word does not seem to be related to the verb וָרָא, "to see;" the root from which it is derived signifies in the Arabic "celeriter ire, currere."—וָרָא, according to the Arabic, literally, "a furrow, excavation" (whence probably: a lime pit), designates an excavated smelting furnace in the form of a pit, a fire pit, which sense is also expressed in the corresponding Ethiop. ጥጥር, and by the originally synonymous, but not essentially related Heb. מִנְיָר. The smelting furnace here referred to, however, being designed for the infliction of the death penalty on criminals by means of fire, was arranged according to vs. 23 and 26, so that at least one, if not more of its sides, rose as perpendicular (or inclined) surfaces above the earth, analogous to the construction of our lime-kilns and furnaces, and probably also to the brick-kiln (כִּלְנִי) at Tahpanhes in Egypt, which is referred to in Jer. xliii. 9 et seq. The principal opening, by which fuel and other materials designed for burning (or smelting) were introduced into the furnace, was above (see v. 22); a second, for the removal of slag, cinders, etc., or the molten metal, was arranged below, in one of the sides, and permitted persons standing before the furnace to observe the material in its interior (the מִנְיָר, v. 26; cf. vs. 24, 25). The passage Jer. xxix. 22 ("The Lord make thee like Zedekiah and like Ahab, whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire") attests that the Babylonians were accustomed to burn condemned criminals, and perhaps prisoners of war in such furnaces, even prior to the time of Daniel. The Moabites employed the same method of inflicting capital punishment, according to Am. ii. 1, as did also the Israelites, according to the Keri of 2 Sam. xii. 31. ["That burning was not an unusual punishment in the East is sufficiently known. As to the Persians, see Brissounius, De Reg. Pers., II. cap. 216. . . . Chardin (who was in Persia A. D. 1671-7) relates that in a time of scarcity, two furnaces were kept burning a whole month, in order to consume such as exacted more than the lawful price of food (Voyages, VI. p. 118).—Stuart.] The genitive clause וּבְהוֹרָה־אֶחָדָה, "of the burning fire," exemplifies the terribly cruel and frightful character of the threatened punishment.—Verse 7. Therefore at that time when all the people heard the sound of the cornet, etc. ["וּבְהוֹרָה־אֶחָדָה (cf. also v. 8) is interchanged with וּבְהוֹרָה־אֶחָדָה, at the time (verses 5 and 15); but it is to be distinguished from וּבְהוֹרָה־אֶחָדָה, at the same moment, verses 6 and 15, for וּבְהוֹרָה־אֶחָדָה, or וּבְהוֹרָה־אֶחָדָה has in the Bibl. Chald. only the meaning instant moment (cf. chap. iv. 16, 30; v. 5), and acquires the signification short time, hour, first in the Targ. and Rabbins."—Keil.] Only five, instead of six, sorts of musical instruments are here mentioned; but the omission of the וּבְהוֹרָה־אֶחָדָה can hardly be designed, as appears from vs. 10 and 15. It is probably to be attributed to the haste of the writer, which also caused the orthography of וּבְהוֹרָה־אֶחָדָה, with ו instead of ו, in this passage, and only here.

Verses 8-12. The companions of Daniel charged with transgressing the royal command. Wherefore at that time certain Chaldeans came near, etc. "Wherefore," i.e., in view of the worship rendered by all the people, excepting only the Jews, to the idol image. Daniel does not mention that it was refused by the Jews, leaving it to be inferred, as a matter of course.—And accused (or slandered) the Jews (of chap. vi. 25); literally, "and ate the pieces (of flesh) of the Jews"—a phrase found also in the Arabic and the Syriac, which expresses both the murder caused by the slanderous tongue, and the gloating over the fragmentary remains of the victim. Cf. the German "Jemanden kure und klein machen, an ihm kein gutes Haar lassen." It appears from the indefinite "Chaldean men" that the malicious informers were not specifically Chaldean priests or wise men (this would have been indicated by כִּשְׂרִי merely, of. chap. ii. 2), but people generally, who were of Chaldean descent. ["That which was odious in their report was, that they used the instance of disobedience to the king's command on the part of the Jewish officers as an occasion of removing them from their offices,—that their denunciation of them arose from their envying the Jews their position of influence, as in chap. vi. 5 (4), ff.—Keil.]—Verse 9. O king, live for ever. Cf. chap. ii. 4.—Verse 12. There are certain Jews whom thou hast set over the affairs of the province of Babylon. A clear reference to the close of the preceding section (chap. ii. 49). The mention of their exalted official rank was designed to emphasize the dangerous feature connected with the disobedience of such men to the royal command, and also to direct attention to the blackness of their ingratitude toward their royal benefactor.—These men, O king, have not regarded thee; i.e., thy commands, אֵלֶיךָ, "these," is peculiar to the Biblical Chaldee of Daniel and Ezra, and is not found in the Targums, which have אֵלֶיךָ or אֵלֶיךָ instead (Winer, § 9, p. 29).—They serve not thy gods, nor worship the golden image, etc. The former of these charges is related to the latter as the general to the particular; the general lack of reverence for the gods of Babylon on the part of the three men, which had been formerly observed, was now demonstrated by a flagrant example. Because of this evident relation to each other between the two clauses—a relation that is again brought out in the parallel verse 18 (and possibly in verse 14; see on the passage)—the Kethib אֵלֶיךָ, "thy gods," must be preferred to the Keri אֵלֶיךָ, "thy god;" which has been the case accordingly, in Theodotion and the Vulgate. Compare, although it is superfluous, verse 28 d, where אֵלֶיךָ shows clearly that a number of gods were in question. ["The Chaldeans knew the three Jews, who were so placed as to be well known, and at the same time envied, before this. They had long known that they did not worship idols; but on this occasion, when their religion made it necessary for the Jews to disobey the king's command, they made use of their knowledge."—Hitzig. It is barely possible that the proposal of erecting such an idolatrous image and requiring the whole realm, and especially the public officials to adore it, originated, as in chap. vi. with some such malicious and envious enemies of Judaism.]—Why was not Daniel included in this charge of the Chaldeans? To this question that so readily presents itself, no answer can be given that will be sufficiently assured to exclude all others; but we are not on that account compelled (with v. Lengerke) to find here a new improbability, and a testimony against the credibility of the book. Daniel might be omitted from the number of the accused, (1) because he was too firmly established in the favor of the king, to justify the attempt of a slanderer to destroy him (Calvin, Hävernick, etc.); (2) because he was absent on business, or sick (Lüderwald, Jahn); (3) because his position, as chief of the magian caste, would remove him from the gaze of the multitude, and would also relieve him from the obligation of prostrating himself before the idol, which more immediately affected the secular officials (see on verse 2, Kranichfeld). All of these explanations are admissible; and very possibly any two of the reasons adduced might combine to cause his absence, e. g. Nos. 1 and 2, or 2 and 3. The opinion of Hengstenberg however (with whom Hitzig agrees), that according to chap. ii. 49, Daniel filled no office of superior power and influence in the state, but that he at once transferred to his three friends the dignity of a viceroy which was offered to him, and contented himself with the spiritual rank of chief of the Magi, cannot be entertained. See to the contrary chap. ii. 48, 49, where it was shown that, together with this spiritual dignity, Daniel must have possessed considerable influence in the political field, although not bearing the title of a recognized officer of the state. ["But the circumstance that Daniel, if he were present, did not exert himself in behalf of his three friends, may be explained from the quick execution of Babylonian justice; provided some higher reason did not determine him confidently to commit the decision of the matter to the Lord his God."—Keil.]

Verses 13-15. The accused summoned to renounce Jehovah. Then Nebuchadnezzar in rage and fury commanded to bring, etc. בְּרָגָז וּבְאַפִּיקִי. The use of the synonymous terms expresses the violence of the king's rage. The Inf. Aphel בְּרָגָז וּבְאַפִּיקִי, "to let them be brought," is found also in chap. v. 2, 18.—Then they brought these men before the king; rather, "Then these men were brought before the king." וַיִּבְרָאוּ is not to be taken transitively, "they brought these men" (Chr. B. Michaelis, etc.); nor is it to be explained as a Hebraizing Hophal form (Buxt., Hävernick, v. Lengerke). It is rather a passive form of the Aphel after the manner of the Hebrew [Hophal], of which the 3d pers. masc. sing. is וַיִּבְרָא the fem. וַיִּבְרָא (chap. vi. 18), while the regular participle with a passive signification would be בְּרָגָז, and the active partic. Aphel בְּרָגָז (of. Hitzig and Kranichfeld on this passage).—Verse 14. Of purpose (marg.), O Shadrach . . . do ye not serve my god? The plural בְּרָגָז, "my gods," is perhaps admissible here, in analogy with verses 12 and 18 (Hitzig); but in this instance the singular is especially suitable, as referring directly to the image of the idol immediately before them; and there is no Keri, in this case, recommending the plural.—וַיִּבְרָאוּ

literally, "Was it design?"—a combination of the interrogative הֲ with $\text{מִן$, a noun that occurs in no other place, but which may be explained by "fraudulent design, evil purpose" [contumacy] on the analogy of the Hebrew $\text{מִן$ (Num. xxxv. 20, 21). The question, "Does an evil purpose lead you to refuse to serve my god?" evidently has a substantial basis in the situation as described; for these men had by no means presented themselves at once in the festive assembly, as is shown by the command to "bring them." Despite their official station, they had rather endeavored to avoid any participation in the ceremonies. Nothing could therefore be more natural than the question of the king, as to whether their absence was grounded on an actual disobedience or evil design, or not. The usual interpretation of מִן is therefore to be retained, and the departures from it must be rejected; e. g., the rendering of Hävernick ("Is it because ye mock, or despise my gods, that ye do not worship them?"), and by Fürst and Kranichfeld (who conceive מִן as an adverbial Aphel noun, from מִן , and thus avoid the interrogative sense of the clause entirely: "In mockery ye not serve my god!"). [The interpretation of the Engl. Bible, "Is it true," is not only unsustained by the etymological signification of the word, but at variance with the circumstances of the case; for their absence was a matter of fact, and their declining to worship was only a question of inadvertence or settled determination. "The king, seemingly with more than usual moderation, first inquires into the truth of the accusation." (Rather he first opens the way for the most favorable construction of the omission.) "He probably suspected the accusers of envious motives, and was desirous of sparing these Hebrews on whom he had bestowed special favors."—Stuart.]

—Verse 15. Now if ye be ready that at what time . . . ye worship; i. e. "at the time . . . to worship. This conditional clause of a positive character may be readily completed from the negative conditional clause which immediately follows, whose apodosis involves the contrary of the thought here required; hence, e. g., "nothing shall be done to you; ye shall escape the death by fire." The same construction [aposiopesis] occurs in Ex. xxxii. 32; Luke xiii. 9. It is also frequent in the classics, e. g., Homer, Il. I. 135; Plato, Protag. 15; and likewise in the Arabic. — וְעַתָּה at the beginning of the sentence, corresponds to the Heb. וְעַתָּה ; the Vulgate renders it correctly by "Nunc ergo." — And who is that God that shall deliver you out of my hand? Not exactly a direct blasphemy of the God of the Jew (Hitzig), but still a challenge addressed to Him in a presumptuous spirit and with a haughty sense of superior power; cf. Isa. xxxvii. 10; and supra, on verse 1.

Verses 16–18. The steadfast confession of the three Jews. Shadrach . . . answered and said to the king, O Nebuchadnezzar, etc. Thus the Masoretic punctuation, which, however, is departed from by all the ancient translations. The Septuagint introduces a βασιλεῦ, "O king," before the vocative Nebuchadnezzar, and Theodotion and the Vulgate connect the name of the king with the preceding dative case, and therefore place the Athnach under בְּכִרְיָם . But there is no ground for either of these variations: for while on the one hand, the boldness of the reply is indicated at the beginning by the word בְּכִרְיָם , the direct address by name, on the other hand, conveys an emphasis and solemnity that fully comport with the situation. The vocative כִּלְכֵּם in v. 17 shows that the form of this address, which contains merely the name of the king, and omits the royal title, was not designed as an expression of contempt. Cf. v. 14, where Nebuchadnezzar likewise addresses the three Hebrews simply by name. — We are not careful to answer thee in this matter, i. e., it is not necessary. The primary emphasis falls on אֲנֵנוּ , as appears from the words $\text{וְאֵלֵינוּ אֲתָרִי אֲתָרִי}$ at the beginning of the next verse. Hence the sense is, "It is not we that are compelled to answer thee (i. e., to manage our case before thee), but if our God can deliver us," etc. On וְאֵלֵינוּ cf. chap. iv. 16; v. 25. The root אֲתָר is foreign to the language of the Targums, but is found in the Syriac, where it signifies "to be useful, suitable," while in the Bibl. Chaldee it expresses the idea of being necessary (e. g., Ezra vi. 9; cf. וְאֵלֵינוּ , "need," Ezra vii. 20), or of standing in need of (as in this place). — עַל־כֵּן , "upon this," is connected with the following וְעַתָּה , by the Sept., Theodotion, Vulgate, Hävernick, etc.: "to answer thee upon this word (or matter);" but in that case עַל־כֵּן must be in the stat. emphaticus, despite the preceding demonstrative; cf. chap. iv. 15; ii. 32; Ezra vi. 11. — וְעַתָּה is a word unquestionably borrowed from the Persian (cf. the Introd. § 1, note 3), but found also in the later Hebrew of the book of Ecclesiastes (see on Ecc. viii. 11). It is compounded from the Zend preposition patī (= prati, πρός) and the verb gam, "to go," and accordingly, signifies "what is going forward, a message" (cf. mod. Pers. patām, "a messenger," and the Armen. patgam, "a message"), from which results the further meaning of "a command, edict, word." The latter is the sense in this place. The idea of "answer" results from its connection with the verb וְעַתָּה , "to give back."

—Verse 17. If it be so, our God whom we serve is able to deliver us; rather, "If our God whom we serve, can save us." וְעַתָּה is not the Heb. וְעַתָּה or וְעַתָּה , and cannot be rendered by enim, with the Vulgate, nor by a causal καρ , with the Sept. It corresponds rather, as always in Daniel, to the Heb. וְעַתָּה , "if," and is here, as in v. 15, in contrast with a וְעַתָּה (see v. 17). In this case, however, the conditional clause is followed by its apodosis, which begins, as the athnach correctly indicates, with the words וְעַתָּה , "to be able," does not, of course, refer to the ability of God, as limited by any bounds whatever, but as ethically conditioned (cf. Gen. xix. 29). The pious Jews were not probably concerned to maintain the perfection of the Divine power in opposition to the king, but at the most, their own worthiness to find mercy at the hands of the Almighty (cf. chap. ii. 18; vi. 22; ix. 15-19),—and perhaps not even this,—for the whole may have been spoken from the point of view occupied by the heathen hearers of the three Hebrews, who certainly doubted Jehovah's ability to save His servants. In order to refer these opponents, and above all the king himself, with all possible emphasis to the test of experience, upon which everything depended, the Jews employ the words, "If our God—can save" (thus corresponding to v. 17), although it would have been more in harmony with their Israelitish consciousness to say, "If He will save" (cf. Hitzig on this passage). ["There lies in the answer, 'If our God will save us, then . . . and if not, know, O king, that we will not serve thy gods,' neither audacity, nor a superstitious expectation of some miracle, (ver. 17), nor fanaticism (ver. 18), as Berth., v. Lang., and Hitz. maintain, but only the confidence of faith and a humble submission to the will of God."—Keil. In the most extreme event they prefer death to idolatry.]

Verses 19-23. The execution. Then . . . and the form (the expression) of his visage was changed against Shadrach, etc. The A. V. is literal. The Kethib וַיִּשְׁתַּחֲוֶה is conformed to the Genit. וַיִּשְׁתַּחֲוֶה, while the Keri וַיִּשְׁתַּחֲוֶה agrees with the Nom. sing. וַיִּשְׁתַּחֲוֶה. The former construction, as being more rare and difficult, is to be considered genuine.—Seven times more than it was wont to be heated; thus Bertholdt, Gesenius, and others, in agreement with the A. V. But וַיִּשְׁתַּחֲוֶה, passive part. of וַיִּשְׁתַּחֲוֶה, "to see," is constantly used in the Targums in the sense of "suitable, appropriate" (literally, "what has been selected as appropriate," quod conveniens visum est), and the construction with וַיִּשְׁתַּחֲוֶה, c. Infinit., shows that the same signification is required here. Therefore, "seven times beyond its appropriate heating;" i. e., seven times more than was necessary (παρ' ὅδε, Sept.). [The sense thus yielded, however, is more inept than the other, and the impersonal construction of the former verb (וַיִּשְׁתַּחֲוֶה), together with the active form of the latter (וַיִּשְׁתַּחֲוֶה), rather favors the same rendering. In either case the ultimate thought is the unusually intense fire.]—The command to heat the furnace exactly seven times beyond its proper measure, has a parallel in judicial procedures and limitations, where seven as a number indicates a full atonement or satisfaction, cf. Lev. xxvi. 18-24; Deut. xxxviii. 7 et seq.; Prov. vi. 31; Matt. xviii. 21 et seq.; and perhaps passages like Isa. xi. 15; xxx. 26; Psa. xii. 7, etc. This judicial bearing of the number seven, which was familiar to all the ancient Oriental nations and current among them, is the only respect in which the number is here employed, and it affords the only explanation of the phrase as used by the Babylonian king. Kranichfeld's remark is less appropriate, when he observes that the number seven serves in this instance to express the idea of intensity, because here, "where a notorious injury had been inflicted on the national divinity," no other than a pre-eminently sacred number would be adequate; but this may be admitted rather than the general opinion that in this case seven was "merely the indefinite expression of a round number" (Hävernick, etc.).—Verse 20. And he commanded the most mighty men . . . in his army. וְהָיָה must not be limited to the life or body guards, against which view the comprehensive and indefinite signification of the term וְהָיָה is, in itself, a sufficient testimony; but in addition, the selection of executioners from the army is seen to be well grounded and capable of an easy explanation, in view of the fact that the task was not without danger, and would require the services of especially trustworthy men; and the presence of the troops at a religious ceremony is not strange, since a great festive procession was one of its features.—To bind Shadrach . . . and to (rather "in order to") cast them into the burning fiery furnace. The second inf. וְהָיָה is subordinated to the first, וְהָיָה, as more directly pointing out the special design.—Verse 21. Then these men were bound in their coats, their hosen, etc.; rather, their undergarments, coats, etc. The haste, as here implied, with which the sentence was executed, is in strong contrast with the direction given immediately before, to heat the furnace more intensely than usual; for the newly added fuel would require time before it could burn with sufficient force, in a furnace of considerable size. But the rage of an inflamed Oriental despot allows itself no time in which to quietly consider all the circumstances connected with any given case.—Three articles of clothing are specified as belonging to the costume of the three Hebrews, which may have constituted the distinguishing features of their official dress; and upon these follows the generalizing וְהָיָה, "and their (other) garments" (cf. vs. 2 and 5) [as "coverings for the feet and the head" (Keil)]. There would be no need to mention such a variety of garments in the case of men of inferior rank.—(1) The וְהָיָה were probably long and closely-fitting undergarments, that covered the whole body (shirts, tunics); for the word is most readily explained by comparison with the Chald. quadril. verb וְהָיָה, texit, operuit. It occurs in the Syriac and the Talmuds, with the signification of pallium (hence "mantles"—Luther, Gesenius, and many others); and in the Arabic, where it becomes serbal, it designates a long undergarment for females, indusium mulieris. Others, among moderns, especially Hävernick, v. Lenckerke, and Hitzig, identify וְהָיָה with the Pers. shahodr, Chald. וְהָיָה, and therefore translate it by "hosen," justifying this opinion by an appeal to Symmachus, the Vulgate, and also to Hesychius, Suidas, etc. (who explain the later Greek σαπάρα by τὰ περὶ τὰς ἀντημίδας ἐνδύματα, βρακία, σκελεαί). But the Pers. shahodr appears to differ fundamentally from our word, and to be related to shul, "the hip" (Sanskrit. khura, Latin crus), while it bears no relation to the Zend saratáro, "covering for the head" (from sára, "head," and ári, "to cover") in either sound or signification. The Greek σαράβαρα (Mid. Age sarabilla), in the sense of "hosen," seems, on the other hand, to owe this interpretation to the Arabic sarawil "a covering for the thighs," and also to the Pers. shakār; but this sense was not attributed to it by the earliest Greek translators. Theodotion, indeed, renders סָרָבָרָא by σαράβαρα, but reserves the interpretation by "hosen" for the third garment, סָרָבָרָא, which he translates περικνημίδες; while the Sept. (and Aquila) evidently failed to comprehend the meaning of סָרָבָרָא, since it renders it in this place by ὑποδήματα, but adopts σαράβαρα in v. 27. Upon the whole, the first named garment in this passage is probably identical with the αὐτὸν ποδηνεκής λίνεος, which Herodotus (I 195) describes as the innermost garment worn by the Babylonians.—(2) The פֶּשֶׁשׁ, or, as the Keri prefers, פֶּשֶׁשׁ, were not "hammers," of course, although the root פֶּשַׁשׁ, "to spread, extend" (cf. פֶּשַׁשׁ, "to spread out"), is probably the same from which פֶּשֶׁשׁ, "a hammer," is derived; cf. the Gr. παράσσω, "to strike." According to the Hebrew translator of the Chaldee sections of Daniel, פֶּשֶׁשׁ

in this place corresponds to the Heb. פֶּתֶחַ, and therefore designates a wider and more flowing under-garment than the סָרָבָא, which answers to the second, woollen tunic (εἰρήνους αὐτὸν), which the Babylonians wore, cf. Herod. I. c. The derivation from the Arabic fudā, "a spider, fine web," according to which the word would rather designate the innermost, closest, and finest garment (Hitzig), seems too precarious, because of the harsh t-sound. The identification of the word with the Gr. πέτασος, "a hat, covering for the head" (Bertholdt), is entirely too far-fetched, since πέτασος was used by the Greeks exclusively to designate the head-covering of the ἐφηβοί, and since the Chaldee language was certainly able to command other than Greek terms with which to designate the Oriental turban (e.g., in Ezek. xxiii. 15 we find טְבִינִי). The same reference of פֶּשֶׁשׁ back to πέτασος seems to underlie the τίτταις, by which the Sept., Theodotion, and Theodoret render the word in this passage.—(3) The פֶּרָבָא appears to have been the third Babylonian garment mentioned by Herodotus, the γλαυκὸν λευκόν, which was worn over the two αὐτὸνες; for this word is based on the quadril. verb פָּרַבַּא, "to gird, wind about," which is also found in the later Hebrew, cf. 1 Chron. xv. 27, מְכַרְבֵּל בְּרִצְרִיל בָּרָא. [According to Rawlinson (Five Monarchies, iii. 2 sq.), the ordinary Babylonian dress of the lower orders of men, was "but one garment, a tunic, generally ornamented with a diagonal fringe, and reaching from the shoulder to a little above the knee. It was confined round the waist by a belt." The head and feet were bare. The richer persons are represented on the cylinders as having "a fillet or head-band, not a turban, round the head. They wear generally the same sort of a tunic as the others, but over it they have a long robe, shaped like a modern dressing-gown, except that it has no sleeves, and does not cover the right shoulder. In a few cases only, we see underneath this open gown a long under-dress or robe, such as that described by Herodotus." "In lieu of the long robe reaching to the feet, which seems to have been the ordinary costume of the higher classes, we observe sometimes a shorter but still a similar garment—a sort of coat without sleeves, fringed down both sides, and reaching a little below the knee." "With rare exceptions the Babylonians are represented with bare feet on the monuments." "The girdle was an essential feature of Babylonian costumes, common to high and low." "The dress of the priests was a long robe or gown, flounced and striped, over which they seem to have worn an open jacket of a similar character. A long scarf or ribbon depended from behind down their backs. They carried on their heads an elaborate crown or mitre" (W.).]—The garments which are specially mentioned, are accordingly referred to in the order of their succession from within outward, "under-garments, coats, mantles"—a climax which serves to indicate that because of the excessive haste under which this transaction took place, the victims were not relieved of their under, nor even of their outer garments. [Or, as Keil suggests, "in the easily inflammable nature of these materials, namely, of the fine long linen gown (cf. Herod.), we have perhaps to seek the reason on account of which the accused were bound in their clothes."—Verses 22, 23. Because the king's command was urgent, or furious. "Because" (פֶּלֶל קָבַל) refers to what has preceded, and the clause 'פֶּלֶל קָבַל' (= Heb. פֶּלֶל קָבַל, "therefore") points out this reference more fully; "because" is therefore equivalent to "namely because," and the ׀ before פֶּלֶל expresses the consequence: "and because in consequence the furnace was in the mean time exceedingly heated up." With regard to מְהִירָא, "strict, raging" (not "hurried") see on chap. ii. 15.—The flame of the fire slew those men that took up, etc. It is not stated how and at what portion of the furnace the death of these executioners took place, nor could it be demonstrated with any degree of probability; but it is not difficult to assume that, owing to the excessive violence of the fire, a strong draught of air, while sweeping through the compressed flames, might blow them in the direction of the executioners on their issuing from the upper opening of the furnace, while leaving the three victims unharmed at the bottom of the furnace, and continuing to burn above their heads without attacking them. The deliverance of the condemned Hebrews is still miraculous, even on this assumption, and the contrast between the extraordinary strictness of the means employed, and the security of the followers of Jehovah in the face of the rage of men, which is so strongly emphasized by our book (and also by the "Song of the three children," vs. 46-50), is still a notable fact. Cf. the Dog-ethical remarks, No. 8. ["If the three were brought up to the furnace, it must have had a mouth above, through which the victims could be cast into it. When heated to an ordinary degree, this could be done without danger to the men who performed this service; but in the present case the heat of the fire was so great that the servants themselves perished by it. This circumstance also is mentioned to show the greatness of the miracle by which the three were preserved unhurt in the midst of the furnace. The same thing is intended by the repetition of the word בַּכְּפִיר, bound, ver. 23, which, moreover, is purposely placed at the close of the passage to prepare for the contrast בְּחֵרֶן, at liberty, free from the bonds, ver. 25.—Keil.]—The Sept., and also Theodotion and the Vulg., influenced probably by an already existing Hebrew or Greek tradition (see Introd. § 11), introduce after v. 23 the apocryphal fragment, "The prayer of Azariah and Song of the three children" (προσευχὴ Ἀζαρίου καὶ ὕμνος τῶν τριῶν), which is broken by a shorter narrative section (vs. 46-50, or also vs. 22-26), devoted to a detailed description of the subject of vs. 22, 23, and containing especially the statement, that the turning aside of the flames from the three men was due to an angel of the Lord.

Verses 24-26. The liberation of the three men from the furnace. Then Nebuchadnezzar the king was astonished, and rose up in haste, viz.: from the chair on which he had been seated opposite the side-door of the furnace, and from whence he had witnessed the execution. He did not seat himself in that position after the victims were cast into the furnace, for the purpose of gloating over their tortures (Hitzig); but, as a king, he was doubtless seated before (although all others might be standing), and his position probably enabled him to see the inside of the furnace, in whose immediate vicinity his chair was placed. It is not necessary to assume that his seat was so near the opening of the furnace, that he could view the interior perfectly, and thus observe the three men together with their heavenly protector; for his words in v. 25 may be readily explained on the hypothesis of a merely spiritual or visional sight.—Spake, and said to his counsellors. The חֲזַקְיָא are counsellors of state or ministers, consiliarii, socii in iudicio (Sept. φίλοι; Theodot. μεγιστάνας; Vulg. and Syr. optimates). The word is scarcely the Chaldean חֲזַקְיָא, "leaders," with the prefixed Hebrew article הַ, which in this instance, like the Arabic article in "Alcoran," "Almanac," has become inseparably united to the word (Gesenius); but the ח must probably be regarded as an organic element of the first half of this compound word (as it must be considered), whether that part be traced back to the Sanscr. sahas, "power" (Hitzig), or it be compared with the Pers. hamd, "judgment, counsel" (v. Bohlen, Kranichfeld). The second half קָר is, without doubt, the Pers. qār, "possessor, owner," as in חֲזַקְיָא קָר and חֲזַקְיָא קָר, v. 2. In regard to Ewald's attempt to identify the terms חֲזַקְיָא and חֲזַקְיָא directly, see supra, on v. 2. Compare generally the repeated mention of these prominent royal officials, in v. 27; chap. iv. 33; vi. 8.—Verse 25. Lo, I see four men loose, walking in the midst of the fire. מַהֲלִכִּים is a regular part. Aphel, as in iv. 34; cf. the Chaldaizing מַהֲלִכִּים in the Heb. of Zech. iii. 7. In opposition to Hitzig, who regards the form as a metamorphosed part. Pael, basing his opinion on chap. iv. 26, see Kranichfeld on this passage.—And the form of the fourth is like the son of God; rather "like a son of the gods." It is by no means necessary to believe that this vision of the king which revealed to him this "son of the gods" (בְּרֵאשִׁית מַלְאָכִים, cf. the plural מַלְאָכִים in vs. 12 and 18) in company with the three Jews, was an objective seeing. It must be observed, that here as well as in v. 28, where the son of the gods is designated as the "angel" of the God of the Jews, Daniel does not himself attest his appearance, nor does he refer to additional witnesses, but in each case mentions the king only as the authority for the occurrence of the event. Kranichfeld's hypothesis that the king employed the term "angel" (מַלְאָכִים) in the second reference to the son of the gods, in consequence of the instruction (which is to be read between the lines after v. 27) imparted to him meanwhile by the rescued Jews, is unnecessary, and without support in the context. From his heathen Babylonian point of view the king could readily characterize an appearance from the celestial world which he fancied he had seen, either as a "son" or a "messenger" of the gods (or of one of the gods—for only thus would he conceive of the national God of the Jews, despite v. 26). That theogonic ideas were unknown to the ancient Babylonians, and that the expression "a son of the gods" must therefore be regarded as a conception of Hellenistic origin, which was foreign to the Orient until after the march of Alexander, as Bertholdt asserts, is wholly untrue; and it is with entire justice that Hengstenberg (p. 159 et seq.) while opposing it, refers to the marriage between Bel and Mylitta and to their offspring. On the conception of a messenger of the gods, compare also the god Nebo, the "writer of the gods," who corresponds fully to the Greek Hermes. The Sept., however, renders even the בְּרֵאשִׁית מַלְאָכִים of this verse by ἀγγελος θεού, and thus avoids all reference to heathen conceptions.—Verse 26. Then Nebuchadnezzar came near to the mouth of the burning fiery furnace. On פֶּתַח, see on v. 6.—Ye servants of the most high God. The king thus designates the national God of the Jews from his heathen stand-point, because he has just received an overpowering impression of His greatness, and therefore regards Him as mightier than all his Babylonian divinities. Cf. מַלְאָכִים, chap. ii. 47; also the Gr. ὑψίστος θεός, as applied to Zeus by Pindar, Nem. i. 90.—עֲבָדָא corresponds exactly to the Hebrew עֲבָדִים, Gen. xiv. 18. Instead of עֲבָדָא the Keri has עֲבָדִים in this place, chap. iv. 14, and nine times elsewhere in the book—substituting the later form, which is usual in the Targums, for the more ancient; cf. the similar Keris in chap. ii. 5 and 40.

Verses 27-30. The effect of this incident. And the princes . . . being gathered together, saw these men, upon whose bodies the fire had no power, etc.; literally, that the fire had possessed no power over their bodies,—an antiphrasis, like Gen. i. 8. The Chaldee of the Targums constantly substitutes מַגְדָּלָא, a fuller form, and analogous to the Syriac, for the בָּשָׂרָא, “body,” of Daniel.—Neither were their coats (under-garments) changed. The mention of this particular article of clothing only, as being uninjured, might lead to the conclusion that the remaining, or outer garments, had actually been harmed by the fire; but that the writer intended no such toning down of the marvelous nature of the event, is shown by the words, “nor the smell of fire had passed upon them.” The pointing of the expression “on them” (בָּהֶם) refers indeed, to the persons themselves, but it furnishes an indirect testimony to the preservation of their clothing that is unmistakable; and the testimony of the passage as a whole, relating to their bodies, hair, and under-clothing, and also to the absence of any odor of the burning, constitutes a gradation analogous to that of v. 21. Only one of the four garments there referred to is here mentioned, and the first is selected, in order to recall that enumeration.—Verse 28. Blessed be the God of Shadrach, etc. The doxology corresponds in form with those recorded in chap. iv. 31 et seq. and vi. 26 et seq., but is addressed to Jehovah himself, in a precatory or explanatory form, cf. Gen. ix. 26; Luke i. 68.—That trusted in Him, and have changed the king's word; rather, “and transgressed the king's command.” The וְ before מִלְכָּא is illative: “and in consequence,” or, “and by reason of their trust, they transgressed the king's command;” cf. supra on v. 22. מִלְכָּא מִלְכָּא is, literally, “to change the word of the king, to alter it (criminally).” The same idiom occurs in Ezra vi. 11; cf. וְהָיָה Isa. xxiv. 5.—And yielded their bodies; cf. Acts xv. 26: ἀνθρώποις παραδεδωκεῖν τὰς ψυχὰς αὐτῶν ὑπὲρ τοῦ ὀνόματος τοῦ κυρίου.—Verse 29. Therefore, I make a decree; literally, “And by me is issued a decree.” מִלְכָּא as in v. 9, and also in Ezra vi. 11, which latter passage is upon the whole very similar to this (e.g., because of its use of the phrase מִלְכָּא מִלְכָּא), but is not for this reason to be regarded as the model, from which the alleged pseudo-Daniel copied in this place (as Hitzig contends). The writer of this book displays too thorough an acquaintance with the Chaldee, to warrant the assumption of its composition by the process of a laborious and clumsy compilation of extracts taken from Ezra and other ancient documents; and in addition, nothing is more probable than that royal edicts should employ stereotyped phrases to enforce obedience to law, threaten punishments, etc.—whether the respective kings were Chaldeans or Persians (cf. also Kranichfeld on this passage).—Which speak anything amiss against the God of Shadrach, etc. The Kethib מִלְכָּא, a Hebraized form for מִלְכָּא, is not to be changed, with Hitzig, into מִלְכָּא (= מִלְכָּא = דָּבָר, “anything whatever”), nor to be replaced by the Keri מִלְכָּא, which is used in the Kethib of chap.

vi. 5; Ezra iv. 22; vi. 9. מִלְכָּא, “a fault, single error, offence,” is rather a concrete term, which is related to the abstract מִלְכָּא, “error,” precisely as the Heb. מִלְכָּא, “a disgraceful thing,” is to מִלְכָּא (Jer. xxiii. 40), “disgrace,” or the Chaldee מִלְכָּא (Dan. v. 12) to מִלְכָּא, etc.—Shall be cut in pieces. This threat, which was evidently a stereotyped formula in royal edicts, and in view of the customs of Oriental despots might also be employed with reference to minor offences, has already been explained in chap. ii. 5.—Because there is no other God that can deliver after this sort. Thus also, among recent expositors, Kranichfeld, who takes מִלְכָּא = obscure, ita; cf. Sept., Theodotion, Vulg., in a feminine sense. The masculine form, however, which accords better with the syntax and the context, is sufficiently supported by chap. ii. 43; vi. 29. Therefore, “that can deliver as He can.”—Then the king made Shadrach, . . . , to prosper (marg.) in the province of Babylon. מִלְכָּא is not intransitive, as in chap. vi. 29, but has a transitive signification, “to bless,” and is accompanied by וְ of the person prospered, as in the Heb. of Neh. i. 11; ii. 20; cf. Gen. xxxix. 23; 2 Chron. xxvi. 5. The reference to “the province of Babylon” indicates the nature of this blessing or prospering, viz.: as a repeated endowment with a position of exalted dignity and power; cf. chap. ii. 49. The expression “made to prosper” is therefore equivalent to “gave prosperity and great power.”

ETHICO-FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES RELATED TO THE HISTORY OF SALVATION, APOLOGITICAL REMARKS, AND HOMILETICAL SUGGESTIONS.

1. General preliminary observation.—A correct estimate of the foregoing section imperatively requires the recognition of the peculiarities of the style of writing employed. That style will serve in a greater degree than any other of the first six chapters, to exemplify the repeated observations in the Introduction respecting the “theocratic chronicling style” of our prophet (cf. Introd. § 4, note 2; § 9, note 1). The whole of the event described is considered emphatically in the light of the strictest theocratic pragmatism. It is Jehovah who preserves His devoted confessors in the midst of the flames. The heathen executors of the barbarous decree, and not they, are destroyed. The tyrant, at first blasphemous and presumptuously defiant, is compelled to humble himself, and reverently to acknowledge the superior power of the only true God, in the end. At the same time, the narrative possesses a peculiar breadth and minuteness of detail, combined with a condensed brevity and force that recall the lapidary style of records relating to the Assyrian and Babylonian empires. Observe the frequent repetition of identical formulas, and of changes and series of names (including both appellatives and proper names). The phrase, “The image which king Nebuchadnezzar had caused to be set up," is found no less than ten times in the first fifteen verses; three times we meet the expression "not serve the gods (or "the god") of the king, nor worship the golden image erected by him," and the characteristic triad "peoples, tribes, and tongues" recurs as often, as does also the triad of officials, "satraps, governors, and prefects." The sounding list of official titles, "satraps, governors, prefects, chief-judges, treasurers, judges, lawyers," is repeated at least once; the names of the six instruments, "the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer" three times (on v. 6, where the "dulcimer" is omitted, see the exegetical remarks); while the proper names Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego recur no less than thirteen times. The explanation of this extraordinary wealth in repetitions, is evidently not to be sought in the careless style of the writer, but in his well-defined intention to impart a solemn and weighty character to the narrative. This hypothesis, however, which is supported by the frequent use of a similar style by both earlier and later writers of the Old-Testament Scriptures,—e.g., by the Elohist in the Pentateuch, among the former, and by the writer of the books of Chronicles among the latter—is not of itself sufficient to explain the numerous repetitions. It will be necessary to assume, in addition, a designed imitation of the solemn phrases and stereotyped formulas employed in the official documents and records of the Babylonian empire, on the part of our prophetic author. The propriety of this method was already apparent in the preceding chapter, in view of the repeated expression, "The decree has been published by me" (vs. 5 and 8); and also with regard to the triad "scribes, conjurers, and Chaldeans" (vs. 2 and 10), and in the phrases repeated in this chapter, although not found in the former: "O king, live for ever," and "ye shall be cut in pieces, and your houses be made dunghills" (cf. ii. 4 with iii. 9, and ii. 5 with iii. 29). The fact that such stereotyped formulas and repeated phrases in an unchanged form are considerably more numerous in this chapter, than in either the chapters that precede or the three narrative sections that follow, indicates that the writer preferred the documentary and chronicle style in this connection, because the subject-matter afforded greater inducements than any other for this choice, and possibly also because he had a special inclination to narrate the event in question in the manner of a theocratic chronicler.—The peculiar coloring of the style of narration in this section unquestionably affords an evidence of especial significance, for the hypothesis postulated in the Introd. § 4, note 2 (in agreement with Kranichfeld), which assumes that the writer recorded the events contained in chap. ii.-v. at different times (although not without regard to their relation to each other), and in the form of a diary.

2. Apologetical.—The foregoing remarks contain features that testify to the authenticity and historical accuracy of the narrative; but a far more forcible evidence is found in the strong contrast between the situation and circumstances of the persecuted Hebrews who steadfastly clung to their faith, as here related, and the similar fortunes of pious Jews in the Asmonæan age. According to Bertholdt, Bleek, v. Lengerke, Hitzig, etc., the motive that inspired the alleged historical fictions of the pseudo-Daniel, was derived from the tribulations of the latter period; but at that time Israel endured the barbarous persecutions inflicted on account of its faith in Jehovah while established on its own native soil; whereas here, the suffering is imposed while in a foreign land and in captivity, and merely upon three individual representatives, who are penally prosecuted on the ground of the slanderous accusations of envious persons or of politico-religious opponents, who charge them with hostility to the national gods of Babylon. In the former case the heathen despot attempted to carry into effect a general system of persecution which aimed at the extirpation of the worship of Jehovah (1 Macc. i. 41 et seq.); while here an occasional denunciation incites a single act of heathen intolerance, which is immediately followed by the recognition and adoration of the God of Israel as a pre-eminently powerful divinity, as in a former instance (cf. chap. ii. 46 with iii. 28 et seq.). In that case the furious religious intolerance of the persecuting tyrant is opposed by the fanatical defiance of the desperate Jewish confessors,* while the confession of the three persecuted Hebrews in this case, vs. 17 and 18, reveals no trace of fanatical excitement; it presents, on the contrary, "so moderate a reflection on the interference of God for the purpose of delivering His servants, that it concedes the possibility of a refusal, on the part of God, to deliver in the present exigency,—for which reason the Sept. felt constrained, in the spirit of its time, to guard against the possible mistake that a doubt of the Divine ability to save is here implied" (see on the passage). Finally, while the barbarous custom of inflicting the death-penalty by means of fire, and in large smelting-furnaces, prevailed at the period of the Chaldean supremacy, as is certified by Jer. xxix. 22 (cf. xliii. 9 et seq.; cf. above, on v. 6), the books of the Maccabees, which describe so many modes of capital punishment as inflicted on the Jews of his time by Antiochus Epiphanes (see 1 Macc. i. 50, 57, 60 et seq.; ii. 38; 2 Macc. vii.), make no mention whatever of this. The burning of isolated fugitives in caverns, where they had concealed themselves in order to observe the Sabbath (2 Macc. vi. 11), was an unpremeditated device, and therefore entirely different from the predetermined punishment by means of the fiery furnace.—Even Hitzig recognizes the weight of the numerous differences in the situation, as here indicated—to which must be added the extreme contrast between the golden image on the plain of Dura, and the βαλάντιον ἐρημώσεως of Antiochus (1 Macc. i. 54; see above, on v. 1)—but assumes that the compiler purposely avoided an exact adaptation of his types to the circumstances and facts of his time, in order to prevent any suspicion that his work was invented for a purpose (p. 43, "Ought a type to correspond so exactly as to arouse suspicion?") He thus attributes to our author an art in concealing his aim, a gift of refined simulation, a practised cunning and adroitness, that might excel even the efforts of modern pseudological tendency writers. But while these, and similar charges of such a critical tendency in the book, are unworthy, and establish nothing, the manifold expositions of details of the narrative which have been deemed necessary by the modern criticism, are no less so. No improbability can be discovered in the statement of the dimensions of the golden image, giving its height at sixty cubits and its thickness at six (v. 1), or in the remark that all the high officials of the realm were summoned to the dedication of the image (vs. 2, 3), which is unquestionably to be taken in a relative sense; nor yet in the mention of certain Grecian instruments (vs. 5, 7, 10, 15), or in the occurrence of the title of "satrap" among those pertaining to political dignitaries (vs. 2, 3, 27). We have already furnished the necessary explanation of these features, and also have accounted for the circumstance that Daniel was absent from the ceremony (see on v. 12), that the garments of the three martyrs are referred to by names that belong, as is asserted, to a post-Babylonian (Persian or Greek) age, and finally, that the decree directed against the blasphemers of the God of these Jews (v. 29) is couched in terms that are considered extravagantly severe.

* The martyrs in 2 Macc. vii. 9 address the Syrian king as: "Thou accursed man," and in v. 34 of the same chapter they denounce him thus: "Thou godless man, and of all others most wicked, be not lifted up without a cause, nor puffed up with uncertain hopes, lifting up thy hand against the servants of God; for thou has not yet escaped the judgment of Almighty God, who seeth all things." How different is the language of the three Hebrews, vs. 16-18. Cf. upon the whole, Zündel, Krit. Unters., p. 73 et seq.

3. The miracle.—The strongest objections, of course, are raised by opponents against the deliverance of the three condemned Hebrews out of the fiery furnace, while at the same time the executioners are destroyed by the flames. Hitzig holds that "the claim of this narrative to a historical character is unworthy of consideration. Its correctness would not only involve that the nature of an element was changed, but also that the flames had at the same time demonstrated (v. 22) and denied (v. 27) their power to consume; and a reference to the angel (vs. 28, 25) does not improve the matter."—Our exegetical remarks have already pointed out that the case is not really so desperate. Traces of a certain co-operation of natural laws in the wonderful event are by no means wanting from the text, despite its evident aim to emphasize the extraordinary and supernatural features of the incident, rather than to modify them. The excessive heating of the furnace which the king had commanded, the reckless haste in executing his commands, which his rage demanded, and even the circumstances that the flames issuing from the upper opening should seize upon and destroy the persons employed in the execution—all these taken together make it possible, up to a certain point, to conceive how the condemned persons might remain uninjured, and afterward, on their leaving the furnace, be without even the odor of fire upon them. Nebuchadnezzar believed himself able to testify that the efficient or co-operating cause of this deliverance was the visible appearance of an angel which was observed at the same time by several witnesses, probably because, in his fearful excitement and conscientious terror, he really saw in vision a fourth person of celestial form in company with the three victims. The writer, however, does not personally assert such an objective entrance of an angel on the arena, because he neither aims to positively establish the fact, nor yet to explain the philosophy of the event taken as a whole. Without seeking out secondary causes of the deliverance of the Hebrews, he contents himself with simply certifying to the extraordinary event itself, which was probably reported to him, as absent at the time, by his delivered friends in person; and his added remarks, of a religious and practical nature, refer merely to the unmistakable interference of his God, whom he represents, after the manner of the older theocratic writers, as working directly and without the mediation of angels. A narrator of the Maccabean period who possessed a mania for miracles, would exaggerate the marvelous element of the event far more conspicuously, would describe the terrible rage of the flames in colors much more glowing, and would introduce, not one, but a multitude of angels as instrumental deliverers. An approximate idea of the description of the event in question which such a writer would have furnished may be gained from a comparison of verses 46–50 of the apocryphal "Prayer of Azariah and song of the three children;" although the embellishment and description of the event attempted in that connection are still within the bounds of reason, and would doubtless be surpassed by a religious-tendency writer of the Maccabean period. On the other hand, a writer at the beginning of the exile, although influenced by an extravagant mania for miracles and inclined to angelolatry, was not necessarily without a real belief in miracles, but rather, might possess a firm and living confidence in the power of God to work miracles for the deliverance and exaltation of His faithful ones. This is apparent in numerous expressions of the exilian Isaiah,* and of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, who assert miraculous displays of Jehovah's power and grace, in the proper sense, and also express conceptions of the Divine government of the world, and particularly of his direction of the theocratical people in the past, present, and future, which are, to say the least, decidedly supernaturalistic; cf. Intro., § 1, note 1; § 9, note 1. The shallowness and triteness of the reasoning is thus apparent, on which Hitzig, p. 44, formulates his conclusion: "A belief in miracles, such as the writer confesses, could not arise and flourish in the night of the exile, in the days of discouragement and despondency, nor yet in the centuries of servitude (Ezra ix. 9) subsequent to Cyrus. The deliverance from the fiery furnace expresses a supernaturalism entirely different from that manifested in the additions of the reviser in Lev. xxv. 21; xx. 20; Ex. xxxiv. 2, 4 (?), and seems to be indicative of the enthusiasm, the increased power of faith, and the boundless imagination of the Maccabean epoch."

4. The ethical and religious importance of the miracle is found substantially in the consequent Divine confirmation and rewarding of the steadfast faith, by which the three Hebrews had glorified the name of God before the heathen

* [The author by this epithet probably refers to the pseudo-Isaiah assumed to have written the latter chapters of that book—an unnecessary and unwarranted distinction.]

monarch and his court. As they had confessed Him, so He now acknowledges them; as they had glorified His name by the confession of their faith, so He now magnifies Himself in them by a glorious display of His power, and of His infinite superiority over all the gods of the heathen. It is a miracle of deliverance, analogous to those witnessed by Noah at the flood, by Lot at the burning of Sodom, and by Israel at the passage of the Red Sea and of the Jordan; but it is none the less, on that account, a type of the deliverance which the recording prophet should himself experience when, at a much later period, his unwavering devotion to Jehovah had brought him to the lion's den, as well as of the rescue of a Peter from the dungeon of Herod, of a Paul from the jail at Philippi, and of other miraculous events of the Apostolic age. The writer of the epistle to the Hebrews therefore classes this event among the Old-Testament trials of faith that were followed by marvelous results, when, near the close of his glorious Catalogus testium fidei Veteris Testamenti (chap. xi. 33), and immediately after the allusion to Daniel in the lion's den, he refers to his three companions with the words, they "quenched the violence of fire" (ἐσθλασαν θύρασαν πυρός). In the same sense, and in a similar connection, the first book of the Maccabees had already adduced the wonderful occurrence, observing with reference to Hana-niah, Azariah, and Mishael, that they παρεβόαντες ἐσθλασαν ἐκ πυρός,—a primitive attestation of the fact, with which, as has been indicated in a former connection, the assumption of its invention in the Asmonæan period, can hardly be made to consist (Introd., § 6). The dogmatic importance of this miraculous event is, however, decidedly overestimated, when it is assumed, with several church fathers, e.g., Tertullian, Irenæus, Hilary, Augustine, etc., and also with Carp-zov, Joh. Gerhard (in the Bibl. Vimar.), Joach. Lange, etc., that the appearance in company with the three men was an actual objective fact, and further, that it was not merely an angel, but the personal Logos that was made flesh in Jesus Christ. Jerome is far more correct when he rejects, as being improbable, the idea that the Son of God should have appeared to the godless king Nebuchadnezzar, and therefore assumes that the appearance of the delivering angel was only a typical prefiguration of the Redeemer: "Ceterum in typo prefiguratur iste angelus sive 'filius Dei' Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum, qui ad fornacem descendit inferni, in quo causa peccatorum et iustorum animæ tenebantur, ut absque exustione et noxa sui eos, qui tenebantur induti, vinculis mortis liberaret." His remark (on v. 1) on the relation of this event to the Messianic mission of Israel in the midst of the pre-Christian world of nations, is also worthy of note: "Datur autem per occasionem captivorum barbaris salutis occasio; ut qui primum per Danielis revelationem potentiam cognoverant unius Dei, in trium puerorum quoque fortitudine discant mortem contemnere et sola non colere."

5. Homiletical suggestions. Melancthon has correctly specified the points of practical importance in his observations: 1, on v. 1: "Exemplum humanæ cecitatis et audacia instituentis nocens cultus sine verbo Dei, quos hic ostendit se Deus reprobare;" 2, on v. 12: "Quod oporteat mandatum Dei anteferre omnibus rebus humanis, potestati, legibus humanis, paci, tranquillitatis vitæ nostræ;" 3, on vs. 16-18: "Qualis debeat esse fides de corporali liberatione, videlicet cum conditione, si Deo placet;" 4, on v. 22 et seq.: "Glorificatio piorum contra blasphemiam, et pena impiorum, præsertim satellitum, qui alieni furoris ministri sunt;" 5, on v. 25 et seq.: "Conversio regis, sequens concionem et glorificationem piorum." He also finely develops several of these points. Thus, he remarks on v. 1 et seq.: "Consider that not only the one Nebuchadnezzar is here intended, but all idolaters in general. As Nebuchadnezzar, with fearful temerity, but still under the impression that he was acting religiously, establishes a new cultus, so have many acted at other periods. A majority of states protect idolatry; and even within the church godless popes found dynasties, and seek to confirm them by the successive introduction of new forms of worship. . . . Consider, therefore, how great is the guilt of the popes and princes, who defend ceremonies and traditions that contradict the Word of God, such as the Mass, monasticism, etc." Cf. M. Geier: "The great lords often put forth greater efforts to introduce false religions than to protect the true. . . . It is a false opinion that all the subjects of a state must adhere to one and the same religion. Thence result so many bloody plans to effect by force what cannot be required with a good conscience." Melancthon observes, on vs. 17, 18: "All the Divine promises require us to believe both that God can and that He will aid; but with reference to His will the following distinction must be observed; God will bestow on us the forgiveness of sins, justification, and eternal life, for He has positively declared His readiness to do this (John iii. 36; 1 John v. 11). Faith in this must therefore shine everywhere upon our pathway before us, and govern our expectations of various external blessings and supports. But the latter must ever be subject to the condition, 'If it please God, He will now deliver me,'—a condition that in no wise conflicts with the essence of faith, but that exhorts us to obedience, to prayer, to patient waiting for aid, and to humble submission to the only wise decree of God." Cf. Starke: "In need and danger men are cheerfully to submit to the will of God, and are not to prescribe to Him in relation to His aid and deliverance. Their motto must always be, 'Thy will be done' (Matt. xxvi. 39; cf. Jas. iv. 15)". On v. 23 et seq., cf. Melancthon: "Though the deliverance be long delayed, in order that we may be tried, we dare not cease to call upon the Lord, because supplication is never in vain. For . . . God always aids, either by immediately imparting comfort and diminishing the evil, or by granting a fortunate escape from the tribulation" (1 Cor. x. 13). Cf. Osiander: "God has assigned a limit to all tribulations and persecutions. If it appears to be too distant, consider that the affliction is light and but for a moment, yea, that it secures an eternal glory" (2 Cor. iv. 17). On v. 28 et seq., Melancthon: "Learn from this that it is the office of princes to suppress godless teaching and customs, and to provide for truly pious instruction and worship. For the government is the guardian and protector of the whole moral law; it cannot change and renew men's hearts, but it must forbid and prevent idolatry, blasphemy, immoral religious services, etc., as well as murder, theft, and the like. For, although a civil government is not enrolled in the service of the Holy Spirit, it is nevertheless the servant of the external moral law, and the responsibility rests upon it, as a distinguished member of the church (membrum principium Ecclesie), to aid and protect the other members in maintaining the true faith." ("The moral effect of this transaction must have been all the greater because it was the final outcome of a public conflict between the king's god and Jehovah of Hosts. Nor let us fail to note that here, as usual, an unseen hand made the wrath of man work out the praise of God."—Coulter).

4. The royal report concerning Nebuchadnezzar's dream relating to his unfitness to govern, and its fulfillment.

CHAP. III. 31–IV. 34 [English Bible, Chap. IV.].

- 1 Nebuchadnezzar the king, unto all people, nations [tribes], and languages,
- 2 that dwell in all the earth; 'Peace be multiplied unto you.' I thought it good
- 3 to shew the signs and wonders that the high God hath wrought toward [with]
- 3 me. How great are his signs! 'and how mighty are his wonders! his kingdom
- is an everlasting kingdom, 'and his dominion is from generation to generation
- [with age and age].
- 4 I Nebuchadnezzar was at rest [tranquil] in my house, and flourishing [green]
- 5 in my palace. I saw a dream which made [, and it would make] me afraid,
- and the thoughts upon my bed [came], and the visions of my head troubled
- 6 [would trouble] me. Therefore [And] made I a decree 'to bring in all the
- wise men of Babylon before me, that they might make known unto me [make
- 7 me know] the interpretation of the dream. Then came in the magicians, the
- astrologers, the Chaldeans, and the soothsayers; 'and I told the dream before
- them; but [and] they did not make known unto me the interpretation thereof.
- 8 But [And] at the last Daniel came in before me, (whose name was Belteshazzar,
- according to the name of my god, and in whom is the spirit of the holy gods),
- 9 and before him I told the dream, saying, O Belteshazzar, master of the magi-
- cians, because I 'know that the spirit of the holy gods is in thee, and no secret
- troubleth [is burdensome to] thee, tell me the visions of my dream that I have
- seen, and the interpretation thereof.
- 10 Thus [And these] were the visions of my head in [on] my bed: I saw, and,
- 11 behold, a tree in the midst of the earth, and the height thereof was great. The
- tree grew, and was strong, and the height thereof reached [would reach] unto
- 12 heaven [the heavens], and the sight thereof to the end of all the earth. The
- leaves thereof were [its foliage was] fair, and the fruit 'thereof much, and in it
- was* meat [food] for all [the whole]: the beasts [living creature] of the field had
- [might have] shadow under it, and the fowls of the heaven dwelt [might dwell]
- 13 in the boughs thereof, and all flesh was [might be] fed of it. I saw in the visions
- of my head upon my bed, and, behold, a watcher and a holy one came down
- 14 from heaven [the heavens]. He cried aloud [with might], and said thus, Hew
- [cut] down the tree, and cut [lop] off his [its] branches, shake off his leaves
- [its foliage], and scatter his [its] fruit: let the beasts get away [living creature
- 15 flee] from under it, and the fowls from his [its] branches. Nevertheless, leave
- the* stump of his [its] roots in the earth, even [and] with a band of iron and
- brass in the tender grass of the field; and let it [him] be wet with the dew of heaven
- [the heavens], and let his portion be with the beasts [living creature] in the grass
- 16 [herbage] of the earth. Let his heart be changed 'from man's [mankind], and
- let a beast's heart 'be given unto him: and let seven times pass over him.
- 17 This matter [The rescript] is by the decree [decision] of the watchers, and the - demand by the word of the holy ones; to the intent that the living may know
- that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men [mankind], and giveth [will
- give] it to whomsoever he will [may please], and setteth [will set] up over it the
- basest [low] of men.
- 18 This dream I king Nebuchadnezzar have seen. Now [And] thou, O Belte-
- shazzar, declare the interpretation thereof; forasmuch as all the wise men of my

- kingdom are not able to make known unto me [make me know] the interpretation: but [and] thou art able [capable]; for the spirit of the holy gods is in thee.
- 19 Then Daniel (whose name was Belteshazzar) was astonished for [as] one hour, and his thoughts troubled [would trouble] him. The king spake and said, Belteshazzar, let not the dream, or [and] the interpretation thereof, trouble thee. Belteshazzar answered and said, My lord, the dream be to them that hate thee,
- 20 and the interpretation thereof to thine enemies. The tree that thou sawest, which grew, and was strong, whose height reached [would reach] unto the
- 21 heaven, and the sight thereof to all the earth; whose leaves were [and its foliage was] fair, and the fruit thereof much, and in it, was meat for all [the whole]; under which [it] the beasts [living creature] of the field dwelt [might dwell], and upon whose [its] branches the fowls of the heaven had their habitation [might abide]:
- 22 it is thou, O king, that art [hast] grown and become strong: for [and] thy greatness is [has] grown, and reacheth unto heaven [the heavens], and thy
- 23 dominion to the end of the earth. And whereas the king saw a watcher and a holy one coming down from heaven [the heavens], and saying, Hew [cut] the tree down, and destroy it; yet leave the stump of the roots thereof in the earth, even [and] with a band of iron and brass in the tender grass of the field; and let it be wet with the dew of heaven [the heavens], and let his portion be with
- 24 the beasts [living creature] of the field, till seven times pass over him; this is the interpretation, O king, and this is the decree [decision] of the Most High,
- 25 which is [has] come upon my lord the king: That they shall drive thee from men,¹³ and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts [living creature] of the field, and they shall make thee to eat grass [the herbage] as oxen, and they shall wet thee with [from] the dew of heaven [the heavens], and seven times shall pass over thee, till thou know that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men
- 26 [mankind], and giveth [will give] it to whomsoever he will [may please]. And whereas they commanded [said] to leave the stump of the tree roots [roots of the tree]; thy kingdom shall be sure [standing] unto thee, after that thou shalt
- 27 have known that the heavens do rule. Wherefore, O king, let my counsel be acceptable unto thee, and break off thy sins by righteousness, and thine iniquities by shewing mercy to [pitying] the poor; if it may be a lengthening of [to] thy tranquillity.
- 28 All this [The whole] came upon the king Nebuchadnezzar. At the end of
- 29 twelve months he walked in [was walking on] the palace of the kingdom of
- 30 Babylon. The king spake and said, Is not this [the] great Babylon that I¹⁴ have built for the house of the kingdom,¹⁴ by the might of my power, and for the honour
- 31 of my majesty? While the word was in the king's mouth, there fell a voice from heaven [the heavens], saying, O king Nebuchadnezzar, to thee it is spoken,¹⁴
- 32 The kingdom is [has] departed from thee. And they shall drive thee from men,¹⁴ and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts [living creature] of the field: they shall make thee to eat grass [the herbage] as oxen, and seven times shall pass over thee, until [that] thou know that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men [mankind], and giveth [will give] it to whomsoever he will [may
- 33 please]. [In] The same hour was the thing [word] fulfilled upon Nebuchadnezzar: and he was driven from men [mankind], and did [would] eat grass [the herbage] as oxen, and his body was [would be] wet with [from] the dew of heaven [the heavens], till [that] his hairs [hair] were [had] grown like eagles' feathers, and his nails like birds' claws.
- 34 And at the end of the days, I Nebuchadnezzar lifted up mine eyes unto heaven [the heavens], and mine understanding [knowledge] returned [would return] unto [upon] me; and I blessed the Most High; and I praised and honoured him that liveth for ever, whose dominion is an everlasting dominion, and his kingdom
- 35 is from generation to generation [with age and age]: and all the inhabitants of the earth are reputed as nothing; and he doeth according to his will in the army of heaven [the heavens], and among the inhabitants of the earth; and [there is] none [who] can stay [lay hold of] his hand, or say unto him, What
- 36 doest thou? At the same time my reason [knowledge] returned [would return] unto [upon] me; and, for [as to] the glory of my kingdom, mine honour and brightness returned unto [would return upon] me; and my counsellors and my lords sought [would seek] unto me; and I was established in [upon] my kingdom; and excellent majesty was added unto me. Now¹⁷ I Nebuchadnezzar praise and extol and honour the King of heaven [the heavens], all whose works are truth, and his ways judgment: and those that walk in pride he is able to abase.

CRITICAL AND GRAMMATICAL NOTES.

[The numerical division of the verses in chap. iv. differs in the English Bible from that in the original text, as the latter annexes the first three verses of this narrative to chap. iii., and consequently begins its chap. iv. with ver. 4 of the English Bible.]

[¹ The customary phrase: sends this greeting, is to be mentally supplied.—² Literally, May your peace (i. e., prosperity) be increased.—³ Literally, It has seemed good before me. The order in the original is also emphatic: The signs and wonders . . . I (have) thought it good to show.—⁴ The same emphatic order is observed in this and the following clause: His signs how, (literally, as what) great (literally, very great, a reduplicated form) etc.—⁵ Literally, a kingdom of eternity.—⁶ וְיִרְדּוּן פָּאֵל is the fut. Paël, with ו epenthetic, as usual in these forms. The tense seems to express the continued effect on the speaker's mind.—⁷ Literally, From me was made a decree.—⁸ The terms employed for these various classes of conjurers are the same as those in chap. ii. 2, except the last, but they are named in a somewhat different order.—⁹ The pronoun, being expressed, is somewhat emphatic.—¹⁰ מִן הָאֲדָמָה from אָדָם by resolution of the dagesh.—¹¹ Literally, Let them change his heart from the man.—¹² Literally, a heart of the living creature.—¹³ Literally, and these they are driving from mankind (the man).—¹⁴ Both nouns being anarthrous, the meaning is a royal residence.—¹⁵ Literally, they are saying.—¹⁶ Literally, and from mankind (the man) these they are driving.—¹⁷ The particle עַתָּה is emphatic=At this time, in contrast with his former impiety.]

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

Chap. iii. 81-83 [Engl. iv. 1-3]. The introduction to the edict. Nebuchadnezzar the king unto all the people, nations, and languages, etc. On the triad "people, tribes, and tongues," see on chap. iii. 4. As it there occurs in the public proclamation of a herald, so here in a royal edict in writing, and at the very beginning. This probably induced the persons who in a former age arranged the division [of the Hebrew text] into chapters, to include the introduction of this edict in the preceding section; but such an arrangement is obviously inadmissible and incorrect, in view of the evident relation of verses 81-83 to the statements commencing with chap. iv. 1, and in view also of the considerable interval of time that appears to have elapsed between the events of the third and those of the fourth chapter (cf. on chap. iii. 1, and see chap. iv. 26 et seq.). A certain relation, however, exists between the subject of the present section and that of the preceding, inasmuch as both record experiences of the exalted greatness and power of God, such as had come to the king in the course of events that partook of the supernatural to a greater or smaller extent.—Like this edict of the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar, so an open letter (manifesto) of the Persian king Artaxerxes, in Ezra vii. 12, begins with a solemn wish for the welfare of the people, immediately after the names of the king and of the person addressed.—Is Nebuchadnezzar in person to be regarded as the immediate composer of the proclamation? Such a conclusion is opposed (1.) by the frequent indications of an intimate acquaintance with theocratic modes of thought and expression which are found in the document, and especially in the beginning and the end (cf. e.g., the doxology in chap. iii. 33; iv. 31; with Psa. lxxii. 4 et seq.; Psa. cxlv. 13, and also with Dan. vii. 14, 27; cf. further, the description of the infinite greatness of God in chap. iv. 32, with Isa. xxiv. 21; xl. 17; xli. 12, 24, 29; xliii. 13; xlv. 9; Job ix. 12; xxi. 22, etc.); (2.) by the broad and circumstantial character of the narrative, resulting from the many repetitions (cf. e.g., the repetition of identical or entirely similar turns in the sentences of chap. iv. 6, 15 and of v. 5; in iv. 17-23 and in vs. 17-23; in iv. 30 and in vs. 12 and 22; in iv. 31 and in iii. 33, etc.), which it has in common with the remaining narrative sections, thus indicating by its style that Daniel was its author; (3.) by chap. iv. 25-30, where the king is referred to in the third person, while elsewhere the first person is constantly employed; (4.) by the designation of the palace as being located "at Babylon," chap. iv. 26, which is positively inconsistent with the assumption that Nebuchadnezzar composed the proclamation in person, but indicates, as clearly as could possibly be required, that the writer was not a Babylonian, or, at least, that he wrote chiefly for other than Babylonians, and that he even adopted their modes of thought. No substantial difficulty can be raised against the hypothesis that Daniel was the writer, and that he composed the proclamation by direction of the king soon after the conclusion of the events to which it refers. The peculiarly heathen forms of thought and expression which occur beside the Jewish-theocratic (especially in chap. iv. 5, 6, 10, 14, 15, and 20), find a sufficient explanation in the consideration that the writer employed, although a decided theocrat, would be obliged to adhere as closely as possible to the king's habits of thought and the range of his conception in the framing of an official document to be published in the royal name—otherwise it would fail to receive his approval. This view, which has recently been represented by Kranichfeld especially, is at any rate more simple and natural than the assumption, which becomes necessary on the supposition that Nebuchadnezzar in person composed the writing, that its theocratic coloring resulted from the instruction derived by the king from his intercourse with Daniel (Calvin, Hävernick, Hengstenberg, etc.). Upon our hypothesis, moreover, it becomes easy to comprehend why the writer should occasionally pass from the first to the third person (vs. 25-30). If Nebuchadnezzar be conceived as the author, the explanation of this feature can only be found in the supposition that the report of the king is interrupted to admit of an abbreviated statement by Daniel (Calvin), or in the assumption that "Nebuchadnezzar considered it improper to report his insanity in person" (Hengstenberg, Maurer, etc.), or finally, in the admission that verse 25 is still due to Nebuchadnezzar, while verses 26-30 are regarded as a parenthesis inserted by Daniel (Hävernick; see to the contrary infra, on ver. 25). *—Peace be multiplied to you; literally, "increase richly, be richly imparted to you;"

cf. Ezra iv. 22. נִשְׁלַח corresponds exactly to παρασπινδιν in the analogous formulas of greeting, 1 Pet. i. 2; 2 Pet. i. 2; Jude 2; Clem. Rom. i. 1.—Verse 32 [iv. 2], I thought it good to show (to you) the signs and wonders, etc.; i.e., "it pleases me."—אֲרִיזָה

אֲרִיזָה, in the Heb. trans., אֲרִיזָה וְנִרְאָה; cf. the well-known similar combination אֲרִיזָה וְנִרְאָה Isa. viii. 18 (Greek σημεία καὶ τέρατα).

The somewhat indefinite and general term אֲרִיזָה "a sign, token," receives the special signification of "miraculous sign" (portentum) from its combination with נִרְאָה, "a wonder, wonderful thing." The same combination occurs in v. 33 [iv. 3], and also in chap. vi. 28.—אֲרִיזָה וְנִרְאָה, pulcrum est coram me, i.e., visum est mihi, placuit mihi (Vulg.); cf. iv. 24; vi. 2.—Verse 33 [iv. 3]. How great are His signs, etc. נִרְאָה, quantopere, a strengthening of the simple נִרְאָה, quam.

The exclamation does not by any means deny that signs and wonders were also performed by the Babylonian gods, but asserts the incomparable greatness of the miracles of Jehovah—a thought which Daniel might express as well as Nebuchadnezzar.—His kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, etc. The same doxology occurs also at the close of chap. iv. 31, with but little change. Cf. Psa. cxlv. 13.

Chap. iv. 1-6 [4-9]. The king's dream. Inability of the Magians to interpret it. I Nebuchadnezzar was at rest in mine house. "At rest," i.e., in the undisturbed possession of my kingdom, which, according to v. 19, extended to the end of the earth; "in my house," i.e., in the abode of peace, not in the field in order to prosecute warlike enterprises. Both expressions therefore refer to the later period of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, when his wars (probably including that against Tyre, Ezek. xxix. 17) were ended, and he was able to devote himself to the affairs of peace, and especially to the erection of the great edifices at Babylon, to which v. 27, and also Berosus, in Josephus, c. Apion, I. 19, refer. The time of this dream is therefore still later than that indicated by chap. iii. 1.—And flourishing in my palace. נִרְאָה, "green," not שָׁקֵט, "quiet" (as the analogy of Job xxi. 23 might perhaps lead us to expect), is the term employed by Nebuchadnezzar perhaps because he already recalls at this point the fresh and strongly flourishing tree (v. 7 et seq.), by which he was symbolized in the dream-vision. Such a prefatory use of a characteristic feature in the symbolic vision was the more appropriate, since the comparison of fortunate and healthful conditions in life with the verdure of trees was exceedingly common throughout the Orient, and especially so in the Old-Testament usage of language; cf. Psa. i. 3; xxxvii. 35; lii. 10; xcii. 13 et seq.; Prov. xi. 28; Hos. xiv. 7; Ezek. xlvii. 12 (see upon this thought, my Theologia naturalis, p. 495 et seq.). For the rest, נִרְאָה belongs to the somewhat numerous class of words which fell into disuse in the later Aramaism; cf. Pusey, Danick, p. 599-606.—Verse 2 [5]. I saw a dream which made me afraid.

The abrupt connection, without וְ, indicates the alarming influence which the suddenly transpiring dream exercised over the king, who had previously spent his time in peace; cf. Job iv. 20, and also the numerous antithetic asyndeta in the Proverbs (Intro. to Prov. of Sol., § 14).—And thoughts upon my bed, viz.: "came to me, arose in me;" an independent clause, which must not be connected with the final verb יִרְאָה, but which is rather to be regarded as a parallel to חֲלֹמֶה, exactly as יִרְאָה is parallel to יִרְאָה in the former half of the verse. The assumption of such a parallelism is not, however, to be strained to the point of regarding (with Kranich.) the "thoughts" as the details of the vision itself; for they, like the לִבִּי in chap. ii. 29, were probably the troubled reflections of the king on awaking from his slumber, and while meditating on the nature of his dream (Von Lengerke; cf. supra, on chap. ii. 29).—The חֲלֹמֶה (= the חֲלֹמֶה of the Targums) seem, however, to be identical with the Armen. shorhurd, "a thought," and the word, therefore, is perhaps of Indo-Germanic derivation (thus Hitzig, at any rate; but Ewald, p. 477, objects; cf. also Gesenius and Dietrich, s. v. חֲלֹמֶה).—And visions of my head troubled me. Exactly similar to chap. vii. 15 b. The "visions of the head" are the several fancies or images of the dream, as in chap. ii. 28.—Verse 3 [6]. Therefore made I a decree. The same words occur in chap. iii. 29; cf. chap. ii. 5.—In regard to

* [The author's arguments for the original composition of this passage by Daniel are plausible, but not quite conclusive. It would seem that all the Chaldean portions of this book are substantially extracts from the archives of the Chaldean realm, and this portion has more than ordinary marks of having been such a document. The record of the facts would doubtless be made as a part of the annals of the empire, such as we know were wont to be preserved by the monarchs of the great East (Bather vi. 1), written doubtless by the official scribe or historiographer in the vernacular or court language. This account we may readily conceive Nebuchadnezzar on his recovery from insanity would be anxious to revise, and he would naturally select Daniel as his secretary in publishing an authorized statement of the matter. This view accounts for the mixture of theocratic and heathen sentiments contained in this extraordinary confession of royal humiliation. Well might Daniel recur to this scene in his bold rebuke of Belshazzar's impiety, chap. v. 18 et seq. The explanation of the Jewish coloring of parts of this chapter by the hypothesis of a later interpolation of the Maccabean age, is amply refuted by Stuart and Keil (see likewise our author's apologetical remarks [No. 3] appended to this chapter). These writers both adduce, as corroboration of the account of Nebuchadnezzar's madness, the statement of Abydenus in the fragments preserved by Eusebius (Præp. Evang., IX. 43, and Chron. Armen., ed. Ancher, I. p. 59), that the Chaldean monarch was seized with a preternatural frenzy (καταρχειναι δὲ ὡς ἐκ θεοῦ . . . θεομανία) while walking on the top of his royal tower at Babylon.]

חֲזֵקָהּ, see on ii. 25.—Observe that, in this instance, where the contents of the dream were not forgotten by the king, nor regarded as being especially marvellous, the condition of the king while demanding an interpretation of the dream is very different from that described in chap. ii. 5—a circumstance that strongly endorses the credibility of the narrative.—Verse 4 [7]. Then came in all the magicians, etc. Concerning the various classes of the wise men of Babylon, four of which are here specially referred to, see on chap. ii. 2.—Instead of עָלֵיךְ (read עָלֶיךָ), the participle of עָלָה, “to go in,” the Keri in this place has עָלֶיךָ (cf. chap. v. 8), which is contracted from עָלֶיךָ, a form that shortens the initial ע to ע ; with the latter cf., e.g., יִשְׁעֶיךָ, chap. iii. 16.—Verse 5 [8]. But at the last Daniel came in before me. The Kethib אֶחָדִיךָ is a form with an undeniably adverbial signification (= “at last, postremo”—not adjective: “the last, postremus,” as Hitzig prefers), that does not occur in the later Chaldee, and is replaced by the Keri אֶחָדֶיךָ (or אֶחָדְךָ). It is rather to be regarded as an extension of the sing. adjective formation אֶחָדִיךָ, than as an irregular plural in which the ע -sound has taken the place of א (see Olshausen, Lehrb. der hebr. Sprache, p. 208).—The עַד preceding is the familiar conjunction “until” (Eara iv. 21; v. 5); the whole expression ועַד אֶחָדֶיךָ, “until at last,” is an adverbial phrase similar to יָצִיב, chap. ii. 8.—Whose name is Belteshazzar, according to the name of my god. Cf. on chap. i. 7. This thoroughly heathen reference to the name of Daniel is immediately followed by a reference to his person, which indicates the feature that had inspired the heathen king with confidence in his superior power and understanding, and, through this, with a faint conception of the nature of that Deity to whom he owed such power and wisdom. From this affirmation “that the spirit of the holy gods is in thee,” which is repeated in vs. 6 [9] and 15 [18], it follows that Nebuchadnezzar had by no means forgotten what he had learned upon two previous occasions respecting the eminent prophetic gifts of Daniel, and his direct intercourse with the only true God. The expression does not, indeed, have an orthodox look from a theocratic or Old-Testament point of view; but it is only to the half a heathen sentiment, similar to the remarks by Pharaoh in praise of Joseph, Gen. xli. 38.—וְכָדִישִׁיךְ is probably not an epitheton ornans of the gods in general, but rather a special designation of the ἀγαθόδαιμονες in distinction from the destructive divinities (Kranichf.).—Verse 6 [9]. O Belteshazzar, master of the magicians, רַב חֲרָסְמַיָּא. This title differs only in form and not in substance from that of “chief president of all the wise men of Babylon,” which dignity was conferred on Daniel, chap. ii. 48. It was by no means necessary that Daniel, as the possessor of this exalted dignity, should at once and without ceremony present himself before the king with the remaining חֲכָמֵיךְ. The more independent position which he occupies, according to this passage, is rather in entire harmony with chap. iii., where he is absent from a large assembly of the officials of the royal court, and also with chap. v. 10 et seq., where it is represented that his character as the chief magician was lost sight of by Nebuchadnezzar's successors, but not that he had been deprived of that dignity. Among the various answers to the question as to why Daniel was not at once summoned before the king to interpret the dream, instead of being subsequently introduced, the one here indicated, which refers to the freedom of his official station, is certainly the most simple and appropriate, since various features of our book appear to conflict with the assumption that he occupied a political or priestly station in the proper sense (cf. on chap. ii. 49; iii. 12; and on viii. 2). Consequently we prefer this explanation to the many which have been attempted, e.g., that of Jahn, that “custom required that the chief of the magicians should not be summoned at the first;” that of Füller, which considers Daniel as being, in fact, an officer of the state (chief satrap) rather than a magician; that of Hävernich, that “the haste with which the terrified king caused the wise men to be summoned” caused the overlooking of Daniel at the outset; that of Kranichfeld, which argues that Nebuchadnezzar, who already surmised the relation of the image of the fallen tree in his dream to his royal person, dreaded the harsher judgment and sterner prophecy of evil to be expected from Daniel, the prophet of Jehovah, exactly as Ahab, in 1 Kings xxii. 8 et seq., summoned the heathen wise men and seems into his presence, before he turned to the proper source, etc. J. D. Michaelis, however, observes with entire correctness, that a certain and trustworthy answer to that question would require a more exact acquaintance with all the facts of the history than we are able to command.*—And that no secret trouble thee. וְאֵין שִׁבְחִיךָ signifies in the Targums “to sweep away, to apply force,” but here “to cause difficulty or trouble;” cf. the Heb. וְאֵין, “to compel,” Esth. i. 8.

Verses 7–14 [10–17]. Subject of the king's dream. Thus were the visions of my head, etc.; literally, “And (concerning) the visions of my head upon my bed; I saw;” an abrupt and detached clause similar to chap. vii. 17–23.—In relation to “vision of my head,” see on v. 2.—And behold, a tree (stood) in the midst of the earth. וְאֵין, unlike the corresponding Heb. וְאֵין, does not signify an “oak” in particular, but “tree” generally; cf. δένδρον and robur. The position of this tree, “in the midst of the earth,” indicates its great importance for the whole earth, and its destiny to develop an unlimited growth in every direction (cf. v. 8). The tree thus occupies a central position that corresponds to its exceeding height. The symbolizing of the mighty Babylonian king by a tree recalls the description by Ezekiel, chap. xxi. 3 et seq., which was probably not known to Nebuchadnezzar, but with which Daniel, the narrator of his dream, must have been acquainted. It also suggests a reference to Ezek. xvii. 22; xix. 10 et seq.; and, among the earlier prophets, to Isa. ii. 13; vi. 18; xiv. 12; Jer. xxii. 15; Am. ii. 9 (cf. also the passages cited above, on v. 1). The especial fondness of the ancient Orientals for the illustration of the growth or decline of human greatness and power by the figure of a growing or fallen tree, is shown by Hävernack in the parallels he adduces from Herodotus (iii. 19; the dream of Xerxes; vi. 37; the threat of Croesus to destroy the town of Lampsacus like a pine tree; cf. also i. 108; the dream of Astyages respecting his daughter Mandane), from Arabic writers (Antara's Mowlaka, V. 51, 56; Reiske on Tarafa, proleg., p. xlvii.), from the later Mohammedan traditions (Mohammed's comparison of a Moslem to an evergreen palm in Sunna, according to v. Hammer, Fundgruben des Orients, I. 152), and from Turkish history and literature (the prophetic dream of Osman I., according to Murajea d'Ohsaon, Allgem. Schilderung des ottoman. Reichs, p. 273 et seq.). Cf. further, with reference to the general use of this tree-symbolism among the Greeks, the interesting work of Bötticher: Baumkultus der Hellenen (Leips., 1858).—Verse 8 [11]. The tree grew and was strong, "became great and strong;" thus, correctly, Chr. B. Michaelis, Hitzig, and Kranichfeld. The finite verbs גָּדַל and חָזַק do not designate a fixed, but a becoming state; hence Nabuchadnezzar sees the tree growing and becoming greater than it was in v. 7 [10].—And the height thereof reached unto heaven, like the tower of Babel, Gen. xi. 4, or the δένδρεα οὐρανόμικτα, Herod. II. 138. Observe the imperfect אֲבָרַח, which here takes the place of the perfect, and indicates the heaven-aspiring tendency of the slowly developing tree.—And the sight thereof to the end of all the earth; rather, "its extent" or circumference. וְיָדוּתָהּ does not signify "its visibility" (Vulg., Syr., de Wette, and many moderns), but "its outlook, its circumference, its extent" (the Sept. and Theodotion are correct, so far as the sense is concerned: τὸ κύρος αὐτοῦ, its bulging, extension); the contrast with אֲבָרַח would itself require this interpretation.—Verse 9 [12]. The leaves (branches) thereof were fair, and the fruit thereof much. עֲנַף, properly its branching, its crown, as אֲבָרַח is the aggregate of its fruit. Bertholdt, von Lengerke, and others, render incorrectly "and its fruit was large" (i.e., it bore a large, thick kind of fruit); for there was no reason to mention such a quality of the tree. The immediate connection shows that the great quantity of fruit, instead of its size, was here referred to.—And it was meat for all, rather, "and food for all (was found) on it." לְכָל, "for all," i.e., for all who lived under its shelter—an exemplification and more circumstantial exposition of אֲבָרַח. It is, however immaterial to the sense of the passage as a whole, whether אֲבָרַח be construed with לְכָל and by neglecting the makkeph between לְכָל and אֲבָרַח; as a majority of expositors, including ourselves, translate, or whether we translate, as Kranichfeld [and Keil], with regard to the makkeph: "and food was found for all on it," i.e., for all the birds that nestled on it. The masora evidently requires this rendering here, while in ver. 18 [21], where the makkeph is wanting from between לְכָל and אֲבָרַח, it observes the other construction.—The beasts of the field had shadow under it. אֲבָרַח, umbram egit, spent in the shadow. The aphel of אֲבָרַח ("obumbrare, to overshadow, protect"), which, in the language of the Targums, is generally transitive, like the Heb. אֲבָרַח, 1 Chron. iv. 8, is here intransitive by virtue of its Niphal signification.—And the fowls of the heaven dwelt in the boughs thereof; cf. Matt. xiii. 32, and the parallel passages. The masculine וְיָדוּתָהּ has its explanation in the fact that אֲבָרַח is of the common gender; the Keri וְיָדוּתָהּ construes the word in the feminine, in analogy with וְיָדוּתָהּ, v. 18 [21].—And all flesh was fed of it. "All flesh," i.e., not merely all the birds, but also all the beasts of the field, and, in short, all the animals living on and under the tree, thus imaging all of the human race that were united under the sceptre of Nebuchadnezzar; cf. v. 19 [22].—Verse 10 [13]. I saw in the visions of my head upon my bed; a formula designed to prepare for the new and remarkably sudden turn of the hitherto quietly transpiring dream.—A watcher and holy one came down from heaven. וְיָדוּתָהּ, obviously a hendiadys for "a holy watcher, a watcher who is holy." וְיָדוּתָהּ, the pass. part. of דָּרַךְ, expergeleri, designates a "watchful one, one who watches" (cf. וְיָדוּתָהּ, Cant. v. 2; Mal. ii. 12), in this place more particularly a celestial watcher, an angel who from heaven watches over the fortunes of men. Thus Aquila, Symm., and the Sept.: ἐγρηγορος; also a scholium in the Cod. Alex. on the eip [a transfer of וְיָדוּתָהּ] of Theodotion (ἐγρηγορος καὶ ἀγγελὸν); also Polychronius: τὸ ἀγγελοῦ καὶ ἀγγελοῦ, and Jerome: "Significat angelos, quod semper vigilant et ad Dei imperium sint parati." By the addition of the modifying וְיָדוּתָהּ the וְיָדוּתָהּ mentioned in this place is expressly classed with the good or holy watchers of heaven, and thus is distinguished from the κακοδαίμονες, in which light the Babylonians regarded a number of their astral gods (see Gesenius on Isa., II. 334 et seq.), and also from the ἐγρηγοροι of the book of Enoch, who are described as bad angels and as inimical to men. The expression "decree (determination, counsel) of the watchers" points strongly to the conclusion that the וְיָדוּתָהּ of our book are identical with the θεοὶ βουλευταῖοι of the Babylonians in Diodor., ii. 80—i.e., with the thirty-six inferior gods associated as counsellors (deos) with the five superior planetary gods; but the entire correspondence of this feature to the

Babylonian doctrine of the gods does not exclude the existence, at the same time, of a certain analogy or essential relation of the "watchers" with the Amesha-çpenta of the Parsees, nor even that the supposed etymology of Amesha-çpenta = non convivens sanctus (thus Bopp, who is, however, contradicted, e.g., by Burnouf) might be asserted in its support. But that עֶרֶךְ is "merely a translation of Amshaspaand" is an arbitrary dictum of Hitzig, which is opposed by the possibly post-Babylonian age of the name Amesha-çpenta (this does not occur at all in the oldest portion of the Zendavesta), and which lacks all scientific support, to an extent equal to the identification of עֶרֶךְ with עֶרֶךְ, "a messenger" (Isa. xviii. 2; lvii. 9), as was attempted by several older expositors, e.g., Michaelis (in Castell. Lxx. Syr., p. 649), cf., however, Hävernick and Kranichfeld on this passage, and also Hengstenberg, Christologie des Alten Testaments, III. 2, 74 et seq.—Verse 11 [14]. He cried aloud and said thus. "Aloud," exactly like the royal herald, in chap. iii. 4; cf. x. 16; Isa. lviii. 1, etc.—Hew down the tree and cut off its branches. The command is addressed to the servants of the angel, who were perhaps inferior angels, and whose presence the rapidly transpiring dream presumes without further explanation; cf. Matt. viii. 9, and the parallel passages. Isidorus Pelusiota already is correct (Épp. i. II. n. 177): ἀγίους δὲ ἐποίησεν τοὺς τὸ δένδρον ἐκτέμνειν ποσάχθεντας ἀγγέλους. [Perhaps Keil rather is correct, who suggests that "the plur. is to be regarded as impersonal: the tree shall be cut down."]—Shake (strip) off its leaves, literally, "cause them to fall off." תִּפְתֹּק (instead of תִּפְתֹּק after the analogy of verbs third gutt.), the aphel of תִּפְתֹּק, which designates the falling of faded leaves or blossoms from the tree, in the Targums, Psa. i. 8; Isa. xl. 8; Joel i. 10.—Scatter its fruit; contemptuously, as if it were of no value, and as if it were not worth the trouble of gathering. The consequence, that the animals, who were hitherto sheltered by the tree, were now likewise scattered, and driven far asunder—a lively image of subjects alarmed by the fall of their sovereign—is indicated in what follows.—Verse 12 [15]. Nevertheless, leave the stump of its roots in the earth. עֶרֶךְ, the still thrifty stump, like תִּפְתֹּק, Isa. vi. 13, or צֶיֶן, Isa. xi. 1; Job xiv. 8. The ultimate sprouting of this root-stump (cf. Job xiv. 7-9), which was allowed to remain in the earth, typified, as appears from verse 23 [26] compared with verse 35 [36], the restoration of Nebuchadnezzar from his sickness; but not the continued supremacy of his dynasty, as Hävernick interprets, since עֶרֶךְ in this passage obviously designates an individual, Nebuchadnezzar himself, instead of the whole race of Chaldean rulers.—Even with a band of iron and brass; rather, "but in fetters of iron and brass." Supply "shall he lie, or be;" or even "shall he be left" (תִּפְתֹּק). The figure of a tree is now dropped; in the stead of a vegetable organism that necessarily clings to the ground there is presented, obviously with regard to the bestializing of Nebuchadnezzar, an animal organism, which, while naturally capable of unimpeded motion and of an individual and independent participation in life, is for the present forcibly restrained. There is thus a partial transition from the figure to the fact (as is frequently the case in the comparisons and allegories of our Lord, e.g., Mark iv. 28; Luke xii. 46; Matt. xxii. 13; John x. 11 et seq.), or at least an approximation of the figurative representation to the actual conditions of the event typified. This fact is misunderstood as soon as the attempt is made, with Von Lengerke, to conceive of the fetters of iron as fastened on the root-stump, "in order to prevent it from cracking and splitting," and also when it is assumed, with Jerome and others, that an actual binding of Nebuchadnezzar as a furiosus, who required to be fettered like all maniacs, is asserted at this early stage. The literal conception of the idea "to fetter" is inappropriate on either method. The "fetters of iron and brass" symbolize the chains of darkness and coarse bestiality in which the mind of the king was held during an extended period. Cf. expressions like "chains of darkness," Wied. xvii. 17; 2 Pet. ii. 4, and figurative descriptions, such as Psa. cvii. 10; cxvi. 16; cxlix. 8; Job xxxvi. 8. Kranichfeld observes correctly: "A more forcible binding of his sovereign aims for himself, exceeding the disgrace of that which might be applied to a prisoner of war, could scarcely happen to the king, than was that to which he was compelled to submit according to verses 22 [25] and 29 [31], in the form of a beastly restraint on his understanding, and of an actual expulsion from the society in which he moved. And since binding in fetters of iron and brass is a metaphor as common as it is in this instance a striking figure of the deplorable condition to which the Babylonian universal monarch was reduced; since, moreover, the towering height of the tree in the dream is of itself sufficient to establish the selection of an expression to indicate the corresponding contrast of a severe and servile compulsion, the explanation of the figure does not require the combination of this expression proposed by Hitzig with an assonant kedan, Syr., 'to bind,' taken from the name of Nebuchadnezzar. This is the more obvious because of the consideration that no reference is made to the name in other portions of the description, although, by a repeated use of the k in nebuk (Nebuch), it might to the Hebrew sound portentously like the Arabic inbaka, "turbata mente frui." For the Talmudic animal with an ingrown tree which resembled man in form and language, adne sadeh (Buxt. Lxx. Chald., p. 34), may be explained, as by Hitzig, without any doubt whatever, from the תִּפְתֹּק of the name Nebuchadnezzar much more readily than that really fabulous creature would have allowed itself to be fabricated, had not the self-authenticated description of Daniel (verses 12, 13 [15, 16], in connection with the otherwise familiar תִּפְתֹּק, the heliotropium which moves its leaves (see Buxt., l. c.), furnished the material."—In the tender grass of the field, etc. This lying in the grass and being exposed to the dews of heaven is as applicable to the stump of the tree as to Nebuchadnezzar, the maniac; cf. verse 20 [23] et seq.—

Concerning the reading אֲנִי־יְהוָה , for which verse 20 [23] substitutes אֲנִי־יְהוָה (corresponding to the Hebraizing Keris in chap. v. 39; vi. 1), cf. Hitzig and Kranichfeld on this passage.—And let his portion be with the beasts in the grass of the earth. Cf. verse 30 [33], “and did eat grass as oxen.” The figure has been departed from entirely in this place, and a feature of the interpretation is anticipated. כֶּלֶב , “portion,” occurs also in verse 20 [28] and Ezra iv. 16. The Targums have כֶּלֶב instead. Concerning the not local, but telic signification of אֲנִי־יְהוָה , of e.g., Joshua xxii. 25; 2 Sam. xx. 1.—Verse 18 [16]. Let his heart be changed from a man's; literally, “they shall change from (that of) a man” ($\text{אֲנִי־יְהוָה} = \text{אֲנִי־יְהוָה}$, as Ibn-Ezra correctly adds). Cf. the similar breviloquentis in chap. i. 10; vii. 20, etc., and concerning the active signification of אֲנִי־יְהוָה (for which the angels addressed in אֲנִי־יְהוָה serve as an indefinite subject), cf. supra, on chap. iii. 4. “His heart,” i.e., his faculties of conception and desire, or, if it be preferred, his consciousness; cf. verses 29, 30 [32, 33]. The Hebraizing form אֲנִי־יְהוָה here and in verse 14 [17] is perhaps to be rejected in favor of the more correct Chaldaic אֲנִי־יְהוָה ; cf. verses 22, 29, 30 [25, 32, 33]; chap. v. 21; vii. 18, etc.—And let a beast's heart be given unto him. “The heart of a man is dehumanized when his soul becomes like that of a beast; for the difference between the heart of a man and that of a beast has its foundation in the difference between the soul of a man and the soul of a beast (Delitzsch, Bibl. Psych., p. 262).”—Kell.—And let seven times pass over him, properly, “change over him;” אֲנִי־יְהוָה , a select word for “to pass over, expire,” praterire, praterlabi. It may be seriously doubted whether the term אֲנִי־יְהוָה , “over him,” was chosen with a special reference to “the stars succeeding each other in the heavenly heights above the tormented one, which were to indicate the duration of his affliction” (Kranichfeld), although the mystical phrase “seven times” may contain a certain reference to the astrology of the Chaldeans. The seven אֲנִי־יְהוָה are seven years, as appears from chap. vii. 25, compared with xii. 7 (thus the Sept., Josephus, Ibn-Ezra, Rashi, etc.),—not seven months (as Saadia Gaon, Dorotheus, Pseudo-Epiphanius, etc., held) or seven half-years (Theodoret). אֲנִי־יְהוָה in itself equivalent to “juncture, emergency,” receives in this place and chap. vii. 25, the sense of אֲנִי־יְהוָה or אֲנִי־יְהוָה , “a point of time,” from the context. The duration of the king's punishment as extending over seven years is explained here, as in chap. iii. 19, by the fact that a judicial retribution is concerned; and the heavy weight of punishment which Jehovah caused to be announced with solemn emphasis to the king was accordingly inflicted. verses 25, 29 [28, 32]. The number seven is, however, not to be pressed literally, to the extent of assuming that the duration of the king's sickness covered exactly seven times 365 days, which would do violence to the always prophetically-ideal pragmatism of the history. Cf. infra, on chap. vii. 25.—Verse 14 [17]. This matter (message) is by the decree of the watchers, and the demand by the word of the holy ones. The parallelismus membrorum in which the solemn and elevated speech proceeds, shows that the אֲנִי־יְהוָה are here also, as in verse 10 [18], identical with the אֲנִי־יְהוָה . The terms אֲנִי־יְהוָה and אֲנִי־יְהוָה are likewise synonymous, but do not, as Hitzig holds, signify “matter” (concern) and “circumstance,” but, in harmony with their etymology and the sense of אֲנִי־יְהוָה in chap. iii. 16, must be rendered “word” (message, announcement) and “demand” (command); cf. the Heb. אֲנִי־יְהוָה , “a request, desire,” Judg. viii. 24; 1 Kings ii. 16; Job. vi. 8; Esth. v. 6, 8, etc. Entirely too artificial and contradictory of the unquestionable sense of אֲנִי־יְהוָה , “a decision, resolution” (and also of אֲנִי־יְהוָה , “a decree, decision”), is the attempt of Kranichfeld to vindicate the signification “a request, petition,” for אֲנִי־יְהוָה , which is based on the idea of a petition such as the watchers, as inferior θεοὶ βουλαιοὶ (see on verse 10 [13]), were obliged to address to their superiors, the five planetary gods. But the אֲנִי־יְהוָה appear nevertheless to be advisory deities, inasmuch as they are only אֲנִי־יְהוָה , and not אֲנִי־יְהוָה , and inasmuch as the supreme decision in their college rests, according to verse 21 [24], with the “Most High”

* [Kell, on the other hand, contends that “from ver. 25 the duration of the אֲנִי־יְהוָה cannot at all be concluded, and in chap. vii. 25, and xii. 7, the times are not years. אֲנִי־יְהוָה designates generally a definite period of time, whose length or duration may be very different. “Seven is the ‘measure and signature of the history of the development of the kingdom of God, and of all its factors and phenomena significant for it” (Lammert's Revision of the Biblical or Symbolical Numbers, in the Jahrb. f. deutsche Theol., IX, p. 11), or as Leyser, in Herweg's Reinigungsk., XVIII, p. 398, expresses himself, ‘the signature for all the action of God, in judgment and in mercy, punishments, expiations, consecrations, blessings, consecrated with the economy of redemption, perfecting themselves in time.’ Accordingly, ‘seven times’ is the duration of the divine punishment which was decreed against Nebuchadnezzar for purposes connected with the history of redemption. Whether these times are to be understood as years, months, or weeks is not said, and cannot at all be determined. The supposition that they were seven years ‘cannot well be adopted in opposition to the circumstance that Nebuchadnezzar was again restored to reason, a thing that very rarely occurs, after so long a continuance of psychical disease’ (J. B. Friedrich, Ev. Bibl. Naturhist., anthrop. u. med. Fragmente, I, p. 316).” This last argument, however, is of little force, in view of the evidently mischievous, or at least specially providential, character of the entire event. “C. B. Michaelis, Gesenius, Roßmüller, Winer, Lengerke, and nearly all the critics agree that year is the probable meaning.”—Stuart. The supposed difficulty of the management of the empire during a long period of the king's incapacity is fairly disposed of by Stuart, by a reference to Berosus, who states that on Nebuchadnezzar's return to his capital, after his protracted absence during his wars in Western Asia, upon his father's death, “he took upon himself the affairs which had been managed by the Chaldees [Magi], and the royal authority which had been preserved for him by their chief” (Josephus, Antiq., X, 11, 1.) Geo. Rawlinson was inclined to find a trace of this interruption of Nebuchadnezzar's government in the period of four years' inactivity noted in his annals (Historical Evidence, p. 137) on the “Standard Inscription” (Herodotus, II, 436); but he has since doubted the reference (Five Monarchs, III, 60).]

(אֱלֹהִים). Cf. the representation of a great subordinate council of the Deity as composed of angels in 1 Kings xxii. 19 et seq.; Job ii. 1 et seq.; and also, with reference to the specifically Babylonian idea of a decision in the council of the deity, Diodor. ii. 80: οἱ δούτοις Χαλδαῖοι — φάσιν τὴν τῶν ὕλων τάξιν καὶ διακόσμησιν θεῶν τινὶ προνοίᾳ γεγενῆσθαι, καὶ νῦν ἕκαστα τῶν ἐν οὐρανῷ γινόμενων οὐχ ὥς ἐτυχεν οὐδ' αὐτομάτως, ἀλλ' ὠρισμένην τινὶ καὶ βεβαίως κεκυρωμένην θεῶν κρίσει συντελεῖσθαι; further, the familiar picture near Kazwini, which represents Bel as a judge and surrounded by genii (Ges., on Isa., ii. 337). Before אֱלֹהִים, “a decree,” the instrumental בְּ must be supplied from the preceding. The variation אֱלֹהִים is, therefore, correctly supplied in the interpretation.—To the intent that the living may know that the Most High ruleth, etc. אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ is to be rendered, either “until, to the circumstance, that” = “until that” (donec, Vulg.), or, with Hitzig, in harmony with chap. ii. 80, and with the ἵνα γινώσκω of Theodotus, אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ, “to the end that.” The latter may perhaps be preferred, because of the ease of mistaking אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ for אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ, and because of the fact that אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ does not occur elsewhere.* Verse 22 [25], which directly substitutes אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ for the אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ of this verse, shows that Nebuchadnezzar, the ruler of the earth, is not excluded from the number of the “living” who are to recognize the authority of the Most High, but rather, that he especially is included.—And setteth up (rather, “can set up”) over it the basest of men. אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ, “the humblest of men,” is grammatically a general conception conveying the idea of the superlative, as in 2 Chron. xxi. 17, the Heb. אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ; cf. Winer, Chald. Gramm., § 58, 2. The assertion of Hitzig, that by this humblest of men, an Israelite, or even the Israelitish Messiah (אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ, chap. vii. 18), is designated as successor to the great world-monarch, is without support from the context. The thought of a person of the lowest rank, rather, was naturally suggested to the mind of the dreaming king, because the fall of himself, the most exalted man, was concerned.—For the opinion that the imperfects אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ and אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ in this place express the idea of ability—“is able to confer, can exalt”—cf. chap. ii. 47, where אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ also designates that Being who is able to reveal secrets. [—“The Kethib אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ is shortened from אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ, and in the Keri is yet further shortened by the rejection of the ר; cf. chap. v. 21; vii. 4 sq., etc.”—Keil.]

have seen. The demonstrative הַזֶּה is placed first for emphasis, thus corresponding to the disturbing and exciting subject of the dream. The predicative rendering, “This is the dream, which,” etc., is opposed by the rule that the relative cannot be omitted after the designated noun (Winer, § 41, 4).—Declare the interpretation thereof. אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ, is a softened form for אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ, “its interpretation,” in this place, v. 16 [19], and chap. v. 8. This view is confirmed by the Peshito, while Theodotus and the Vulgate have אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ, which reading is still represented among moderns, e.g., by Hitzig.—On the close of the verse, cf. 6 [9].

Verses 16–24 [19–27]. The interpretation. Then Daniel was astonished for (about) one hour. On the reading אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ instead of אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ, cf. Winer, § 25, 2. Several MSS. have אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ instead of אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ, but this reading conflicts with the usage of the context, and also with the testimony of the ancient translators (Theodot., Vulg., Syr., and probably with the Sept.). Concerning the etymology of אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ, “hour,” which is certainly to be taken here in the literal sense, cf. on chap. iii. 6.* That the astonished gazing of Daniel continued “about an hour,” is mentioned by the author from a motive (viz., in order to indicate the greatness of his astonishment) similar to that from which the book of Job records the sympathetic mourning and silence of the three friends during seven days (Job ii. 18). Hitzig observes correctly: “He meditates on the interpretation, and is astonished when he perceives it, because he wishes well to the king, and probably, also, because Nebuchadnezzar might receive the prophecy ungraciously, and might take vengeance on him (as Ahab did on Micaiah, 1 Kings xxii. 26, 27). His confusion is depicted on his countenance; which causes the king to observe that he has found the interpretation, and to invite him in encouraging terms to impart it freely.” It cannot really be comprehended how it is possible, in the face of so unsought-for, and, in itself, probable a historical situation, to establish the hypothesis of a conventional forgery in the Maccabean age.—[“That Nebuchadnezzar (ver. 16 [19]) in his account speaks in the third person does not justify the conclusion either that another spoke of him, and that thus the document is not genuine (Hitzig), nor yet the conclusion that this verse includes a historical notice introduced as an interpolation into the document; for similar forms of expression are often found in such documents; cf. Ezra vii. 13–15; Esth. viii. 7, 8.”—Keil.]—My lord, the dream be to them that hate thee, and the interpretation thereof to thine enemies! i.e., Would that the dream concerned thine enemies, and that its interpretation related

* [Keil, however, justly claims that “the change of אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ to אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ is unnecessary and arbitrary. The expression is general, because it is not yet said who is to be understood by the tree that is to be cut down. This general expression is in reality correct; for the king comes by experience to this knowledge, and so all will attain to it who consider this.”]

* [Keil, however, insists that the term here means “as it were an instant, a moment.” But so brief a delay would seem altogether insignificant, and could have excited little surprise, or called for any urging on the part of the king. Stuart, on the other hand, regards so long a hesitation as an hour as “very improbable,” and therefore adduces the derivation of אֲדַרְכֶּנּוּ (a look, Germ. augenblick, Heb. רִצְצָה) as favoring the signification an instant; and in this interpretation Geesinus and Fürst both coincide.] to thy foes rather than to thee! Instead of the Kethib מִן־אֵל (a regular formation from מִן־אֵל , chap. ii. 47; v. 23), the Keri has, here and in v. 21 [24], the shorter form מִן־אֵל , which corresponds to the usage of the later Chaldee. The following וְיָ , "an enemy," is likewise peculiar to the pre-targumistic Chaldee.—Verse 17 [20]. The tree that thou sawest, which grew, and was strong; rather, "of which thou sawest that it was great and strong." The second וְיָ is subordinated to the first in וְיָ וְיָ , and is therefore to be rendered as a conjunction, not as a relative pronoun coordinated with the first. The ensuing description of the tree, in vs. 17 and 18 [20 and 21], and likewise of the Divine sentence of judgment pronounced on it in v. 20 [23], are repeated verbally from vs. 7 and 13 [10 and 16], although with abbreviations and unessential variations.—Verse 19 [22]. It is thou, O king, that art grown and become strong, etc.; i.e., "that art become great and strong." The following $\text{וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ רִבָּה}$, etc., is loosely connected with the relative clause $\text{וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ}$. The Keri offers the smoother form וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ instead of וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ , and in the following, the third pers. fem. מִסָּחָה instead of מִסָּחָה ; cf. also v. 21 [24].—Concerning the remarkable addition by the Sept. to v. 19 [22], cf., e.g., Eth.-fund. principles, No. 3 [below].—Verse 21 [24]. This is the interpretation (of it), O king;—the conclusion to the lengthy antecedent clause, v. 20 [23].—And this is the decree of the Most High which is come (determined) upon my lord the king. In regard to עַל מִסָּחָה , cf. the Heb. עַל מִסָּחָה , Gen.

xxxiv. 27; Job ii. 11. The preterite מִסָּחָה represents the decree as already decided on, and, therefore, as unavoidable, and certain to be executed on the king.—Verse 23 [25]. They shall drive thee from men, literally, "and thee shall they drive," etc. The וְיָ in וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ is consecutive: "and thus shall they drive thee." The impersonal active מִן־אֵל is exactly similar to מִן־אֵל , chap. iii. 4, and infra, v. 28 [31]. The agents of the punishment, who are not designated, are the inferior angels, as with וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ , v. 13 [16], and as in v. 28 [31].*—Verse 23 [26]. And whereas they commanded to leave the stump of the tree roots; "they" = the heavenly watchers, of whom one only spoke, vs. 10-14 [13-17]; but that one was the representative of the entire community of angels.—Thy kingdom shall (again) be sure unto thee, after that thou shalt have known, etc. וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ neither signifies "to continue" (Theodotion, Vulg., Dereser, von Lengerke, etc.), nor "to be preserved" (Bertholdt), but rather, "to arise, stand, be firm," and here, in view of the context, "to again be firm" (Hitz., Kranichf.). מִן־אֵל in this place is not inferential—"since, because,"—as in chap. iii. 23, but instead relates to time, "as soon as," and designates a juncture following the period included in וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ , vs. 21, 29 [24, 32]—hence at the close of the seven years.—That the heavens do rule, viz.: over the kingdoms of men, cf. vs. 14 [17] and 23 [25]. "The heavens" is here used to designate God, instead of "the Most High." The expression must be regarded as an abbreviation of the phrase "the God of heaven," which was employed on former occasions (chap. ii. 18, 37, 44), or of "the King of heaven" (iv. 34), which is synonymous with the former, or also of "the Lord of heaven" (v. 23). There is nothing untheocratic and polytheistic in the expression, even though the Chinese designate their god as heaven, and though the same usage prevailed among the ancient Persians (Herod. i. 131), the Greeks ($\text{Zeis} = \text{Sanscr. } \text{śūas, "heaven"}), and the Romans ($\text{Deus} = \text{Divus, Jovis, etc.}.$). Even in the New Testament the $\text{βασιλεια τῶν οὐρανῶν}$ is identical with the βασιλ. τοῦ θεοῦ , and the Talmudists (e.g., Nedarim, IX. 10; X. 12, etc.; Buxtorf, Lex. Chalk., col. 2440), as well as the Jews of a much earlier period (according to Juvenal, Sat., XIV. 96 et seq., and Diodorus in Photius, Bibl., XI.), generally designated God directly as "heaven," indicating thereby that they attributed to Him the sole dominion over the heavenly world, and denied that other gods were associated with Him (cf. Psa. cxv. 16).—Verse 24 [27]. Wherefore, O king, let my counsel be acceptable unto thee. וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ , "wherefore," as in$ chap. ii. 6. In regard to וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ , cf. on chap. iii. 32. The term is here construed with עַל , as in that passage and chap. vi. 2, with וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ , by which the persuasiveness of the remarks is increased (cf. וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ with עַל , Ezra v. 17), and by which the desire of Daniel to aid the king, if possible, in averting the impending danger and punishment, becomes more apparent than would be the case if the more courteous phrase וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ had been employed. From this truly theocratic standpoint, the prophet persists in holding it possible to turn aside the punishment threatened in the dream, similar to Isaiah (xxxviii. 1 et seq.) and Jeremiah (xviii. 7 et seq.) in analogous cases; cf. Joel ii. 12 et seq.; Am. vii. 3, 6; Jonah iii. 5 et seq.; 2 Kings xx. 1 et seq.*—And break off thy sins by righteousness; rather, "purchase thy deliverance from thy sins," etc. The ancient translators justly regard וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ as plural; cf. the parallel וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ . The suffix in וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ , instead of וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ , is defective, similar to that in וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ , chap. v. 10. The word is derived from the Stat. emphat. וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ of a singular וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ (=

* [We prefer to say, with Kell, that "the indefinite plur. form וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ stands instead of the passive, as the following

וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ and וְיָבֹהֵבֶנְךָ , cf. under chap. III. 4. Thus the subject remains altogether indefinite, and one has neither to think of men who will drive him from their society, etc., nor of angels, of whom perhaps the expulsion of the king may be predicated, but scarcely the feeding on grass and being wet with dew."]

* ["Daniel knew nothing of a heathen Fatum, but he knew that the judgments of God were directed against men according to their conduct, and that punishment threatened could only be averted by repentance."—Kell.]

Heb. פָּרַק, cf. Olshausen, Lehrb., p. 288).—

פָּרַק, properly "to break" (cf. Sanscr. prāk, Lat. frango, Germ. brechen), designates, similar to the Heb. פָּרַק in passages like Psa. cxxvi. 24; Sam. v. 8, etc., a "tearing out" of a matter from its former position or relations, and hence, a "liberating, redeeming, or purchase" (cf. 2 Sam. vii. 23; Isa. xxxv. 9, 10, where פָּרַק is used for נָצַח or פָּדָה, exsolvere, redimere). The Sept. and Theodot. therefore render it correctly by λύτρωσαι, the Vulg. redime, and Syr., Saad., Ibn-Ezra, Berth., de Wette, Hitzig, etc., in a similar manner. On the other hand, Baashi, Geier, Starke, Dereser, Hävernicks, von Lengerke, Kranichfeld, etc., prefer the idea of casting off, casting away, as it is found in Gen. xxvii. 40, and accordingly interpret: "lay off thy sins" (Häv.), or "break off thy sins, give them up" (Kranichfeld). But in the usage of the Chaldean language, and especially in that of the Targums, פָּרַק constantly and undeniably bears the sense of redeeming by purchase (e.g., a birthright, a field, the daughter of Jephthah, Judg. xi. 35); and the rather broad conception, admitting, as it does, of an application to many and diverse relations, by no means requires that the object to be redeemed should be desirable to the purchaser, and possess value for him. Rather, the remark of von Hofmann (Schriftbeweis, I. 519) is correct: "The sins are not under restraint, but, instead, they enslave. The idea of Daniel, therefore, is that the king should deliver himself from the sins that involve him in guilt and slavery, by practising righteousness and mercy for the future, instead of persisting in the arbitrary and tyrannical course to which he had hitherto been addicted." * Cf. Melancthon also, in the Apology (Art. III, p. 112), where the "redime" of the Vulgate is retained, but the supposed interpretation is decidedly rejected, as favoring the doctrines of work-righteousness insisted on by the Jewish and Roman Catholic exegesis (see Eth.-fund. principles, etc., No. 2 [below]). This interpretation, however, does not result from any possible rendering of the imper. פָּרַק, but from the incorrect explanation of פָּרַק by "doing good, alms," which is found in numerous expositors, from Jerome to Hitzig; and the latter rendering is not justified, either by Psa. cxxvii. 21, nor by a comparison with extravagant laudations of works of mercy in Eccles. iii. 28; xxix. 12; Tob. iv. 10; xii. 9, etc. The only interpretation of פָּרַק allowed by the context and general usage is "righteous deportment" to be observed by the king toward his subjects, in contrast with his former tyranny and arbitrary domination. In the parallel member, "mercy toward the poor" is intimately connected with this, as being the second leading virtue in rulers, which virtue the king is exhorted to cultivate (cf. Hofm., as above). The historical situation, rather than the usage, indicates that, in connection herewith, the פָּרַק are to be sought for principally in the number of the poor Israelites, the theocratically wretched (פָּרַקִים), who were languishing in exile and captivity. The usage would admit of a different rendering of the פָּרַק. *—If it may be a lengthening of thy tranquility; rather, "if thy prosperity shall be durable." This is the external motive addressed to the king, to induce him to heed the warning of the theocratic seer. The conditional language is very decided; וְ, "if," is no more to be taken in the dubious sense of ei apa (Acts viii. 22) in this passage than in chap. iii. 17.—פָּרַק is not "forbearance, forgiveness," but "duration, continuance;" cf. Jer. xv. 15; Eccl. viii. 12.

Verses 25-30 [28-35]. The fulfilment. All this came upon the king Nebuchadnezzar. Hävernicks regards these words as still belonging to the royal proclamation, while all that follows, to v. 30 [33], is a parenthesis inserted by the prophet (see supra, on chap. iii. 31). But this hypothesis renders it impossible to observe unity of the report, which must obviously be preserved, since the theocratic coloring apparent in these verses may elsewhere be frequently noticed (supra), and since a detailed statement of the infliction of the threatened punishment is required in order to give point to the report. This does not make it inconceivable that Daniel, the writer of the report as a whole, should in this connection relegate the royal subject, who had hitherto been spoken of in the first person, to the background, and that he should describe the Divine judgment executed on the king from his own theocratic point of view.†—Verse 26

* [Daniel prudently alludes to the king's moral obliquities only in general terms. Implicitly was doubtless his most heinous offence (see verses 27 [30], 37 [40]), and compare chap. v. 23, 28), and it was indeed his failure to remember Jehovah, whom he had once been brought to recognize (chap. iii. 28), that bred and fostered his heaven-insulting arrogance. Yet Daniel doubtless hinted also at some special sins of Nebuchadnezzar as a wilful despot. Stuart thinks "he means to designate his capricious and tyrannical behavior on some occasions when he fell into a rage; perhaps also to remind him of the heavy hand that pressed on all the captives whom he had led into exile" and still retained. This last seems especially probable from the particulars specified immediately.]

† [Kell thus aptly refutes the view of Bertholdt, Hitzig, and others, who "find here that the author falls out of the role of the king into the narrative tone, and thus betrays the fact that some other than the king framed the edict. But this conclusion is opposed by the fact that Nebuchadnezzar from ver. 31 [34] speaks of his recovery again in the first person. Thus it is beyond doubt that the change of person has its reason in the matter itself. Certainly it could not be that in this Nebuchadnezzar thought it unbecoming to speak in his own person of his madness: for, if he had had so tender a regard for his own person, he would not have published the whole occurrence in a manifesto addressed to his subjects. But the reason of his speaking of his madness in the third person, as if some other one were narrating it, lies simply in this, that in that condition he was not Ich = Ego (Kiefoth). With the return of the Ich, I, on his recovery from his madness, Nebuchadnezzar begins again to narrate in the first person."]

* [This interpretation of פָּרַק, however, is hardly satisfactory, for, as Kell urges, it "means to break off, to break in pieces, hence to separate, to disjoin, to put at a distance, see under Gen. xxi. 40. And though in the Targums פָּרַק is used for נָצַח, פָּדָה, to loosen, to unbend, of redeeming, ransoming the first-born, an inheritance, or any other valuable possession, yet this use of the word by no means accords with sins as the object, because sins are not goods which one redeems or ransoms so as to retain them for his own use." Rosenmüller likewise notes this incongruity, and adduces Exod. xxxii. 2, as an instance, where Onkelos retains the word in the sense of breaking off (the earrings). He even declares that "Chaldee writers employ פָּרַק simply for laying aside as in Num. i. 51."]

[29]. At the end of twelve months he walked upon (marg.) the palace of the kingdom of Babylon; rather, "the royal palace at Babylon." In relation to the time indicated, "at the end of twelve months," Kranichfeld observes: "When the important incident of the dream was a year old, and on that account its recollection naturally exercised the imagination of the king with special force, he gave himself up, despite the Divine warning, to the proudest exaltation of self, which indicated that he was neither controlled by religious piety in general, nor by reverence for the God of the Jews in particular," etc. It appears to us that this is seeking too much in that designation of time. It is simply a historical circumstance that exactly twelve months elapsed between the dream and its fulfilment, and at the same time an illustration of the simple accuracy and concrete truth of the narrative.* — "Upon the royal palace," i.e., upon its flat roof; cf. 2 Sam. xi. 2. The proud king, who has employed the respite of twelve months in nursing his tyrannical superciliousness, instead of improving it by repenting and working righteousness, wishes, by actual observation from this elevated spot, to assure himself of the condition of his royal power, and to feast himself with looking on the gigantic metropolises of the world which he had created. His thoughts are similar to those of another, in Schiller's Glocke (the Bell):

"The splendor of the house
Stands firm as earth's foundations
Against the power of evil," etc.

The "walking along" (מִלְכָּךְ; cf. מִלְכָּךְ; cf. בְּנִי, v. 34 [37]) likewise indicates his conceited arrogance and pride; cf. the Germ. "einherstolzen" (strutting along).—The mention of the location, "at Babylon," does not at all compel the assumption of a Palestinian origin of the book, or of any particular part of it, as even Hitzig acknowledges. It merely indicates that the author was not a constant resident in the city of Babylon, and that his narrative was composed for readers who were chiefly, or without exception, strangers in Babylon (however long they might have been detained in that city against their will). These features are suited to the view that Daniel was the writer of the document before us, as thoroughly as they militate against the idea that Nebuchadnezzar was its immediate author; cf. supra, on chap. iii. 31.†—Verse 27 [30]. Is not this (the) great Babylon that I have built, etc. "The great" (גָּדוֹל) was evidently a standing title of Babylon, with its circumference of 480 stadia (Herod.

i. 191), its colossal walls, its 25 gates on either side of the immense square, its 676 districts filled with houses of several stories each, its hanging gardens on the Euphrates, its gigantic temples and palaces, etc. Cf. Herod., i. c.; Diodor. ii. 5 et seq.; Aristotle's Polit., III. 2; Philostratus, i. 18; Curtius, VI. 1 et seq.; also Starke's Synopsis on this passage; Wattenbach, Ninove und Babylon (Heidelberg, 1868); and Alfred Maury, Ninove et Babylone, in the Revue des deux Mondes, 1868, March 15, p. 470 ss.; [also Rawlinson's Five Ancient Monarchies, I. 510 et seq.]. For this reason many other authors apply the predicate ἡ μεγάλη to that city; e.g., the Apocalyptic John, Rev. xiv. 8; xvi. 19 (cf. also Isa. xiii. 19; xiv. 4; xlvii. 3, 4); and Strabo (l. xvi.), who applies to it the stanza: ἐρημία μεγάλη ἐστὶν ἡ μεγάλη πόλις, cf. Pausanias, Arceid., p. 509, who describes Babylon as a city ἣντινα εἶδε πόλεω τῶν τότε μεγίστην ἤλκος. Nebuchadnezzar's Babylon might certainly be designated as "the great city" with as much propriety as formerly Nineveh (cf. Gen. x. 11, 12; Jonah i. 2; iii. 2; iv. 11), and far more justly than, e.g., Hamath (see Amos vi. 2; חֲמַת רַבָּה), or Diospolis (Διόσπολις ἡ μεγάλη, Inscr. 4717), or Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamos, Nicomedia, and other cities of a later period in Asia Minor (cf. Rheinwald, Komment. zum Br. an die Philipper, p. 3 et seq.).—That I have built for the house (or seat) of the kingdom. The A. V. is literal. The expression is equivalent, in modern idiom, to "the royal capital and seat of government." The מְלִכְךָ of the whole empire was to have its seat, its residence, in that metropolis (Kranichf.). Cf. the reference to Bethel as a מְלִכְךָ, in Am. vii. 13. "That I have built;" i.e., that I have developed and completed. On בָּנָה, otherwise בָּנָה, in this signification, cf. 2 Kings xiv. 22; 2 Chron. xi. 5, 6; and see the Chaldean historians Berosus, Abydenus, and Megasthenes, in Josephus, Ant., X. 11, 1; c. Apion, I. 19; and in Eusebius, Chron., I. 59, with reference to the numerous edifices erected in Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar; also Bochart, Phaleg, p. 263 et seq., where Nebuchadnezzar's services in beautifying the city and increasing its architectural greatness are compared with those of Augustus in Rome, which justified his well-known remark, "se marmoream relinquere, quam lateritium accepisset" (Suetonius, Aug., c. 29).*—For the honor of my majesty; לִיכָר הַדָּר; cf. the similar constructions in Deut. v. 33, 17; Zech. xi. 13; and with reference to the preceding expression, "by the might of my power," cf. passages like Isa. xl. 26; Eph. i. 19; Col. i. 11, etc.—Verse 28 [31]. While the word was in the king's mouth. The Divine punishment follows closely after the vain and presumptuous exclamation (cf. Isa. xxviii. 4); exactly as in the poem by Schiller quoted above, where it is added:

* [Abundant confirmation has been found of these enlargements and reconstructions of the edifices of Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar in the excavations carried on there by Botta, Layard, and others. Most of the ancient bricks are stamped with the name of that monarch. See Rawlinson's Herodotus, I. 412 (Am. ed.).]

* [Kell will have it that "עָנָה here means not simply to begin to speak, but, properly, to answer, and suggests to us a foregoing colloquy of the king with himself in his own mind." He prudently retrains, however, from inferring that Nebuchadnezzar was thinking of the very dream in question at the time.]

† [Rather, as Kell suggests, "the addition at Babylon does not indicate that the king was then living at a distance from Babylon, as Berth., von Leng., Maurer, and others imagine, but is altogether suitable to the matter, because Nebuchadnezzar certainly had palaces outside of Babylon; but it is made with reference to the language of the king which follows regarding the greatness of Babylon."]

"For no eternal bond can be
With the fates that rule our destiny,
And misfortune's pace is swift."—

There fell a voice from heaven. Observe the agreement between the prophetic description in the dream, vs. 10 [13] and 11 [14], and the fulfilment twelve months later. The words נָחַם

נָחַם, which are employed in the former passage, are here echoed by נָחַם (cf. Isa. ix. 7), which still more strongly emphasizes the suddenness with which the judicial sentence is promulgated; and נָחַם in that place is here repeated by the characteristic נָחַם, which recalls the analogies in Deut. iv. 33, 36; Matt. iii. 17; John xii. 28; Acts ix. 4; x. 13, etc. The record, although sufficiently circumstantial, is but a summary, and affords no trustworthy indications to show whether this φωνή ἐξ οὐρανοῦ was produced by the mediation of psychological or of physical causes. The leading fact to be observed is merely that the powerfully excited king was compelled to recollect the warning formerly conveyed in the dream, by what he now heard, whether by a purely subjective mode of perception, or whether objective agencies were at the same time employed.—O king Nebuchadnezzar, to thee it is spoken; The kingdom is departed from thee. The perf.

נָחַם is employed, because he who was degraded to the level of the brute by the most fearful of mental maladies, was at once and directly incapacitated for his position and office as ruler as a matter of course. In regard to נָחַם, "they say," see on v. 22 [25]; concerning v. 29 [32] see ibid., and on v. 14 [17].—Verse 30 [33] The same hour (hence immediately; cf. on chap. iii. 6) was the thing (or word) fulfilled upon Nebuchadnezzar. נָחַם, literally, "came to end;" for the end of a prophecy is its coming to pass, by which it ceases to be prophecy (Hitzig; cf. Hitzig, chap. xii. 7; Ezra i. 1. etc.—Concerning the lycanthropy of Nebuchadnezzar, see Intro., § 8, note 1, and the literature there adduced.—Till his hairs were grown like eagles' feathers, and his nails like birds' claws; literally, "like eagles—like birds" (נָחַם—נָחַם), a comparatio compendiaris, with which the Stat. const. after the particle of comparison has been omitted, as with נָחַם in v. 13 [16], and as in Isa. ix. 3; Joshua v. 36, and also in the classics (e.g., Il., 17, 51; Juvenal, Sat. 4, 71, etc.).

Verses 31–34 [34–37]. The restoration of Nebuchadnezzar, and his ascription of praise to God. And (rather "but") at the end of the days, i.e., of the period of seven years, vs. 13, 22, 29 [16, 25, 32].—I . . . lifted up mine eyes unto heaven, namely, as seeking help from thence, as supplicating the God of heaven (see on v. 23 [26]; cf. Psa. cxxiii. 1 et seq.; xxv. 5, etc.).—And mine understanding returned unto me; or, taking the ו as illative, "so that mine understanding returned." The prayer of the hitherto maniac king was thus shown to be anything rather than a "flagrant inconsequence," as Von Lengerke, Hitzig, and others characterize it. On the contrary, it produced the beneficial effect of delivering the penitent king from his disease, and of restoring him to the society and the mode of life of civilized people. Cf. Pusey and Kranichfeld on this passage, in relation to the inclination to prayer, or to other religious manifestations and observances, which has frequently been observed in the case of maniacs afflicted with lycanthropy. In the case before us, where the period of insanity and punishment imposed by God had, at any rate, expired, the prayerful looking up to heaven by the humbled king could not possibly result in less than the elevation of the sufferer from his brutal condition to manhood—from the state of one lying helplessly on the ground, and looking earthward in his debasement, to the dignity and bearing of man, who is formed in the image of God, that is to say, to the normal form of man, of which Ovid sings (Metam., I. 85 ss.):

"Pronaque cum spectent animalia cætera terram
Os hominis sublimè dedit, culumque videre
Jussit, et erectos ad sidera tollere vultus."—

And I praised and honored him that liveth forever. Cf. vi. 27; xii. 7; and also, in relation to the latter half of the verse, chap. iii. 33. ["The first thought he entertained was to thank God, to praise him as the ever-living One, and to recognize the eternity of His sway. Nebuchadnezzar acknowledges and praises God as the 'ever-living One,' because He had again given to him his life, which had been lost in his madness."—Keil.]—Verse 32 [35]. And all the inhabitants of the earth are (to be) reputed as nothing, that is, "in comparison to Him." The partic. נָחַם must be regarded in this place as the part. fut. pass., and is not, therefore, to be explained (in analogy with Isa. xl. 17) by, "are reputed as nothing by Him" (Hävern., Kranichf., etc.). ["The eternity of the supremacy of God includes His omnipotence as opposed to the weakness of the inhabitants of earth" (Keil).] נָחַם instead of נָחַם may be regarded as the error of a copyist, who thought to correct a supposed נָחַם (that is, נָחַם) by substituting נָחַם.

Or "לֹא for לֵא, is an archaism, conforming to the pregnant character of the negation, similar to לֹא for לֵא, Deut. iii. 11" (Kranichf.). [The final ו seems to be a mere Chaldaic interchange for א in the ordinary נָחַם, as not.] The rabbinical assertion, found in Rashi and Saadia, that לֵא signifies "an atom of solar dust," is at all events to be rejected.—And he doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, etc. Cf. Isa. xxiv. 21, a passage that evidently lies at the foundation of the one before us, in which "the host on high" presents the same idea as is contained in "the army of heaven" in this place. Both refer to the innumerable companies of angels who inhabit heaven (Gen. xxxii. 2 et seq.; Heb. xii. 22 et seq.; cf. Dan. vii. 10).—And none can . . . say unto him, what doest thou? Cf. Isa. xliii. 13; and in relation to the phrase, "to stay one's hand —

* [This raising of his eyes to heaven was "the first sign of the return of human consciousness; from which, however, we are not to conclude, with Hitzig, that before this, in his madness, he went on all-fours like an ox."—Keil.]

to oppose him," see the Targ. on Eccles. viii. 4; Tr. Sanhedr., c. 2; also the Arabic of Hariri, p. 444.*—Verse 33 [36]. And the glory of my kingdom, mine honor, and my brightness returned unto me. The לפני before הִנֵּה serves to introduce that word as a new subject, after the former, הִנֵּה (cf. Isa. xxxii. 1; xxxviii. 16; Psa. lxxxix. 19). הִנֵּה , "station, majesty, dignity," such as is manifested in the look, bearing, and manners of a princely personage. הִנֵּה , "splendor," A. V. "honor" (cf. v. 27 [30]; chap. v. 18), is here contrasted with his former appearance and condition, which denied his royal state, and even his nature as a man, v. 30 [33]. וְיָרַד is properly "brightness," and here refers to the beauty or beaming freshness of the human countenance (cf. chap. v. 6, 9; vii. 23), while הִנֵּה refers more particularly to the splendor of his robes (cf. Psa. cx. 3; xxix. 2; xvi. 9; 2 Chron. xx. 21).—And my counsellors and my lords sought unto me,—they, who had formerly avoided and deserted me! That בְּחִינָה signifies a search for one who is believed to have disappeared without leaving a trace by which to discover him, is an assumption made by Hitzig and also by a number of earlier expositors, such as Geier, Michaelis, Bertholdt, etc., which, however, is without any support whatever. The expression rather designates "a search conducing to the honor of the king, which was instituted by his former counsellors and magnates in their capacity as the council of the regency during the interim, for the purpose of officially requesting the king on his restoration to health, to resume the control of the government." The terms הַדְּבָרִים (see on iii. 24) and הַדְּבָרִים do not, however, designate different subjects, but the same ones with reference to their several powers and dignities; cf. שָׁר וְגִדּוֹל , 2 Sam. iii. 28; $\mu\epsilon\gamma\alpha\varsigma \kappa\alpha\iota \delta\upsilon\sigma\tau\alpha\sigma\eta\varsigma$, Job. ix. 22.—And I was (again) established in my kingdom. $\text{וַחֲקִנֵּיתִי$ instead of וַחֲקִנֵּיתִי , because of the following accent. distinct.—And excellent majesty was added unto me; "I received still greater power" than I had formerly enjoyed; cf. Job xiii. 10. There are no historical authorities to show in what the additional power consisted which came to Nebuchadnezzar toward the end of his life; but the truth of this statement cannot on that account be questioned.—Verse 34 [37]. Now (or therefore) I, Nebuchadnezzar, praise, and extol, and honor, etc. By this doxology the close of the royal proclamation returns to the thought of the introduction, chap. iii. 32 et seq.—All whose (rather, "for all His") works are truth, and his ways judgment. וְכָשֶׁלֶט , literally "firmness, immutability," and hence, "faithfulness, truth" (= Heb. אֱמֻנָה). וְדִין , literally "judgment," procedure strictly conformed to justice (= Heb. מִשְׁפָּט); cf. Jer. ix. 23; xxii. 13.—And those that walk in pride, he is able to abase. Cf. Isa. x. 33; xiii. 11; xxv. 11; 1 Sam. ii. 7; Psa. xviii. 28; Luke i. 51 et seq.—In relation to the enlargement of this doxology of Nebuchadnezzar which is found in the Sept. in this place, see the Eth.-fund principles, etc., No. 3 [below].

ETHICO-FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES RELATED TO THE HISTORY OF SALVATION, APOLOGETICAL REMARKS, AND HOMILETICAL SUGGESTIONS.

According to the remarks on chap. iii. 81 [iv. 1], the authorship of this section is divided between Nebuchadnezzar and Daniel, with the distinction that the former is conceived as the moral originator and ordainer of the edict, while the latter is its writer. But, at the same time, both the heathen king and the theocratic prophet are so exclusively the active (or suffering) characters of the narrative, that every observation of dogmatic or apologetical importance must be derived from the conduct of one or the other of these two persons. We therefore direct our attention

1. To Nebuchadnezzar,—with reference to whose seizure by lycanthropic mania, as being credible on general grounds, and also as being attested by extra-biblical authorities, the necessary explanation has been given in the Intro. (§ 8, note 1). We now direct attention to the act of profound self-abasement which the king performed by publishing, of his own impulse, a report respecting his protracted disease of several years' duration, and also respecting its causes and his final cure. This involves no improbability on psychological, political, or religious grounds. (1.) From a psychological point of view, the report became necessary, because a spirit of repentance and of sincere self-abasement had really come over the proud monarch, and because he had been led to recognize with all emphasis that the humiliation, as wearisome as it was deeply painful to his consciousness, was a righteous punishment inflicted on him by the only true God, even though a genuine, durable, and fruit-bearing conversion might not have been accomplished in his case. On the nature of this sincere and profoundly realized humiliation of the king, which, however, was inadequate to secure his admission to a gracious state, or to formal membership in the congregation of God's people under the Old Covenant, cf. Calvin on chap. iv. 34: "Hic est modus omnis humiliationis; sed careret profectu illa humiliatio, nisi Dominus postea regeret nos spiritu mansuetudinis. Et ita Nebuchadnezzar hic non completitur gratiam Dei, quæ tamen digna erat non vulguri dogio et prædicatione; sed non descriptis etiam in hoc edicto quicquid posset requiri ab homine pio et qui adoctus fuerit diu in schola Dei, sed tamen ostendit se multum profecisse sub Dei ferulis, quum tribuit illi summam potentiam (c. iii. 32, 33; c. iv. 31 ss.), deinde conjungit justitiæ laudem et rectitudinis (c. iv. 34) et esse interea fuletur rorem et testatur justam fuisse penam, quæ divinities irrogata fuit."—(2.) In a political aspect, also, the edict became necessary, since, as appears from v. 33, circumstances required that at the end of the king's illness a proclamation should be issued, certifying that the monarch in person was about to resume the government, and to supersede the regency of the interim, composed of his "counsellors and lords," who had hitherto administered the affairs of the state. The king had no need to dread the effect of such an explanation on his people, even though it involved much that was humiliating to him; but it is by no means recorded that he caused it to be promulgated in the public places and on the streets by the lips of a herald (as was the case with the edict in chap. iii. 4 et seq.), nor even that it was at any time brought into public notice in writing. (3.) Finally, the document involves no considerable difficulty in a religious point of view, inasmuch as the partly heathen and partly Israelitish faith of the Babylonian king, in other words, that syncretism which amalgamated all religions, and which so frequently appears in the history of the rulers of the period of the captivity, is clearly manifested, as has already been shown on chap. iii. 31 [iv. 1]. Accordingly, even Hitzig finds it to be entirely credible that Nebuchadnezzar as a newly or only partially converted person should "acknowledge a god as his god (v. 5), and even other holy gods (vs. 6, 15), in addition to the Highest God." The statement by the same critic that it is strange that "after this stern experience Nebuchadnezzar should not have liberated the Jews, the captive servants of the Highest God, as the history shows he did not," is without any foundation; for, according to chap. iv. 1 compared with vs. 27 and 31, the event did not transpire until near the close of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, and we cannot tell what he would have done had he lived any considerable time after his recovery (which was certainly not the case, according to Berossus, in Josephus, c. Apion, I, 20), nor yet what political relations, combinations, or considerations may have prevented the immediate execution of a plan to restore the Jews to their country, which may already have been prepared.

2. So far as the conduct of Daniel is concerned, the characteristic feature of the two-fold position which he occupied at the Chaldean court as a prophet of Jehovah and chief of the Magians, is prominently exhibited in a manner that affords a highly favorable testimony for the credibility of the narrative as a whole. The Jewish wise man, who is dignified by an honorary office rather than burdened with definite official functions, e. g., with sacerdotal duties, is permitted to be absent at first, on the occasion when the interpreters of dreams or Magians were summoned before the king, because he was allowed a greater freedom of action in general (see on v. 6). It was not, probably, without producing a feeling of profound injury that when he finally appeared the king addressed the servant of the living God (vs. 5, 6) in a thoroughly heathen manner as "Belteshazzar," after the name of his god (i. e., the idol Bel), according to Calvin's just remark, "Non dubium est, quin hoc nomen graviter vulneraverit animum propheta." He did not, however, renounce his allegiance and devotion to the royal personage who was his benefactor, and who, in case he would receive and be guided by the prophet's counsel, might so easily become the benefactor and liberator of the entire people of God. When the king had related to him the dream, so prophetic of misfortune, he gave way to trouble and sympathetic sorrow "about an hour" (v. 16), and the words by which he at length introduced the interpretation, invoked a blessing on the king coupled with the wish that the fate which threatened the monarch might rather overtake his foes. Cf. Calvin again: "Daniel exponit (v. 16), cur ita fuerit attonitus, nempe quia cuperet averti tam horribilem penam a regis persona. Etsi enim merito eum potuit detestari, tamen receritus est potestatem divinitus ei traditam. Discamus igitur exemplo prophetae, bene precari pro inimicis nostris, qui cupiunt nos perdere, maxime vero precari pro tyrannia, si Deo placeat subijci nos eorum libidini;—alioquin non tantum illis, sed etiam Deo ipsi sumus rebelles. Ceterum altera ex parte ostendit Daniel, se non frangi ullo misericordiae affectu, neque etiam moliri, quominus pergat in sua vocatione."—The manner in which Daniel succeeded in uniting the strictest theocratic fidelity towards God with this devotion to his sovereign, is seen partly in the unconcealed directness and the categorical plainness with which he announced the most degrading and humiliating punishment to the king, in v. 22 [25], and partly in the warning or epilogue, v. 24 [27], with which he concluded his interpretation. In this epilogue the fundamental dogmatic and ethical ideas of the entire section concentrate and crowd together in pregnant significance. The exposition of this passage has shown that the course which Daniel here recommends, with a noble frankness and an impressive fervor, is none other than that which should be followed by every pious ruler who is faithful in his office, and in brief, that it comprehends the sum of princely virtues. Hence, those expositors who find that this passage recommends and prescribes work-righteous conduct, and especially the giving of alms, as in itself meritorious, do violence to the words. Such expositors are the Rabbins, who generally ascribe an almost magical virtue to alms-giving; and who press every possible passage of Scripture to support their view, especially those containing the term צדקה, which is by them rendered "well-doing, alms-giving" (cf. Buxtorf, Lex. p. 1,891 et seq.); further, the Roman Catholic exegetes, who are accustomed, since Bellarmine's detailed exposition of this passage (l. II. penitentia, c. 6; cf. l. iv. c. 6), to employ it as one of the principal proof-texts for their anti-evangelical theory of justification and sanctification (in connection with which they declare, of course, that the rendering of the Vulgate: "peccata tua elemosynis redime," is the only correct translation); finally, nearly all the rationalistic expositors, from Griesinger and Bertholdt down to Gesenius, de Wette, and Hitzig, who, while defending the translation by Jerome above referred to, and while referring to apocryphal passages like Eccles. iii. 28; xxix. 12; Tob. iv. 7 et seq.; xii. 9 et seq.; xiv. 10 et seq., endeavor to find here a work-righteous "morality of the later Judaism," and therefore a certain indication of the composition of the book subsequent to the exile. Grotius already pointed out that even on the adoption of the faulty Vulgate exegesis, which makes צדקה equivalent to elemosyna, the passage does not necessarily yield a sense favorable to Pelagianism: "Negue offendere quemquam potest, quod operibus penitentia, in quibus excellunt elemosynas, tribuatur id, quod penitentia proprie convenit; et enim talis metonymia aut synecdoche frequens." Still better Melancthon, in the Apolog. Conf. Aug. art. iii. p. 112 B: "*Non volebat Daniel regem tantum elemosynam largiri, sed totam penitentiam complectitur, quum ait: 'Redime peccata tua elemosynis,' i. e.: redime peccata tua mutatione cordis et operum. Hic autem et fides requiritur Ac verba Danielis in sua lingua clarius de tota penitentia loquuntur et clarius promissionem efferunt: 'Peccata tua per justitiam redime, et iniquitates tuas beneficiis erga pauperes.' Hæc verba præcipiunt de tota penitentia; jubent enim, ut justus fiat, deinde ut bene operetur, ut, quod regia officium erat, miseros aduersus injuriam defendat. Justitia autem est fides in corde," etc. He expresses himself similarly in his comment on the passage (Opp. ed. Bretschneider, vol. xiii. p. 843 ss.), where he pays no attention to the false rendering of פָּדָה in the Vulgate; as does also Calvin in his commentary and the Inst. rel. Chr., III. 4, 31, 36, and among the later Protestant expositors especially Carpoz, De elemosynis Judæorum (in his Apparat. historicus in the Critica Sacra, p. 726 ss.). In all the conduct of Daniel, therefore, as described in this section, nothing can be discovered which is at variance with the proper deportment of a witness to the faith and a highly enlightened seer of the Old Covenant in the presence of a heathen ruler of the world. To this deportment in practical life corresponds also the tone observed by him in the composition, under the king's direction, of the document before us, whose agreement with the theocratic modes of thought and conception has already been pointed out.*

3. In an apologetic respect the disharmony must be noticed, which exists between what might have been expected from the art of a pseudological tendency-writer of Asmonæan times, and the conditions of place and time as indicated in our narrative. A careful and unbiased examination of the document with reference to the conditions of the Maccabæan period, reveals at once how empty and arbitrary is everything that has been said by Bertholdt, Bleek, Von Lengerke, Hitzig, and others, respecting the parenetic aim, calculated for the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, with which they allege it was written. "The sinner Nebuchadnezzar, who was punished for his pride and folly, was a type of the presumptuous Ἐπιφανής, who in like manner sought improper associates, denied the kingly character, and had but recently issued a circular letter, although of an entirely different character." This brief extract from Hitzig (p. 58) contains a whole brood of tendency-critical assumptions and captious perversions of the actual historical facts, based on the erection of false parallels. It is impossible to understand why precisely Nebuchadnezzar, the Chaldean king whose presumption was punished with lycanthropy, should be selected as a type of the proud Selenidæan Ἐπιφανής (cf. 1 Macc. i. 21, 24), when, e.g., Sennacherib (2 Kings xviii. 19), Saul (1 Sam. xvi. 14; xviii. 10 et seq.), or Pharaoh (Ex. 14), would have furnished a far more suitable parallel to the tyrant of the Mac-cabæan period, who was to be punished for presumptuous fury against God, and since, moreover, there is no lack, upon the whole, of historical examples to illustrate the proverb, "A haughty spirit goeth before a fall" (Prov. xvi. 18). The fact recorded by Polybius xxvi. 10 (to which passage Hitzig explicitly refers), that Antiochus Epiphanes was a lover of improper, i.e., immoral, coarse, and riotous gatherings, certainly finds but a clumsy illustration and an exceedingly vague foreshadowing in Nebuchadnezzar's association with the beasts of the field. The analogy is merely superficial, and that to a degree in which it dissolves into incongruity and even absurdity, whenever it is submitted to a careful examination (cf. Kranichf. p. 174 et seq.). With reference to the third parallel, that both tyrants issued circular letters, Hitzig himself concedes that the circular mentioned in 1 Macc. i. 41 et seq. was "really of a nature entirely different" from that of Nebuchadnezzar's edict. The mere fact, therefore, that Nebuchadnezzar addressed a circular to his subjects, convinces him that it was typical of the other fact, that Epiphanes also issued such a document—as if any king whatever could reign but a single year, without publishing some manifesto, or edict, or circular, etc. Hitzig's treatment of chap. iv. 28 [31], (the sentence of Divine punishment denounced on Nebuchadnezzar, "The kingdom is departed from thee"), by which he endeavors to demonstrate the special time in the Maccabæan epoch during which this section originated, results in similar absurdities. He holds that the threat of an immediate overthrow, or rather of a ruin already in progress, clearly indicates that the document was "composed at a time when the Asmonæans had already taken up arms and had gained the upper hand," hence in the period designated in 1 Macc. ii. 42-48; as if any real analogy existed between the punishment of a presumptuous spirit by means of a severe mental disease, and the political and religious revolt of an oppressed nation against their persecutors! and further, as if the syncretistic Chaldean king, who admitted all religions, could by any means be placed in comparison with Antiochus, the fanatically intolerant worshipper of Zeus! How can Nebuchadnezzar, who was exhorted to mercy toward the "poor" (פָּדָה, v. 24 [27]), be brought into parallelism with the Syrian king, who was engaged in an open conflict with the representatives of the Theocracy (i.e., with the armed bands of Israelitish heroes inflamed with rage, who, moreover, could at that time hardly be termed the poor)?—the world-monarch of the captivity, who was punished indeed, but whose punishment led him to repent and be converted, with the incorrigibly hardened and diabolized antichrist upon the throne of the Seleucids, who for that very reason was regarded as hopelessly lost, and as the certain prey of eternal damnation, from a theocratic point of view? And in relation to the conduct of Daniel—where, in the theocratic state, and especially among the apocalyptists of the Maccabæan period who were enthusiasts for God, could a parallel to the prophet of this chapter be found? What servant of Jehovah in that age can be mentioned, who, like our prophet, and in analogy with the course of the Syrian captain Naaman (2 Kings v. 18), would quietly sojourn at the court and in the immediate presence of a heathen ruler; who would have counselled the king in friendship, warned him in loving earnestness, supported and comforted him, as Daniel actually did in his intercourse with the Chaldean monarch, according to the statements of our section? Certain passages of the Talmud, (Hilchot Rozeach, xii. 15; Baba Bathra, f. 4, p. 1) may serve to indicate the kind of description which the Maccabean age would probably have given of the ancient Daniel. It is there asserted that God afterwards punished that prophet, because he had wasted good advice and instruction on the heathen Nebuchadnezzar, such as are found in chap. iv. 24! In addition, cf. the doxology appended by the Sept. to chap. iv. 34, for an illustration of the manner in which that age would have described a Nebuchadnezzar who should actually repent and turn to God. In that passage the restored king is represented as renouncing forever the heathen gods as being utterly powerless, as promising to dedicate himself and his people to the constant service of Jehovah, and as honoring and exulting the Jewish people with excessive praise!—Upon the whole cf. Kranichfeld, p. 170 et seq. and p. 203. See also Ibid., p. 175: "The situation, however, becomes no more conceivable, if, for the purpose of demonstrating the invention of this section as a sketch copied from the circumstances of the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, its composition be placed prior to the armed revolt mentioned in 1 Macc. ii. 42 et seq. and consequently in a time when Antiochus raged in unresisted power against the helpless Jews. In this case it must be allowed indeed, that the writer possessed considerable prophetic gifts, so that even Hitzig ascribes prophecy to him in relation to the final fate of Epiphanes, without characterizing it as prophecy ex eventu. The definite and unconditional prediction concerning the loss of the kingdom by means of force, v. 28 et seq., would thus be fully realized; and likewise that foretelling of a peculiar disease by which he should be brought to a humble recognition of the God of the Jews, even though it were not a disease of the mind (cf. 2 Macc. ix. 5 et seq.). The total desertion to which he was actually exposed during the progress of his disease (cf. 2 Macc. ix. 9) ἐπι ξένῃς ἐν τοῖς ὄρεσιν (ibid. v. 28) would have reflected honor on the prophetic threat of the alleged forger (cf. Dan. iv. 22, 29 et seq.). But besides mistaking the nature of the disease, he has unfortunately erred with reference to the recovery, and on that very account he is compelled, according to Hitzig, to renounce the honor of composing a prophecy after the event had transpired, and that without compensation for the otherwise really wonderful prediction of the three circumstances mentioned above, whose combined fulfillment of itself assuredly deserves the distinguishing attribute of pseudo-prophecy. But there still remains the oracle of chap. iv. 23 [26], an expression on the part of a Jew regarded as a model of the patriot who is jealous because the law of his God is trodden under foot, and which is ambiguous when compared with the circumstances of the period of persecution under Antiochus Epiphanes, and therefore inconceivable in a historical point of view, since that period preceded the armed rising. Moreover, it must seem strange at the least, that the writer should content himself at the time of Epiphanes with assigning such very ordinary limits to the sinfulness and presumptuous pride of Nebuchadnezzar, while the violence done to the sanctuary of Israel is not mentioned with a single word, for instance, in v. 24 [27]; and yet it was this very act which ranked chief in importance in the eyes of Antiochus himself (cf. i. Macc. 21-24, 36 et seq., 44 et seq.; v. 1 et seq.), and which was regarded as the most heinous crime of that tyrant, and as the principal ground for the lamentations of pious Jews in the Maccabean period, as well as of the Divine vengeance visited on him; cf. 1 Macc. ii. 8-13; iii. 55, 51, 58 et seq.; iv. 36 et seq.; vi. 12 et seq. Such a silence in this connection with regard to so scandalous a deed is the more remarkable, since the historical books expressly record the robbery of the sanctuary perpetrated by Nebuchadnezzar, which action was known to our author, according to chap. i. 2; cf. v. 3, as well as to his compatriots. He was not obliged therefore, as a cautious forger, to fear that he should betray his pseudonymity by the mention of the sacred edifice. How greatly the Sept. animated by the spirit and views of the Maccabean time, must have desired to find in the words of Daniel v. 19, a condemnatory mention of the violence done to the temple by Nebuchadnezzar, and how appropriate it would seem to them, may appear from their addition to v. 19, which is certainly significant for the Asmonean period, and for that reason has unjustly been eliminated by Tischendorf without ceremony: ἡρώσθη σοὶ ἡ καρδία ὑπερφανία καὶ ἰσχὺ ὑπὲρ τὰ πρὸς τὸν ἄνθρωπον καὶ τοὺς ἀγγέλους αὐτοῦ. Τὰ ἔργα σου ὡς καὶ καθότι ἐξηγήμωσας τὸν οἶκον τοῦ θεοῦ τοῦ ζώντος ἐπὶ ταῖς ἁμαρτίαις τοῦ λαοῦ τοῦ ἡγιασμένου." —The exact acquaintance of the writer with the architectural condition of Babylon (cf. the exegesis) which is apparent in vs. 26 [29], and 27 [30], and is as unlooked for as it is evident, deserves to be mentioned as a circumstance of especial force as bearing against the hypothesis of a fiction in the interests of a tendency of the Maccabean period. A Maccabean author would scarcely have represented that his typical pseudo-Antiochus was overtaken by a fearful visitation of Divine justice in the form of an unusual disease, while walking on the roof of his own palace and within the limits of his capital. The temptation to let him encounter this fate in the place where Epiphanes succumbed to his, "in a strange land and in the desert," would have been almost irresistible (cf. 2 Macc. ix. 8, 28).

4. Homiletical suggestions.—The features of practical importance in this section are concentrated in v. 24 [27], the same passage in which Daniel's words of exhortation and warning to the king furnish the leading elements of dogmatic significance. Not merely is the counsel of Daniel, recommending the practice of the virtues belonging to a ruler who pleases God, such as the doing of works of righteousness and mercy (cf. supra. No. 2), worthy of notice and of thorough homiletical treatment; but equally so the impulse which constrains and encourages him to venture this exhortation—his faith in the willingness of God to avert the threatened punishment from the king, in case he should repent and be converted while it was yet time; his truly prophetic and theocratic conviction that God might possibly repent of His purpose, on the fulfilment of the proper conditions by the threatened person. In this connection see the prophetic parallels adduced above, and compare the remarks of Jerome on this subject: "Si prædixit sententiam Dei, quæ non potest immutari, quomodo hortatur ad elemosynas et misericordias pauperum, ut Dei sententia commutetur? Quod fucile solitatur Ezechia regis exemplo, quem Isaias dixerat esse moriturum, et Ninivitarum, quibus dictum est: Adhuc quadraginta dies, et Ninive subvertetur. Et tamen ad preces Ezechia et Ninive Dei sententia commutata est; non vanitate iudicii, sed illorum conversione qui meruerunt indulgentiam. Alioquin et in Jeremia loquitur Deus se mala minari super gentem; et si bona fecerit, minas clementia commutare. Rursum bona agenti se asserit polliceri, et si mala fecerit, dicit se mutare suam sententiam; non in homines sed in opera, quæ mutata sunt. Neque enim Deus hominibus, sed vitiiis irascitur; quæ quum in homine non fuerint, nequaquam punit quod mutatum est." Cf. also Melancthon, Calvin, Geier and Starke, on this passage, and further, the expositions of Biblical theologians on the Old-Testament teaching concerning the repentance of God, e.g., Steudel, Theologie des A. Ts., p. 181 et seq.; Hävernicks, Vorles., p. 65 et seq.; F. Majer, Was hat du wider das Alte Testament? (Stuttgart, 1864), p. 118 et seq., and Kling, in Herzog's Real-Encykl., art. Reue, vol. xii. p. 764.—The theme derived from v. 24 [27] might therefore be formulated: "Repent of thy sin, and God will repent of the punishment threatened against thee;" or, "The aim of Divine punishment is the conversion of men; if this be attained, how gladly will He cause the punishment to cease" (Starke); or, "Be ye therefore merciful, as your Father also is merciful" (Luke vi. 36).*

* [“This noble example of manly and Christian fidelity to his sovereign is worthy of all admiration, and of course imitation. Prompted by such manifest love and in manner so respectful to the king, and yet with so much personal dignity, it must have fallen upon the king’s mind with great

Additional points of departure for homiletical discussion and observation are afforded in chap. iii. 31-33 [iv. 1-3], and chap. iv. 31-34 [34-37], the introductory and closing doxologies of the report. These are particularly adapted to serve as points of connection for sermons upon the entire narrative, having the theme, “All the works of God are truth, and His ways judgment” (iv. 34 [37]); or, “Humble yourselves in the sight of God, and He shall lift you up” (Jas. iv. 10); or, “God puts down the mighty from their seats, and exalts them of low degree” (Luke i. 52), etc. Cf. especially what Theodoret observes, on chap. iv. 31: Τοσαύτην ὑφέλειαν ὁ Ναβουχοδονόσορ ἐκ τῶν συμφορῶν ἐδέξατο, ὅτι προφητικῶς περὶ τοῦ θεοῦ καὶ φρονεῖ καὶ φθέγγεται, καὶ ὡς ἐκ συμφορῶν τινὸς ἀπὸ τῆς κρίσεως πάσῃν τῇ ὑμνωδίᾳ ὑψαίνει. Another homiletical text is contained in chap. iv. 3 [6] et seq., on which Cramer (in Starke) observes correctly, “If human wisdom cannot interpret and explain a dream, it is much less able to discover the secrets of God. Human reason should therefore not be permitted to be master in Divine things; for none can know what is in God, except the Spirit of God.” A still further passage of homiletical bearing is chap. iv. 26-30 [29-33], a powerful and awfully impressive illustration of the proverb, “Pride goeth before destruction” (Prov. xvi. 18). Cf. Starke: “When a man permits the time for repentance to pass without a change of disposition, the Divine punishment overtakes him in the midst of his sins. He then learns that the threatenings of God were not idle words” (Num. xvi. 12, 31 et seq.).

force.—The sin specially indicated here, unrighteous oppression of the poor, looks very probably toward the terrible exactions of labor imposed upon his defenceless subjects (some of them captives of war) in those immense public works which were, in the eyes of men, the glory of his reign. The eye of man, dazzled with so much architectural splendor, commonly fails to look down through to the crushed bodies and broken hearts, and to the hopeless, never-lifted pressure of woe which such a mass of coerced labor always signifies. Human eyes rarely see it, still more rarely make any account of it, but the Great Father sees it and can never fail to take it into most solemn account.”—Coville.]

5. Belshazzar's feast, and Daniel's foreshadowing of the downfall of the Chaldean Empire, based upon the mysterious handwriting on the wall.

CHAP. V. 1-30.

- 1 Belshazzar the king made a great feast to a thousand of his lords, and drank
- 2 wine¹ before the thousand. Belshazzar, while he tasted [in the taste of] the wine, commanded to bring the golden and silver vessels which his father²
- 3 Nebuchadnezzar had taken out of the temple which was in Jerusalem; that [and] the king and his princes [lords], his wives and his concubines, might drink
- 4 therein. Then they brought the golden vessels that were taken out of the temple of the house of God which was at [in] Jerusalem; and the king and his princes
- 5 [lords], his wives and his concubines, drank in them. They drank wine¹ and praised the gods of gold, and of silver, of brass, of iron, of wood, and of stone.
- 6 In the same hour came forth fingers of a man's hand, and wrote over against the candlestick upon the plaster of the wall of the king's palace; and the king
- 7 saw the part of the hand that wrote. Then the king's countenance was changed,³ and his thoughts troubled [would trouble] him, so that [and] the joints of his loins [loin] were loosed, and his knees smote one against another [this to that].

- 7 The king cried aloud [with might] to bring in the astrologers, the Chaldeans and the soothsayers. And the king spake, and said to the wise men of Babylon Whosoever [That any man that] shall read this writing, and shew me the interpretation thereof, shall be clothed with scarlet [put on the purple], and have a [the] chain of gold about [upon] his neck, and shall be the third ruler [rule the third] in the kingdom. Then came in all the king's wise men: but [and] they could not read [call] the writing, nor [and] make known to the king [make the king know] the interpretation thereof. Then was [the] king Belshazzar greatly troubled, and his countenance was changed in him,⁴ and his lords were astonished.
- 10 Now the queen, by reason of the words of the king and his lords, came into the banquet-house [house of the drinking]; and the queen spake and said, O king, live for ever; let not thy thoughts trouble thee, nor let thy countenance be changed.⁶ There is a man in thy kingdom, in whom is the spirit of the holy gods: and, in the days of thy father, light, and understanding, and wisdom, like the wisdom of the gods, was found in him; whom [and] the king Nebuchadnezzar thy father, the king, I say, thy father, made [appointed him] master
- 12 of the magicians, astrologers, Chaldeans, and soothsayers; forasmuch as an excellent spirit, and knowledge, and understanding, interpreting of dreams, and shewing of hard sentences [riddles], and dissolving of doubts [knots], were [was] found in the same [in him] Daniel, whom the king named [put his name] Belshazzar: now let Daniel be called, and he will shew [or, and shew] the interpretation.
- 13 Then was Daniel brought in before the king. And the king spake and said unto Daniel, Art thou that Daniel, which art of the children of the captivity of
- 14 Judah,⁶ whom the king my father brought out of Jewry [Judah]?⁷ I have even heard of [upon] thee, that the spirit of the gods is in thee, and that light,
- 15 and understanding, and excellent wisdom, is [was] found in thee. And now the wise men, the astrologers, have been brought in before me, that they should read [call] this writing, and make known unto me [make me know] the interpretation thereof: but [and] they could not shew the interpretation of the thing.
- 16 And I have heard of [upon] thee that thou canst make [interpret] interpretations and dissolve doubts [knots]: now, if thou canst read [call] the writing and make known to me [make me know] the interpretation thereof, thou shalt be clothed with scarlet [put on the purple], and have a [the] chain of gold about [upon] thy neck, and shalt be the third ruler [rule the third] in the kingdom.
- 17 Then Daniel answered and said before the king, Let thy gifts be to thyself [thee], and give thy rewards [largesses] to another; yet I will read [call] the writing unto the king, and make known to him [make him know] the interpretation.
- 18 O thou king, [Thou O king—] the most high God gave [to] Nebuchadnezzar thy father a [the] kingdom, and majesty [greatness], and glory, and
- 19 honour. And, for [from] the majesty [greatness] that he gave him, all people, nations [the nations, peoples], and languages, trembled and feared [were trembling and fearing from] before him: whom he would he slew, and whom he would he kept alive, and whom he would he set up, and whom he would he
- 20 put down.⁸ But [And] when his heart was lifted up, and his mind [spirit] hardened in pride [to act proudly], he was deposed from his kingly throne [the throne of his kingdom], and they took [caused to pass away] his glory [the dignity] from him. And he was driven from the sons of men [mankind]; and his heart was made like [with] the beasts [living creatures], and his dwelling was with the wild-asses: they fed him with [would make him eat] grass [herbage] like oxen, and his body was [would be] wet with [from] the dew of heaven [the heavens]; till [that] he knew that the most high God ruled in the kingdom of men [mankind], and that he appointeth [will set up] over it whomsoever he
- 22 [may] will. And thou⁹ his son, O Belshazzar, hast not humbled thy heart,
- 23 though [because] thou knewest all this; but [and] hast lifted up thyself against the Lord¹⁰ of heaven [the heavens]: and they have brought the vessels of his house before thee, and thou and thy lords, thy wives and thy concubines,

- have drunk [are drinking] wine¹ in them: and thou hast praised the gods of silver and gold, of brass, iron, wood, and stone, which see not, nor hear, nor know; and the God in whose hand thy breath is, and whose are all thy ways,
- 24 hast thou not glorified. Then was the part of the hand sent from [before] him; and this writing was written [signed].
- 25 And this is the writing that was written [signed], MENE, MENE, TEKEL, 26 UPHARSIN. This is the interpretation of the thing [or, word]: MENE 27 [NUMBERED]; God² hath numbered thy kingdom, and finished it. TEKEL 28 [WEIGHED]; Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting. PERES [DIVIDED]; thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes [Media] and Persians [Persia].
- 29 Then commanded [said] Belshazzar, and they clothed Daniel with scarlet [the purple], and put a [the] chain of gold about [upon] his neck, and made a proclamation concerning [upon] him, that he should be the third ruler in the king-
- 30 dom. In that night was Belshazzar the king of the Chaldeans slain.

GRAMMATICAL NOTES.

...¹¹ מְלֵךְ is significant of the true God, like מְלֵךְ־הַיְּהוּדִים.

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

Verses 1-4. The decoration of the sacred vessels of the temple at the royal feast. Belshazzar the king made a great feast. The name of the king מְלֵךְ־בֶּלְשַׁצְצָר differs in its orthography merely from the Chaldee name מְלֵךְ־בֶּלְשַׁצְצָר, which Nebuchadnezzar, according to chap. i. 7 (cf. infra, v. 13 of this chapter), had conferred on Daniel, as it omits the t-sound between the letters l and sh. It is therefore a softened form, having the same etymological significance in its elements, and both are equivalent to Beli princeps, = the Bel-sarussur of the Babylonian inscriptions (cf. Introd., § 8, note 3). According to Hitzig (on i. 7, and on this passage), Bel-tsh-dzar is synonymous with the Sanscrit Pāla-tshāpara, "provider and devourer," while in Bel-shamear the middle member of this compound, the Sanscrit and Zend copula tsha, "and," has been dropped out and replaced by the Heb. relative sh, so that the shortened form signifies, "provider, who (is) devourer." This hypothesis appears altogether too artificial, and, like the direct derivation of the word from the Aryan, is doubtful, especially as the Bel-sarussur of the inscriptions on the Babylonian monuments favors it but little. Ewald's assumption that the royal name מְלֵךְ comprehends the name of the male god Bel, while that of Daniel, מְלֵךְ־דָּנִיֵּאל, includes that of the goddess Belt, is likewise without sufficient proof, and is opposed by chap. iv. 5 [8], and also by the orthography with sh instead of r.—Concerning the hypothesis that Belshazzar was the same as Evil-merodach, the son and immediate successor of Nebuchadnezzar, see the Introd., § 8, note 3.—Made a great feast, i.e., caused it to be made. עָבַד, "he had prepared," as in chap. iii. 1. לֶחֶם, "bread, food," comprehends the beverages (מִשְׁתֵּי, v. 10) also, as the second half of the verse shows; cf. in the Heb., Gen. xxvi. 30; 1 Sam. xxv. 36; Ecc. x. 19.—And drank wine before the thousand. This does not probably mean that he "vied with them in drinking" (Hävernick), but that he "drank in their presence, while seated at a separate table,"—as was the custom of the Persian kings on the occasion of their great banquets, according to Athenæus, Deipnos, iv. 10. On the expression, "to eat and drink before others," cf. Jer. lii. 33; it differs materially from "to eat and drink with others," Ex. xviii. 12; Acts x. 41, etc. The number of the king's guests, a thousand lords (grand-officers, mighty ones, cf. iv. 33 [36]), which the Sept. doubles, δυσχίλιον, is not remarkable, when it is remembered that, according to Ctesias (in Athen., i. c.), the Persian king provided daily for fifteen thousand persons at his table; that, according to Curtius, Alexander the Great invited ten thousand to a wedding feast; and that Ptolemy Dionysius (according to Pliny, H. N., XXXIII. 10) supported a thousand soldiers of the army of Pompey the Great from his kitchen. ["The number specified is evidently a round number, i.e., the number of the guests amounted to about a thousand" (Keil).] However, according to the genuinely Oriental custom, which is attested, e.g., by Herodotus, II. 78, in the case of the Egyptians, and by Elian, V. H., XI. 1, among the Persians, the wine-drinking or carousal follows upon the feast proper. At such times, and especially at a court like the Babylonian immediately prior to the Persian period, the banqueters may have given way to all the excesses of their dissolute frivolity, in the manner described in the ensuing narrative. In relation to the drunkenness and wantonness of the Babylonians, cf. Isa. xiv. 11; xlvii. 1; Jer. li. 39; Herod., I. 193, 195; Athenæus, XIV. p. 601; Curtius, V. 1 etc.—Verse 2. Belshazzar, while he tasted the wine, commanded, etc. בִּשְׁטֵם חֲמֵרָא, “while tasting, while enjoying the wine,” therefore, while under its influence; cf. Prov. xx. 1; Acts ii. 13; and in regard to שָׁטַם, cf. Job vi. 6. [It “does not mean merely sipping in order to determine the flavor, or as a prelude to drinking more freely, but drinking with relish, and therefore plentifully” (Stuart).]—To bring the golden and silver vessels, namely, out of the “treasure-house of the gods,” in which they had been deposited by Nebuchadnezzar, according to chap. i. 2. The etymology of the name Belshazzar invented by Saadia and favored by Hitzig, by which it is derived from this very act of causing the vessels to be brought from the treasure-house (שָׁבַט, “to seek” and אִשָּׁר), is an idle vagary that never entered into the mind of the writer.—That the king . . . and his concubines might drink therein. The ך in יִשְׁתִּיחֶן is expressive of the design; cf. chap. i. 5 δ. שָׁחַח with ך, “to drink from a vessel,” occurs also in vs. 3 and 23; cf. Winer, § 51, 1.—His wives and his concubines. שָׁבַל designates the legal consort as contrasted with the concubine (לְחֵכֶה), as in the Hebrew (Psa. xlv. 10; Neh. ii. 6). The Sept. represents only the concubines as present at the feast (both here and in vs. 3 and 23), being apparently governed in this by what is described in Esther i. 9 et seq. (cf. Josephus, Ant., XI. 6, 1) as the court custom of the ancient Persians; but even with reference to them, Herodotus (v. 18) testifies that their wives (νομιμαὶ γυναῖκες) were admitted to banquets (cf. also Plutarch, Sympos. I. 1 and Macrob. vii. 1, who represent that at least concubines were present at the Persian feasts). It is clear that the luxurious Babylonians were even more lax in the observance of a strict etiquette, from Herod. i. 191; Xenophon, Cyrop., V. 2, 28, and especially from Curtius, V. 1, 38. From this may appear the propriety with which Bertholdt (p. 366), on the strength of v. 10 of this chapter, which he misunderstood, charges ignorance of the Babylonian custom in question on the prophet.—Verse 3. Then they brought the golden vessels that were taken out of the temple of the house of God which was at Jerusalem. Merely the golden vessels are here mentioned, while the silver ones are omitted, on the principle a potiori fit denominatio. The temple (הַמִּקְדָּשׁ) in this place, as in 1 Kings vi. 3; Ezek. xli. 4, is the temple proper, consisting of the holy and the most holy place, and is here distinguished from the “house of God,” i.e., the whole of the sacred area of the temple.—Verse 4. They drank wine, and praised, etc. אֲשָׁרִין (with א prothetic, Winer, Gramm., § 23, note 1) resumes the אֲשָׁרִין of the preceding verse supplemented by חֲמֵרָא, “wine,” in order to connect immediately with it the praising of the gods, and thus to present in a striking manner the profanity and lasciviousness of the scene.* —On the six-fold number of the materials from which the idols were constructed, “gold, silver, brass, iron, wood, and stone,” compare the similar number (“gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay stubble”) in 1 Cor. iii. 11; also Psa. cxv. 5-7; Bar. vi. 7 et seq.; Wisd. xv. 15.† On the number itself, as the number of the world amenable to judgment because of its hostility to God, cf. Auberlen, Dan., p. 304 et seq.; and my Theologia naturalis, p. 816 et seq.—The aggravated feature of this profanation of the sacred vessels of the temple does not consist in the “placing of Jehovah and the idols of the king upon the same level” (Hävernich), but in the fact, which Daniel mentions with censure in v. 23, that Belshazzar proudly exalted himself above the God of Israel, and in mockery employed the vessels stolen from His sanctuary to drink wine while singing the praises of the victorious gods of Babylon. It was thus essentially an exaltation of the idols above Jehovah, who had succumbed to them in battle, and whom they had despoiled (cf. Kranichf. on this passage).

Verses 5, 6. The finger on the wall, and the consequent terror of the king. In the same hour, therefore while the sacrilegious act was in progress; immediately and suddenly. Cf. chap. iii. 6.—Came forth fingers of a man's hand. The Kethib שָׁפָרָה (3 plur. masc.) is sufficiently explained by its position before the feminine subject אֲשָׁרִין, or also by the supposition that the mind of the writer reverted in an indefinite manner to the Divine powers here engaged. The feminine plural אֲשָׁרִין, substituted for it by the Keri, is therefore to be rejected, as an easier reading (similar to that in chap. ii. 33). The participle יִכְתֹּב (“and writing,” instead of “and wrote”), which follows the verb שָׁפָרָה, has a realizing effect, as in chap. ii. 7 a; iii. 9 a.—Over against the candlestick on the wall of the king's palace. The wall of the banquet-hall was not panelled nor draped, but rather a simple, light-colored “wall of lime or plaster” (פֶּתֶל = the פֶּתֶל of the Targums), such as the ruins of the palaces at Nineveh still exhibit in great number, according to Layard (Nin. and Babylon, p. 651). Upon a spot of this wall that was especially exposed to the light from the lamp above the king, he suddenly beheld the mysterious and terrifying phenomenon of the hand engaged in writing.—And the king saw the part (the extremity) of the hand that wrote. אֶת יָדוֹ properly designates here and in v. 24 the “extremity of the hand,” probably

* [“As the city was already besieged, and the real king Nabonned had gone into the field against the armies of the Medes and Persians under Cyrus, the sense of security which this feast implied must be accounted for by their confidence in the assumed strength of the city. Plainly it was supposed to be absolutely impregnable.—It may be added that God had given up the king and the princes to a blind infatuation, of such sort as usually precedes destruction.”—Cotelles.]

including the fingers, hence what the first sentence describes by אֶצְבָּעַיִם. The rendering of Gesenius and Dietrich in the Handwörterbuch, "palm of the hand, palma," is hardly correct; nor is that of Hitzig, who, in connection with Saadia, takes יָד in the wider sense of "the lower arm, including the hand," and hence explains כָּכָרִידָא by "the whole hand." The writer appears rather to have employed the words "fingers" and "extremity of the hand" interchangeably, with design,—"in order to excite more effectually the conception of a mysterious person in the background, by the observation that only the extremity of the organ employed in writing was visible" (Kranichfeld). Whether the phenomenon of the mysterious hand is to be placed solely to the account of "the fancy of the king under the influence of wine," and therefore to be reduced (with Kranichfeld) from an objective and actually transpiring miracle to a merely subjective apprehension (similar to the perception of the fourth person in the fiery furnace—see on chap. iii. 24), or otherwise, depends entirely on the other question, whether the mysterious writing on the wall, which certainly was visible to others as well as to Belshazzar (cf. vs. 7, 8, 16, 25), is to be regarded as having been previously carved or painted in a natural way and by human agency, or whether it is to be accepted that the inscription was made by supernatural intervention at the time of the banquet and before the eyes of the terrified king. In support of the former theory reference might perhaps be made to the distinction between an older and a later cuneiform writing among the Babylonians, the former of which differed materially from the latter, or even to the hieroglyphics which the primitive Babylonians are said to have employed (cf. Spiegel, Art. Nineve u. Assyrien, in Herzog's Real-Encykl., vol. xx. p. 234 et seq.), but with which the later ages were entirely unacquainted. It is conceivable that the king may suddenly have noticed an inscription in characters of that former time, that were traced on bricks and inserted in the wall, and that such characters were not intelligible to the ordinary magicians of the time, but required the all-surpassing knowledge of Daniel to decipher. But, aside from the evident design of the narrator to report a positively miraculous incident, this theory is militated against and positively overthrown by the nature of the writing, which does not bear the character of the primitive oracles of the kind represented by the Sibyllines, but is a Divine sentence of destruction upon the king and his people, that was called forth by the insolent presumption of the present ruler, and is adapted to the circumstances of his time (cf. on v. 25 et seq.). The theory of an actual miracle is therefore to be received, and the psychological explanation cited above, as well as every other naturalistic theory, must be rejected.*—Then the (color of the) king's countenance was changed; literally, "Then the king, his color was changed to him." [כִּלְכָּא (the king) stands absolutely, because the impression made by the occurrence on the king is to be depicted" (Keil).] The intransitive כִּלְכָּא ("to change") has the accusative suffix in כִּלְכָּאֵי, instead of the dative; cf. כִּלְכָּאֵי in the Heb. of Ezek. xlvii. 7. However, the more circumstantial expression כִּלְכָּאֵי, v. 9, has substantially the same signification, as is the case also with the somewhat different expressions in v. 10 and chap. vii. 28. On כִּלְכָּאֵי, see on chap. iv. 33.—And his thoughts troubled him; רַעֲיוֹנָיו, the uncomfortable and terrifying thoughts concerning the meaning of the writing, which sprang from the guilty conscience of the king. Cf. chap. ii. 30.—The joints of his loins were loosed, and his knees smote one against another. The tremulous knocking together of the knees is a consequence of the yielding of the joints of the loins, and this again, like the change of color in the countenance, is the natural effect of terror.* Cf. with כִּלְכָּא, "hip, loin," the etymologically equivalent Heb. הֶלֶץ (only in the dual, הֶלֶצִים). אֶרְבֵּבָא, "knee," appears not to be etymologically related to כָּרָךְ, כַּרְכִּים, but rather to signify originally "combination, commisura;" cf. commisura genu, Plin., H. N., XI. 108.

Verses 7-9. The useless consultation with the Magians. The king cried aloud; בָּהִרָל, "with power," as in chap. iii. 4; iv. 11.—To bring in the astrologers (soothsayers), the Chaldeans, and the soothsayers (astrologers). Several classes of wise men are here mentioned to designate the entire number, as in chap. ii. 2 (cf. 27) and in iv. 4; and among them the Chartummin or learned class (see on chap. ii. 2), whose wisdom would be especially required in the present instance, are not even mentioned by name. This is evidently an oversight on the part of the writer, which is paralleled in the somewhat more complete enumeration of the principal classes of Magians in v. 11, and also in the abbreviated expression, "the wise men, the soothsayers," in v. 15. The indefinite בְּכָל חֲכָמֵי in this verse, and the expression כִּלְכָּאֵי in v. 8, show clearly that the author always refers to all the wise men, without excluding any of the chief classes, and especially so in this instance. But it cannot be required here, any more than in the similar case mentioned in the preceding chapter, that Daniel should have at once presented himself among all these wise men of Babylon (see on iv. 5). The position of the great Jewish wise man under Nebuchadnezzar's reign, which was not official in the more limited sense, was probably continued to him under Belshazzar; and, moreover, the latter, who, according to v. 11 et seq., knew little or nothing about Daniel, would be far more likely than was his father to ignore the prophet of Jehovah, and to seek the counsel of the heathen wise men at the outset. The words of the queen in v. 11 et seq. by no means indicate that the king was wholly unacquainted with Daniel, but merely that up to that time no personal or official intercourse had taken place between them. This circumstance also finds a sufficient explanation in the greater freedom of action incident to the partly official and partly private station of Daniel, which devolved on him the obligation to attend to certain portions of "the king's business" indeed (see chap. viii. 27), but released him from the duty of frequently presenting himself before the king. The assumption of Hengstenberg and Hävernick, that on the accession of Belshazzar Daniel was formally deprived of his office as the chief Magian, is a very doubtful supposition, and stands in direct contradiction to chap. viii. 27 (cf. viii. 1).—Whoever shall read this writing, etc. וְכִי יִקְרָא (here and v. 15), for וְכִי יִקְרָא, v. 8, 16, 25, appears to be the orthography of a later copyist, as in the case of וְכִי יִקְרָא, chap. iv. 32, and of וְכִי יִקְרָא in v. 12, below.—Shall be clothed with purple (marg.) and have (rather "with") a chain of gold about his neck. וְכִי יִקְרָא here, and in the Chaldaizing Heb. of 2 Chron. ii. 6, equivalent to the Heb. וְכִי יִקְרָא (Ex. xxv. 26, 27, and often), the "red or genuine purple," πορφύρα, was probably more costly and brilliant than the violet or blue purple וְכִי יִקְרָא, from which it must be distinguished. It formed the distinguishing feature of clothing among the Persian kings (Pollux, VII. 13), and was by them occasionally bestowed on high officials, as a mark of especial favor and exalted dignity; e.g., on Mordecai, Esth. viii. 15; and on the purpurati, i.e., persons who were adorned with the purple κάνθυς, whom Xenophon (Anab. I. 5, 8), Curtius (III. 2, 10; VIII. 3, 15; XIII. 13, 14), and others mention (cf. Xenophon, Cyrop. I. 3, 2; II. 4, 6; Herodotus, III. 20, etc.). Purple was probably the badge of distinguished rank at the Babylonian as well as at the Persian court, especially as Babylon, like Tyre, was celebrated among the ancients for its manufacture of purple goods. Cf. Philostratus, Ep. 27; Ezek. xxvii. 24; Josh. vii. 21; and generally, Heeren, Ideen, etc., I. 2, 205 et seq. With respect to their etymology, both forms, וְכִי יִקְרָא and וְכִי יִקְרָא, may be most readily derived from the Sanscrit, in which both rāgaman and rāgavan occur as adjectives derived from rāga, "red," and signify "red-colored;" cf. Gesen., Addit. ad Theaur., p. 111. Hitzig however refers to the Sanscr. argh = "to possess value, be costly," and most of the older expositors prefer a Shemitic root, e.g. וְכִי יִקְרָא—"chain, necklace" (Sept. and Theodot., μανιάκας; also Aquil. and Symm. on Gen. xli. 43), seems not to have been changed to וְכִי יִקְרָא (= Gr. μανιάκας), the form which is here and in vs. 16 and 29 preferred by the Keri. As among the early Egyptians (Gen. xli. 42), so also among the later Persians the golden necklace served as the ornament of princes and as the mark of special favor from the king. cf. Herod., III. 20; Xenophon, Anab. I. 2, 27; 5, 8; 8, 29.—And shall be the third ruler in the kingdom; rather, "shall have power in the kingdom as a triumvir." וְכִי יִקְרָא, not the same as וְכִי יִקְרָא, vs. 16 and 29, is generally regarded as an ordinal number, "the third," formed after the Heb. analogy, and is compared with the more usual וְכִי יִקְרָא; but it may perhaps, and with greater probability, be regarded, with Kranichfeld, as a feminine adverbial formation after the analogy of adverbs like וְכִי יִקְרָא, etc., and be rendered accordingly, by like, or as a triumvir; while וְכִי יִקְרָא in vs. 16 and 29 is the corresponding masculine noun "triumvir" (formed from וְכִי יִקְרָא, "three"). There is therefore no difference in sense between the term employed in this passage and those found in the parallel verses cited above; but it is unnecessary and arbitrary to declare, with Hitzig, that the two forms are identical, and on that account to substitute וְכִי יִקְרָא in this place. The dignity of triumvir which is here promised to the fortunate interpreter of the mystery is probably not identical with the office of one of the three governors of the province of Babylon mentioned in chap. ii. 49, but designates the position of one of the three chief governors over the whole kingdom. The latter office is noticed in chap. vi. 8, as established by Darius the Mede; but that statement may be regarded as merely indicating the restoration of a feature in the administration of government which had already existed under the Babylonian regime. The Sept. presents the correct idea: ἐξουσία τοῦ τρίτου μέρος τῆς βασιλείας; but the Peshito is less correct in its rendering by "the third rank in the kingdom," which results in the idea that the recipient should immediately succeed in rank the king, who was supreme, and the prime minister or grand vizier, who filled the second place in the kingdom. This thought was certainly foreign to the author, and would be expressed as indefinitely as is possible by וְכִי יִקְרָא וְגו'. The evident meaning of these words is rather that the person concerned should be placed over the kingdom αὐτὸς τρίτος, or the third beside two other grand officials or שְׁלִישִׁין (cf. chap. vi. 3).—Verse 8. Then came in all the king's wise men. On the Keri וְכִי יִקְרָא see on chap. iv. 4. The וְכִי יִקְרָא וְכִי יִקְרָא וְכִי יִקְרָא are evidently the same as those mentioned separately (although not exhaustively, and merely by way of indicating their office) in v. 7. Kranichfeld is exceedingly arbitrary when he assumes a gradation between the three classes of wise men who are specially mentioned in v. 7, and the summoning of all the wise men related in this passage, and consequently finds between the lines and preceding the וְכִי יִקְרָא, "then," a series of incidents that are not expressly noticed (after the manner in which many expositors treat the καὶ εἰς τοὺς οὐλοῦτος, Luke xiv. 23). Instead of this compare the relation of the general expression וְכִי יִקְרָא

* [The phrase וְכִי יִקְרָא "does not depend on וְכִי יִקְרָא, but forms a clause by itself; and a chain of gold shall be about his neck."—Kell.]

בְּכָל in chap. iv. 3, to the special classes of wise men which are immediately referred to (ibid. v. 4), and also what has been observed above, on v. 7, in relation to the careless style of the author.—But they could not read the writing, etc. Kranichfeld supposes that the reason for this was, that the mysterious inscription was written in the old Phœnician characters, which Daniel, being a Hebrew, would have recognized, while the Chaldean Chartummin, who were acquainted only with the character in use among the ancient Babylonians, which corresponded to the later Syriac or Palmyrene, would naturally be unable to understand them. But in this instance we are probably to conceive of cuneiform writing, or of hieroglyphic characters (see on v. 7), because the brick walls of the palaces in ancient Babylon generally contained only such. Prideaux, however, preceded Kranichfeld in the opinion expressed in the Universal History, part III. p. 755, that the writing was not composed of the square characters in use among the Chaldeans, but of the ancient Arabic (?), which preceded the modern Samaritan. *—Verse 9. Then was king Belshazzar greatly troubled . . . and his lords were astonished. The unusual, and even unique and incomprehensible characters in which the suddenly apparent writing was composed, increased the alarm produced by the apparition, and filled the king and his guests, now thoroughly aroused from their wild debauch, with anxious dread in relation to the misfortunes predicted by the supposed oracle. If, with Hävernick, and many earlier expositors, we could believe that Belshazzar's feast was held during the siege of the city by the Medo-Persians, and with a design to ridicule the danger from that source, it would be still easier to explain so general an alarm, and it would not even be necessary, in that case, to allude to the fear of the many officials that their own deposition from office might be connected with the king's impending fall; but that conclusion does not necessarily result from v. 30 et seq.—Hitzig remarks on the Ithpael Part. כְּתִיבִיבִי, and probably with justice, that "it not only comprehends the idea of alarm, but also that of confusion and excited movement." "None retained their places; a general uproar ensued; groups were formed; and the people talked, and ran hither and thither to no purpose."

Verses 10-12. The queen-mother refers Belshazzar to Daniel. Now (or "then") the queen . . . came into the banquet-house. מַלְכֵּהָ can only be the queen-mother (בְּרִיָּה), 1 Kings xv. 13; 2 Chron. xv. 16; cf. Jer. xiii. 18)—not

* ["But this interpretation of the miracle on natural principles is quite erroneous. First, it is very unlikely that the Chaldean wise men should not have known these old Sennitic characters, even although at that time they had ceased to be in current use among the Babylonians in their common writing. Then, from the circumstance that Daniel could at once read the writing. It does not follow that it was the well-known Old-Hebrew writing of his fatherland. 'The characters employed in the writing,' as Hengstenberg has rightly observed (Beitr., I. p. 123), 'must have been altogether unusual, so as not to be deciphered but by Divine illumination.' Yet we must not, with M. Geier and others, assume that the writing was visible only to the king and Daniel. This contradicts the text, according to which the Chaldean wise men, and, without doubt, all that were present, also saw the traces of the writing, but were not able to read it."—Kell.]

one of the king's wives; for, according to vs. 2 and 23 these were already in the banquet-hall among the carousers. Hence, if Belshazzar was the same person as Evil-merodach, the son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar, this queen-mother, who here evidently displays a dignity and authority such as belonged to the gebiröth at the Israelitish courts (cf. the passages adduced), was probably the Nitocris whom Herodotus celebrates in I. 185. Cf. the Introduct., § 8, note 3.—Instead of the Kethib מַלְכֵּהָ, the Keri, conforming to the usage of the later Chaldee, has מַלְכֵּהָ; cf. on chap. iv. 4.—מַלְכֵּהָ מַלְכֵּהָ מַלְכֵּהָ, "by reason (on account) of the words of the king and his lords." So the majority of moderns, correctly; for a confused, excited talking, whose sound possibly penetrated to the apartments of the queen-mother, is implicitly included in כְּשֶׁחֲבִיבִי, v. 9.

9. The plural מַלְכֵּהָ, as well as the complementary genitive, is opposed to the version of the Vulg., Luther, Bertholdt, Dereser, von Lengerke, etc.: "by reason of the matter, or the affair."—O king, live for ever. Cf. on chap. ii. 4, where also the defective מַלְכֵּהָ מַלְכֵּהָ has been noticed.—Verse 11. And in the days of thy father light (מַלְכֵּהָ, cf. on chap. ii. 22), and understanding, and wisdom, like the wisdom of the gods, was found in him. Cf. 1 Kings iii. 28; Wisd. viii. 11.—King Nebuchadnezzar, the king, thy father. The subject is briefly repeated at the close of the sentence, because its first position was somewhat distant from the verb, similar to Cant. v. 7.—Verse 12. Forasmuch as an excellent spirit . . . were found in the same Daniel. The wisdom of Daniel, which had been extolled in v. 11, is again mentioned as the reason for the distinction conferred on him by Nebuchadnezzar, for the purpose of preparing Belshazzar to listen to the counsel which follows.—Interpreting of dreams, and showing of hard sentences, and dissolving of doubts; rather, "to interpret dreams, show riddles, and loosen knots." This triplicate circumstantial clause,—the first and third of whose members are expressed in the Heb. [Chald.] by participles, and the second by the infinitive מַלְכֵּהָ—is a genitive, depending on מַלְכֵּהָ, which closes the series of objects governed by the principal verb מַלְכֵּהָ in the manner of a parenthesis. Hitzig holds differently, taking the three terms מַלְכֵּהָ, מַלְכֵּהָ, and מַלְכֵּהָ, under the precedence of the Vulgate, as three nouns of action, coördinated to the preceding ones ("an excellent spirit, knowledge, and understanding"), and consequently assuming as subjects מַלְכֵּהָ מַלְכֵּהָ מַלְכֵּהָ. But מַלְכֵּהָ and

* ["The 'queen' in this passage is the queen-mother, as may be inferred from the fact that the king's (Belshazzar's) wives and concubines are with him in his carousals, while this woman was not; and also from her intimate acquaintance with Daniel and the incidents of Nebuchadnezzar's life. She was probably the daughter of Nebuchadnezzar, and the mother of Belshazzar."—Coville. If Rawlinson's conjecture (Herodotus i. 424) be correct, that the real king Nabonadus had left his son Belshazzar temporarily in charge of Babylon, this woman may have really been the consort of the actual king.]

מִשְׁרָא are clearly Pael participles, and they cannot be taken as nomina actionis, even under reference to the Heb. מִכְסֵּה, "a covering," or to מִשְׁמֵם, chap. ix. 27. It is exceedingly doubtful whether the figurative expression "to loosen knots" (cf. the Lat. nodos solvere; and also Seneca's "nodosa sortis verba," Edip., 101) contains an illusion to the "loosening of the loins," in v. 6 (as Hitzig, Kranichfeld, etc., assert), or not, in view of the merely superficial relation between מִשְׁרָא and מִשְׁתַּרְרֵן.—In . . . Daniel whom the king named Belteshazzar; בְּהַ בְּרִינְיָאֵל (cf. v. 30), an emphatic pleonasm. The giving of the name is referred to, as in chap. iv. 5, as something honorable to the prophet.—Now let Daniel be called, and he will show the interpretation. Concerning the form מִשְׁתַּרְרֵן, see above, on v. 7. ["The tone in which this last clause is spoken betokens that the speaker herself is conscious of an elevated rank and a kind of authority, or, at least, a right to give advice; a tone which only such a woman as stood in the relation of a mother (not a wife) could assume in the East before a king" (Stuart).]

Verses 13-16. Daniel's appearance before the king. Then was Daniel brought in before the king. מִשְׁרָא וְהַעֲלֵה are Hebraizing Hophal-forms, like מִשְׁרָא, chap. iv. 33, or like מִשְׁרָא in v. 20.—Art thou that Daniel, which art of the children of the captivity of Judah, etc. ["The question did not expect an answer, and has this meaning: Thou art indeed Daniel."]—Keil.] This question clearly indicates that no direct intercourse had hitherto taken place between the king and Daniel (see on v. 7), but also, on the other hand, that the former had some knowledge of the prophet. The use of the name Daniel instead of Belteshazzar, in the king's address, was probably dictated simply by a desire to avoid the use of a name so nearly identical in sound to his own—although it certainly belonged to the prophet in the official language of the Babylonian court. Hitzig therefore commits a decided error, when he assumes a historical improbability in this place, suggestive of a later Jewish authorship.—Whom the king . . . brought from (rather "hitherto, out of") Jewry? מִיִּשְׂרָאֵל is probably to be referred to the captives, as Theodotion, the Sept., Luther, Hitzig, etc., hold, and not specially to the person of Daniel, which is the view of the Vulgate, Kranichfeld, etc. On the form מִיִּשְׂרָאֵל for מִיִּשְׂרָאֵל (cf. the voc. מִיִּשְׂרָאֵל = 'Αββᾶ, Rom. viii. 15), see Hitzig, Kranichfeld, and others, on this passage.—On v. 14 cf. v. 11; on v. 15 cf. v. 8. ["It is not to be overlooked that here Belshazzar leaves out the predicate holy in connection with מִלְכֵּי, gods" (Keil).]—The wise men, the astrologers ("soothsayers"). On this combination cf. on v. 7.—That they should read this writing, etc. מִי, as the accompanying imperfect indicates, is in this place the telic conjunction "that, in order that." Upon this clause which indicates the design, depends that which follows, construed with 5 c. Inf. (cf. ii. 16). Concerning the form מִשְׁתַּרְרֵן see supra, on v. 7.—But they could not show the interpretation of the thing (or "word"). מִשְׁתַּרְרֵן cannot be rendered by "matter, thing," any more than מִלֵּךְ in v. 10; it rather signifies, collectively, the words written on the wall (against Hitzig and others).—Concerning מִשְׁתַּרְרֵן v. 16 b., see supra, on v. 7.

Verses 17-24. Daniel's censuring address to the king, as the prologue to the interpretation of the writing. Let thy gifts be to thyself. This refusal of the royal presents was designed merely to decisively reject, at the outset, and in a manner becoming the prophet of Jehovah, any influence that might be brought to bear on him. It is not, therefore, a pert expression, which the king might justly punish, nor is it inconsistent with the fact that Daniel ultimately accepted the reward offered for the interpretation, v. 29, since he regarded it as a recognition of his God. The assertion of v. Lengerke, Hitzig, etc., that we should expect either that the enraged king would punish the prophet who bears evil tidings and couples them with threatenings and censure, or that, in v. 20, Daniel would despise the royal purple and the golden necklace, all this is simply adapted to afford a conception of the manner in which a Maccabean tendency-writer would have treated this history, and of the probable issue to which he would have conducted it.—Verse 18. O thou king, the most high God, etc. The absolute position of the vocative מִלְכָּא אֱלֹהֵימָא at the beginning of the sentence, places the king rhetorically in a living relation with the facts reported in the following clause, with regard to his father Nebuchadnezzar.—Verse 19. And for the majesty (or "power") . . . all people, nations ("tribes"), and languages trembled and feared; properly, "were trembling and fearing," were in a state of fear and trembling. The Keri has מִלְכָּא instead of מִלְכָּא, similar to מִלְכָּא (chap. ii. 38; iii. 31; iv. 32) instead of מִלְכָּא; see on ii. 38. Concerning the triad, "people, tribes, and tongues," see on chap. iii. 4.—Whom (soever) he would (cf. Winer, Gramm. § 47, 1, a) . . . he kept alive. מִלְכָּא is derived by Theodotion (ἐμψυχον) and the Vulgate (percutiebat; cf. Luther, "erschlug") from מִלְכָּא "to smite;" but the parallelism requires the Aphel partic. of מִלְכָּא, "to live," and מִלְכָּא must either be considered as such (namely, as a peculiar, old-Chaldaic contraction of מִלְכָּא, which is generally contracted to מִלְכָּא, e. g., Targ. Deut. xxxii. 39), or, with Saadia, Rashi, Buxt., Bertholdt, Gesenius, Fürst, Hitzig, etc., the usual contracted form מִלְכָּא must be substituted for מִלְכָּא. ["The brilliant description of Nebuchadnezzar's power in ver. 18 and 19 has undesirably the object of impressing it on the mind of Belshazzar that he did not equal his father (that monarch) in power and majesty . . . The last clause in ver. 19 reminds us of 1 Sam. ii. 6, 7" (Keil).] Verse 20.

But when his heart was lifted up. רָם = רָם, is a preterite with intransitive signification, not a passive participle, as v. Lengerke suggests. Cf. Winer, § 23, 4.—And his mind hardened in pride. לִבָּב, the nearest synonym to לִבָּב, is also frequently used interchangeably with it in the Hebrew, e. g., Psa. li. 12, 19. רָם, in this place, is about equivalent to the Heb. רָם in Ex. vii. 13. *—He was deposed . . . , and they took his glory from him; or, "his glory was taken from him." Instead of רָם the best MSS. have רָם, which is possibly to be read as רָם (Hitzig); but on the other hand the case may be analogous to רָם, supra, v. 8 and chap. iv. 15.—Verse 21. And his heart was made like the (heart of) beasts. Read רָם, not רָם (Keri) or רָם (v. Leng., Hitzig), or even רָם (Ewald). The 3d sing. active רָם is used, instead of the more usual 3d plural active, to express an impersonal sense. There are thus three several modes of indicating that sense employed in vs. 20 and 21: a, the passive (רָם v. 20, רָם v. 21); b, the 3d plural active (רָם v. 20, רָם v. 21); c, the 3d sing. active (רָם v. 21)—a rapid change, that is conditioned by the rhetorical, or if it be preferred, the poetical elevation of Daniel's remarks.—[And his dwelling was with the wild asses. This "circumstance is added by the speaker, and not found in chap. iv. 29 (32). It is added for the sake of stronger impression" (Stuart).]—Till he knew that . . . God . . . appointeth over it (or "them") whomsoever he will. Cf. chap. iv. 14, at the close of which, as here, the Keri substitutes רָם for the Kethib רָם.—Verse 22. And thou . . . hast not humbled thine heart, though thou knewest all this.† Properly, "precisely because (רָם) thou knewest all this," hence, because of a defiant opposition to the well known design and will of the Highest. The words indicate the reason not for what Belshazzar should have done, but for what he did not perform (thus Kranichf. correctly, against v. Lengerke, Hitzig, etc.).—Verse 23. And thou has praised the gods of silver, and gold, etc., cf. v. 4. The descriptive addition in this case, "which see not, nor hear, nor know," is based on Deut. iv. 28; cf. Psa. cxv. 5 et seq.; cxxxv. 15 et seq.—And (rather "but") the God in whose hand thy breath is. Cf. Job xii. 10; Num. xvi. 22. On the following, "whose (or "with whom") are all thy ways" (רָם ways = experiences, Targ. Job viii. 13), cf. Jer. x. 23.—Hast thou not glorified; a litotes for, "hast thou dishonored, disgraced." ["This is surely plain and faithful admonition; and probably the king's conscience was smitten by it."—Stuart.]—Verse 24. Then (or "therefore") was . . . sent from him. רָם, properly "then," namely at the time when thou didst thus exalt thyself against God. The post hoc in this instance is really a propter hoc.—רָם does not, as, e. g., in Ezra vi. 12 (cf. the Heb. Dan. xi. 43), designate the stretching forth of the hand, as if God Himself were the writer; but rather indicates the emanation of the hand from God in a general way, and therefore, so as not to exclude the intervention of angels, but rather to presume it. Hitzig remarks correctly: "The hand that writes is that of an angel who stood before God (chap. vii. 10), and received the commission to write this."

Verses 25-28. The reading and interpretation of the writing. Menē, Menē, Tekel, Upharsin = numbered, numbered, weighed, and-dividers. The forms רָם, רָם, and also רָם, which in v. 28 takes the place of רָם, are unmistakably passive participles Peal, by which the surely-impending future is expressed in the manner of a Præteritum propheticum, but with greater brevity and emphasis. The forcible laconic utterance of a mysterious oracle sounds forth from these disconnected consecutive passive participles; and this tendency and signification appear also in the unusual and antique form of the participles, of which only the first, רָם, has a somewhat regular formation (analogous to רָם, chap. iii. 26, or to רָם, for רָם, in the later Chaldee), while the e-sound in רָם and רָם is decidedly abnormal, and conflicts with the ordinary usage. רָם appears to have been selected as an equivocal mediating form between רָם, the regular passive participle of רָם, and רָם (from רָם, "to be light;" cf. v. 27); רָם was possibly chosen because of its assonance to רָם, vs. 2 and 23; and in like manner רָם = רָם may contain an amphibole, by way of an allusion to the name רָם—hence a reference to the world-power which was chiefly instrumental in the "division," i. e., the overthrow of the Chaldean empire. Kranichfeld rejects, but without any reason, this assumption of a designed two-fold sense of the terms, and especially of רָם, which is adopted by Hitzig and others; although Hitzig is probably in error when he assigns to רָם (upon the ground of Isa. lviii. 7, and in connection with Ibn-Ezra and Rashi) the meaning of the Heb. רָם or רָם, "to break." * As v. 28 shows, the writer repre-

† [Keil argues that those words "place it beyond a doubt that Belshazzar knew these incidents in the life of Nebuchadnezzar, and thus that he was his son, since his grandson (daughter's son) could scarcely have been so old that the forgetfulness of the Divine judgment could have been charged against him as a sin." Most readers, however, will regard this as a strained argument, for surely Belshazzar had ample means of knowing what his grandfather had set forth by a royal proclamation, and these events are here not merely alluded to as aggravating his sin, but rather by way of contrast, and possibly for an incitement to similar repentance.]

* [Keil regards רָם as "a noun-form, and plur. of sents the destruction of the Chaldean empire, which is foretold in פָּרֶס (פָּרְסִיָּה), precisely as a division between the allied nations of the Persians and the Medes, although he might properly have mentioned the Persians only, as effecting the destruction of the kingdom. The substitution of the plural active partic. פָּרְסִיָּה for the abnormal passive partic. פָּרֶס in the written oracle itself, which results in a change of construction similar to that observed in vs. 20 and 21 (cf. also chap. ii. 7; iii. 9; vi. 14, and the remarks on פָּרְסִיָּה, chap. iii. 4), appears to have been made for the sake of clearness. The unusual פָּרֶס would have accorded more exactly with the two preceding terms, but would scarcely have been intelligible; while the plur. פָּרְסִיָּה, "and dividers," or, "and they divide," could not be misunderstood. (Ewald's interpretation: "and in pieces and in ruins," is without any linguistic proof.) However, the expressions "to number" or "count," and "to weigh" are found elsewhere also, as figures to designate a final judicial determination; cf. Psa. lvi. 9; lxii. 10; Job xxxi. 4, 6. The repetition of מִנָּה as indicating the character of the entire sentence, is designed merely to add a solemn emphasis to the words; cf. the frequent αὐτὴν ἀμύνε in the New Testament, and O.-T. passages like Gen. xiv. 10; Deut. ii. 27; xiv. 22, etc.; and, generally, Ewald, Lehrb., § 813 a.—Verse 26. God hath numbered thy kingdom. מִנָּה מַלְכֻתְךָ is not "thy kingdom," but "thy kingship," the duration of thy reign, the days of thy sovereignty.* The verb מִנָּה is written with ה probably with design, in order to indicate the change of the vowel as compared with מִנָּה.—And finished it. מִלְּמָלְכָהּ, literally, "has made it complete," or "has fully numbered it," i.e., has brought it to the end of the time assigned to it. Cf. הוֹשִׁיעַ, Isa. xxxviii. 12.—Verse 27. Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting. "Thou," i.e., thy moral personality, thy moral character and worth; cf. Job xxxi. 6: "Let me be weighed in an even balance, that God may know mine integrity."—Thou "art found wanting" seems to refer to the threatening מִלְּמָלְכָהּ, פֶּר, "for thou art vile" (or "too light"), which the prophet Nahum (i. 14) hurls at the Assyrian king; and in so far may serve to substantiate what has been observed above on the two-fold sense of מִלְּמָלְכָהּ. מִלְּמָלְכָהּ, properly

"wanting" (= מִלְּמָלְכָהּ), namely in moral worth or capacity.—Verse 28. Thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians. In regard to the abnormal form פָּרֶס, which is followed by the regular fem. pass. part., פָּרְסִיָּה, see above, on v. 25. God is naturally conceived of as the divider; the related tribes of the Medes and the Persians are named as the recipients, although the latter clearly appears as the principal power. The oracle contains an etymological allusion to פָּרֶס only, and none to מִנָּה, an assonance to which might have been readily found in the root מָדַד, "to measure" (cf. מִדְּדָה, מִדְּדָה, Ezra iv. 20; vi. 8; vii. 24). The evident design with which the Persians, as the preponderating power in the Medo-Persian kingdom (for only thus was it known to the author, as the comprehensive פָּרְסִיָּה indicates of. on chap. ii. 39), are thus brought into prominence, is not contradicted by chap. vi. 1, where Darius the Mede is mentioned as the first foreign ruler over Babylon after the Chaldean dynasty was overthrown. The actual state of affairs compelled the author to represent that at that time Media still held the same rank as Persia, at least formally and officially, and at first even gave a dynasty and name to the whole empire; and this was done with sufficient clearness by the mention of the Medes before the Persians in this verse.*

Verses 29 and 30. The consequences. Then commanded Belshazzar, and they clothed Daniel; rather, "and caused Daniel to be clothed." The literal rendering is, "Then said Belshazzar, and they clothed," etc.; a similar construction as in chap. ii. 49; iv. 17, 25. Is the Heb. מִלְּמָלְכָהּ (fut. with עוֹשׂ convers.—cf. Neh. xiii. 9; 2 Chron. xxiv. 8; Jon. ii. 11), rather than מִלְּמָלְכָהּ would have corresponded to מִלְּמָלְכָהּ. The enrobing is therefore to be regarded as immediately succeeding the command, and Hävernicks opinion, that "the sudden death of the king prevented the execution of his design," is evidently wide of the narrator's meaning. The opinion that the prophet was invested with the royal insignia of the purple and the necklace on the same evening, involves no questionable feature, which could lead us to refer the execution of the king's command to the following day (Dereser), or even to regard the whole incident as improbable (Hitzig, etc.); but rather, the immediate bestowal of the promised marks of favor and honor harmonizes fully with the oriental despotic methods of administering government and justice, which under different circumstances observed the most rapid modes of executing punishment (see chap. iii. 6, 20 et seq.). The "public announcement" of the promotion which had taken place (the verb מִלְּמָלְכָהּ = Sanscrit krus, κηρύσσειν, signifies to proclaim publicly, as was shown on chap. iii. 4), in the same night and in every street by means of heralds, is however an unjustified demand which the closing words of v. 29 by no means involve. The solemnity in question may have been confined to the range of the royal palace, and even פָּרֶס = Hebr. פָּרֶס (cf. פָּרְסִיָּה, Zech. xi. 16), in the sense of broken pieces, fragments." He adds that מִנָּה "is twice given perhaps only for the sake of the parallelism, so as to maintain two members of the verse, each of two words."

* [The author is led to this forced interpretation by his attempt to identify Belshazzar with Evil-merodach, and consequently to defer the capture of Babylon beyond the night under consideration.]

to the banquet hall (which, according to v. 1. must be regarded as an extended building, and as filled with an extraordinary multitude).—Concerning the probable motive (namely, because his God and Lord was thus honored) which induced Daniel, despite his former refusal, to accept the expressions of the royal favor, see on v. 17. In connection with this, the assumption is still admissible, that any protest which the prophet may have offered, remained without effect, in view of the stormy haste of the king in his alarm, and was lost amid the acclamations and the noisy conversation of the excited throng. Cf. Jerome : “ Acceptit autem (Daniel) insigne regium, torquem et purpuram, ut Darius, qui erat successurus in regnum, fieret notior et per notitiam honorator. Nec mirum, si Baltasar, audiens tristitia, solebat premium, quod pollicitus est. Aut enim longo post tempore credidit ventura, quæ dicerat, aut dum Dei Prophetam honorat, sperat se veniam consecuturum. ”—Verse 30. In that night was Belshazzar, the king of the Chaldeans, slain—evidently through a conspiracy of a number of his magnates, which may have existed previously, but which did not attempt the execution of its design, until the interpretation of the mysterious writing by Daniel gave the conspirators courage. Only this opinion seems to be justified by the language of this passage and by the context,* to the exclusion of the more general view, by which the king was slain at the hands of the victorious Medo-Persians, who are supposed to have taken the city on that night, and by which Belshazzar is in consequence identified with Nabonidus, the last Chaldean king—all of which is based on a combination of Isa. xvi. ; xxi. 5 ; Jer. li. 39 ; and of Xenophon, Cyrop. vii. 5, 15 et seq. ; Herodotus, I. 190, etc., with this narrative. The latter view has recently been defended, especially by Hengstenberg (p. 325 et seq.), Keil (Bibl., p. 457), Hävernicks, etc., and also by nearly all the rationalistic expositors and critics (also by Stähelin, Bibl. ins A. T., p. 350 et seq.), and is certainly supported by the opening verse of chap. vi., in case it be immediately connected with the one before us, as is done by the writers named. It is however more than questionable whether this arrangement corresponds to the conception and design of the author ; for (1) the words, “And Darius the Median took the kingdom,” together with the subjoined reference to his age, “being about threescore and two years old,” seems intended to introduce the narrative concerning Darius and his relations to the Babylonian dynasty, much rather than to close that relating to Belshazzar. (2) Berosus and Abydenus relate nothing of a taking of Babylon while a luxurious banquet, held by the last Chaldean king and his magnates, was in progress, as the tradition of Xenophon and Herodotus asserts (cf. Introd. § 8, note 8, and especially the extracts from Kranichfeld on this question there adduced). (3) Berosus, in Josephus, Ant. x. 11, 1, does not, indeed, state that Nabonidus, the last Babylonian king, became the victim of a conspiracy, but he does ascribe that fate to Evil-merodach, the immediate successor of his father Nebuchadnezzar (cf. vs. 11, 13, 18, 22). The conspiracy in the case of the latter was headed by Neriglissar, the brother-in-law of the king, and removed the latter under circumstances entirely similar to those under which Belshazzar is said by our passage to have been slain, by murderers whose names are not given. The identity of the latter with Evil-merodach thus becomes highly probable (cf. Introd. l. c.). (4) Finally, the prophecy of the mysterious writing in v. 25, which transfers the Chaldean empire to the hands of the Medes and Persians, does not oppose, but it rather favors, the mode of division we advocate, on which an entirely new section begins with chap. vi. 1. For precisely as in chap. ii. 38, 39, Nebuchadnezzar, the head of gold, appears first as an individual, and then as identified with his dynasty and as the representative of the Babylonian world-kingdom, so Belshazzar appears first under the conception of a single person—in the words, “numbered, numbered, weighed”—but afterward as identified with his kingdom, in the closing prediction expressed by עָרָא or עִירָא. The interval of perhaps 22-24 years which thus falls between his own destruction and that of his kingdom, will, in view of the recognized perspective character of all prophecy, appear no more questionable than the still greater number of years which, according to that earlier prediction, were to elapse between the death of Nebuchadnezzar and the ruin of his dynasty. Similar groupings of immediate with more distant events are frequent in the O.-T. prophecies ; a particularly noteworthy and instructive instance of which fact may be found in the remarkable prophecy to the wife of Jeroboam by Ahijah of Shiloh in 1 Kings xiv., that comprehends three distinct events, between which extended intervals intervene : (1) The death of the sick prince, Ahijah (vs. 12, 13) ; (2) the overthrow of Jeroboam's dynasty, more than 28 years later (vs. 10, 14 ; cf. 1 Kings xv. 29 et seq.) ; (3) the ruin of the kingdom of Israel, which did not transpire until two centuries afterward (v. 15 et seq. ; cf. 2 Kings xvii.). The fundamental law of all Messianic typology, by which later events are grouped organically with earlier ones, and by which one and the same guilty act conditions a succession of Divine judgments in the course of developments, underlies this collocation in the perspective vision of a single prophecy. “The cause of the sad end of the kingdom of the ten tribes existed already in the beginning made and cultivated by Jeroboam, two and a half centuries before ; the fate that extinguishes the house of Jeroboam is at bottom the same which destroys the kingdom of the ten tribes. Jeroboam's sin destroys his dynasty and his kingdom ; for this reason the destruction of both is comprehended in the same prophecy, and not merely because the destruction of the dynasty coincides with that of the kingdom” (Kranichfeld ; cf. also Bähr, on 1 Kings chap. xiv. p. 149

* [The requirements of the language are obviously met quite as well by the presumption that the king fell that same night together with his empire, and so the author candidly admits a little further on, although himself driven to another view by his preconceived theory of the identity of Belshazzar with Evil-merodach.]

* [The weakness of these arguments is obvious, and indeed seems to have been apparent to the writer himself. The collateral considerations which he adduces below are too vague to support a theory so plainly at variance with the tenor of the text and its connections.]

of vol. 7 of the Bibelwerk). Substantially the same principles apply to the predictions of evil denounced by our prophet against Nebuchadnezzar and his kingdom, and against Belshazzar and his kingdom. The connection of widely separate events which they embody, is natural and organically necessary; and therefore the reference to two events of fulfilment, although separate in point of time, upon which we insist, involves no arbitrary features.—The assertion of Keil (Einkl. l. c.) that if the two events were not coincident, the author would have been required to state, in chap. vi. 1, how the second fact in the fulfilment stands related to the first, or, in other words, “when and how the transmission of the kingdom to the Medes and Persians came to pass,” is entirely uncalled for, and is opposed by the analogy of Ahijah’s oracle, whose final and complete realization by the overthrow of Israel, is likewise not expressly noticed; and in addition the mere mention of the taking of Babylon by Darius is a sufficient indication of the anti-typical relation of that event to chap. v. 25–28. The annexed reference to the age of Darius seems rather to indicate a reference to a period considerably later, than a design to designate the particular night in which Belshazzar was slain as falling in the sixty-second year of Darius. There was certainly no apparent motive for the author to make a chronological statement of this sort.—In relation to the peculiar opinion of Ebrard (Die Offenbarung Johannis erklärt, p. 55 et seq.), that chap. v. 30 together with chap. vi. 1, refers to the overthrow of Laborasorachad, the grandson and third successor of Nebuchadnezzar, by Nabonidus (= Darius the Mede), see on chap. vi. 1 et seq. (cf. supra Introd. § 8, notes 3 and 4).

ETHICO-FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES RELATED TO THE HISTORY OF SALVATION, APOLOGETICAL REMARKS, AND HOMILETICAL SUGGESTIONS.

1. The principal object in an apologetic point of view will have been realized in this section, whenever the identity of Belshazzar with Evilmerodach is established, and when, in consequence, the repeated designation of Nebuchadnezzar as his father (vs. 11, 13, 18, 22), the correspondence of the mode of his sudden and violent death (v. 30) with that attested by Berosus with regard to Evilmerodach, and the accession of Darius the Mede to the throne of Babylon at a period considerably later, shall have been properly substantiated. After what has been observed upon this question on v. 30, and also in the Introd. (§ 8, note 3), it only remains to examine the question, “In how far does the narrative yield to the tendency-critical attempts to represent it as a romantic fiction of the Maccabean age?”—According to Bleek (Einkl. § 266), v. Lengerke (Daniel, p. 241 et seq., p. 256) and others, the story was inspired by the plundering of the temple at Jerusalem by Antiochus Epiphanes in the year B. C. 168, and above a year before the Maccabean revolt. The brutal manner in which the Syrian king at that time penetrated into the temple of Jehovah, and seized, with polluted hands, the golden layers and other sacred vessels (1 Macc. i. 21 et seq.; 2 Macc. v. 15 et seq.), is said to have led the pseudo-Daniel to compose this history, and “by the fate of Belshazzar to warn the Syrian monarch, that a similar Divine judgment would be visited on him, because of his sacrilege.” But the narrative concerning the Seleucids and the Maccabees makes no mention of a luxurious banquet, such as a sacrificial feast, at which anything transpired that would at all compare with the profanation of the sacred vessels, as described in this chapter; and the only remaining parallel between the passages cited from 1st and 2d Maccabees, and Dan. i. 2 (cf. v. 2), is surely insufficient to justify the adoption of the charge that the history was invented to further a tendency! Any other embellishment of the sacrilege that took place at that time would certainly have been more appropriate than the one here offered, which does not charge the insolent spoiler of the temple with venting his frivolous pride on the stolen relics, but reserves this for his son and successor! The tendency-narrator might well be charged with clumsiness, if he had represented his Epiphanes-Belshazzar as not merely easy to be excited and capable of contrition and repentance while influenced by terror, but also as promising and conferring the highest dignities and honors of his kingdom upon a zealous theocrat and prophet of Jehovah. The circumstance that such a theocrat is permitted to accept such honors and rewards (v. 29) without further question, is likewise in strange contrast with the rigid monotheism and anti-Hellenistic fanaticism of the Judaism of Maccabean times, as whose representative the author is said to have written, and for which his work is alleged to have been designed (cf. 1 Macc. i. 24; Dan. xi. 28).—In no wise superior to this theory of the date of the history, as advocated by Bleek and v. Lengerke, is the assertion of Hitzig, that although this section was not composed before the revolt of the Asmonæans, it yet originated in the first year after that rising took place, immediately after and in consequence of the magnificent feasts which Antiochus Epiphanes held in B. C. 166 near Daphne, when, besides splendid games and luxurious banquets, there was a solemn procession in the presence of many ladies of the highest, as well as of lower rank, in which “the images of all conceivable gods were carried, together with an incredible number of golden and silver vessels.” If the report by Polybius (l. 31, cp. 3, 4) respecting those festivities be carefully examined, it will reveal a most marked discrepancy between the historical original and the supposed copy, which was framed after it by the alleged pseudo-Daniel. Polybius does not mention the sacrilegious use during those feasts of sacred vessels belonging to the temple with a single syllable. He states indeed that the expense connected with those festivities was chiefly met out of the treasures stolen from various temples—but from Egyptian temples, which the pseudo-Daniel would assuredly have placed in the category of the vain “gods of gold, silver, brass, iron, wood, and stone” (vs. 4, 23), and whose desecration he would have been more ready to applaud than to censure. But beyond all this, Polybius reveals no trace of a knowledge that the wild festivities were interrupted by a terrifying incident, which compelled the proud Syrian king to recognize the judicial interference of superior Divine power; nor of any inclination on the part of that prince to honor and promote the prophet who opposed him with earnest censure, despite his boldness; nor yet of a course on the part of the heroic Jewish defender of his faith towards the heathen ruler, which, although not slavishly subservient, was yet courteous, and mindful of the obedience due from a subject to his superior. But if such a meeting between a Jewish zealot and the proud Antiochus, who was fanatically devoted to his Hellenistic faith in the gods, had transpired during a public feast in the Maccabean age, a materially different kind of incidents might have been looked for, from that described in this chapter. Both the ὑπερηγία and φοροκτορία of the bloodthirsty tyrant, and the defiance inspired by faith, prepared for conflict, and careless of death, which was characteristic of the martyr of the theocracy who was engaged in an open revolt against the despot, would have been brought into collision in a manner entirely different from anything found in the report of Polybius—which contains no mention whatever of such an interruption during the feasts of Daphne—and also from the description found in our alleged tendency-forgery. The latter, if it were really the work of a pseudological apocalypticist of the Maccabean times, would, without any doubt whatever, have presented to our notice persons of the stamp of Matthias (1 Macc. ii. 2, 18 et seq.), Judas and Simon Maccabeus (ibid. chap. iii. 1 et seq.), and Eleazar (2 Macc. vi.) as opponents of the raging heathen, instead of a man like Daniel. A narrative of the kind before us, as respects its contents and progress, would be wholly inconceivable as a product of the orthodox Palestinian Judaism of the year B. C. 166, and would rank as an unequalled historical monstrosity.

2. Accordingly, if confidence may be placed in the pre-Maccabean, and, what amounts to the same thing, in the Babylonian origin of the history during the captivity, it will be possible for that very reason to examine the miracle of the mysteriously introduced hand which traced the writing, as here recorded, without being restrained by sceptical considerations. It will not be necessary to inquire in this connection, how such a thing could take place, but merely, whether and why such an event was necessary.—The necessity for a miraculous announcement to Belshazzar of the impending judgment was conditioned by the fact that his impious conduct had reached an intolerable height when he desecrated the sacred vessels of Jehovah's temple to a common use, and exposed them to the ridicule of a besotted heathen mob, and also that it threatened danger to the faith in Jehovah of the community of exiles. If such an act of presumption was permitted to pass without being Divinely censured and punished, it might certainly be expected that not only the last spark of reverence for the mighty God of the Jews would fade from the consciousness of the royal officials and the Babylonian population, but that the faithful adherence of the Jewish captives to their confession would gradually lose its firmness, and give way to a tendency to favor the idolatrous worship of the Babylonians, and to adopt their luxurious, dissipated, and immoral mode of life. Dangers such as these are described, in a realizing manner, in the second part of Isaiah (see xlii. 6 et seq.; lvii. 5 et seq.; lxv. 3 et seq.; lviii. 2 et seq.; lix. 3 et seq. Cf. supra, Introd. § 1, note 1); and it appears from the penitential prayer of our prophet in chap. ix., that they existed for his people, and threatened the continuance of the theocracy and its Messianic faith, while in the land of exile. With regard to them it became imperatively necessary that a stern example should be made of the presumptuous king, while giving utterance to his witticisms and blasphemies, and while surrounded by the sycophants of his court and the women of his harem, that thus the name of the only true God might be brought powerfully to the recollection of all, and that an emphatic testimony, coupled with an immediate execution of the threat, might be borne against the impious conduct of the idolaters. Such a testimony, however, could only possess sufficient weight if it were demonstrated to be absolutely miraculous, admitting of no natural explanation (i.e., for the purpose of destroying its supernatural force), and transpiring under the observation of all who were present. For this reason all the various attempts to limit the incomprehensible character of the incident, that have been made by modern expositors since M. Geier, are to be rejected, without exception; e.g., the assumption of Geier, which decidedly conflicts with v. 8, that the writing was visible to the king and Daniel, but to no others (similarly Calvin remarks that the Chaldeans were all smitten with blindness—"ita excecatos fuisse, ut videndo non viderint"); the coarsely naturalistic attempt at explanation made by Bertholdt, that the hostile party of the king's courtiers, who were in league with the Medo-Persian besiegers of the city, produced the writing in a purely natural manner, but gave a mysterious appearance to the transaction, in order "to gratify their malice and over-confidence, by announcing his last hour to the victim of their treason;" and finally, the psychological-visionary mode of interpretation, advocated in the last century by Lüderwald, and more recently by Kranichfeld—the latter by means of an attempt to transfer the miraculous feature to the imagination of the king (cf. his observation on v. 8, p. 221: "How and when during the hilarious banquet the writing itself was traced on the wall, was of no importance to the author, as the wonderful feature was alone significant for his purpose, that the king should observe, at the moment of the blasphemous act by which he ridiculed the God of Israel, the hand which wrote the sentence that changed the confident humor of the idolater into anxious fear"). In opposition to these naturalizing interpretations, and especially to the one last mentioned, see the remarks on v. 5, and compare Buddeus, Hist. eccl. V. Test., II p. 508: "Verum quis non videt, hæc omnia ad meras conjecturas redire, quæ eadem rejiciuntur facilitate, quæ afferuntur. Satis itaque fuerit, in iis acquiescere, quæ Daniel ipse de hac re tradiderit, scripturam scilicet ita comparatam fuisse, ut sapientes et magi, etsi eam viderent (v. 8), non tamen legere, multo minus interpretari potuerint; Danielum autem eam ita et legere et interpretari potuisse, ut rex ipse statim convinceretur, lectionem istam atque interpretationem veram esse." Also cf. Pfeiffer, Dubia vexata, p. 508 ss., and Starke, Synops. on the passage.

3. In accordance with this, the homiletical treatment of the section is chiefly concerned with the miracle of the writing and its mysterious origin and contents, as the central point of the narrative, and also of its theological and ethical importance. As in the preceding chapter the object of the narrative was to show that "pride goeth before destruction," so the aim here is to illustrate the "judgments that are prepared for scorners" (Prov. xix. 29), the "snare" into which "they bring the whole city" (Prov. xxix. 8), the "non-immunity from punishment of the blasphemers of the Divine Wisdom" (Wisd. i. 6). Cf. Psa. i. 1; Jer. xv. 17; Prov. xiii. 1; xiv. 6; xxiv. 9; also Eccles. xxvii. 28: "Mockery and reproach are from the proud; but vengeance as a lion shall lie in wait for them;" Psa. lxxii. 4: "He shall break in pieces the oppressor" (or blasphemer); 1 Cor. v. 10: "Nor revilers . . . shall inherit the kingdom of God,"—and other oracles directed against the reviling and blaspheming of the Holy One, which may afford a theme for a homiletical treatment of the section as a whole. Starke is therefore correct in designating as the leading features of the narrative "Belshazzar's transgression and his punishment." Cf. Geier's arrangement of subjects in this chapter: "(1) Regium flagitium (v. 1-4); (2) subsequens portentum (v. 5, 6); (3) portenti interpretamentum, partim ut profanis impossibile (v. 7-6), partim ut Danieli expeditum ac facile (v. 10-28); (4) interpretamenti complementum (v. 29, 30)."—With reference to the relation of the fundamental idea in this narrative to that of the preceding section, cf. Melancthon: "Supra proposuit regem agentem penitentiam et propagantem veros cultus, quem Deus etiam ornavit promissis. Nunc addit contrarium exemplum regis impij, restitutionis idolatriam, non agentis penitentiam, quem Deus puniit et regno exuit . . . Has blasphemias enim cito sequuntur pœna, juxta secundum præceptum: 'Non habebit Deus insontem,' etc. (Ex. xx. 7)."

Upon separate points the following passages may be used, as furnishing suitable matter for homiletical discussion.

Verses 2-4. Luxurious banquets and carousals are dangerous precipices, even for the pious and unsuspecting (cf. Jude v. 12); at them Satan himself is the host and master (Cramer, in Starke, under reference to 1 Cor. x. 20), and there religion, the fear of God, brotherly love, uprightness, morality—and, in short, everything is forgotten (Starke).

Verse 17. Daniel's disinterestedness and modesty. On these Jerome observes: "Abmulemur Daniele, regis dignitatem et munera contemnentem, qui absque pretio proferens veritatem jam illo tempore præceptum evangelicum sequabitur: 'Gratis accipitis, gratis date' (Matt. x. 8). Alioquin et tristia nuntiantem indecens erat libenter dona accipere."

Verses 25-28. The oracle against Belshazzar, whose spirit is: "If thou wilt neglect to number thy days, to weigh thyself in the balance of divine righteousness (Job xxxi. 6), and to measure thyself by the rule of the Divine law, thou shalt be weighed by God in the scale of His judgment, and—be found wanting." Cf. the figure of farming grain, Am. ix. 9; Isa. xxx. 24; Jer. xv. 7; Matt. iii. 12; Luke xxii. 31, etc.; and also Joachim Lange: "Outside of Christ we are always wanting in the scales of God, and are lighter than nothing," Psa. lxii. 10, and Starke: "The duration of every kingdom is pre-determined by God; without the permission of God, no monarch is able to extend or limit it," etc.

6. The deliverance of Daniel from the lion's den.

CHAP. VI. 1-29. [English Bible, v. 31-vi. 28.]

31 Darius the Median took [received] the kingdom, being about three score and two years old [as a son of sixty and two years].

1 It pleased [seemed good before] Darius to set over the kingdom a hundred and twenty princes [satraps], which should be over the whole [in all the] kingdom; and over these [them], three presidents, of whom Daniel was first [one]; that the [these] princes might give accounts [the reason] unto them, and the king should have no damage [not be damaged].

3 Then this Daniel was preferred [made eminent] above the presidents and princes, because an excellent spirit was in him; and the king thought to set him over the whole realm [all the kingdom]. Then the presidents and princes sought [were seeking] to find occasion against [cause as to] Daniel concerning [from the side of] the kingdom; but [and] they could find none occasion nor fault [corrupt thing]; forasmuch as he was faithful, neither was there any error [wrong] or fault [corrupt thing] found in him.

5 Then said these men, [That] We shall not find any occasion against [cause as to] this Daniel, except we find it against him concerning [in] the law of his God.

6 Then these presidents and princes assembled [crowded] together to [upon] the king, and said thus unto him, King Darius, live for ever. All the presidents of

- the kingdom, the governors, and the princes, the counsellors, and the captains [pashas], have consulted together to establish a royal [or, for the king to establish a] statute [an established act of the king], and to make a firm decree [confirm an interdict], that whosoever [any one that] shall ask a petition of [an asking from] any god or man for [till] thirty days, save of [except from] thee, O king, he shall be cast into the den of [the] lions. Now, O king, [mayest thou] establish the decree [interdict], and sign the writing, that it be not changed [change not], according to [like] the law of the Medes [Media] and Persians [Persia], which altereth not [will not pass away]. Wherefore [Therefore the] king Darius signed the writing and the decree [interdict].
- 10 Now when Daniel [And Daniel, as soon as he] knew that the writing was signed, he went into his house; and, his [its] windows being [were] open in his [its upper] chamber toward [in front of] Jerusalem, [and] he ^s kneeled upon his knees three times a day [in the day], and prayed [was praying], and gave thanks [thanking] before his God, as he did aforetime [because he was doing so from before that time]. Then these men assembled [crowded in], and found Daniel praying [asking] and making supplication before his God.
- 12 Then they came near, and spake before the king concerning [upon] the king's decree [interdict]; Hast thou not signed a decree [an interdict], that every [any] man that shall ask a petition of [from] any god or man within [till] thirty days, save of [except from] thee, O king, shall be cast into the den of [the] lions? The king answered and said, The thing is true [word is firm] according to [like] the law of the Medes [Media] and Persians [Persia], which altereth not [will not pass away]. Then answered they, and said before the king, That ^s Daniel, which is of [from] the captivity of the children of Judah, regardeth not [has not put attention upon] thee, O king, nor [and] the decree [interdict] that thou hast signed, but [and] maketh his petition [is asking his asking] three times a day [in the day]. Then the king, when he heard these words [this word (thing)], was sore displeased with [it greatly offended upon] himself, and [he] set his heart on Daniel to deliver him; and he laboured [was exerting himself] till the going down of the sun to deliver [rescue] him.
- 15 Then these men assembled [crowded] unto [upon] the king, and said unto the king, Know, O king, that the law of the Medes and Persians is [it is a law to Media and Persia], that no decree nor statute [interdict and established act] which the king establisheth [shall establish] may be changed [change]. Then the king commanded [said], and they brought Daniel, and cast him into the den of [the] lions. Now the king spake and said unto Daniel, Thy God, whom thou ^s servest continually [art serving in continuity], he ^s will [may he] deliver thee. And a stone was brought, and laid upon the mouth of the den; and the king sealed it with his own signet, and with the signet of his lords, that the purpose [(will) matter] might not be changed [change] concerning [in respect to] Daniel.
- 18 Then the king went to his palace, and passed [lodged] the night fasting: neither were instruments of music brought [and concubines he did not bring] before him, and his sleep went from [fled upon] him. Then the king arose very early in the morning [in the dawn would rise in the early light], and went in haste unto the den of [the] lions. And when he came [near] to the den, he cried with a lamentable [pained] voice unto Daniel: and the king spake and said to Daniel, O Daniel, servant of the living God, is thy God, whom thou ^s servest continually [art serving in continuity], able ^s to deliver thee from the lions? Then said [talked] Daniel unto [with] the king, O king, live for ever. My God hath sent his angel, and hath shut the lions' mouths, that [and] they have not hurt me: forasmuch as before him innocency was found in [to] me; and also before thee, O king, have I done no hurt.
- 23 Then was the king exceeding glad [it greatly rejoiced] for him [upon himself], and commanded [said] that they should take Daniel up out of the den. So [And] Daniel was taken up out of the den, and no manner of hurt was found upon [in] him, because he believed in his God.
- 24 And the king commanded [said], and they brought those men which [who] had accused * Daniel, and they cast them into the den of [the] lions, them, their children, and their wives; and the lions had the mastery of them, and brake all their bones in pieces or ever [ere] they came at the bottom of the den.'

- 25 Then [the] king Darius wrote unto all people, nations, and languages, * that 26 dwell in all the earth; Peace be multiplied unto you. * I make¹⁰ a decree, That in every dominion of my kingdom men tremble and fear¹¹ before the God of Daniel; for he is the living God, and steadfast for ever, and his kingdom that 27 which shall not be destroyed, and his dominion shall be even unto the end. He delivereth [delivering] and rescueth [rescuing], and he worketh [working] signs and wonders in heaven [the heavens] and in [the] earth, who hath delivered Daniel from the power of the lions.
28 So [And] this Daniel prospered in the reign of Darius, and in the reign of Cyrus the Persian.

GRAMMATICAL NOTES.

[¹ As Chap. vi. in the original begins with verse 31 of the A. V., there is a difference of one in numbering the verses of this section.—² The form מֶלֶךְ followed by יָדָה seems like a noun in the emphatic state, and may not inaptly be rendered, "as the chief above."—³ The pronoun, being expressed, is emphatic.—⁴ יָדָה here = ἐν expletive.—⁵ The order of words is emphatic: Thy God . . . has He been able.—⁶ Literally, that ate His pieces of, i. e., backbit, as in chap. iii. 8.—⁷ The order and style of the original are very emphatic: and they did not reach to the earth of the den till that (before) the lions ruled over them, etc.—⁸ The terms in the original are the same as in chap. iii. 4, the nations, the peoples, and the tongues.—⁹ Literally, May your peace be great.—¹⁰ From me is made.—¹¹ They shall be trembling and fearing from.]

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

Verse 1 [v. 31]. Transitional introductory observations. And Darius the Median took the kingdom, etc. The copula before וַיִּקַּח serves, indeed, to connect the present section closely with the preceding one, and indicates that its subject is more intimately related to the foregoing, than is the case in chapters iii., iv., and v., which begin without any copulative particle whatever. The וַיִּקַּח however, does not compel the assumption that chapters v. and vi. were properly a unit in their plan and the time of their composition (Hitzig, Kranichfeld); for (1) chap. ii., although forming a decidedly independent whole, likewise begins with the copula, as do also numerous sections in the historical and prophetic portions of the Old Testament, whose subjects are independent of what precedes them. (2) Kranichfeld's opinion (p. 210) that chap. v. ought to conclude with a "theocratic panegyric closing sentence" similar to chap. vi. 27, 28, if it were to rank as an independent and complete section in itself, is apparently confirmed, indeed, by the closing verses of chaps. ii., iii., and iv., but is decidedly opposed by chap. i., which has no such doxology at the close. (3) Chapters v. and vi. are distinguished from each other by several unmistakable differences in the mode of expression and representation, which indicate the composition of these sections at different times. Notice especially the character of the descriptions in chap. v., which are more circumstantial and full of repetitions than those in chap. vi. (cf. vs. 2, 3, 4 with v. 23; v. 7 with v. 12; v. 12 with v. 16; v. 16 with vs. 7 and 20, etc.). (4) The transactions recorded in the two sections are separated by an interval of at least twenty-two years (cf. supra, on chap. v. 30) since the events of chap. v. transpired under the fourth reign before the close of the Chaldean dynasty, while chap. vi. falls in the reign of Darius the Mede,—which covered about two years and a half—and probably not in its opening period (see vs. 15, 17); and chap. v. creates the impression that it was composed immediately after the events which it records transpired, and that, like all the narratives in the historical part of the book, it originated while they were still fresh in the recollection of the writer (cf. Introd., § 4, note 2). The connection of the two sections by means of a copulative וַיִּקַּח despite the difference in the time of their composition, is probably owing to the circumstance that at the close of chap. v. only the beginning of the fulfilment of the oracle addressed to Belshazzar had been noticed, while the principal fact, which concludes the fulfilment, is reserved for the narrative in the present section; cf. on chap. v. 30.—For the view that "Darius the Mede" can only designate Cyaxares, the son of Astyages and father-in-law of Cyrus, see Introd., § 8, note 4. Perhaps the Sept. also referred to this Cyaxares, when it translated this passage καὶ Ἀραξέρξης ὁ τῶν Μήδων πατέρας τὴν βασιλείαν καὶ Δαρείος πλήρης τῶν ἡμερῶν καὶ ἐνδοξος ἐν γῆρι; by Ἀραξέρξης they may have intended Astyages, the father of Darius Medus, and by the predicate πλήρης κατ., which they applied to Darius, they may have attempted to repeat the קָבַר קָבַר of the second half of the verse (cf. Michaelis, Oriental. Bibl., iv. 20). Despite the marked ignorance of history which the Alexandrians occasionally reveal, they can hardly be presumed to have been guilty of the gross anachronism of confounding the Median Darius with Darius Nothus, the son of Artaxerxes I. Longimanus (against Hävernick).—Ebrard (Die Offenbarung Johannis [in Olshausen's Bibl. Kommentar], p. 55 et seq., and in a review of Fuller's Prophet Daniel in the Göttersche Allg. literar. Anzeiger, October, 1868, p. 267), attempts, in harmony with his assumption that Belshazzar was identical with Laborasarchad, to identify Darius the Mede with Nabonidus, whom the conspirators who slew Laborasarchad elevated to the throne (similarly Syncellus, Scaliger, Petavius and Buddeus). In this way he certainly succeeds in removing every difference between the time of chap. v. 30 and vi. 1; but he neglects to notice (1) that Laborasarchad was a grandson of Nebuchadnezzar, instead of being his son, as chap. v. 11 et seq. requires; (2) that Nabonidus, according to the express statement of Berosus, was not of Median, but of Babylonian descent, although not of royal blood; (3) that according to vs. 9, 13, and 16 (the "laws of the Medes and Persians") the administration of the king in question is characterized, in the plainest manner, as modelled and organized after the Medo-Persian code, rather than the Babylonian; (4) that the system of espionage and denunciation (vs. 12, 14, 16), the barbarous custom of executing the families of criminals (v. 25) together with the culprit, and also the aristocratic constitutional procedure connected with the promulgation of the prohibition and with the sealing of the stone (vs. 8, 18), all likewise refer to specifically Medo-Persian arrangements, such as could not yet have been introduced under Nabonidus. These arguments will also hold good against A. Scheuchzer, of Zurich, who, without reference to Ebrard, and to some extent basing his views on different grounds, has recently likewise attempted to identify Nabonidus with Darius the Mede (Assyrische Forschungen, in Heidenheim's Vierteljahrsschrift für engl.-theolog. Forschung, vol. IV., No. 1, p. 17 et seq.).—["The addition of כֶּתִיב (Kethib) forms on the one hand a contrast to the expression, 'the king of the Chaldeans' (chap. v. 30), and on the other hand it points forward to כֶּתִיב, ver. 29 (28); it, however, furnishes no proof that Daniel distinguished the Median kingdom from the Persian; for the kingdom is not called a Median kingdom, but it is only said of Darius that he was of Median descent, and, ver. 29 (28), that Cyrus the Persian succeeded him. In כֶּתִיב, he received the kingdom, it is indicated that Darius did not conquer it, but received it from the conqueror" (Keth.).]—Being about three-score and two years old. This precise and concrete designation of his age was hardly designed to note that he had overthrown the Chaldean empire after attaining to old age and when he was no longer competent to the personal conduct of warlike operations (Kranichfeld); for such a purpose is not expressed with sufficient clearness, and moreover, the implied reference to the weakness and defenceless condition of the declining Babylonian empire would involve a historical inaccuracy which cannot well be charged against the author. The real motive that led him to mention the age of Darius can only consist in the design to refer to the considerably later time of the taking of Babylon, in its relation to the events that had just been described (cf. supra, on chap. v. 80).*

Verses 2, 3 [1, 2]. The new constitution of the empire under Darius, and the position assigned to Daniel. It pleased Darius to set over the kingdom a hundred and twenty princes. The Sept. increases this number to 127, probably with a reference to Esth. i. 1. Josephus Ant. X. 13 multiplies it by three (ἐξήκοντα καὶ τριακόσιαι σατράπαι), perhaps because he believed each of the three chief prefects to have been placed over 120 satraps, or because he believed himself obliged to make the number of satrapies equal to that of the days in the year. The number 120 is to be retained, in opposition to both these uncritical attempts to enlarge it, although no other authorities mention so large a number of satrapies or provinces in the Medo-Persian empire at the time of its first organization under Darius-Cyaxares and Cyrus, and although according to both Herodotus and Xenophon their number seems to have been considerably smaller at that period. The former of these authors mentions no definite organization of satrapies by Cyrus whatever, and remarks of Darius Hystaspis that he founded in all only twenty of such provinces for the whole empire (III. 89); the latter notices satraps under Cyrus as well, but mentions only nine, eight of whom were appointed for Asia Minor and one for Arabia—from which it might be concluded that the aggregate number of such officials did not much exceed twenty, and perhaps, did not even reach that number (Cyrop. VII. 4, 2; VIII. 6). The statements of these Greek historians do not, however, compel us to doubt the accuracy of Daniel's report, or to reduce the number from 120 to 20; for various indications lead to the conclusion that the number and boundaries of the satrapies varied exceedingly in different periods of the Persian empire. The three lists of Persian provinces, for instance, which are found among the inscriptions of Darius (at Persepolis, at Behistun, and at Nakshi Rostam) enumerate on the whole thirty-three satrapies or provinces, without permitting us to regard the number as exhaustively complete. The opinion that such changes among the satrapies actually occurred is further supported by Ezra viii. 36, where several satraps beyond the Euphrates are mentioned as holding office under Artaxerxes, while Herodotus, III. 91, knew of but one; and also by Esth. i. 1, where the whole number of the Persian satrapies is fixed at 127, etc. Hence, it must probably be assumed that at different times the arrangement of provinces varied in the Persian empire, and that a subdivision of the realm into numerous smaller sections (whose number, 120, may have been symbolically significant, and relating to astronomical conditions) existed already under Darius-Medus and Cyrus, but in such a manner that in addition a reckoning by larger, and consequently less numerous provinces, was customary. The division into 120 smaller satrapies may have descended to the Medo-Persians from the Chaldeo-Babylonian world-kingdom, in which, according to chap. iii. 2, 27, the title of satrap had long been known, and on account of its almost sacred astronomical importance, they may have gladly admitted it into the constitution of their realm. The enumeration by larger and less numerous (20-30) satrapies may have been chiefly in use in the official language of the court and the arts in the kingdom of the Achæmenides, as being a national Medo-Persian institution, and for that reason may have been principally or exclusively observed by the Greeks. The Biblical enumeration, having a Babylonian origin, may therefore be properly designated as the esoteric or hieratic, and the ancient Aryan division, supported by the classics, as the exoteric or demotic. Nor is it a questionable feature that on this explanation the title khatrapa (shōitrapaiti, achashdaxpan) was applied interchangeably to the administrators of both larger and smaller divisions; since this harmonizes well with the fluctuations of later Hellenistic writers in rendering the word and especially with the indecision of the Sept. On this question, and in relation to the origin and significance of the title of satrap, cf. the exeg. remarks on chap. iii. 2.—Verse 8 [21]. And over these three presidents, of whom Daniel was first; rather, “was one.” [The following verse, however, shows that he was the principal one]. The סָרְקִין (in the Targ. equivalent to שְׂרָרִים, “arrangers, overseers”) were certainly “chief-prefects, princes, ministers,” whether the סָרְקִין is regarded as related to שָׂר, i.e., as derived, by means of the Pers. participle of derivation שָׂר, from the Zend sara (Gr. kapa, Pers. ser), “head,” or as related to the Sanscr. carana, “protector,” or also to tāraka, “steersman” (the former according to Gesenius, the latter, to Hitzig). The dignity of these Sarekin was doubtless identical with that of the Talkain or “triumvirs,” who are mentioned in the preceding chapter (vs. 7, 16, 29) as the superior princes of the realm, or heads of the government under Belshazzar. Accordingly, like the 120 satraps, they were a class of dignitaries in the Medo-Persian kingdom, whose office was modelled after the Babylonian precedent, but was discontinued at a later period, or perhaps, was developed into the institution of the seven counsellors of the Persian kings (corresponding to the seven Amshaspands—cf. Esth. i. 14; Ezra vii. 14; Herod. III. 31). Daniel owed his elevation to this rank to the circumstance that he had already been raised to the dignity of a triumvir by Belshazzar, and had probably remained in that office until the overthrow of the Chaldean kingdom; as also Nebuchadnezzar, according to chap. ii. 48, 49, had already conferred on him a position of distinguished political and priestly power and eminence.—That the princes (satraps) might give accounts to them, and the king should have no damage, i.e., not suffer loss in his revenues (cf. דָּן Ezra iv. 13, 15, and דָּן Esth. vii. 4). The satraps are thus designated more particularly as officers of finance, which doubtless constituted one of their chief functions; cf. Herod. III. 89 et seq.

Verses 4, 5 [3, 4]. The ill-will of the other grand officials of the realm against Daniel. Then this Daniel was preferred above (showed himself superior to) the presidents, etc. מִתְּהַיָּהוּ, “distinguished himself, outshone them.” The demonstrative הַזֶּה, “this,” which is connected with the name of Daniel only here and in v. 20, is conceived and spoken from the standpoint of his opponents, who look with envy on him (istum) whom God has hitherto so highly favored with His assistance. In this way the succeeding remark, “because an excellent spirit was in him” (cf. chap. v. 12), may likewise be explained without involving any suspicion of self-laudation on the part of the narrator.—And the king thought to set him over the whole realm, hence, to promote him to the office of grand-vizier or prime minister—the superior of the “triumvirs” or Sarekin. The Targums always employ the Ithpael for the intransitive עָשָׂה, “to be inclined, to purpose.” [“This intention of the king stirred up the envy of the other presidents” (Keil)].—Verse 5 [4]. Then the presidents . . . sought to find occasion against Daniel concerning the kingdom, i.e., they sought to assail his official character; and only after frequent proofs that their efforts in this direction were futile, did they direct their attention to his religious standpoint (v. 6 et seq.).*—But they could find none occasion nor fault.

עָלָה, as before, is an “occasion, opportunity, pretext,” upon which the accusation might be based [“as aitia, John xviii. 38; Matt. xxvii. 37, an occasion for impeachment” (Keil)]. This more general term may be co-ordinated with שְׂחָדָה, “wickedness,” because it is conceived concretely or objectively; and hence also with the following שָׁלֵי, “fault, inadvertence” (from שָׁלַח, the probable primitive form for שָׂרָה; cf. in the Gr. σῶλος and σῶγος). Fidelity is the leading political virtue of the servant or officer of a government (cf. 1 Cor. iv. 2), in like manner as justice and mercy should be the ornament of rulers (chap. iv. 24).

Verses 6–10 [5–9]. The procuring of a governmental edict pertaining to religion, directed against Daniel.† We shall not . . . against this Daniel, except we find it against him concerning the law of his God. דִּין אֱלֹהֵי, the law of Daniel's God, is the theocratic law, considered as the rule of his religious life, and especially of his devotional exercises. Cf. דִּין in Ezra vii. 6, 12, 14, 21, 25, 26; and supra, chap. ii. 2.—Verse 7. Then these presidents (princes) and princes (satraps) assembled together to the king; rather (as marg.), “ran in stormy haste.” “These princes and satraps” (cf. “these men.” v. 6 [5]) were not, of course, all of them, without exception, but only those who envied and sought to calumniate Daniel, since only such are here concerned; cf. v. 25 [24]. The idea that all the satraps participated is the more improbable, in view of the fact that the possible presence of all in the metropolis is nowhere indicated (cf.

† [“With Satanic cunning the princes shaped this proposed law to take with the king by a bait for his low vanity, and to entrap Daniel through his known decision and firmness in the worship of his God. It was the best compliment they could pay to Daniel that they assumed so confidently that he would pray to God none the less for this monstrous law. It was the kindest reproach to their king that they should anticipate his ready assent to such a law under the impulse of his excessive vanity. Darius was a weak and vain king, else he would have asked, What can be the motive of these men in proposing such a law? Plainly the appended exception, ‘Save of thee, O king,’ was so grateful to his vanity that it blinded his dull eye to the monstrous nature and possible bearings of this law.”—Cowles.]

even in v. 8 [7]).—On אָרִישׁ, “to rush anywhere in stormy haste, to rush anywhere frequently” [rather, tumultuously] (Luther, “came often”), cf. the German “jemanden die Thüre stürmen” (“to storm somebody’s door”); see infra, vs. 12 [11] and 16 [15].—Verse 8. All the presidents (princes) of the kingdom, the governors, and the princes (satraps), the counsellors, and the captains (prefects) have consulted together; rather, “have considered it advisable.” אָרִישׁ seems here to be employed in a more extended sense than heretofore (vs. 3 [2], 5 [4], and 7 [6]), where it designates the chief-prefects who were placed over the satraps; * for the four classes of officials which follow—the same as in chap. iii. 27, but in a different order—are evidently intended to specialize the pre-fixed general idea of “princes” or “prefects” (thus Chr. B. Michaelis correctly, against Hitzig and others, who in this place also regard the Sarekin as the chief prefects who were Daniel’s colleagues). In like manner the term Chaldeans was found to be employed above, at one time to designate a special class of wise men, and at another to denote the whole order of magicians (see on chap. ii. 2).†—In relation to אָרִישׁ, “to determine or agree among themselves,” compare the term רֹצֵעַ, “a counsellor,” consiliarius, as designating one of the principal officers of the Persian king, Ezra vii. 14, 15.—To establish a royal statute; rather, “that the king should establish a statute.” In view of the accentuation, מְלִכָּא is not to be construed with אָרִישׁ as a genitive (“to establish a royal statute,”

* [“If we compare the list of the four official classes here mentioned with that of the great officers of state under Nebuchadnezzar, ch. iii. 2, the naming of the אָרִישׁ before the אֶחָד־מִן־הַסָּטְרָפִים (satraps, while in ch. iii. 2 they are named after them) shows that the אָרִישׁ are here great officers to whom the satraps were subordinate, and that only the three אָרִישׁ could be meant to whom the satraps had to render an account. Moreover, the list of four names is divided by the copula וְ into two classes. To the first class belong the אָרִישׁ and the satraps; to the second the אֶחָד־מִן־הַסָּטְרָפִים, state councillors, and the אֶחָד־מִן־הַפְּרָפֶטִים, civil prefects of the provinces. Accordingly, we will scarcely err if by אָרִישׁ we understand the members of the highest council of state, by אֶחָד־מִן־הַפְּרָפֶטִים the ministers or members of the (lower) state council, and by the satraps and pebas the military and civil rulers of the provinces. This grouping of the names confirms, consequently, the general interpretation of the אָרִישׁ מְלִכָּא, for the four classes named constitute the entire chief prefecture of the kingdom. This interpretation is not made questionable by the fact that the אָרִישׁ had in the kingdom of Darius a different position from that they held in the kingdom of Nebuchadnezzar; for in this respect each kingdom had its own particular arrangement, which underwent manifold changes according to the times.”—Keil.]

† [“The whole connection of the narrative plainly shows that the authors of the accusation deceived the king. The council of state, or chief court, to which all the satraps had to render an account, consisted of three men, of whom Daniel was one. But Daniel certainly was not called to this consultation; therefore their pretence that all ‘presidents of the kingdom’ had consulted on the matter, was false. Besides, they deceived the king in this, that they concealed from him the intention of the decree, or misled him regarding it.”—Keil.]

etc.), but must be regarded as the subject of the Inf. לְקַיְמָה, so that the object אָרִישׁ is placed between the infinitive and its noun, as in Isa. v. 24; xix. 8; xx. 1 (thus correctly Rosenmüller, Hitzig, Kranichfeld, [Keil], etc., against Theodotion, Vulgate, Luther, Bertholdt, and a majority of moderns). *—And make a firm interdict (marg.). The אָרִישׁ which the king was to establish, is at the same time an אָרִישׁ, “interdict;” in the parallelism of the address it is at first designated generally as a “statute,” and afterwards more especially as an “interdict.” On אָרִישׁ, “to bind,” in the sense of “to prohibit,” see Num. xxx. 10, and also the N.T. deceiv as the opposite of ἀπειν, Matt. xvi. 19; xviii. 18.—That whosoever shall ask a petition . . . for thirty days; i.e., during the thirty days next ensuing, from that time until the expiration of thirty days. Literally, “unto thirty days.” This number, the triplicate of the ten days in chap. i. 12-15, is a round number, corresponding to the duration of a month, and employed otherwise also as a general period, during which an interdict was imposed on persons; e.g., by the vows of Nazarites, Acts xxi. 26; cf. Tract. Nasir. I. 3; Joseph., de B. Jud., II. 15, 1.—The command (or interdict) to pray † during one month only to the king was in this instance specially aimed at Daniel, the pious worshipper of Jehovah, for the purpose of entrapping him; but it was suggested by a national religious custom of older date among the Medes, by which Divine honors were rendered to the king. Herodotus, I. 199, refers to this custom, when he remarks that Deioces had introduced the περὶ ἐαυτὸν σέβειν for himself and his successors, by removing his person from the observation of his subjects, in order to persuade them that he was ἑρπείων (cf. also Xenophon, Cyrop., I. 3, 18). The existence of this custom among the Medes is further substantiated by the fact that the Persians, who were intimately related to the Medes, observed it, as did several others of the Oriental nations of antiquity (e.g., the Egyptians and Ethiopians, according to Diodor., Sicil., I. 90; III. 8, 5)—the former from the peculiar religious reason that they considered the king as the “offspring of the gods” (ἐκγονὸς θεῶν) and the image of Ormuzd, and even addressed him directly as θεός; cf. Eschylus, Pers., 157, 855; Plutarch, Themist., 27; Cur-

* [But this construction is extremely harsh, and, as Lengerke remarks, opposed to the usage of אָרִישׁ מְלִכָּא in v. 13. Even Rosenmüller renders (apparently by inadvertence, however) decreto regio. The passages adduced by the author from Isaiah (xix. 8 is not correct) are not altogether in point, as the preposition there is not לְ, but בְּ or בָּ. Had the writer intended such a construction he would naturally have used וְ with the fut. The Masoretic interpunction, however, undeniably favors it.]

† [The term “בער” is here not any kind of request or supplication, but prayer, as the phrase, ver. 14 (13), אָרִישׁ

אֶת־הַמֶּלֶךְ, directing his prayer, shows. The word אָרִישׁ does not prove the contrary, for the heathen prayed also to men (cf. ch. ii. 46), and here the clause, except to the king places together god and man, so that the king might not observe that the prohibition was specially directed against Daniel.”—Keil.]

See the Ethico-fund. principles, etc., against the assumption of the modern pseudo-Daniel tendency-criticism, on which the edict of Darius in question is a cunningly invented prototype, and at the same time an exaggerated caricature of the course of Antiochus Epiphanes as described in 1 Macc. i. 41 et seq.; 2 Macc. vi. 1 et seq.—Verse 9 [8]. Now, O king, establish the decree and sign the writing; rather, “and record the writing.” for רשם always signifies to record, and not to sign; and moreover, the Persian edicts received their official stamp as laws from the royal seal, instead of the royal signature; * cf. Esth. iii. 10 et seq.; viii. 8.—That it be not changed, according to the law of the Medes and Persians, i.e., according to that law of the united Medo-Persian realm, as is somewhat more fully described in v. 16 [15], by which every official edict from the king, issued with certain formalities, should possess enduring force as law, hence, “should not be changed” (לֹא יִשָּׁנֶה) אֲמַר, cf. Winer, Gramm., § 46, 3); cf. Esth. i. 19; viii. 8. Against the opinion of Von Lengerke, that the writer here was guilty of an anachronism, since the phrase “the law of the Medes and Persians” must have originated subsequently to the time of Cyrus, cf. supra. Hitzig also rejects this position of Von Lengerke, inasmuch as he denies, for telling reasons, the presumption on which it rests, that דָּרִי in that formula designates the whole body of laws of the kingdom.—[Verse 10 (9). “The king carried out the proposal. אֲמַר is explicative: the writing, namely, the prohibition (spoken of); for this was the chief matter, therefore אֲמַר alone is here mentioned, and not also דָּרִי (edict), ver. 8 (7).”—Keil.]

Verses 11, 12 [10, 11]. Daniel's protest, by his conduct, against the royal decree.† And, his windows being open in his chamber toward Jerusalem; rather, “but he [it] had open windows,” etc. The upper chamber, or attic, receives consideration as being more removed and less liable to be disturbed, hence as being particularly adapted to purposes of devotion; cf.

* [This distinction is rather over-nice; for it was not the engraving of the edict, surely, that the magnates desired, and this of course would not have been done by the royal hand, but his official approval and sanction, such as a signature—whether by writing or stamping the name—only could confer.]

† [“The satraps did not wait long for Daniel's expected disregard of the king's prohibition. . . . He continued this custom (of prayer) even after the issuing of the edict; for a discontinuance of it on account of that law would have been a denying of the faith and a sinning against God. On this his enemies had reckoned. They secretly watched him, and immediately reported his disregard of the king's command. In ver. 11 (10), the place where he was wont to pray is more particularly described in order that it might be shown how they could observe him.”—Keil.]

‡ [“אֲמַר does not refer to Daniel (‘he had opened windows’), but to הַבַּיִת, his house had open windows. If אֲמַר referred to Daniel, then the אֲמַר following would be superfluous.”—Keil. The same remark of course will apply to הַבַּיִת following.]

2 Sam. xix. 1; 1 Kings xvii. 20; Acts i. 13; x. 9.—“Opened windows,” בָּרִיר פְּתִיחוֹת, are the opposite of such as are covered with lattice-work (בָּרִיר זָהָרִיךְ, Ezek. xl. 16) by which the view is obstructed. These open windows were required to be “toward Jerusalem,” because according to ancient custom the face of the worshipper must be turned towards the temple in that city; for as in Jerusalem the supplicant turned toward the sanctuary (Psa. v. 8; xxviii. 2 etc.), so he turned when abroad towards the “holy city” (Matt. iv. 5) as the site of the temple. This was the case long prior to the captivity; see 1 Kings viii. 33, 35, 38, 44, 48; 2 Chron. vi. 29, 34, 38. The corresponding custom among the Mahomedans (Kibla) with reference to Mecca, appears thus to be the imitation of a custom developed on the primitive soil of Bible lands; and for the earliest followers of Islam Jerusalem itself was Kibla. On the other hand, the ancient Jewish and the most ancient Christian custom prohibited, on the ground of Ezek. viii. 16, 17, the turning of the face in prayer towards the east, i.e., towards the sun (cf. Clement, Strom. VII. 724; Origen, Homil. V. in Num.; Tertull. Apol. c. 16), while the later church, standing on the ground of Mal. iii. 20; Luke i. 78 et seq., zealously recommended that supplicants and houses for prayer should face towards the east, and introduced it into general use. Cf. Bingham, Origines, V. 275 ss.—He kneeled upon his knees three times a day. Knœling is mentioned as the characteristic posture of supplicants in 1 Kings viii. 54; 2 Chron. vi. 12; Ezra ix. 5; Luke xxii. 41; Acts vii. 59; ix. 40; xxi. 5; Eph. iii. 14; Clem. Rom. 1 Cor. 48; Hermas, Pastor, Vis. I. 1, etc. Cf. O. A. Hubnerus, de genuflectione (Halle, 1741); Zöckler, Krit. Geschichte der Askese (Frankf. and Erlangen, 1863), p. 350 et seq.—[“Daniel offered prayers not to make an outward show, for only secret spies could observe him when so engaged. לֹא יִשָּׁנֶה does not mean altogether so as (Rosenmüller, Von Leng., Maurer, Hitzig), but, as always, on this account that, because. Because he always did thus, so now he continues to do it.”—(Keil).] The custom of praying three times in a day, which is attested for the first time in this passage, and which, according to the Talmudic tradition was first brought into general use among the Jews by the “men of the great synagogue,” appears to have taken shape during the Babylonian captivity as a usage observed by pious individuals among the Israelites. The fundamental general idea of this custom is already expressed in Psa. lv. 18; but the desire to find a regular substitute for the morning and evening sacrifices, which were now interrupted, doubtless contributed towards originating the custom, since the Jews were accustomed, from an early period, to regard prayer as in itself a sacrifice with which God is pleased (Hos. xiv. 3; Psa. li. 17; cxvi. 17, etc.), and especially since they associated it in their minds with the evening sacrifice (Psa. cxli. 2; 1 Kings xviii. 36 et seq.;

Ezra ix. 5; cf. Dan. ix. 21). The Parsee custom of rendering Divine honors to the three parts of the day themselves, has, of course, nothing in common with the habit of the Jews and primitive Christians (Acts iii. 1; x. 9, 30; cf. Pusey, Daniel, p. 554); nor has the custom of the Egyptian priests, who, according to Porphyry, de abstinent. IV. 8, sang daily four hymns of praise to the sun; nor yet the three daily sacrifices and hymns of the Pythagoreans, as mentioned by Jamblichus, Vit. Pythag. c. 149 ss. Cf. generally, Zöckler, l. c. p. 329 et seq.—Verse 12 [11]. Then these men assembled (rushed together), and found Daniel praying and making supplication before his God. Here, as in v. 7 [6], וַיִּרְאוּ is not a single rushing together, but a frequent* hasty gathering; the only difference is that in that passage the design was to obtain the decree from the king, while here it is to watch Daniel in order to denounce him. According to v. 11, the open windows in Daniel's upper chamber seem to have enabled them to execute their plan of espionage with success, either because they saw him while engaged in prayer (perhaps from a still more elevated room in the vicinity, cf. 2 Sam. xi. 2), or because they heard him from the street. At any rate, a repeated [?] approach and observation in secret must be assumed, instead of a single surprise; hence the question, "At which of his daily prayers was he surprised?" is inappropriate.—Concerning the thoroughly organized system of espionage and denunciation in the Medo-Persian kingdom, of which this passage affords a characteristic proof, see Max Duncker, Geschichte des Alterthums, II. 648.

Verses 13-15 [12-14]. The denunciation. Then they came near and spake before ("with") the king, etc., cf. chap. iii. 8, and for what follows, iii. 24.—The thing is true, according to the law of the Medes and Persians; rather, "the word is firm, according, etc. וְכֵן אֵלֶּיךָ אֵלֹהֵינוּ does not affirm that the decree was published, but indicates the certain punishment of any who might transgress it.—Verse 14 [13]. Daniel, which is of the children of the captivity of Judah. Cf. chap. v. 13, and observe that the accusers do not mention the high official station of Daniel and his intimate official relations with the king, but merely refer to his foreign birth, ["in order that they may thereby bring his conduct under the suspicion of being a political act of rebellion against the royal authority." (Keil.)]—Verse 15 [14]. Then the king . . . was sore displeased. וַיִּפְּצֵהוּ is impersonal in וַיִּפְּצֵהוּ, like וַיִּרְעֵהוּ in Gen. xxi. 12, and like וַיִּפְּצֵהוּ below, in v. 24 [23]. Literally, therefore, it reads, "Then the king, when he heard the word—sorrow came on him" (and similarly v. 24 [23], "Then . . . joy came on him").†—And set his heart on Daniel to deliver him. וַיִּפְּצֵהוּ, "heart," is not found in the later Chaldee, but occurs in the Syriac and Arabic. Compare, however, the phrase וַיִּפְּצֵהוּ, Targ. Prov. xxii. 17.—And he labored till the going down of the sun, etc. On the form וַיִּפְּצֵהוּ (st. constr. plur. of וַיִּפְּצֵהוּ, or also of the Inf. וַיִּפְּצֵהוּ), cf. Hitzig and Kranichfeld on this passage. Instead of וַיִּפְּצֵהוּ, "he labored" (cf. ἀγωνίζεσθαι, Luke xiii. 24), the Targums have וַיִּפְּצֵהוּ, which, however, has a different meaning from that of וַיִּפְּצֵהוּ.

Verses 16-18 [15-17]. The condemnation and execution. On v. 16 of supra, on v. 9 b.—Verse 17 [16]. Then the king commanded, and they brought Daniel, and cast him into the den of lions; rather, "that they should bring Daniel and cast," etc. The construction is the same as in chap. v. 29 [but in neither this nor that passage is this rendering justified by the force of the text, וַיִּפְּצֵהוּ . . . וַיִּפְּצֵהוּ]. According to Oriental custom, the execution in this case, as in that under Belshazzar, chap. v. 29, and in that under Nebuchadnezzar, chap. iii. 19 et seq., was to follow immediately on the sentence. ["This does not, however, imply that it was on the evening in which, at the ninth hour, he had prayed, as Hitzig affirms, in order that he may thereby make the whole matter improbable." (Keil.) The season of prayer at which Daniel was discovered would seem to have been at noon. This will allow ample time for the preparation of the edict the same morning, and the execution the same evening. The accusers were evidently in hot haste].—Thy God, whom thou servest continually, he will deliver thee; rather, "may thy God . . . deliver thee." Pilate may have solaced himself with a similar confession of his own weakness and cowardice, when he delivered the Saviour into the hands of his mortal enemies (Matt. xxvii. 24; Luke xxiii. 23, etc.); or Herod, when he commanded to bring the head of the Baptist (Matt. xiv. 9). Verse 19 [18] et seq. shows that the exclamation was by no means intended to be ironical or malicious, as those in Ps. xxii. 9; Matt. xxvii. 43; but on the other hand, Josephus probably attributes too favorable a disposition to Darius, when he observes: ἐλπίας δὲ ὁ Δαρείος, ὅτι βύσεται τὸ θεῖον αὐτὸν καὶ οὐδὲν μὴ πάθη δεῖνόν ὑπὸ τῶν θηρίων, ἐκέλευεν αὐτὸν εὐδύνμας φέρειν τὰ συμβαίνοντα (similarly also Jerome et al.).—Verse 18 [17]. And a stone was brought, and laid upon the mouth of the den. וַיִּפְּצֵהוּ, a Hebraizing passive form of the Aphel; cf. on chap. iii. 13. וַיִּפְּצֵהוּ, Hebraizing passive partic. Peal, instead of וַיִּפְּצֵהוּ (cf. v. 27 [26]).—It is natural to suppose that the stone was of sufficient size to completely close the mouth of the den, and that it was at hand for that purpose, instead of

† ["The king is chagrined and ashamed of himself that he allowed himself to be caught in this snare. Now for the first time he sees the enmity and mean spirit of his officers in obtaining from him that decree, and bites his lips in shame that he could have been so beguiled and entrapped.

No doubt he heartily esteemed Daniel, and probably loved him, and felt therefore the bitterest grief and shame that he should be made unwillingly the author of his destruction."—Coville. He also felt intensely anxious for his fate, and doubtless cast about in his mind some method of extricating him, and at the same time of exposing and punishing his accusers.]

assuming, with Hitzig, that it was necessary to bring it from a distance. The den itself, corresponding to the sense of אֵינַן (אֵינַן), which is thoroughly identical with that of the Heb. בֵּינָה, must not be conceived of as a cistern or funnel-shaped pit (Hitzig); but rather as having a capacity sufficient to hold several lions and permit them to move freely about (which involves no greater difficulty than that the אֵינַן in the Targ. Jer. xli. 7, 9 should have contained the corpses of seventy slain persons; cf. also the Targ. Jer. xxxvii. 16; Isa. xvi. 15). In brief, it may be supposed to have been an actual lions' den, similar to those connected with the Roman amphitheatres, from which it probably differed simply in having a horizontal opening in the flat or arched roof, through which the ad bestias damnati were thrown to the lions, in addition to the door at the side, by which the beasts were introduced into the den or removed from it. Its construction may therefore have been similar to that of the fiery furnace, upon the whole (see on chap. iii. 6)—an opinion which seems to derive additional support from the manner in which Darius was enabled to converse with Daniel while in the den, even before the stone was removed from its opening (v. 21 et seq.). The two lions' dens at Fez, belonging to the emperor of Morocco, which Höt describes in his Nachrichten von Fez und Marokko (pp. 77, 290) as being large rectangular and uncovered pits in the earth (whose wide opening was surrounded by a wall one and a half ells in height), were consequently constructed somewhat differently from that of the Medo-Babylonians under consideration, but are still interesting for comparison with the latter.—And the king sealed it with his own signet, and with the signet of his lords. On the custom of sealing cf. Matt. xxvii. 26. The two-fold sealing, with the ring of the king and with that of his grand officers, may have been designed to secure Daniel, for whose deliverance the king still hoped (see vs. 17 [16], 21 [20], against any violent assault, and also against any attempt to liberate him—hence, to insure a strict control of the prisoner. Cf. Jerome: “Obsignavit annulo suo lapidem, quo os laci clauderetur, ne quid contra Danielem moliantur inimici . . . Obsignat autem et annulo optimatum suorum, ne quid suspicionis contra eos habere videretur.”—That the purpose might not be changed concerning Daniel; rather, “that the matter,” etc.; that his situation might not be unlawfully altered. אֵינַן here is not “intention, purpose” (v. Leng. etc.)^{*} but “affair, matter;” cf. the corresponding Syriac word.

Verses 19–23 [18–22]. The king discovers the miraculous preservation of Daniel. Then the king went . . . and passed the night fasting. אֵינַן is properly a substantive with adverbial signification—“with fasting”—i.e., superfluous. Luther renders it forcibly, “and remained not eating.”—Neither were instruments of music brought before him; rather “concubines.”

Instead of “food,” which is the interpretation assigned by Theodotion, the Peshito, the Vulgate, Luther, etc., the rendering of אֵינַן by “concubines, women of the harem,” is sufficiently supported by closely related terms in the Arabic; and the verb אֵינַן in connection with the prep. אֵינַן, admits of no other interpretation. The bringing in of inanimate objects would have been expressed by אֵינַן; cf. chap. v. 2 with ii. 24, 25; iv. 8; v. 13, 15.—And his sleep went from him; forsook him; cf. on chap. ii. 1.—Verse 20 [19]. Then the king arose very early in the morning; “with the dawn, when it became light.” אֵינַן, “the dawn” (= אֵינַן, Targ. Jon. on Isa. lviii. 8). The hypothetical rendering of the imperf. אֵינַן, for which Kranichfeld contends, is unnecessary. [“The future or imperfect is used instead of the perfect to place this clause in relation to the following, meaning: the king, as soon as he arose at morning dawn, went hastily by the early light” (Keil).] The Septuagint is [substantially] correct: ἀπὸ πρὸς πρωῆς; also Theodotion, the Peshito, etc.—אֵינַן, “with the twilight, with the dawn or break of day” [“serves for a mere determination of the אֵינַן, at the morning dawn, namely, as soon as the first rays of the rising sun appeared” (Keil)]; cf. אֵינַן, Job xxiv. 14.—And went in haste. אֵינַן, as in chap. ii. 35, = μετὰ σπουδῆς; cf. Luke i. 39.—Verse 21 [20]. And . . . cried with a lamentable voice unto Daniel. אֵינַן = אֵינַן; cf. Isa. liv. 6 with Prov. xxxi. 6.—O Daniel, servant of the living God. Darius was able to designate the God of Daniel as the living God (cf. v. 27) thus early, before his observation had convinced him of the prophet's safety, for the simple reason that during the intercourse consequent on their intimate relation, Daniel had instructed him concerning the nature and power of his God as the God of all gods, and also because the pangs of conscience endured by him during the night that had just elapsed, had produced a profound conviction of the truth of the prophet's testimony to Jehovah.—Verse 23 [22]. My God hath sent his angel, and hath shut the lions' mouths. Cf. v. 28 [27]; Acts xii. 7. The summary conciseness of the statement forbids any conclusion as to whether Daniel had seen the angel who wrought his miraculous deliverance, as an objective fact, or whether he merely argued from the effect to the underlying invisible cause (cf. Psa. xxxiv. 8; xci. 11 et seq.; Matt. viii. 9, etc.). On the expression, “to shut the lions' mouths,” cf. 2 Tim. iv. 17; Heb. xi. 33.—And also before thee, O king, have I done no hurt. “Before thee,” אֵינַן, i.e., “in thine eyes, according to thy judgment”—a loosely connected supplemental proof of what he has just asserted, viz., that he is innocent. In modern speech the connection might have been, "even as I was likewise found innocent by thee" (which was apparent to him from the king's anxious inquiries concerning his welfare).*

Verses 24, 25 [23, 24]. The deliverance of Daniel and the punishment of his enemies. Then was the king exceeding glad (cf. on v. 15) for him,† and commanded that they should take Daniel up out of the den.‡ דַּנִּיֵּאל, the inf.

Aphel of the root דָּנָה, compensates for the doubling by ׀, similarly to לָצַח in v. 19 [18]

(cf. ii. 25). Cf. דָּנָה, chap. iii. 22.—Verse 25 [24]. And the king commanded, and they brought those men; rather, "that those men should be brought." The same construction as in v. 17 [16].§—"Those men" are the same who are mentioned in vs. 6 [5] and 7 [6], viz.: the grand officers who were present in Babylon itself, and who had taken part in traducing Daniel. A number of them may have been in the king's train, when he commanded that the seals should be broken and the stone removed (v. 24 [23]), without venturing to protest, in the presence of the angry monarch, against the violation of the seal which belonged in part to them. The others were brought from their houses by the king's command. There is consequently nothing in the passage that involves a difficulty or that contradicts v. 18 [17] (against Hitzig).—Which had accused Daniel. Literally, "who had devoured Daniel's flesh;" cf. on chap. iii. 8.—And they cast . . . into the den of lions, them, their children, and their wives. Upon this point even Hitzig is compelled to remark: "To execute the families of criminals together with themselves was eminently the Persian custom (Herod., III. 119; Ammian. Marcell., xxiii. 6, 81); Justin, in such an instance, makes especial reference to the wives and children (X. 2); cf. further, Justin, XXI. 4; Josh. vii. 24, 25." On the authority of the statements quoted from Herodotus and Justin (and also influenced by what Curtius, VI. 11, states with reference to the custom among the Macedonians), Hitzig contends that such fearfully bloody justice—whose barbarous severity our prophet seems to allude to when he mentions the children before the wives—was only inflicted on conspirators against the king. But Ammian. (l. c.) states no such limitation; and the malicious plot of these magnates against one of the chief officials of the kingdom, as well as intimate counsellor of the king, was almost equivalent to a conspiracy directed against the royal person.—And the lions had the mastery of them (or "fell upon them") . . . or ever they came at the bottom of the den. Literally, "and not came they . . . until that," i. e., when the lions already seized them. On the incident, cf. chap. iii. 22; concerning the form דָּנָה, see chap. ii. 29.

Verses 26-28 [25-27]. The royal proclamation consequent on the miraculous deliverance of Daniel. Then king Darius wrote (commanded to write) unto all people, nations, and languages, etc.; i. e., to all the subjects of his realm, which was a world-kingdom like that of Nebuchadnezzar, chap. iii. 31.—Verse 27 [26]. I make a decree. Cf. iii. 29; iv. 8, where the shorter דָּנָה occurs instead of דָּנָה, which is found in this place.—That . . . men tremble and fear before the God of Daniel. Cf. chap. v. 19.—The theocratic phraseology of the royal edict admits of the same explanation as do the similar proclamations of Nebuchadnezzar, chap. ii. 47; iii. 23 et seq.; iii. 31 et seq.; iv. 31 et seq. It results in part from the extended intercourse of the king with Daniel, the representative of the theocratic faith of revelation; and in part from the profound influence of the experience of the immediate past.—And his kingdom (is one) which shall not be destroyed; a forcible ellipsis, similar, for instance, to that in chap. vii. 14; cf. also chap. ii. 44; and on the thought, iii. 33; iv. 31.—And his dominion (shall be even) unto the end; i. e., "to the end of all earthly kingdoms, to the end of the world" (the συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνος), which coincides with the erection of the completed kingdom of Messiah or God; cf. vii. 14, 26 et seq.—Verse 28 [27]. He delivereth and rescueth; rather, "He is a saviour and deliverer." Cf. chap. iii. 29 b., and for what follows cf. iii. 32; iv. 32.—From the power of the lions: literally, "out of the hand of the lions;" cf. Psa. xxii. 21, "out of the hand of the dogs."

Verse 29 [28]. The epilogue. So this Daniel prospered in the reign of Darius. "This Daniel," as in v. 4 [3].—דָּנָה, "found prosperity, prospered;" similar to chap. iii. 30. Ewald's reading, דָּנָה, which is designed to be equivalent to, "he was reinstated in his office" (?), is unnecessary.—On the subject of chap. ii. 48.—And (also) in the reign of Cyrus the Persian. This complementary closing sentence, like that in chap. i. 21, appears to have been added a considerable time after the preceding facts were recorded, for the purpose of closing the historical part of the book as a whole. But the objection that it is clearly a "bald and labored gloss in its appearance" (Kranichf.), is not therefore justified. The reign of Cyrus is merely mentioned, as having been reached by Daniel, for the same reason that dictated chap. i. 21.

* ["Daniel casts no severe reproach upon the king. Indeed the original rather expresses a genial and kindly feeling: Daniel 'talked with the king.' With beautiful modesty he ascribes his deliverance to God's own hand alone through his angel, and very properly asserts his innocence of any wrong in this matter.—We may suppose Daniel to have had a sweet sense of the presence of God by his angel while spending the night in the den with these hungry lions."—Cotterell.]

† דָּנָה does not refer to Daniel, but to the king himself.

‡ It denotes the reflexive sense of דָּנָה, which is here used impersonally: gladness came over him.

§ ["By this, however, we are not to understand a being drawn up by ropes through the opening of the den from above. The bringing out was by the opened passage in the side of the den, for which purpose the stone with the seals was removed."—Kell.]

§ [But the rendering proposed by the author is equally inadmissible here.]

ETHICO-FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES RELATED TO THE HISTORY OF SALVATION, APOLOGETICAL REMARKS, AND HOMILETICAL SUGGESTIONS.

1. The similarity of the facts recorded in this section to those of the third chapter is certainly evident and undeniable; but these analogies do not warrant the disregarding of the important differences between the incidents of the two sections. These differences, on the one hand, affect the disposition and the modes of action of the persons engaged in the various transactions, in which respect the king Darius especially observes from the beginning a more cordial bearing toward the worshipper of Jehovah than does Nebuchadnezzar; and, on the other, they relate to the miracle which forms the end and climax of the entire event. The deliverance of Daniel from the lions' den was a miracle differing materially in character from that of the deliverance of the three Hebrews from the fiery furnace; while the latter, as was intimated on chap. iii. 22, would admit of a natural explanation. To some extent at least, this is absolutely impossible with the event recorded in this chapter, as may be seen more particularly from the fact, noticed in v. 25 [24] b, that the same lions who spared Daniel during an entire night immediately seized on his accusers with a ravenous voracity in order to rend them. By this contrast between the subjection of the beasts to the prophet, and the outburst of their savage nature towards the guilty princes—a contrast which evidently constitutes the fundamental characteristic of the incident before us—this miracle takes its position among that series of marvellous events in Old and New Testament history in which the life and work of isolated distinguished messengers of revelation appear, by virtue of Divine grace, to have restored the paradisaical dominion of man over nature, so that the beasts of the desert yield him a ready obedience as their rightful lord. We class here, prior to the time of Daniel, the ravens of Elijah (1 Kings xvii. 4) and the bears of Elisha (2 Kings ii. 24); and in N. T. times, the sojourning of the Saviour with the beasts of the desert, immediately subsequent to his temptation (Mark i. 13), Paul's escape from injury by the viper on the island of Malta (Acts xxviii. 5; cf. Mark xvi. 18), and perhaps several incidents of a similar character in the history of the earliest monkish saints and missionaries of the Church down to the times of Columban and Gallus, so far as any faith may be placed on the statements in the generally fancifully distorted biographies of these saints which relate to their friendly intercourse with wild beasts (cf. Montalembert, Les Moines d'Occident depuis St. Benoît jusqu'à St. Bernard, vol. II.; and for a criticism of the often excessively credulous judgment of this author with reference to such miracles, see the review of his work in the Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie, 1863, No. 2).—It is, however, precisely because the marvellous incident of this section belongs to the category of such facts, that it must rank as the greatest wonder recorded in the historical part of the book, as the climax in the series of mighty works by which God glorified Himself in His servants in the metropolis of the Chaldean empire, and which, forming a gradation of miracles in certain aspects, and presenting a constantly-increasing manifestation of the supernatural element in them, from chap. i. 15 to the close of this chapter, excludes, with steadily-increasing emphasis, the possibility of tracing back the events to natural causes (cf. especially on chap. v. 5).

2. So far as the general situation is similar to that described in chap. iii., it accords well with the conditions of the captivity, "in which the aim was not, as afterwards under Antiochus Epiphanes, to extirpate the Jewish worship, but where we find merely certain very natural and intelligible displays of grudging selfishness and envy on the part of individual native officials, as against a captive foreigner who was preferred above them in official stations; while the general condition of the captives was very tolerable, as a natural result of the lax administration of government which was usual among Oriental conquerors" (Kranichfeld). The assertion of the modern "tendency-critics" (Hitzig, p. 89 et seq.; Bleek, p. 604, etc.), that the edict of Darius which prohibited the rendering of Divine honors during one month to any but the king (v. 8 [7]) was invented for the purpose of exag-gerating or caricaturing the proclamation of Antiochus Epiphanes, which prohibited the Jews from observing the Divine law and their worship of Jehovah (1 Macc. i. 41; 2 Macc. vi. 1-9), in order to incite them to steadfast endurance and to patient trust in God,—this assertion is decidedly nugatory, since the raging fanaticism of the Syrian king, which aimed at the total destruction of the Jewish worship and nationality, had nothing in common with the far milder disposition of Darius, and since the latter was merely concerned to bring about a temporary suspension of the religious observances in regard, rather than to definitely extirpate the current systems of religion. Nor would it have been possible for the pious Jews of the Maccabean period to recognize an edict, which amounted directly to the deifying of the king, as a prototype of the manifesto of the Syrian king, which differed materially from it, in respect both to its language and its character. For this reason Van Lengerke, more cautious than his compeers, rejects the assumption that the edict of v. 8 [7] was a conventional fiction framed on the model of that mentioned in the Maccabean books, as being too artificial and unsupported a hypothesis, and contents himself with observing that "the proclamation of Darius on the religious question corresponds in general to that persecuting spirit which produced the measures of Antiochus." But it will be seen that even this is not correct, since the deportment of Darius towards Daniel, manifesting in every respect a mild, friendly, and benevolent spirit (vs. 14, 15 et seq.; 21 et seq.), presents the sharpest contrast to the senseless rage and blood-thirsty spirit of persecution displayed by the intolerant Syrian tyrant; and, moreover, since no reason whatever can be discovered that could induce the alleged Maccabean-tendency writer to invent so weak, and in all respects so inappropriate, a counterfeit of Antiochus at the last, after having furnished in Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar far more suitable and tangible types of that despot. Nor does it appear why he should desire to conceal the person of Antiochus behind that of a jealous and scheming official under the Median king (vs. 4, 5 et seq.).—How much more simple and intelligible, in comparison with such hypercritical assumptions, does the narrative appear when its characteristic peculiarities are regarded as historical facts, such as were naturally to be expected in the scenes of a politico-

religious drama that transpired on the soil of the newly-founded Medo-Persian world-kingdom! The 120 satrapies instead of the former division of the kingdom into differently constituted provinces (cf. vi. 2 with iii. 2); the exceedingly independent course of the royal counselors and officers, without whose consent no edict could be promulgated nor the royal seal affixed (vs. 8 [7], 18 [17]); the temporary deifying of the king as the son and image of the supreme God (v. 8 et seq.), so surprisingly in harmony with the fundamental principles of the Old-Persian state religion; the cruel procedure connected with the punishment of the offenders (v. 25 [24]) which bears, in an equal degree, the stamp of specifically Persian legal usage; and finally, the repeated reference to the "law of the Medes and Persians," as the original source and inviolable authority for the measures proposed and put in force—all these point, with all possible force and internal congruity, to a well-defined historical condition with which the writer was familiarly acquainted, an actual condition which was distinguished from the state existing in the Chaldæo-Babylonian kingdom in a manner that corresponds fully with numerous extra-biblical testimonies, and which indicates that the experience and personal observation of the author formed the only source of his descriptions. Cf. the observations made above on the several passages.

3. The homiletical treatment of this section will vary, according as the conduct and fate of Daniel, the man of God, receive attention, or as those of the other agents, viz.: of the good-natured but weak king and of the jealous accusers, are prominently considered. In the former case, the theme for the treatment of the subject as a whole might be: "We should obey God, rather than men" (cf. v. 5 with v. 11 et seq.); or, "Fidelity to God is a more precious virtue, and secures a more certain and precious reward, than fidelity to human authority;" or, "It is better to be the friend of God, even if the foe of the whole world." In the latter case: "Who-so digs a pit for others, shall fall into it himself;" or, "God knows how to use the plans by which men seek to destroy his faithful servants, for their deliverance and honor;" or "God has converted many a ruler, from being a persecutor of His church into its forwarder and zealous protector!"

In connection with the former class of meditations, cf. the following extracts from older practical expositors: Jerome (on vs. 11, 12): "Daniel, regis jussa contemnens et in Deo habens fiduciam, non orat in humili loco, sed in excelsis, et fenestras aperit contra Jerusalem, ubi erat visio pacis. Orat autem secundum præceptum Dei dictaque Salomonis, qui contra templum orandum esse admonuit." Melancthon (on v. 19 et seq.): "Periculum Danielis pingit robur et violentiam hostium Christi. Sicut Daniel imbecillis obicitur leonibus, sic tota Ecclesia habet hostes validissimos, diabolum, reges, potentes, superbos, præstantes auctoritate et opibus in mundo. Liberatio Danielis est testimonium, quod Deus adit sanctis et servet eos suo judicio, alius corpore, alius spiritu." Starke (on v. 29 [28]): "Whosoever does not permit himself to be driven by persecution and danger, either from the upright fear of God, nor, on the other hand, from his lawful obedience to earthly authorities, shall find at last that honor and glory follow upon fidelity" (1 Sam. xxiv. 11, 21).

With the second class of themes, cf.: Melancthon (on v. 5 [4]): "Tales habet diabolus ministros, qui captatis occasionebus regum animos astute a veritate avertunt, ubi summi officii et virtutis specie insidias struuntur. Ita his . . . bonus senex . . . non videt quantum admittat sceleris, quod in edicto etiam Dei invocatio prohibetur. Monet igitur hoc exemplum, ut cauti sint principes in observandis talibus insidiis, ac præsertim in legibus et edictis condendis." Id. (on v. 15 et seq.): "Quamquam igitur peccavit Darius, tamen infirmitate lapsus est et contra furorē accusatorum sustentat se quadam scintilla fidei, quæ ostendit non ipsum, sed principes esse supplicii auctores, etiamsi ipsi non satis fortiter eos represserat . . . Tales infirmos subleat Deus, ut hic apparet. Sequitur enim statim acerbissima poenitentia regis, ac deinde tantum fidei robur, tanta animi magnitudo, ut puniat etiam accusatores." Geier (on v. 21 [20]): "Hoc sensu Darium ex animi sui sententia adeoque ex vera fide compellasse Danielis Deum, verosimile non est; sic namque omnia Persearum Medorumque improbasset et abnegasset numina . . . immo non vocat Deum suum, sed Danielis, neque aut se ipsum colere, sed: quem tu colis." Joh. Gerhard (Weim. Bib., on v. 24 et seq.): "God is able to promote and extend the true faith by means of the very persecutions and other methods by which its enemies seek to destroy it."

SECOND (PROPHETIC) DIVISION.

CHAP. VII.—XII.

1. The vision of the four world-kingdoms and of the Messianic kingdom.

VII.

- 1 In the first year of ¹ Belshazzar king of Babylon, Daniel had [saw] a dream, and visions of his head upon his bed: then he wrote the dream, and told the sum of the matters.²
- 2 Daniel spake³ and said, I saw⁴ in my vision by⁵ night, and, behold, the four winds of the heaven [heavens] strove upon [were rushing to] the great sea. And four great beasts came up from the sea, diverse one from another⁶.

- 4 The first was like a lion, and had eagle's wings: I beheld till' the wings there-
 5 of were plucked, and it was lifted up from the earth, and made [to] stand upon
 6 the feet as a man, and a man's heart was given to it. And, behold, another beast,
 7 a second, like to a bear, and it raised' up itself [was made to stand] on one side,
 8 and it had three ribs in the mouth of it between the teeth of it: and they said
 9 thus unto it, Arise, devour much flesh. After this I beheld,' and lo, another, 10 like a leopard, which [and it] had upon the back of it four wings of a fowl [bird]:
 11 the beast had also four heads; and dominion was given to it. After this I saw'
 12 in the night visions, and, behold, a fourth beast, dreadful and terrible, and strong 13 exceedingly; and it had great iron teeth: ¹⁰ it devoured and brake in pieces, and 14 stamped the residue with the feet of it: and it was diverse from all the beasts
 15 that were before it; and it had ten horns. I considered ¹¹ the horns, and, behold, 16 there came up among them another little horn, before whom [and from before it]
 17 there were three of ¹² the first horns plucked up by the roots [were extirpated]:
 18 and, behold, in this horn were eyes like the eyes of man, and a mouth speaking 19 great things.
- 9 I beheld till' the thrones were cast [set] down, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose [his] garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the ¹¹ pure wool: his throne was like the ¹² fiery flame [flames of fire], and his wheels as 10 burning fire. A fiery stream [stream of fire] issued [flowed] and came forth from before him: thousand thousands ministered unto him, ¹⁴ and ten thousand times ten thousand stood ¹⁵ before him: the judgment was set [did sit], and the books 11 were opened. I beheld' then, because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake [was speaking]; I beheld, even till' the beast was slain, and his 12 [its] body destroyed, and given to the burning flame. As concerning [And] 13 the rest of the beasts, they had their dominion taken away: ¹⁶ yet their lives were prolonged for ¹⁷ a season and time.
- 13 I saw' in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came [was coming] with the clouds of heaven [the heavens], and came to [reached] the 14 Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him [to him was given] dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, ¹⁸ should serve ¹⁹ him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed.
- 15 I Daniel was grieved in my spirit [my spirit was grieved] in the midst of my 16 body [its sheath], and the visions of my head troubled ²⁰ me. I came near unto ²¹ one ²² of them that stood by, and asked him ²³ the truth of ²⁴ all this. So [And] 17 he told me, and made ²⁵ me know the interpretation of the things. ²⁶ These great 18 beasts, which are ²⁷ four, are four kings, which shall arise out of the earth. But 19 [And] the saints of the Most High ²⁸ shall take [receive] the kingdom, and possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever and ever.
- 19 Then I would know [wished] the truth of ²⁹ the fourth beast, which was diverse from all the others [of them], exceeding dreadful, whose [its] teeth were of iron, and his [its] nails of brass; which devoured, brake [breaking] in pieces, and 20 stamped the residue with his [its] feet; and of ³⁰ the ten horns that were in his
 [its] head, and of the other which came up, and before whom [from before it] three fell; even [and] of that horn that [and it] had eyes, and a mouth that spake [speaking] very great things, whose [and its] look was more stout than his 21 [its] fellows. I beheld,' and the same [that] horn made war with the saints, and 22 prevailed' against them; until the Ancient of days came, and [the] judgment was given to the saints of the Most High; ³¹ and the time came [arrived] that [, and] the saints possessed the kingdom.
- 23 Thus he said, The fourth beast shall be the fourth kingdom ³² upon [the] earth, which shall be diverse from all [the] kingdoms, and shall devour the whole 24 earth, and shall tread it down, and break it in pieces. And the ten horns out of this ³³ kingdom are ten kings that shall arise: and another shall rise [arise] after them; and he shall be diverse from the first, and he shall subdue [abase] three 25 kings. And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out [afflict] the saints of the Most High, ³⁴ and think to change times and laws

- [law]: and they shall be given into his hand, until a time and times and the 20 dividing of [half a] time. But [And] the judgment shall [did] sit, and they 27 shall take away his dominion, o consume and to destroy it unto the end. And the kingdom and [the] dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven [heavens], shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High,²⁸ whose [his] kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all [the] dominions shall serve and obey him.
- 28 Hitherto is the end of the matter." As for me²⁹ Daniel, my cogitations [thoughts] much troubled³⁰ me, and my countenance³¹ changed in³² me: but
 [and] I kept the matter³³ in my heart.

EXEGETICAL REMARKS.

Verse 1. Historical introduction. In the first year of Belshazzar; hence, in the first year after the death of Nebuchadnezzar, the father and predecessor of Belshazzar; see on chap. v.
 1.* This designation of the time "seems substantially to have furnished the occasion for renewed reflection on the part of the prophet, bearing upon the former series of prophetical meditations that had been called forth in him by an important event (the dream of Nebuchadnezzar concerning the image of the monarchies, which Daniel interpreted, chap. ii.).
 The idea of the four heathen kingdoms which were to precede the introduction of the Messianic kingdom of Israel, that was announced by the earlier prophets and believed by them to be near, is again brought out comprehensively in this place, with reference to the course observed by those kingdoms toward the theocracy" (Kranichfeld).—Concerning the chronological parallelism of the series of apocalyptic visions, opened by this new vision of the monarchies,
 with the series of historical events recorded in the former division of the book, and beginning with chap. ii., see the Introd., § 8.—Daniel had a dream and visions of his head upon his bed.
 Cf. chap. ii. 19; and with reference to the visions of his head, cf. ii. 28.—Then he wrote the dream, immediately or soon after it transpired; a note intended to strengthen the following statements concerning its nature (cf. chap.
 xii. 4). This note, however, as the change of person between vs. 1 and 2 indicates, was probably introduced by the author at a later time, in connection with his final revision of the whole book. The closing verse of the chapter, which likewise is merely important as a transitional passage, seems also to be a later addition.—And told the sum of the matters; gave the leading features. סֻמָּא מַלְיָא, the sum or substance of the words; cf. רִאשֹׁנָא in passages like Lev. v. 24;

 Ps. cxix. 160; and also the Talmudic סֻמָּא רִאשֹׁנָא (Rosh hash., II. 6), and the Gr. κεφάλαιον, which is employed in this place by the Sept.
 The "sum" signifies, of course, the aggregate of all that is of Messianic significance. Cf.
 Ewald: "When it is said that Daniel merely recorded the leading features, or gave a mere summary, of the wonderful visions which he saw, the meaning becomes evident, when it is observed with what freedom the leading outlines of the visions are drawn in the first two turns of the description (vs. 1-14), and are afterward repeated for the purpose of interpretation. All the remaining prophetic sections of the book have the same plan in substance; but whenever it is attempted to record personal experiences and observations in writing, it is advisable to furnish the briefest outline consistent with clearness, on account of the readers, if for no other reason." *

* ["This vision accords not only in many respects with the dream of Nebuchadnezzar (ch. ii.), but has the same subject.
 This subject, however, the representation of the world-power in its principal forms, is differently given in the two chapters. In ch. ii. it is represented according to its whole character as an image of a man whose different parts consist of different metals, and in chap. vii. under the figure of four beasts which arise one after the other out of the sea. In the former, its destruction is represented by a stone breaking the image in pieces, while in the latter it is effected by a solemn act of judgment. This further difference also is to be observed, that in this chapter, the first, but chiefly the fourth, world-kingdom, in its development and relation to the people of God, is much more clearly exhibited in ch. ii.
 These differences have their principal reason in the difference of the recipients of the Divine revelation: Nebuchadnezzar, the founder of the world-power, saw this power in its imposing greatness and glory; while Daniel, the prophet of God, saw it in its opposition to God in the form of ravenous beasts of prey. Nebuchadnezzar had his dream in the second year of his reign, when he had just founded his world-monarchy; while Daniel had his vision of the world-kingdoms

* [This assumption rests upon the author's theory that Belshazzar is identical with Evil-merodach, which, as we have shown in the notes appended to the Introduction, is not sustained by the latest authorities on Babylonian history.
 If Rawlinson's conjecture is correct, that Belshazzar was the son of Nabonnet, left in command of Babylon while his father threw himself into Borsippa, the date in question will relate to the viceroyship of the former, which may well have continued a year or more (or even into the third year, see chap. viii. 1), since the siege of Babylon lasted two years.]

Verses 2, 3. The entrance of the four beasts. Daniel spake and said. The incoherence of these words with the statements of v. 1 seems to indicate that they no longer belong (as Kranichfeld believes) to the supplementary note, v. 1, but that they originally served to introduce the description of the vision.—I saw in my vision by night; עַל, "during, by," spoken of synchronous things; cf. chap. iii. 38.—And behold, the four winds of the heavens strove ("broke forth") upon the great sea. Concerning רָפָח, see on chap. ii. 31.—The fourfold number of the "winds of the heaven" (i. e., the winds blowing from the different quarters of heaven, or, more simply, those blowing under heaven; cf. "the birds of heaven") has reference, of course, to that of the beasts in v. 3 et seq. It designates all the winds of the world (cf. chap. viii. 8; Zech. vi. 5; Jer. xlix. 38), and therefore indicates at the outset the universal importance of the following vision. Hence actual winds must be intended, and not "angelicae potestates" as Jerome suggests, under reference to Deut. xxxii. 8 (Sept.).* It is not necessary to ask, in connection with a dream-vision, how all the four winds could arise together; nor how the great sea (i. e., probably the Mediterranean, the ocean of the nations of hither Asia; cf. Josh. xv. 48) could enter into the dream of an Israelite who resided from his early youth at Babylon. The sea, as is frequent in prophetic figurative language of the Old Testament, represents the heathen world of nations, which unquestionably afforded a striking illustration in every case when they arose in hostility against theocracy, in order to overwhelm and destroy the constantly-diminishing people of God, as the raging waves of the ocean break upon an insignificant island or coast. Cf. Isa. viii. 7 et seq.; xvii. 12; xxvii. 1; lvii. 20; Psal. xli. 4; also Rev. viii. 8; xvii. 15; and with reference to the overflowing (by hostile forces) see Dan. ix. 26; xi. 10, 22, 26.—מִן־הַיָּם may be properly translated "breaking forth upon the sea, breaking loose against the sea;" on מִן, cf. the corresponding Heb. word in Job xl. 23; Ezek. xxxii. 22, and also the Syr. and Targum. usage, which principally employs the word to represent the hostile irruption of warlike forces. Less natural is the factitive rendering of the participle, "caused the great sea to break forth" (Kranichf.), and the reciprocal, by Luther, "stormed against each other on the great sea (cf. Ewald's "swept through the great sea"); the prep. מִן seems not suited to either conception.†—Verse 3. And four (excessively) great beasts came up from the sea. The strengthening of the idea implied in the reduplicated מְרִיבִים may be rendered, with Ewald, by "monstrous," or by an adverb of comparison prefixed to "great," as "very, excessively," etc.* Kranichfeld is incorrect and interpolating: "four ravenous beasts."—The rising of "the beasts from the sea" describes, figuratively, their rising out of the great undefined, and, so to speak, mist-enveloped sea of nations, and their more noticeable entrance into the range of the dreaming prophet's vision. There is therefore no allusion to a coming up out of the sea to the land (unlike Gen. xli. 2, 18 et seq.), especially since, in the parallel description in v. 17, four kings, corresponding to the four beasts, arise "out of the earth." ["These four fierce beasts arise, not all at once, but, as ver. 6 and 7 teach, one after another" (Keil).]—Concerning the representation of nations or kingdoms under the figure of certain beasts, especially ravenous beasts, monsters (cf. Isa. xxvii. 1; li. 9; Ezek. xxix. 3; xxxii. 2; Psal. lxviii. 31; lxxiv. 13), see Ewald: "It is an ancient habit to regard beasts as symbols of kings and empires; but it first became really significant through the custom of emblazoning them on standards and arms, especially on shields, and also on permanent monuments and works of art, as standing symbols. The most ancient picture-writing in Egypt and Assyria afterward contributed its part to introduce an intimate connection in thought between a figurative creature and a kingdom corresponding to it. It is now known that each of the twelve tribes of Israel bore the figure of an animal on its standard and its coat of arms; and likewise that every representative of a tribe could wear such a symbol, while a king could elevate the symbol of his tribe to the dignity of a national emblem" (Geschichte des V. Israel, III. 341, 349). Certain animals, such as the lion, panther, and ox, would naturally be suggested in any case; and others would be chosen by way of contrast. But nowhere would such animal-symbols be likely to become so significant as in the ancient Assyrian empire. This has become the more certain, since the frequent colossal animals scattered among the ruins of Nineveh and other places, which served as symbols of the power and greatness of that empire, i. e., of its kings and gods, have been brought to light. Hence, after Assyria and the other great powers of the ancient world had, from the 8th and 7th centuries B. C., been opposed to the Israelites, whom the latter were continually less and less able to resist, their poets and orators adopted the custom of designating them on proper occasions by such symbols, e. g., Assyria as a lion or as a "reed-beast," and Egypt as a crocodile or dragon. As a consequence, it is comprehensible why animals were chosen here and in chapters vii. and viii. as symbols of the great monarchies beginning with the Assyrio-Chaldean, although these animals are selected independently, because an entirely new conception is here introduced. Since an increased spiritual significance was attributed to animals as the emblems of kingdoms, it would become possible for the imagination to extend such figures beyond the realm of actual creation, and to construct ideal forms; but our author clearly avoids the use of wholly imaginary animals for this purpose, as being inappropriate. His object is here to re-

and of the judgment against them in the first year of Belshazzar, when the glory of the world-monarchy began to fade, and the spirit of its opposition to God became more manifest."—Keil.]

* [Keil's remark, however, is apposite: "The winds of the heavens represent the heavenly powers and forces by which God sets the nations of the world in motion."]

present in a more striking and impressive manner the four successive changes of the great world-kingdom described in chap. ii. under the figure of a monstrous human image, which afforded but faint analogies; and for this purpose he selects four wild beasts, which differ among themselves respectively, and which overcome each other in succession.—Diverse one from another, for the reason that they represented distinct kingdoms, which differed from each other respectively, and were peculiarly constituted in respect to their national character and their political tendencies. These distinctions are now to be brought out as clearly and prominently as possible, thus indicating a different purpose from that connected with the image of the monarchies, which was chiefly designed to represent the perpetuation of the same heathen world-power throughout the four successive phases of its development.

Verses 4-8. More detailed description of the four beasts, and especially of the fourth. The first was like a lion and had eagle's wings. The emblem of a wonderful beast so constituted might be chosen with propriety to represent the Chaldean, or, if it be preferred, the Assyrio-Chaldean world-power (cf. supra, Eth.-fund. principles, etc., on chap. ii.), since the winged lions with human heads recovered at Nimrud (Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, p. 348) and also the similar images of winged animals at Babylon (Münter, Religion der Babylonier, pp. 98, 139) were doubtless designed as symbols of the power and glory of that empire or of its rulers. In addition, the description of Nebuchadnezzar as a lion in strength and an eagle in swiftness was familiar to his contemporaries, as may be seen on the one hand, in Jer. iv. 7; xlix. 19; i. 17, 44; on the other, in Jer. xlix. 23; Lam. iv. 19; Hab. i. 8; Ezek. xvii. 3, 12. Moreover, the rank of the lion as the king of beasts, and of the eagle as the king of birds, corresponds to that of gold, the most precious of metals, which had been in chap. ii. the symbol of the first world-kingdom. As in that instance (v. 38) the king was identified with his realm, and therefore was regarded as its representative, so here the fate of the first world-kingdom is illustrated by various traits taken from the history of Nebuchadnezzar in chap. iv.—I beheld till the wings thereof were plucked, i.e., until its power and unrestrained motion were taken from it; cf. chap. iv. 28 et seq.—And it was lifted up from the earth, to which, after being deprived of its wings, it had been confined; compare chap. iv. 30 with iv. 33. The words, therefore, as well as those which follow, relate to the restoration from a state of beastly degradation to the upright posture and free dignity of man. Others, as Jerome, Theodoret, Rashi, Bertholdt, Hitzig, etc., render it, "and it was taken away from the earth," as if the sentence implied the destruction of the Chaldean world-power; but neither its connection with the following context, nor the usual meaning of נִסָּר, "to raise up, elevate,"—cf. iv. 31 and the corresponding Heb. verb, Gen. xxi. 18—will justify this reading.—And made (to) stand upon the feet as a man; cf. chap. iv. 13, 31, 33; v. 21. Notice the suffixless עַל שְׁנֵי רַגְלָיו, "upon two feet," instead of "on its two feet," which (corresponding with

2 Kings xiii. 21) would have been employed if the description had from the first referred to Nebuchadnezzar in person. [The phrase "does not mean that the whole beast was lifted up into the air, but that it stood upon its hinder legs, taking the upright position of a man. The purpose of this is explained more fully by the clause that follows.—נִסָּר is a Hebraizing dual form, only found in Biblical Chaldee. . . .—The heart of a man was given to it, i.e. (in connection with the preceding clause), not only did it take the outward position of a man, but also partook of his internal mind and feelings. I understand the design here to be to characterize the greater moderation and humanity which the Babylonian dominion exhibited after Nebuchadnezzar's malady and restoration, or, to use the language of the prophet, after 'its wings were plucked.'—Stuart.]—See Hitzig on this passage, with reference to the at times venturesome explanations offered by exegetes who deny its relation to chap. iv. in any way whatever (e.g., Bertholdt: "The writer designed to indicate in this place that human empires are symbolized;" J. D. Michaelis, Dereser: "The civilizing of the formerly barbarous Chaldeans, which was reserved until the Babylonian period, was to be described;" Jerome, Rashi, Ibn-Ezra, etc.: "The standing upon two feet of the hitherto four-footed beast was to symbolize the humiliation of the Chaldeans on the overthrow of their supremacy;" etc., etc.).—Verse 5. And behold another beast, a second, like to a bear. נִסָּר is the more extended, נִסָּר the more definite idea; the former only is repeated in v. 6, and the latter in v. 7. The bear, considered as being second only to the lion in point of strength and savage disposition, is frequently mentioned in close connection with the latter; e.g., 1 Sam. xvii. 34; Prov. xxviii. 15 (cf. xvii. 12); Wisd. xi. 17.—And it raised up itself on one side; or even, "it stood leaning to one side" (Hitzig), as it is to be rendered on the authority of the reading נִסָּר, "side" (for which several MSS. substitute the usual Aram. form נִסָּר).

The common reading נִסָּר would require to be regarded as synonymous with the Heb. נִסָּר, "dominion" (Job xxxviii. 38), but would thus lead to the rapid sense, "and it raised up one dominion," which is opposed by the context, and is questionable in every respect. This meaning, however, has recently been unsuccessfully advocated by Kranichfeld, who refers to the erection of a Median empire on the ruins of the Babylonian. Most expositors regard it correctly as indicating a leaning posture of the beast, an inclination to one side. Such a posture would naturally suggest a tendency to fall, an unsteady, vacillating character of the monarchy in question, verging upon ruin—and thus it has been interpreted by the Sept., Theodot., the Syr., and by many moderns, as Hitzig, Ewald, Kamphausen, etc., who find here a reference to the weakness and brief duration of the Median supremacy, which soon gave way to that of the Persians. The context, however, requires that a strong kingdom, animated with a lust for conquest—or, in the figurative language of the text, a "voracious" kingdom—should be understood, to which the words "arise, devour much flesh," are not spoken ironically and uselessly. For this reason we must suppose (with Hävernick; cf. also Bertholdt, Von Lengerke, and Maurer) that the beast inclined forward, i.e., that it was prepared to spring and to attack; and this threatening, rapacious, and warlike posture of the beast shows clearly that not the weak and short-lived Median kingdom, but the powerful empire of the Medo-Persians, with its greed for lands and conquest, is intended.*—And it had three ribs in the mouth of it between the teeth of it. שְׁלֹשָׁה עֲצָמִים evidently designates a prey that has already been seized by the beast, and which it is preparing finally to devour (cf. Num. xi. 33; Zech. ix. 7), and not (as Saadia, Bertholdt, and Hävernick suppose) parts of its own body, such as three molar teeth—an interpretation which שְׁלֹשָׁה עֲצָמִים nowhere bears. The three states, or even cities, which became the prey of the Persian empire as symbolized by the "three ribs," can hardly be specified; perhaps three is used merely as a round and indefinite number. If, however, it is attempted to designate them more particularly, it will certainly be more appropriate to conceive of three countries, e.g., Babylon, Egypt, and Lydia (or, instead of the latter, Palestine, including Syria), which were conquered by the Medes or Medo-Persians (with De Wette), than (with Hitzig) to think of the three great Assyrian cities on the Tigris, Nineveh, Calah, and Resen,—or Nineveh, Mes-pila (?), and Larissa, which, according to Xenophon, Anab., III. 4, 10, the Medes are said to have destroyed (cf. Gen. x. 12; Jon. iii. 1 et seq.).—And they said thus unto it, Arise, devour much flesh. These words evidently refer to something in the history of the Median empire, that is subsequent to the devouring of the three ribs, and therefore to the later wars of that state for conquest and plunder, which followed after the subjugation of the three neighboring kingdoms. This clearly indicates that the beast described in this connection does not represent

Media only, but the united Medo-Persian empire (against Ewald, Kranichfeld, etc., and also against Hitzig, who applies this command to "devour much flesh" to the overthrow of the Chaldean empire by the Medes, which he believes to have preceded the destruction of the three cities on the Tigris). The direction to devour much flesh is, however, an appropriate feature in the description of the voracity of this ζῷον πάραγιον; cf. Micah iii. 2, 8; Isa. ix. 11; Jer. l. 17. The speakers who are implied (וְהָיוּ), as in chap. iii. 4; iv. 28) are the angelic powers of God, who govern the world and especially watch over and guide the fortunes of the great world-powers.*—Verse 6. After this I beheld, and lo another, like a leopard, which had upon the back of it four wings of (or "like") a fowl. Ewald observes, with entire correctness: "This beast is already distinguished from the other in being less one-sided, and in having 'four wings of a bird'—i.e., such as are large and capable of carrying it swiftly to any place—on its back. [It moves, however, 'not so royally as Nebuchadnezzar—for the panther has not eagle's wings but only the wings of a fowl—yet extending to all the regions of the earth' (Keil).] Hence it can move with ease and freedom towards either of the four regions of the world, and therefore, in a sense, it possesses all the four regions of the world, i.e., it is in the full sense a world-kingdom." Cf. Kranichfeld also: "The flashing swiftness of movement, the παράδεισος ὄψις (Hab. i. 8), which is here specially indicated by 'four wings of a fowl on the back of it,' i.e., in a condition for flying, is regarded as characteristic of this beast (the leopard) while lurking for its prey (Jer. v. 6; Hos. xiii. 7). Compared with the clearness and correctness of this interpretation there seems to be a strange lack of motive for the refusal of the two scholars to apply it to that world-kingdom, which more than any other was remarkable for its extension by leaps of panther-like swiftness, and by the lightning-like rapidity of its rise and fall—namely, the Macedonian empire of Alex. the Gr." Cf. the remark of Hitzig: "The special rapidity of the Persian movements to war and victory cannot be historically established"—certainly a correct remark, but one which ought not to have decided its author, who was likewise an opponent of the Macedonian hypothesis, to regard the four wings in this instance, not as symbols of rapid movement, but as "an emblem of the far-reaching protecting royal power from above" (after Lam. iv. 20; Ps. xxxvi. 8).—The beast had also four heads, i.e., it extended its dominion in the four quarters of the earth, and governed the whole world. The words which follow, "and dominion was given unto it," are probably merely epeexegetical of this symbolical description, in which the four heads have the same significance as the pushing of the ram towards the four quarters of the heavens in chap. viii. 4, or as the four faces of the cherubs which looked towards the four quarters of the earth in Ezek. i. 10 et seq. If it is desired to interpret the four heads more closely, they may be taken to represent the four principal divisions

* [Keil adopts a different, but, as it seems to us, far-fetched and over-ingenious interpretation: "This means neither that it leaned on one side (Ewald), nor that it stood on its fore feet (Hävernick), for the sides of a bear are not its fore and hinder parts; but we conceive that the beast, resting on its feet, raised up the feet of the one side for the purpose of going forward, and so raised the shoulder or the whole body on that side. But with such a motion of the beast the geographical situation of the kingdom (Geier, Mich., Ros.) cannot naturally be represented, much less can the near approach of the destruction of the kingdom (Hitzig) be signified. Hofmann, Delitzsch, and Kliefoth have found the right interpretation by a reference to ch. ii. and viii. As in ch. ii. the arms on each side of the breast signify that the second kingdom will consist of two parts, and this is more distinctly indicated in ch. viii. by the two horns, one of which rose up after the other, and higher, so also in this verse the double-sidedness of this world-kingdom is represented by the beast lifting itself up on one side. The Medo-Persian bear, as such, has, as Kliefoth well remarks, two sides; the one, the Median side, is at rest after the efforts made for the erection of the world-kingdom; but the other, the Persian side, raises itself up, and then becomes not only higher than the first, but also is prepared for new rapine."—Stuart justly remarks that "the difficulty seems to have arisen from the fact that, until lately, we have been ignorant of a like symbol sculptured on the ancient monuments of Persia. Münster (Rel. der Bab., p. 112) has given us a description (with an engraving) of an animal of the symbolic kind, in a group near the star of Belus, which, kneeling or lying on the right foot, has its left one erect. A sense of security, combined with watchfulness, seems to be the indication. Probably this symbol, now on the monuments of Persia and Babylon, was a part of what belonged to the insignia of the royal and national standards."]

or aggregates of countries which the empire of Alexander embraced (cf. Hävernicks on this passage), e.g., Greece, Western Asia, Egypt, and Persia (including India). This is less arbitrary, at least, than the opinion of Jerome, that the heads represented the four leading generals of Alexander, viz.: Ptolemy, Seleucus, Philip, and Antigonus, or than the favorite assumption of many moderns after Von Lengerke (e.g., Hitzig, Ewald, Kamphausen, etc.), that the author represents the four earliest Persian kings, from Cyrus to Xerxes, who alone were known to him as the four heads of the leopard. The advocates of the latter opinion refer for support to chap. xi. 2, which passage, however, does not even imply that Daniel knew of but four kings of Persia (see on that passage), to say nothing of its affording no proof whatever that the present passage is concerned with any Persian kings. Our apocalypticist does not represent kings by heads, but by horns (see vs. 8 and 24 et seq.); a feature which recurs in the apocalypse of St. John, where the ten horns of the beast (Rev. xvii. 13) symbolize ten kings, while the seven heads indicate seven mountains. This analogy seems to favor the view of Hävernicks, which assumes that the four heads represent the four principal sections of the world-kingdom in question, but of course without demonstrating its correctness.—Verse 7. After this I saw in the night visions, and behold a fourth beast, dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly. Observe the solemn minuteness with which the fourth beast is introduced, and also the description as both "dreadful and terrible," דָּרָא וְרָאָה; cf. Chr. B. Michaelis: "Jung-untur duo synonyma, ad intendendum rem significatam, ut hac bestia non vulgariter, sed supra modum horribilis apparuisse videatur."—And it had great iron teeth. Iron is mentioned as signifying firmness and incisive sharpness (cf. Jer. xv. 12; Mic. iv. 13), while the teeth symbolize its lust of conquest (cf. v. 5).—It devoured and brake in pieces and stamped the residue with the feet of it. Unlike the other beasts, it was not content with simply securing its prey, but, rejoicing in destruction, it stamped with its feet what it could not devour. This description evidently does not indicate that the conquests of the fourth world-kingdom were more extensive than those of its predecessors, but merely that its course was more devastating and destructive. This obviously alludes to the description of the legs of iron and clay (the organs employed in treading and stamping), which belonged to the colossus in chap. ii., and corresponds fully to the actual character of the empires of the Macedonian Diadochi, and particularly that of the Seleucids. Cf. Kranichfeld: "It is generally acknowledged that the description of the fourth beast agrees in its leading features with that of the fourth kingdom in chap. ii. 40; especially in regard to its rage for destruction, which crushed without pity and trode everything under foot. Even the iron, the medium of destruction in chap. ii. 23, 40, returns here in the large teeth of the monster. The terrible appearance of the colossus resulted primarily from its fourth constituent part, and corresponding to this, the qualities which produce a terrible appearance are here expressly connected with the form of the fourth beast."—And it was diverse from all the beasts before it. This does not assert that "it combined in itself all that was prominent in the three former beasts, the lion, bear, and leopard respectively" (Jerome, Hävernicks, et al., under comparison with Rev. xiii. 2), but merely that it differed from them all, and displayed its nature in a way that could not be realized by a comparison with the lion, the bear, or the leopard. This difference of the fourth beast from all the others is chiefly suggestive of the fragmentary and divided character of the fourth world-kingdom, and consequently alludes to the composition of the feet of the colossus out of intermingled iron and clay. The opinion of Hävernicks and other advocates of the theory which regards the Roman empire as the fourth world-kingdom, that this description indicates the contrast between the character of that empire and that of the Oriental-Hellenistic monarchies which preceded it, is entirely too far-fetched; but that of Hitzig is no less so, when, in the support of his theory that the fourth beast represents Alexander the Great, he asserts that the contrast between the Hellenistic and the Oriental rule is here indicated—a contrast that was far greater than that between Rome and the world-kingdoms which preceded it.—And it had ten horns. According to v. 24 these ten horns represent "ten kings." Unlike ordinary animals, which have two horns, this monster representing the fourth world-kingdom has ten, being so many symbols of warlike power and dominion (cf. Deut. xxxiii. 17; 1 Sam. ii. 1, 10; Psa. xviii. 3; Job xvi. 15; Mic. iv. 13, etc.). The number ten is hardly to be strained, in this connection, to represent ten specified kings; but like the number four in v. 6, it is rather to be taken in a symbolic sense, and to be regarded as indicating a multiplicity of rulers, or an indefinitely large number of kings—in harmony with the usual significance of the number,

* ["The writer gives to this fourth beast no particular name. Plainly it was a peculiar monster. The reason why he omits a name seems to be, that in the world of nature no similitude could be found, for in no case of really-existing beasts are four of them united in one, so as to constitute an appropriate symbol for the four kingdoms of Alexander's successors. He classes these under the dynasty, comprehensively considered, which grew up out of the predominance or victories of the Greeks in the East. But when enough is introduced to designate the general nature of the dynasty, both here and in ch. viii. and xi., he goes over into a notice of only such kings as were in the neighborhood of Palestine, and had more or less to do with annoying it. As Antiochus Epiphanes was incomparably the most annoying and mischievous of them all, so a peculiar share of the prophecy respecting the fourth dynasty is allotted to him in each of the chapters named. It is evident from a comparison of historical facts as well as from the nature of the case, that a dynasty is spoken of by Daniel as more or less dreadful and destructive according to the measure in which Palestine was actually affected by it in this way."—Stuart. Kell, on the contrary, who adopts the common or "orthodox" interpretation of the fourth monarchy, gives a different explanation of this feature: "The fourth kingdom is represented by a nameless beast, because in Daniel's time Rome had not come into contact with Israel, and as yet lay beyond the circle of vision of Old-Testament prophecy." This candid admission one would think might have led the commentator to doubt any reference even here to Rome. He does not seem, moreover, to have perceived that for precisely the same reason the Macedonian empire should have been represented by some nameless beast, as being hitherto unknown to the Hebrews.]

* [May not the diversity rather consist in the fact that, unlike all the former governments, the Seleucid dynasty began a systematic attack upon the religious institutions of the subject Jews?]

both in the Scriptures and elsewhere, as the symbol of earthly perfection.* Kranichfeld observes correctly, "It is clearly not in the nature of the prophetic idea, that the number ten, in addition to the value which it thus has for the writer, should be capable of being demonstrated on the analogy of ordinary numerals, in the realization of the picture of the future." The notes on chap. xi. will show that in the more detailed description of the development of the fourth world-power in that place, there is by no means an exact enumeration of ten kings on the throne of the Seleucidae.—Verse 8. And behold, there came up among them another little horn. Concerning אֵין קוֹרְנִים, and its relation to the succeeding modifying predicate, see supra, on v. 5.—The prophet observes the rising or springing up of this little horn, the eleventh one, as taking place between the ten which already existed (notice the idea of continued observation, so to speak, of being lost in observation, which is indicated by the expression אֵין קוֹרְנִים, "I was engaged in considering, in observing"). The smallness of the new horn in this case, as in the parallel chap. viii. 9, refers merely to its original state, not to its later appearance when fully grown; for, according to v. 20, it was then greater than any of the other horns. Concerning the reading אֵין קוֹרְנִים, instead of אֵין קוֹרְנִים, see Hitzig on this passage.—Before (or "by") whom there were three of the first horns plucked up by the roots; i.e., it grew so strongly, and through its growth exercised so disturbing an influence upon its neighbors, that three of them were uprooted and wholly destroyed. Here also the definite number "three" is hardly to be strained to signify precisely three kings, who were overthrown by the monarch represented by the eleventh horn.† The prophecy certainly had its more immediate Messianic fulfilment in the manner in which Antiochus Epiphanes rose from his originally obscure condition to the throne of the Seleucidae, by removing two or perhaps three of his rivals (see infra); but from the prophet's point of view, involving substantially a merely ideal, or, more correctly, a dream-like indefinite view of the future, the idea of precisely this personage in future history, and of the political conjunctures preceding his accession to the throne, was assuredly excluded.—And behold, in this horn were eyes like the eyes of a man. Eyes like those of a man, human eyes (therefore two in number, despite the plural אֵין קוֹרְנִים, which is probably substituted for the dual for euphonic reasons merely, and by virtue of a usage that is frequent in the Chaldee), are borne by the horn in token that it represents a man,* and, moreover, a wise, judicious man; for here as elsewhere (e.g., Ezek. i. 18; x. 12) eyes are the symbol of understanding; cf. אֵין קוֹרְנִים, "to look at, understand."—And a mouth speaking great (or "proud") things; a farther indication of the human nature and character of the historical personage prefigured by the horn. אֵין קוֹרְנִים, properly, "speaking great or monstrous things;" cf. supra, on v. 3, and also infra, v. 11; also the Heb. אֵין קוֹרְנִים, Psal. xii. 4. The interpretation in v. 25 shows that blasphemies are meant by this "speaking of great things;" cf. xi. 36; Rev. xiii. 5.†

Verses 9–12. The Divine judgment upon the world-powers. I beheld (such things) till the thrones were cast down (or "set"). The A. V. is literal (אֵין קוֹרְנִים). The chairs of the Orientals consist of cushions, which are not set down, but laid down, and, in case of haste, are cast down; cf. ἐκείνω, Rev. iv. 2. The place where the thrones are set is not in heaven, for according to v. 13 the Son of man descends to it from heaven; nor is it on the earth, but, as in chap. xii. 7, a locality intervening between heaven and earth. ["Seats, not merely a throne for God the judge, but a number of seats for the assembly sitting in judgment with God. That assembly consists neither of the elders of Israel (Rabbins), nor of glorified men (Hengstenb. on Rev. iv. 4), but of angels (Psal. lxxxix. 8), who are to be distinguished from the thousands and tens of thousands mentioned in ver. 10, for those do not sit upon thrones, but stand before God as servants to fulfil his commands and execute His judgments" (Keil).]—And the ("an") Ancient of days did sit; viz., on his throne, in order to preside at the judgment; cf. Psal. ix. 5; xxix. 10; Isa. xxviii. 6. The "Ancient of days" (אֵין קוֹרְנִים), i.e., the aged in days (παραλαβόμενος ἡμερῶν, Sus. 52), is doubtless the God of Israel, the same as the Most High, v. 25, who was blasphemed by the little horn. He is described as the "Ancient of days," probably not by way of comparison with the younger associated judges, nor yet with the "blasphemous upstart," the little horn (Kranichfeld), but in comparison with the more recent gods of the heathen; cf. Deut. xxxiii. 17; Jer. xxxiii. 23. This predicate therefore refers to that attribute of the God of the Old Covenant, which is designated in such expressions as אֵין קוֹרְנִים, Dent. xxxiii. 27, אֵין קוֹרְנִים, Psal. iv. 20; βασιλεὺς τῶν αἰώνων, 1 Tim. i. 17; ὁ πρῶτος καὶ ὁ ἔσχατος, Rev. i. 17 (cf. Isa. xlv. 6; xlviii. 12). "He, who from primitive times has proven Himself a powerful judge, assumes the form of venerable age, in order to beget the confidence that He pos-

esses the wisdom and power to bring the blasphemer to judgment."—His garment was white as snow; thus correctly Theodot., Vulg., Hitzig, under comparison with Mark ix. 3, but conflicting with the Masoretic accentuation, which requires "as the white snow." The white color of the garment is probably not designed "to increase the impression of awful majesty" (Kranichf.), but to symbolize the purity and innocence of the judge. He appears, "so to speak, robed in the כְּתוֹרֹת of the righteous judge;" cf. Isa. lix. 17; Job xxix. 14; 2 Chron. xix. 7, and also the passages which mention the light, the symbol of holiness, as the garment of God, e.g., Ezek. i. 26; Psa. civ. 2; 1 Tim. vi. 16.—And the hair of his head like the pure wool, hence, likewise as white as snow, as in the case of a venerable sage. Cf. the parallelism of snow and wool in passages like Isa. i. 16; Psa. cxlvii. 16; Rev. i. 14.—His throne like the fiery flame; flashing like flaming fire, and apparently composed of it. The mention of the fiery appearance of the throne of God, does not of itself convey the conception of flaming vengeance on the part of the strict judge (Deut. iv. 24; ix. 3; xxxii. 22; Heb. xii. 29, etc.); for He frequently appears surrounded by fire in cases where His judicial character is not involved, e.g., Gen. xv. 17; Ex. iii. 3; Psa. xviii. 9, etc. In the present instance, however, the judicial significance of the fire that emanates from God is clearly established by the connection, as in Ex. xix. 16; xx. 15; Psa. l. 8 et seq. (against Hitzig and Von Lengerke).—His wheels as burning fire. The throne of the universal judge is therefore mounted on wheels (cf. the cherubic chariot, Ezek. i. 12 et seq.; x. 13 et seq.; Psa. lxxvii. 19), whose swift revolutions are encompassed with flashing fire. This description of the Divine throne of judgment as mounted upon wheels leads Kranichfeld to the incongruous opinion that the "casting down of the thrones" was accompanied with noise (!).—Verse 10. A fiery stream issued and came forth from him; i.e., from the Divine Judge, not from His throne; for the שֶׁמֶרֶץ of the first sentence can hardly be construed with a different object from that of the second, which clearly relates to God. Nevertheless both the author of the book of Enoch (xiv. 19) and the writer of the Apocalypse (iv. 9) represent the fiery stream as issuing from the throne, in the descriptions copied by them from this passage. Ewald interprets the "stream of fire" as a "stream of light," and arbitrarily makes it the symbol of the speech which issues from God, that is, of His command to begin the judgment (in support of which he appeals to chap. ii. 15; vi. 27, etc., whose character is entirely different). Hitzig is no less arbitrary when he remarks that the stream must be conceived as flowing evenly over a smooth bottom (hence like liquid glowing lava!), and as constituting the floor for the entire scene of the judicial procedure, since without this "the whole apparition would float in the air without support"—an empty fancy, which the prophet's language in no wise favors.*—Thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him. The imperfect tense of the verbs indicates that a readiness to serve existed in the thousands as a constant and enduring quality. Concerning "to stand before one" as synonymous with "to serve," cf. chap. i. 4.—In relation to the plural ending כְּתוֹרֹת in כְּתוֹרֹתָא, which the Keri rejects as a Hebraism, cf. chap. iv. 14; Ezra iv. 13.—The Kethib כְּתוֹרֹת (the plural of כְּתוֹרָה) immediately following is likewise to be retained, in opposition to the Hebraizing Keri כְּתוֹרָה; Hitzig's suggestion, however, to write כְּתוֹרָה (on the analogy of the corresponding Syr. word) instead of כְּתוֹרָה is unnecessary.—The "thousand thousands and ten thousand times ten thousand" are of course a host of ministering angels, which, standing in a wide circle, surrounds the council of the judges who are seated beside God (these are angels of a superior order, or perhaps "elders," cf. Rev. iv. 4). Cf. Deut. xxxiii. 2; 1 Kings xxii. 19; Neh. ix. 6; Psa. lxxviii. 18; ciii. 20 et seq., and also the mention of the angelic hosts in Gen. xxxii. 3; 2 Kings vi. 17, etc. The numbers 1,000 and 10,000 are not to be regarded as definite; they indicate, in a symbolic manner, the impression of an innumerable multitude which was made on the prophet in his dream-vision, while he was naturally in no condition to overlook the whole of this immense host, to say nothing of counting its numbers exactly; cf. Psa. lxxviii. 18; xci. 7.—The judgment was set. דִּין is properly an abstract word, signifying "judgment;" here used concretely to designate the judicial conclave composed of the superior angels—the angelic princes or archangels (cf. Josh. v. 14; Tob. xii. 15, etc.); cf. the analogous use of judicium in the concrete by Cicero, Verr., II. 18. Since chairs indeed were mentioned in the foregoing (v. 9 a), but nothing was said about the judges taking their seats, we must find it indicated in this place, and it is therefore not necessary to explain, with Dathe and Kranichfeld, that "He seated Himself in judgment" (the Ancient of days), as if this were merely a repetition of דִּין in v. 9 (similarly also Syrus, who read דִּיןֵי instead of דִּין, and therefore renders it, "the judge seated himself").—And the books were opened; the books of record, in which the good and bad deeds of men were recorded, that they may serve as a basis of the sentence to be pronounced upon men by God, the heavenly judge. Cf. Rev. xx. 12, as well as the frequent mention of the "book of life" in which the names of the burning zeal with which the holy God not only punishes and destroys sinners but also purifies and renders glorious His own people; see on Exod. iii. 3.—Kell.

* ["In the N. T. Christians are represented as sharing in the like solemnities, 1 Cor. vi. 2; Matt. xix. 28; Luke xxii. 30; Rev. iii. 21. Not improbably such expressions as 'Let us make man in our image.' 'Let us go down and see.' 'Who will go for us?' take their plural form from such views of the heavenly Concensus. The sum of the matter is that the prophet presents the Supreme Lord and Judge to our view by imagery borrowed from earthly sovereigns, i.e., as having all the insignia of pre-eminence and supremacy around him."—Stuart.]

* ["Fire and the shining of fire are the constant phenomena of the manifestation of God in the world as the earthly elements most fitting for the representation of the heirs of celestial glory, who have been reconciled to God, are inserted,—in Ex. xxxii. 82; Psa. lxi. 29; Isa. iv. 3; Dan. xii. 1 (see on that passage); Luke x. 20; Phil. iv. 3; Rev. iii. 5; xx. 15; also the “book of remembrance,” in which God records the sufferings of His faithful servants, which is noticed in Psa. lvi. 9; Mal. iii. 16, etc.—Verse 11. I beheld then, because of the voice of great words which the horn spake—I beheld even till the beast was slain. An anacoluthon, in the second וְהָיָה הַקֶּרֶן repeats the first, which was separated from וְהָיָה by the accent, but gives a somewhat different turn to the thought; cf. the similar constructions in Jer. xx. 5; Rev. xii. 9; 1 Macc. i. 1. וְהָיָה,

+ “till that,” indicates a protracted trial, which ends with the destruction of the beast, i.e., with the judicial execution of the God-opposed world-power. The little horn, representing the last anti-Christian king of the fourth monarchy, who brings ruin upon his whole empire by his insolent rebellion against the Most High, is designated as the cause for this destruction.—And his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame; rather, “and given for burning to the flame.” The latter of these expressions illustrates the former; the destroying of the “body” of the beast, i.e., of the entire edifice of anti-Christian national power, is effected by burning, which burning (וְהָיָה = Heb. וְהָיָה in Isa. lxi. 10) is of course to be taken figuratively, as in Isa. ix. 4; lxi. 24; Rev. xix. 20; xx. 10; and the fiery nature of the Divine Judge of the world, as described in v. 9, unquestionably stands in a causal relation to the kindling of this devouring fire of judgment; cf. Isa. x. 17; xxx. 27; Zeph. i. 18, etc.—Verse 12. The rest of the beasts. they had their dominion taken away; rather, “and the power of the rest of the beasts was also taken away.” The subjects of וְהָיָה are the celestial powers, as in v. 5.

Since the dominion of the three earlier beasts was destroyed before the rise of the fourth, so far at least as it was a dominion over the world in the proper sense, and since it does not seem admissible to take וְהָיָה in the sense of the pluperfect, thus explaining the passage as a mere supplementary note (against Ephraem, Polychron., Kamphausen, C. B. Michaelis, etc.), the judgment inflicted on the “rest of the beasts” together with that visited on the fourth must be understood to signify that utter destruction of the heathen world-powers which subjects the remnants of all the four world-kings to the new all-embracing Messianic dominion, and incorporates them in its realm; for as the characteristic expression וְהָיָה, “the rest of the beasts” (instead of וְהָיָה or וְהָיָה כְּלִי-חַיָּה, v. 7 b) indicates, certain fragments or remnants of the three former world-kings are conceived of as continuing to exist beside the fourth, and as being involved in its destruction. The fall of the three earlier world-kings is not regarded as complete by the prophet, inasmuch as larger or smaller portions of them continue to exist beside the last—perhaps temporarily incorporated into it as provinces, but not on that account assimilated to it—until the Messianic judgment involves them in a common destruction. That he refers only to such remnants, and not to new kingdoms essentially distinct from the former world-monarchies (as J. D. Michaelis, Von Lengerke, Hitsig, Ewald, etc., suppose), is evident (1) from the parallel description in chap. ii., where the destruction of the four constituent parts of the colossus results at the last and in the same moment through the agency of the stone which rolls from the mountain (see v. 34 et seq., and especially v. 44); (2) from the later parallel, chap. viii. 4, where all the beasts (כָּל-הַחַיָּה) with whom the Persian ram contends, are likewise only the constituent parts into which the latest world-kingdom had dissolved, and which are all overthrown and subjugated by the new dynasty (see on that passage, and compare Kranichfeld's remarks on this place, p. 265 et seq., which are certainly correct).—Yet their lives were prolonged for a season and time; rather, “for the duration of their life was fixed, to the season and time.”

This time (וְהָיָה, identical with וְהָיָה, v. 22, according to the correct opinion of Von Lengerke, Kranichfeld, etc.) has come, so far as the seer is concerned, with the judgment of the fourth beast and of the remnants of the other beasts, which has just been described. The duration of their lives (וְהָיָה, properly “respite, prolongation of life”) finds its unalterable terminus ad quem in this period of Messianic judgment, beyond which, indeed, the various nations (v. 14) continue to exist, but not the heathen world-powers formerly composed of them. Concerning וְהָיָה (= Heb. וְהָיָה) see on chap. ii. 21.

Verses 13, 14. The erection of Messiah's kingdom. I saw in the night visions, and behold; again a solemn and circumstantial introduction, like that preceding the description of the fourth beast in v. 7. Cf. the minuteness with which the prophet dwelt on the description of the fourth world-power, and of the Messianic judgment which came upon it, in chap. ii. 40 et seq.—(One) like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven; literally, “with the clouds of heaven (one) coming like a Son of man” (וְהָיָה).

The subject is omitted, and must be rendered indefinitely by “one,” as in chap. viii. 15; x. 16, 18. “With the clouds of heaven,” i.e., together with them (Rev. i. 7), and therefore in them (Mark xiii. 26) or upon them, ἐπὶ τῶν νεφελῶν (Matt. xxiv. 30; xxv. 64; Rev. xiv. 14). As the Messiah here comes to God upon the clouds of heaven and stands before Him, so God Himself rides, in poetical and prophetic descriptions elsewhere, upon the clouds as His celestial chariot, cf. Psa. civ. 3; Jer. iv. 13; also Psa. xviii. 10–18; xvii. 2–4; Nah. i. 3 et seq.; Isa. xix. 1 (cf. Isa. xiv. 14).—וְהָיָה, “son of a man, son of man,” is a simple circumlocution to express the idea “man,” which is found also in the Syr. and the Targums; and therefore = the Heb. וְהָיָה or וְהָיָה, for which the Heb. also occasionally substitutes וְהָיָה or וְהָיָה (see Psa. viii. 5; cxliv. 3; and infra, chap. viii. 17; x. 16, 18). This combination serves to specially point out an organic connection with or membership in the human race. The personage whom Daniel saw coming with the clouds of heaven had the appearance, therefore, of being one of the human race—a man. The mention of the human appearance of the apparition certainly does not aim at contrasting it with the forms of the beasts before described (as Hofmann supposes, Weissagung und Erfüllung, I. 290); for these have passed from the prophet's vision in consequence of their destruction, which has already transpired (vs. 11, 12). The comparison with the human form of Him who comes with the clouds, which, although not expressed, is certainly implied, is to be found in the superhuman—hence the Divine, or at least angelic—form, which the seer would naturally expect to behold in these exalted scenes (see Ewald on this passage). That he should observe a form similar to that of man, shining through the clouds, instead of a terrifying apparition that blinds and confuses his senses, produces on him an impression of wonder, but also of pleasure. Cf. Kranichfeld: "The case here is different from that of chap. iii. 25, where only ordinary men might be looked for in the fiery furnace, so that he who became the associate of the three Jews was at first regarded merely as partaking of human nature, and a comparison with merely human traits was necessary to lead the judgment to express the stronger utterance כְּבָר וְאֵלֹהִים, without thereby denying the human appearance of the form. And as the judgment in iii. 25 rests in the conclusion that the personage in question belongs to the race of gods, although present in human form, so it here concludes that the object of notice is one belonging to the human race, but wearing the form of God." The prophet, however, holds fast to the distinction between a wholly human appearance and the vision he has seen, and indicates this by the particle of comparison כְּ, which points out that he intends to represent a really supernatural, but still human-like personage. (The correspondence with the כְּ in vs. 4 and 6, does not militate against this conception of the כְּ here—despite the assertion to the contrary by Richno, in the Stud. u. Krit., 1869, II., p. 255.) There cannot be the slightest doubt, in view of the entire description, particularly in v. 14, and also in view of the exactly corresponding signification of the destroying stone, in the parallel vision of the 2d chapter (see ii. 44 et seq.), that this superhuman form of a man represents the Messiah, the Divine-human founder of that fifth world-kingdom, which is at the same time a heavenly kingdom of eternal duration.

The effort of Hitzig to refer the כְּבָר וְאֵלֹהִים to the people of Israel as the "personified community of saints, which rules over the heathen," is merely the product of a persistent and fundamental aversion to the idea of a personal Messiah, which results naturally from the extreme rationalistic position of that exegete. The interpretation which asserts a personal Messiah is advocated by nearly all expositors (with the exception of Ibn-Ezra, Jahn, Paulus, Baumgarten-Crusius, and Hofmann, who agree with Hitzig, but, in part, for very different reasons, and giving a more positive turn to the subject), and is removed beyond the region of doubt, (1) by vs. 18 and 21 of this chapter, in which an unbiased exegesis is compelled to find the people of Israel clearly distinguished from the Son of man (see on v. 18); (2) by the undeniable reference of ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, the pre-eminently favorite Messianic designation of Himself employed by the Saviour, to this passage (Matt. viii. 20, etc.; John xii. 34); (3) by important testimonies of the Jewish-Hellenistic literature, such as Enoch (xli. 1-3; xlviii. 2 et seq.; lxii. 7, 9, 14; lxiii. 11; lxix. 27.—Cf. Hilgenfeld, Jüdische Apokalyptik, p. 155 et seq.), Orac. Sibyll. (III., 286 et seq., 653 et seq., ed. Friedlieb; cf. Zündel, Kritische Untersuchungen, p. 163 et seq.); * (4) by most of the rabbins (e.g., R. Joshua in Ibn-Ezra, Saadia, Rashi, Ibn-Jahja, etc.), who frequently designate the Messiah simply as כְּבָר, "the beclouded one." Cf. the Eth.-fund. principles, etc., No. 4.—And came to the Ancient of days; i.e., he was admitted to the immediate presence of God (cf. Ezek. xlii. 13), conducted before Him until he was placed as near as were the elders who sat on the right and left, and even still nearer.—And they brought him near before him. The subject of בָּרָךְ is probably not "the clouds," but rather the ministering angels, v. 10. Thus Hitzig, Ewald, etc., correctly hold, in opposition to Kranichfeld, who construes the clouds as the subject, and to several others, as Kamphausen, etc., who prefer to leave the subject wholly undesignated, as with כְּבָר, v. 12.—That the Messiah was required to be brought before God and be presented to Him at this juncture, indicates that the prophet regards him as having previously existed while the beasts exercised their dominion—and therefore that he ascribes personal pre-existence to him. Daniel probably conceived of him as pre-existing among the thousands and tens of thousands of the saints of God, and as subduing and crushing the God-opposed world-powers at their head (vs. 11, 12); for only thus can be explained the investing of the Messiah with eternal dominion over the kingdom of God, which is evidently a reward for his valiant battling in the service of the Most High, as described in the next verse; cf. also the parallel description in chap. ii. 44 et seq.—Verse 14. And there was given him dominion and glory, and a kingdom. Instead of יְהוָה Syrus and the Vulgate read וְהוּא—"and He (the Ancient of days) gave him," etc.; likewise Luther in this place and the parallel v. 22, where also the Sept. and Theodot. interpret וְהוּא. In the latter instance the active sense would certainly seem preferable, since the "Ancient of days" immediately precedes a different verb in the 3d sing. active as its subject; here, however, this subject is too distant, and the analogy of vs. 4 and 6 recommends the passive form וְהוּא.—The triad "dominion, glory, and kingdom" recalls chap. iii. 33; iv. 31; vi. 22, where at least "dominion" (כְּבָר) and "kingdom" (מְלָכָה) are given.

* Cf. also Sibyll., I. II., p. 277, ed. Galland: ἔγει ἐν νεφέλῃ πρὸς ἀφ' αὐτῶν ἀφ' αὐτῶν αὐτὸς ἐν δόξῃ χριστὸς συν ἀμύμητον ἀγγελῶν καὶ καθύπερθε, κτλ.

Upon it is based the ancient doxology at the close of the Lord's prayer: σου γὰρ ἡ βασιλεία καὶ ἡ δόξα εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας.—And all people . . . should serve ("served") him. Concerning the triad "peoples, tribes, and tongues" see on chap. iii. 4. Von Lengerke and Ewald regard שָׂרְבָן as future, "shall serve him," but thereby assume a rather harsh change of tense in the midst of the remarks which describe the objects seen in the vision. Hitzig, Kranichfeld, etc., are correct in considering the verb as logically dependent on the preceding principal verb יִרְאֶה, thus expressing design—"in order that," or, "so that all people, etc., should serve him." שָׂרְבָן in itself is certainly not to be limited to signify religious service (Divine adoration, cultus), for in the extra-Biblical Chaldees, e.g., in the Targuma, it signifies also a purely secular service, and in v. 27 of this chapter it is synonymous with אֲשַׁמְעָה, "to obey;" but in point of fact it serves, both here and in that passage, to designate service rendered to a Divine person, which is also its bearing in chap. iii. 12 et seq.—His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not be destroyed. Cf. chap. iii. 33; iv. 31; vi. 27; also Mic. iv. 7; Luke i. 33; Rev. xi. 15; xix. 16, etc.

Verses 15-18. The interpretation of the vision in general, without special reference to the fourth beast. The impression of alarm produced on Daniel by what he saw, led him to seek a further explanation of its meaning. He therefore mingles with the host that surrounds the Ancient of days, after having hitherto remained apart as a mere observer. A second act in the drama of the dream-vision, in which the prophet himself takes part, though merely as an inquirer, begins therefore at this point. Von Lengerke arbitrarily remarks: "The vision is now over (with v. 14); but the seer remains on the heavenly scene, and requests an angel to interpret the dream." That this is incorrect, appears from v. 16, where the ministering hosts of angels mentioned in v. 10 still appear, while on that assumption they must have disappeared with all the other features of the vision; and the character of what follows, to the end of the chapter, does not indicate that it is a mere interpretation as distinguished from the preceding dream.—I, Daniel, was grieved in my spirit in the midst of my body; properly, "within in the sheath" (בְּיָדִי), i.e., in the body, which contains the spirit, as the sword is contained in its scabbard; cf. Job xxvii. 8; Pliny, H. N., VII., 58. Ewald well remarks that "as the sword remains at rest as long as it is in its sheath, so the spirit of man is generally quiet while it feels itself enclosed by the coarse veil of the body; but there are still moments in which the spirit becomes restless while in its coarse tenement, and when it would break forth impatiently and venture all," etc. In relation to פָּנָה (properly "to abbreviate, contract, torquere") as designating an unusually bitter grief, cf. the corresponding Syr. and Arab. verbs. The feature that plunges the prophet into so severe and bitter sorrow is not so much the circumstance that he is unacquainted with the special meaning of the vision, as that a majority of its features, and particularly the four beasts and the dreadful fate imposed on them, were so prophetic of evil and misfortune. The end, indeed, toward which everything was tending, according to vs. 13 and 14, was glorious, but the way by which to reach it was painful, and opened a prospect of severe conflicts for the people of God; and the prophet must have suspected this, even before it was explained to him in detail.—אֲנִי, in the combination

אֲנִי יִרְאֶה, is not the nominat. absol., as Bertholdt supposed, but is in apposition to the suffix in יִרְאֶה; cf. viii. 1, 15; Ezra vii. 21; also Winer, § 40, 4, and concerning the corresponding construction in the Hebrew, see Gesenius, Lehrgeb., p. 728. The solemn emphasis which the prophet's language gains by this appositional supplement, corresponds to the importance of his vision; cf. chap. x. 1, 7; xii. 5.—Verse 16. I came near unto one of them that stood by, i.e., one of those engaged in His service, who stood about God.—And asked him the truth (or "the true explanation") of all this; אֲשַׁמְעָה

properly "the firm, or certain;" here used of the trustworthy interpretation, conforming to the designs of God, for which Daniel asks. Kranichfeld interpolates: "He desires that nothing should be concealed because of a desire to spare the inquirer in his excited state." This additional idea of laying aside reserve, of disregarding considerations of pity, is not contained in the simple אֲשַׁמְעָה.—And he told me, and made me know the interpretation of the things (or "words"), viz.: in the remarks which follow (vs. 17, 18). The clause "and made me to know" is therefore epexegetical to "and he told me;" the ו before אֲשַׁמְעָה is explicative, as in v. 1 a. Von Lengerke and Kranichfeld unnecessarily take יִרְאֶה in the telic sense, "He told me that he would make me to know," etc. The reason for such a promise to reveal the interpretation is not discoverable, since the interpretation itself immediately follows.—Verse 17. These (exceedingly) great beasts, which are four—four kings—shall arise, etc. With reference to the clause in the nom. absol., "these exceedingly great beasts, which are four" (or, "With reference to these . . . beasts, concerning them," etc.), cf. vs. 23, 24, and also Isa. xlii. 49.—The four kings (מְלָכִים) whom the beasts are here said to denote, are unquestionably not regarded as four individuals, but as the representatives of four kingdoms, as appears from vs. 23, 24 (where the fourth beast is represented as a מְלָכִים governed by a numerous succession of individual kings). Cf. the identifying of מְלָכִים and מְלָכִים which appears already in chap. ii. 37 (as well as supra, v. 4) in the case of Nebuchadnezzar, and again in chap. viii. 21 et seq.; xi. 2.—The "arising of the kings will be מִן הָאָרֶץ, i.e., not "out of the earth," but "from the surface of the earth," hence, in effect, "on earth" (Luther).—In the later Heb. parallels, viii. 22, 23; xi. 2, 3 et seq. קִרָּה is rendered by מְלָכִים. The future יִרְאֶה denotes the Divine decree, which limits the duration of the dominion of kings, as well as appoints their rise. Instead of "They shall arise," קִימוֹן may therefore be rendered modally, "They shall be compelled to arise." If the purely future sense be retained, it will be necessary to assume, with Von Lengerke, Kamphausen, etc., that the prophet carelessly, or by virtue of a denominatio a potiori, included the actually existing, and even partially superseded Babylonian world-kingdom among the future ones of his vision. This view is, however, more eligible than the strange assumption of Hitzig that the author does not in this connection regard the Chaldean empire as the first of the coming monarchies, but assigns that position to the reign of Belshazzar merely, which opened shortly after the time of this vision; as if v. 1 did not expressly specify "the first year of Belshazzar" as the time of recording the vision, and as if it were at all certain that the author really regarded Belshazzar as the last Chaldean king! Moreover, how can it be reconciled, that while formerly (chap. ii. 37) Nebuchadnezzar was selected as the representative of the Chaldean monarchy, and this was to a certain extent repeated at the commencement of the present vision (see v. 4), the unimportant, listless, idle Belshazzar should here suddenly be installed in his place?—Verse 18. But the saints of the Most High shall take ("receive") the kingdom. The plural קְדוֹשֵׁי, which occurs here and in vs. 22, 25, and 27, serves, like עַלְי in the Targums, as a plurais excellentia, to denote the God of Israel, who in Gen. xiv. 18 is called אֱלֹהֵי

קְדוֹשֵׁי. As similar plurals of excellence, cf. not merely אֱלֹהִים, but also קְדוֹשִׁים, Josh. xxiv. 19; Hos. xii. 1; Prov. ix. 10; xxx. 3.—The "saints of the Most High," or the "saints" simply (קְדוֹשִׁים), as they are called in vs. 21 and 23, are not the angels, mentioned in vs. 10 and 16, who surround the throne of God, but the people of God on the earth, the "real members in the communion of the perfectly true religion" (Ewald), the members of the house of Israel in its ideal spiritual signification (Gal. vi. 16), the Israel of the Messianic time of fulfilment; cf. Isa. iv. 3; vi. 13; lxii. 12; Rom. ix. 6, etc.—The same expression is also found in vs. 23 and 25; cf. עַם קְדוֹשִׁים, chap. viii. 24, and עַם קָדָשׁ, chap. xii. 7 (also Ex. xix. 6; Deut. vii. 6; xiv. 21; Ps. xvi. 3; xxxiv. 10).—When it is said that these saints of the Most High "shall receive the kingdom," the reference is evidently to the transmission of the Messianic kingdom into the hands of the Son of man from the Ancient of days, as described in v. 14. The saints, however, are by no means to be regarded as identical with the Son of man, so as to make him a mere personification of the people of Israel. This view, which, besides being advocated by Hitzig and Hofmann (see supra, on v. 13), is adopted by Herzfeld in his Geschichte Israels, II., 381, is opposed by v. 21, where the saints are represented as a host of battling persons, and are clearly distinguished from the Messiah, who is exalted far above them, and at the time of their conflict with the anti-christ carries in heaven with the Ancient of days—

hence the relation between the Messiah and the Messianic people is represented to be such that he aids them in heaven and from heaven (strengthening, comforting, and supporting them in their conflicts and sufferings), and for that reason, as their representative, receives for them the dominion over the eternal kingdom from the hand of God, as was already indicated in the vision, v. 14. Cf. Auberlen, p. 51; also Von Lengerke, Kranichfeld, and Ewald on this passage. The latter correctly observes, p. 406: "If the language in this place and in vs. 22 and 27 refers at once to the genuine members of Messiah's kingdom instead of Himself, this is merely for the purpose of more fully explaining the great picture which has been given once for all. A kingdom and its sovereign cannot exist without subjects, and in fact, they only exist through the latter. . . . When such a people has really been found, it receives the power and perpetuity, the indestructible and eternal character, as well as the dignity and the pre-eminence which lie in the nature of that empire and its Messiah (cf. ii. 44). The language of this interpretation refers therefore to this people, and the subject of the vision in v. 13 et seq. derives therefrom a self-evident but not unimportant completion. This by no means implies, however, that the Messiah, who was already sufficiently characterized in that passage, is identical with the people who are now, at the final stage, included, any more than that the description of the Messiah in that place, whose majestic character is not easily repeated, has any analogy with the words here employed. The king and his people are associated only in the final results and end, in the eternity and glory of the kingdom itself, as is strikingly remarked in this passage and in v. 27; and yet even here the distinction is clearly observed that the three things, 'authority, glory, and dominion,' i.e., majesty in its full activity and glorious recognition, are in v. 14 awarded only to the Messiah, and not to his people." Cf. also the same author's Jahrbücher der biblischen Wissenschaft, vol. III., p. 231 et seq.—And possess the kingdom for ever, etc. אָדָם, "to possess," here denotes the continued possession, while in v. 22 it is inceptive, and signifies the assumption of the possession, or the entrance upon it. The superlative expression עַלְמָא עַלְמָא, "unto the eternity of eternities, unto all eternities," is exactly like the Hebrew עַד עוֹלָמֵי עַד, Isa. xlv. 17; cf. 1 Tim. i. 17; Eph. iii. 21, etc.

Verses 19-22. Daniel desires a certain explanation of the FOURTH BEAST. He therefore briefly recapitulates the former description of its appearance and fate in vs. 7-14. In this recapitulation, which recalls to mind the similar ones in chap. ii. 45 (cf. v. 34), and especially in chap. iv. 17 et seq. (cf. v. 7 et seq.), we have the new features that claws of brass are noticed in addition to its iron teeth (v. 19), and that the people of God are mentioned as warring against the beast (aided by the Messiah, and under his protection) and overcoming it.—Then I would know the truth of the fourth beast. יָדַעְתִּי, I desired to be certain about this, ἐζητοῦν ἀκριβῶς περὶ (Theodot.). The reading

אֶרֶץ, instead of אֶרֶץ, which is found in three MSS. at Erfurth, probably owes its origin to the defective form, which in this place, unlike v. 16, seemed to indicate an Inf. Pael (which, however, is found in no other place). The rendering in the Vulgate: "Post hoc volui diligenter discere," may also have contributed to originate that reading.—Whose teeth were of iron and its nails of brass. The brazen claws are associated with the iron teeth, by virtue of the association of ideas, which frequently connects iron and brass in thought; see e.g., Deut. xxxiii. 25; Jer. xv. 12; Isa. xlv. 2; Psa. ovii. 16, etc.—Verse 20. And the other which came up, and before whom three fell. Literally, "and they fell before him the three." The relative construction is dropped at this point, as well as the connection of the speech from נָפַל, at the beginning of the 20th verse, so that the discourse again assumes the character of description, especially from the beginning of the 21st verse.—And (of) that horn that had eyes; properly, "and that horn, and it had eyes," etc. The ׀ before עֵינָיו is epexegetical or correlative, as in Isa. xlv. 12; Psa. lxxvi. 7.—The form מְבַלֵּל with ׀ occurs also in v. 25 and chap. vi. 22.—Whose look was more stout than his fellows. כֶּן חֲבֵרָתוֹ, a shortened expression for כֶּן חֲבֵרָתוֹ; cf. chap. i. 10; iv. 13, 30.—Verse 21. I beheld, and the same horn made war with the saints, etc. This war against the saints merely indicates a special feature connected with the "devouring, breaking in pieces, and stamping under foot" (v. 19), of which the beast was guilty, but precisely that feature which would especially arouse the attention and fears of the prophet. So far as the mode of expression is concerned, the writer here passes from figurative to literal language; cf. Rev. xi. 7; xii. 7; xix. 19.—Verse 22. Until judgment was given to the saints of the Most High; i.e., "until justice was done to them." דִּין here signifies justice to be secured by law, equivalent to the Heb. מִשְׁפָּט, e.g., Deut. x. 18; cf. Psa. cxl. 13. It cannot here be taken in the sense of judging or performing judicial functions; for according to vs. 9, 10, it is God, with whom are associated the elders of heaven, who sits in judgment and administers justice (cf. Psa. ix. 5). There is no design here to assign a participation in this judicial administration of the Almighty to the saints (thus differing from Matt. xix. 28; 1 Cor. vi. 2).—Instead of "the saints of the Most High," the original has "saints of the Most High," without the article, which is also the case in the latter half of the verse, and in v. 21. Concerning the omission of the article in solemn and poetic speech, cf. Ewald, Lehrb., § 277 b, where Mic. vii. 11 et seq.; Isa. xiv. 32; Hab. iii. 16; Psa. lvi. 11, etc., are adduced as illustrations of the Hebrew usage.

Verses 23–27. The explanation of the angel respecting the fourth beast and its judgment. The fourth beast shall be the fourth kingdom; rather, "the fourth beast, a fourth kingdom shall be," etc. The same construction as in v. 17 a, and as in v. 24.—And shall devour the whole earth. The emphasis does not fall on "the whole earth," but on "shall devour" (אֲכָלֶה), which is not only placed first, but is also repeated by two synonymous terms following the object. אֶרֶץ אֲרָצִים does not, therefore, as Hitzig supposes, signify "all the countries of the earth," for this would result in an unnecessary exaggeration of the hyperbole which, without question, really exists. Nor does the related אֲכָלֶה signify "to swallow up," which would be equivalent to "appropriating, or incorporating with itself" (as Hitzig asserts, appealing for proof to Deut. vii. 16; Isa. ix. 11; Jer. x. 25—which passages are, however, by no means convincing), but only "to devour," which, like the synonyms "to break" and "to stamp" (דָּבַק and דָּבַק), indicates merely a devastating and destructive energy, without including the idea of conquering. The fourth world-kingdom, therefore, may be held to signify the empire of the Seleucidæ, in the light of this passage also; and there is no necessity to refer it to the Macedonian empire of Alexander, nor yet to that of the Romans.—Verse 24. And the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise; rather, "And the ten horns; out of this kingdom shall arise ten kings." מִמֶּנָּה מְלָכֵיהֶם, literally, "out of this, the kingdom," i.e., out of this same kingdom; cf. on chap. iii. 6. Concerning the form מְלָכֵיהֶם, for מְלָכֵיהֶם, see on chap. ii. 7. Hitzig prefers, needlessly, to substitute the ending ׀, and refers the resulting "out of it, his kingdom" to the fourth beast, or even to the "other one" (antichrist) who is afterward mentioned, as its subject—which clearly is forced and arbitrary. Hengstenberg (p. 211 et seq.) attempts, contrary to the sense of the prophet, to make the "ten horns" represent ten kingdoms, i.e., ten Christian German states which are developed out of the Roman world-empire. Bleek (Jahrb. für deutsche Theol., 1860, I. p. 68) also inclines to this transformation of the "kings" into kingdoms, since he attempts to apply the fourth beast as a whole to the Macedonian-Hellenistic world-monarchy, the ten horns to the several kingdoms of the Diadochi which sprang from the former, and the eleventh horn directly to the dominion of the Seleucidæ, and at the same time to its characteristic leading representative, Antiochus Epiphanes. Since the ten horns correspond to the partly iron and partly clay toes of the colossus in chap. ii. 41 et seq.,* the assumption that "kings" are here really put for "kingdoms" might seem admissible; but in parallelizing the toes of the image with the horns of the beast, the prophet would hardly think of individual rulers, any more than of distinct states or kingdoms (see on ii. 42). A horn, as Hitzig justly observes, would not be especially appropriate as the symbol of a kingdom; and the attempts of

* [This correspondence, however, cannot be legitimately urged as an argument in favor of the contemporaneity of the ten kings, for it is doubtful if the number of the toes has any special significance, and no stress is laid upon it in the explanation of the vision. Like the two legs, it forms but an accidental accessory in completing the figure. Otherwise we should be obliged to count the toes on both feet likewise, and this would be more than any interpreters are prepared to do.]

Luther, Melancthon, Geier, Ph. Nicolai (De regno Christi, l. I., c. 5 sa.), etc., to make the ten horns denote ten designated states which were formed out of the Roman world-monarchy—e.g., Syria, Asia, Egypt, Africa, Greece, Italy, Germany, France, Spain, and England, or (as Nicolai, l. c., suggests) Syria, Egypt, Greece, Italy, Germany, Poland, Hungary, France, Spain, and England—can only produce absurd and arbitrary results. In v. 8 the horn is clearly represented as a person; and accordingly the numerous horns in this place are probably intended to denote individual royal personages. Cf. also chap. viii. 21, where the horn is said, in the plainest terms, to represent a personal king.* For the rest, see Ethico-fund. principles, etc., Nos. 2 and 3.—He shall be diverse from the first. "As the fourth kingdom differs (vs. 7, 19) from the other three, so he differs, and to his disadvantage, from his predecessors; this is true generally, but especially so in his conduct towards God and his saints, v. 25" (Hitzig).—And he shall subdue three kings. יִהְיֶה כְּשֵׁר, the opposite of יִהְיֶה כְּשֵׁר, as in chap. ii. 21. It does not denote a merely moral humiliation, but a complete degradation, and even a hurling down, a seizing of their dominion (cf. Ezek. xxi. 32; Isa. x. 33). This is also shown by v. 8, which speaks very plainly about a "plucking up by the roots" of three of the former horns by the "little horn," and thereby probably refers to a supplanting of three rulers of the Seleucidæ by the violence of a new sovereign (see on that passage).†—Verse 25. And he shall speak—words against the Most High; יִהְיֶה כְּשֵׁר—יִהְיֶה כְּשֵׁר, like the Heb.

יִהְיֶה כְּשֵׁר, Hos. x. 4; Isa. viii. 10; lviii. 18. It appears from vs. 8 and 20, and also from the later parallel, chap. viii. 25 b, that blasphemous words are meant. This prophecy was certainly fulfilled in a marked degree by the blasphemous words of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc. i. 24, etc.), but by no means for the last time; cf. the N.-T. prophecies relating to antichrist, 2 Thess. ii. 4; Rev. xiii. 5 et seq. יִהְיֶה כְּשֵׁר, properly, "in the direction of the Most High," i.e., against the Most High (who is personally near), "against the person of the Most High" (Kranichfeld).—And shall wear out ("disturb") the saints of the Most High. Hitzig's remark is too far-fetched: "יִהְיֶה כְּשֵׁר" is assonant with the preceding parallel יִהְיֶה כְּשֵׁר, and is not equivalent to 'disturb, wear out' (cf. יִהְיֶה כְּשֵׁר in 1 Chron. xvii. 9, and the Targ., Isa. iii. 15), but signifies 'to try, oppress, make wretched' (?).—And think to change times and laws. יִהְיֶה כְּשֵׁר does not signify "statuta sacra" (Hävernich), but = Heb. מוֹעֲדִים, "festival seasons" (Lev. xxiii. iv.; Isa. xxxiii. 20), i.e., determined, legally appointed times for religious celebrations in general, for the great annual feasts as well as for the weekly and monthly (Sabbaths and new moons); cf. Num. xxviii. 2. The following יִהְיֶה כְּשֵׁר, "and law, traditional usage," indicates that the impious king shall not merely endeavor to change the appointed times of these rites, but that he shall seek to abrogate the ceremonial observances of religion themselves; hence, what was formerly said in a good sense (chap. ii. 21) of God, the absolutely perfect and omnipotent "changer of times and seasons," is here predicated in a bad sense of His daemonic adversary, the impious Ἀντίοχος. Cf. the attempts of Antiochus Epiphanes, recorded in 1 Macc. i. 45 et seq.; 2 Macc. vi. 2-7, to destroy the theocratic system by abrogating the daily sacrifices, the observance of Sabbaths and feasts, and by introducing the sacrifice of unclean beasts, and the worship of Jupiter and Bacchus—attempts in which the prophecy before us found its more immediate historical fulfilment, while its ultimate realization must be looked for in the last times, according to 2 Thess. ii. 4; Rev. xiii. 8, 12 et seq.—And they shall be given into his hand until a time and (two) times and the dividing of (or, "a half") time. The expression sounds, upon the whole, like Mic. v. 26; but the duration of the period of suffering imposed by the permission and pedagogic wisdom of God is somewhat more definitely fixed in this instance, without, however, omitting the mystical feature in this limitation which requires to be interpreted. The aggregate duration of this time of affliction is divided into three distinct periods, which, however, are sufficiently indefinite in themselves, and therefore in no wise indicate the real measure of time in the prophet's mind; for while it is entirely probable that יִהְיֶה כְּשֵׁר has the same signification here as in chap. iv. 13, namely, "a year" (see on that passage), yet the duration of "a year" in a vision of the future, which constantly presents symbolic conceptions, is upon the whole extremely doubtful. It must remain an open question whether ordinary calendar years are intended, or, what is scarcely less probable in itself, whether mystical periods are referred to, which are measured by a standard not known to men, but only to God.* It may

* [Kell's reference to chap. viii. 20-22 is unavailing against this express statement of the text here, for not only is the great goat horn there undeniably a personal ruler, but so are likewise the "four notable horns" that succeed it as the founders of so many dynasties. His entire argument on this point is a perversion of the sense: "Since the ten horns all exist at the same time together on the head of the beast, the ten kings that arise out of the fourth kingdom are to be regarded as contemporary." On the contrary, they are explicitly said to "arise" in the sight of the prophet, as if they were not there originally, and this admits, if it does not require, the idea of their gradual and consecutive development. So in the case of the two-horned ram (chap. viii. 3) we might with equal reason have presumed both horns to have arisen simultaneously, but such was not the fact. Moreover, as they are stated in so many words to be kings of one and the same kingdom, they must in the nature of the case be successive; for ten simultaneous sovereigns in one dominion would be a palpable absurdity. In the case of the last three only, whose fall makes room for the eleventh, is there a partial simultaneousness.]

† [Kell contends that "the king coming after them can only overthrow three of the ten kingdoms when he himself has established and possesses a kingdom or empire of his own." But such is not the process represented in the vision. The little horn in the act of arising evidently usurps the room previously occupied by the three others. It is this expansion in their place that makes it become great. They must, therefore, have been themselves rivals at the time, and not well-established in their seat, when this fourth contestant arose in its first insignificance.]

* [Few readers, however, will be content with this indefinite exposition of these sharply defined and frequently reiterated statements of time with reference to the events predicted. The difficulties in the way of their literal application to the period of desecration of the Temple by Antiochus Epiphanes do not appear so formidable as to require such a vague interpretation. See under the Ethico-fundamental considerations below.]

be shown with more confidence how the three particular designations of time, עֶדְנִיךָ, עֶדְנִיךָ, and עֶדְנִיךָ, are related to each other, and also why precisely these terms are employed in the prophecy, which are repeated in the Heb. of the parallel, chap. xii. 7, in the words מוֹעֵדִים, מוֹעֵדִים, and מוֹעֵדִים. In harmony with a not infrequent Chaldee usage, the plural עֶדְנִיךָ is put for the dual (cf. Targ., Am. iv. 6; Ex. xi. 5; Num. xix. 36; supra, v. 8 et seq., and, upon the whole question, Winer, § 55, 8), and therefore, like the corresponding Heb. מוֹעֵדִים, represents a double period, a pair of times, and, in case עֶדְנִיךָ signifies a year, a period of two years. The converse holds with עֶדְנִיךָ, which, though in itself denoting any fraction whatever, is shown positively by the parallel מוֹעֵדִים in xii. 7 to signify "a half." Hence a double year is at first added to the year which stands at the beginning, and afterward another half year. The period of 8½ years which thus results is symbolically significant, inasmuch as it forms the half of seven years, and therefore stands related to the prophetically significant "seven times" in chap. iv. 13, as the half to the whole. If, therefore, the sevenfold number of the years passed in lycanthropy by Nebuchadnezzar (which was not to be taken literally, but ideally and prophetically) denoted, in a general way, an extended duration of the sufferings imposed on him by God, it follows that the present figures indicate a period of affliction that is shorter by one-half. "A time, and times, and a half time" represents a time of suffering that is abbreviated by one-half, or that is interrupted at the middle, similar to that referred to in the prophetic words of Christ: εἰ μὴ ἐκολλωθῆσαν αὐτὴν αἱ ἡμέραι ἐκείναι, οὐκ ἂν ἐσώθη πᾶσα σὰρξ, Matt. xxiv. 22; Mark xiii. 20. The same idea of a shortened or halved time of affliction is expressed by the "half-week" (i.e., half week of years) in chap. ix. 27, which, like the 1,290 days in chap. xii. 11 (or the 1,260 days or 42 months of the Apocalypse, xi. 2 et seq.; xiii. 5), is merely a tolerably exact designation of the 8½ years, in different language. It will be shown hereafter that this prophecy of the affliction of Israel during 8½ years prior to its deliverance likewise had a typical fulfilment in the history of Antiochus Epiphanes, while its final realization is reserved for the eschatological future.* For the present it will be necessary to remember merely, as the result of an unprejudiced exegesis having a suitable regard for the prophetic usage of language in this book, that a strictly literal conception of the period of 8½ years will hardly conform to the sense of the prophecy, and that there is therefore no need to seek for a period of suffering in the history of the Jews, while subject to that Syrian despot, which shall cover precisely that length of time, for the purpose of demonstrating that first fulfilment of the prophecy.*

—But the judgment shall sit; cf. v. 10 b, and also v. 22.—And they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy (it) unto the end. מוֹעֵדִים is to be repeated, as the accusative of the object to the two infinitives. מוֹעֵדִים,

"unto the realized end," i.e., to the end of the last God-opposed world-power, which marks the end of the heathen world-power as a whole. מוֹעֵדִים therefore designates (unlike chap. vi. 27, where the never-accomplished end of God's kingdom is referred to) the goal at the end of the development of earthly dominion, which coincides with the erection of the kingdom of God (v. 13 et seq.).—Verse 27. And the kingdom and dominion and the greatness of the kingdom ("kingdoms"); a triad similar to that in v. 14, differing only in the substitution of מוֹעֵדִים, "the greatness" (Luther, "the power"), for עֶדְנִיךָ, "glory." עֶדְנִיךָ depends equally on all the three nouns as a subjective genitive, and therefore denotes that the dominion, power, and greatness possessed by all the heathen kingdoms is intended. On the meaning of the expression "of the kingdoms under the whole heaven," see supra, on v. 12.

Verse 28. The impression made on Daniel by what he has seen and heard. Hitherto is the end of the matter (or "remarks"), namely of the interpreter, the conclusion of which coincides with the end of the dream. De Wette, Hitig, etc., render it inappropriately, and contrary to the sense of מוֹעֵדִים, "Thus far the history"—an interpretation which finds no support in chap. xii. 6.—As for me, Daniel, my cogitations much troubled me, namely, after awaking from his dream-vision; cf. ii. 1; iv. 2.—And (the color of) my countenance changed in me. Cf. chap. v. 9, where the same expression is found, and chap. x. 8, which is parallel in substance.—But I kept the matter in my heart, viz.: the remarks of the interpreting angel, v. 17 et seq., and consequently, the subject and signification of the dream-vision. Cf. Luke ii. 19.

ETHICO-FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES RELATED TO THE HISTORY OF SALVATION, APOLOGETICAL REMARKS, AND HOMILETICAL SUGGESTIONS.

1. After what has been remarked, it is apparent that the principal force and the greatest interest of the prophetic descriptions of this chapter centre in the fourth world-kingdom and in its development as an anti-christian power, which immediately prepares the way for the judicial advent of Christ. In the parallel description in

* [Some of those modern interpreters who hold in part to the "year-for-a-day theory" make the little horn in this passage to be different from that in ch. viii., referring the latter to Antiochus Epiphanes, but the former to the papacy or else to Mohammedanism. Such as maintain that the days stand for years in both instances regard the difference in the periods between this passage and that (1,060 years here and 2,900 there) as caused by computing the period in the one case from the rise of the power to its downfall, and in the other from Daniel's own time. In either case the same fatal objection applies, that there is no good evidence of such a symbolic use of the word "day" by Daniel.]

* [Kell, in like manner, argues for the purely symbolical and indefinite import of this designation of time, being driven thereto by his theory that this whole prophecy applies to the duration of the Roman power, which he extends into the unknown future. He has all along contended against a literal interpretation of these chronological data as they seem to be.]

the second chapter,—where the series of world-kingsdoms was represented by four metallic substances, respectively inferior to each other in value, in the order of their succession, and although together forming a great colossus, yet indicating its perishable nature by the weakness of the feet on which it rested—the observation of both the dreaming king and the interpreting prophet was fixed equally on all the four world-monarchies. Their intimate relations to each other, their separation, and their subjection to the same ultimate fate through the agency of the rock of Messiah's kingdom, formed the principal features of that prophecy, which, however, likewise dwelt more extensively upon the fourth kingdom than upon its predecessors (v. 40 et seq.); but the principal reason for the prominence thus given to the last kingdom in the series, existed substantially in the fact that the aim was to point out that its heterogeneous elements and its divisions laid the foundation for its own ruin, and, as a matter of course, for the fall and ruin of the former empires. The case is different with the present vision and its interpretation. Each of the four beasts which in this instance represent the world-kingsdoms is indeed drawn with nervous and strongly characterizing strokes, that admit of no doubt respecting their identity with the four constituents of the image (v. 4 et seq.); but the attention of the narrator is principally directed to the fourth beast, and to the horn which denotes the height of the development of the world-power (v. 7 et seq.; 11 et seq.), even during the dream-vision itself. The interpretation of the vision disposes of the first three beasts and their reference to the three earliest world-kingsdoms very summarily (v. 17), but emphasizes the fourth beast and its "little horn which speaks blasphemous things," as symbols of the final phase of development on the part of the world-power, and of the reign of antichrist produced by it; for not only are the characteristic peculiarities of this beast noticed twice over, the second time in a recapitulation denoting the reflections of the prophet concerning its nature and appearance (vs. 18-22), but they receive a somewhat detailed explanation (vs. 23-26), which does not indeed display the clearness of the disclosures in chapters viii., xi., and xii. relating to the same events in the period immediately prior to the Messianic future, but which is nevertheless far superior to all the former prophetic sections of the book, and especially to that contained in chap. ii., in the precision and clearness of its expositions.

2. In order to a correct apprehension of the Messianic bearing of this prophecy, it is requisite before all else, that the identity of the monarchical relations and situations indicated in this chapter with those described in chapters viii., xi., and xii. should be carefully observed; or, in other words, that the common reference of the prophecies in all these chapters to Antiochus Epiphanes and the Maccabean period, as marking their more immediate fulfilment, should be recognized. The following considerations will demonstrate that this reference is common to the prophecies mentioned (and also to that contained in chap. ix. 24-27), and that, consequently, the second part of the book of Daniel refers, as a whole, to that time as the epoch of its first and more immediate fulfilment:

a. The world-power in question is described as divided and subject to dissensions in itself, in all the parallel representations, especially in chap. ii. and vii. on the one hand and chap. xi. on the other. This agreement extends even to the point, that in both instances, chap. ii. 43 as well as chap. xi. 6, 17, the vain attempts to secure peace by means of intermarriages are noticed (see on ii. 43 and cf. infra, on chap. xi., l. c.).

b. The number ten is applied to the kings of the fourth monarchy, and receives prominent mention in at least two of the parallel descriptions (chap. vii. and xi.), although merely as a symbolic number, which finds its counterpart, in a general way, in the first ten possessors of the throne of the Seleucids. (It must be remembered, however, that [according to the author's view] neither the ten toes of the image of the monarchies, chap. ii. 42 et seq., nor the four horns of the Grecian goat, chap. viii. 7 et seq., refer to these ten predecessors of Antiochus Epiphanes, or to any individual kings whatever.)

c. The blasphemous and sacrilegious course of the eleventh king—symbolized by the "little horn"—towards the Most High, His law, and His saints, is described in chap. vii. (vs. 8, 11, 20-25), and more fully in chap. viii. 10, 24 et seq.; ix. 24 et seq. [?]; xi. 31, 36, in a manner that recalls the statements of the Maccabean books relating to the abominable attempts of Epiphanes to profane the Jewish worship and oppress its adherents, with the liveliest and strongest emphasis.

d. Chapters vii. 25; ix. 27; xii. 7 et seq., agree in limiting the duration of the tribulation caused by the antichristian tyrant to $3\frac{1}{2}$ years. (In relation to the merely apparent discrepancy in the duration of the suffering, as stated in chap. viii. 14 and chap. xii. 12, see on those passages.)

e. The several descriptions agree in superseding and destroying the antichristian supremacy by the erection of a Messianic kingdom. This is not only asserted in the chapter before us and in chap. ii. 44 et seq., but also in chap. viii., where the breaking of the foe without hands (v. 25) is evidently synonymous with the loosening of the destroying stone "without hand" in chap. ii. 34, 45, and where the "justifying" (v. 14) of the desolated sanctuary denotes nothing else than the introduction of the Messianic period of salvation. Further illustrations of this head appear in chap. ix. 24 and in xii. 1 et seq., 7 et seq., where the Messiah likewise is described as the direct opponent and victorious successor of antichrist and his abominations. Hengstenberg (p. 213 et seq.), Hävernicks, Ebrard (Offenb. Joh., p. 84 et seq.), Zündel (p. 119), and Auberlen (p. 197 et seq.) attempt in vain to deny the identity of the antichrist noticed in chapters ii. and vii. with the enemy of the people of God described in chapters viii. and ix., asserting that the former is to be looked for in N.-T. times immediately prior to Messiah's second advent, while the latter appeared and was destroyed during the Old Dispensation and before the first advent of Christ, and that the prophecies in chapters ii. and vii. relate to the eschatological antichrist, while those in viii. and ix. denote a typical personage!—as if the descriptions in chap. vii. 25 did not already indicate an opponent of the O.-T.

church and ceremonial! as if the "changing of (festal) times and laws," there referred to, could designate anything but the violent offences against the temple and the sacrifices of the Old Covenant, as described in chapters viii., ix., and xi. (see supra on v. 25, and also under c)! and as if an Israelitish prophet could possibly suspect that the worship of Messianic times would differ from that of the former dispensation; and as if he had not, in chap. ix. 24, even expressly opened the prospect of a restoration of the O.-T. sacrifices and sanctuary services when Messiah should appear (see on that passage)! An unprejudiced exegesis, governed by scientific principles, can discover but a single antichrist in all the parallel prophecies, and that one is clearly described as the immediate predecessor of the Messiah, who supersedes and destroys him.* The prophet, however, was evidently ignorant of the merely typical importance of this antichrist, as being only a forerunner of the antichrist of the last times (to whom refer the N.-T. descriptions of the future, which are based upon this book indeed, and which frequently recall its features—in 2 Thess. ii.; Rev. xi. 7; xiii. 1 et seq.; xvii.; xix. 19 et seq.); for instead of representing the former as merely an imperfect analogue of the incomparably more atrocious impiety, the far more concentrated and diabolical wickedness of the latter, as he must have done if he were actually conscious that the distinction between type and anti-type existed in this case, he everywhere presents the idea of a flagrant rebellion against the Most High, and of the desecration of the sanctuary, and the attempted extirpation of the true religion, in expressions of equal force. And instead of dwelling chiefly on the anti-type as the more important character, and as being more significant in his relations to Messiah's work, as might have been expected, he pursues a contrary course, and furnishes a far more thorough and realistic prophetic description of the type!—We are therefore obliged to conclude that, in harmony with the law of prophetic perspective, Daniel saw the type and anti-type, the vista of Old and New-Testament times, the scenes of the more immediate future and those of the eschatological period, as a comprehensive whole, and that from his point of view, as a captive in Babylon, he no more saw the interval between the two features in the history of the future, although it covered thousands of years, than the pilgrim who journeys toward a distant goal is able to observe the broad and depressed valley that intervenes between the mountain immediately before him and that which seems to rise in close proximity beyond it. Cf. Hofmann, Weissagung und Erf., p. 313 et seq., where it is correctly remarked, with reference to the closing verses of chap. xi., which describe the terrible end of the typical antichrist, Antiochus Epiphanes, that "at a subsequent point he (the prophet, or rather the angel who speaks to him) observes only the final end of national history, the fear and tribulation which overtake the whole world, and the preservation of Israel in the midst of it, in addition to the final end of human history, the resurrection of the dead to life or to perdition (chap. xii. 1-3). . . . The connection of these last things with the prospect of the end of that oppressor of Israel is not different, for instance, from that by which Isaiah speaks of the impending attack on Jerusalem by Assyria as the final alarm of that city, or which causes Jeremiah to regard the end of the seventy years as coinciding with the end of all the afflictions of his people." Similar views are advanced by the same author in his Schriftbeweis, II. 2, 547 et seq., and also by Delitzsch, p. 285: "It is a law of Messianic history that the fulfilment of a prophecy, if not completed by one event, must produce successive developments, until the actual state that has been realized shall correspond to the sense and word of the prophecy. The afflictions caused by Antiochus were not the last experienced by God's people; but the book of Daniel predicts them as the last, as Isaiah in the downfall of Assyria, chapter x., and Habakkuk in the destruction of Babylon, chap. ii. et seq., foretell the overthrow of the world-power. The range of the prophet's vision is decided by the border of the horizon where arises the glory of the congregation of God, but not the measure of the meaning which the Spirit of prophecy introduces into his words, and which history gradually unfolds."

3. While, however, the more immediate fulfilment of the predicted misfortunes of the dream-vision is to be chiefly, and even exclusively sought in the period of tribulation marked by the reign of the Seleucids and the revolt of the Asmoneans, it does not follow in any degree that a contemporary of that generation must be regarded as the composer of this vision, and that therefore it must be held to be a prophecy forged ex eventu. In opposition to this assumption of a pseudological conventional composition of the chapter by an apocalypticist of the Maccabean period, it must be observed that discrepancies exist between several leading characteristic features of the prophecy and the facts connected with the history of the sufferings of Israel under Antiochus, and also the facts connected with the development of the empire, which are unquestionably more marked than the origin of the chapter in the time of the Maccabees would justify in any way. Above all we notice the following:

a. The difference between the ten horns of the fourth beast (v. 7 et seq., 20, 24) and the number of the predecessors of Antiochus Epiphanes on the throne of the Seleucids. The most plan-

* [Keil seeks (p. 258 et seq.) to make the most of the incidental variations in the description of the "little horn," in ch. vii. and viii.; but his points are minute and often far-fetched, whereas the coincidences are striking, numerous, and essential. Consult the harmonic table in the introduction. Lest we might be thought to treat the opposite view too lightly, we briefly note the differences adduced by Keil. 1. The little horn of ch. vii. rises out of one of the four horns without adding to their number or injuring them; that of ch. viii. arises among the ten as an additional or parallel element, and uproots three. This merely proves that the four powers are not identical with the ten horns, which is precisely our view. 2. The enemy in ch. vii. goes much farther in his violence than that in ch. viii.; but as the conduct is of the same general character, this is evidently but a fuller or more detailed description. Both certainly tallied with the behavior of Antiochus. It is vain to allege that in one chapter the persecutor is not an antichrist because he is not directly said to arrogate divinity as in the other chapter, but only to oppose the people of God; for these are everywhere in the Bible identified with God himself, and their cause and interests are his likewise. 3. The periods in the two cases are different (2,300 days, and a year and a half, or 1,290, or 1,335 days). This is readily explained as including in some passages more accessory circumstances than in others. See the exegetical remarks on each.]

able method of reconciling the number of the horns with that of the early Seleucids—hence, of fixing the number of the latter at ten, while Antiochus follows as the eleventh—is that adopted by Prideaux, Bertholdt, Von Lengerke, Delitzsch, and Ewald, by which Alexander the Great is excluded from the series, and Seleucus Nicator heads the list. This certainly secures a succession of seven rulers down to Seleucus IV. Philopator, the brother and predecessor of Ant. Epiphanes (1. Seleucus Nicator, B. C. 312-280; 2. Antiochus Soter, 279-261; 3. Antiochus Theos, 260-246; 4. Seleucus Callinicus, 245-226; 5. Seleucus Ceraunus, 225-223; 6. Antiochus the Great, 222-187; 7. Seleucus Philopator, 186-176); but every attempt to designate the three missing monarchs, who should fill the brief interregnum and state of restless anarchy which preceded the accession of Antiochus Epiphanes, results in failure. The ordinary resource is to assume that these three kings, whom Antiochus dethroned and superseded, or, as the figurative language in v. 8 has it, “the three horns which were uprooted before the little horn came up,” were (1) Demetrius, the eldest son of Seleucus Philopator, and therefore the nephew of Ant. Epiphanes, who was at Rome as a hostage when his father died, and whose crown was usurped in his absence by his uncle (who had just returned to Syria from an extended sojourn in Rome, where he had likewise been a hostage); (2) Heliodorus, the murderer of Seleucus Philopator (see chap. xi. 20), who occupied the throne for a short time after poisoning that king, until Epiphanes dethroned him; and finally (3) Ptolemy IV. Philometer, king of Egypt, a minor at the time, who was the son of Cleopatra, the daughter of Antiochus the Great and sister of Epiphanes. It is assumed that this queen laid claim to the throne of the Seleucids for her son, or at least to the provinces of Palestine and Phœnicia, which adjoined Egypt. In point of fact, however, none of these rivals of Epiphanes could be regarded as the king of Syria, for Heliodorus was a mere usurper, who was dethroned after a brief reign, and there is no record to show that either Demetrius or Ptolemy Philometer pretended to the throne with any degree of earnestness.* Hence a variety of different explanations have been attempted; as, for instance, Alexander the Great has been included in the series of the ten kings, as being the actual founder of the empire of the Seleucids (1), so that the line begins with him and closes with Seleucus Philopator as the eighth, Heliodorus as the ninth, and Demetrius as the tenth representative of that dynasty (thus Hitzig, on the passage, and Hilgenfeld, Die Propheten Esra und Daniel, 1863, p. 82); or again, attention is called to the fact that exactly that period in the history of Syria which immediately precedes the reign of Epiphanes, is known to be particularly obscure, uncertain, and defective in its records (Ewald, and also Hitzig and Kamphausen); or it is observed that on the analogy of the toes of the image, which were partly of clay and partly of iron, the requisite number of kings is probably to be found both among the Seleucids and the Ptolemies (Rosenmüller, Delitzsch, following Porphyry, Polychron, and other ancients); or the attempt to discover a succession of ten kings is wholly given up, and the ten horns are regarded as denoting ten contemporary rulers, e.g., ten satraps or generals of Alexander the Great, among whom the three that Seleucus Nicator conquered, Antigonus, Ptolemy Lagus, and Lysimachus, were especially prominent (Bleek, p. 68). The uncertain and unsatisfactory nature of all these attempts at an explanation, which Delitzsch (p. 283) also acknowledges in substance, has finally led even several advocates of the theory of the Maccabean composition of this section (e.g., Hertzfeld, Geschichte Israels) to adopt the only correct view, on which the number ten as applied to the horns is a round or symbolic number, whose more specific interpretation it is useless to attempt. This view is also held in substance by a majority of the expositors who refer the fourth beast to the Roman world-power and the occidental-Christian kingdoms which emanated from it, although they hold fast to the really prophetic character of the vision, and therefore its origin with Daniel and during the captivity.* We have already shown that the advocacy of the genuineness of this prophetic book by no means involves, as a necessary consequence, the interpretation by which the fourth beast designates Rome. It has also been shown, on v. 8, that we must be content with a general and symbolic explanation of the subordinate three-fold number of the horns, as well as of the number ten. Cf. infra, on chap. xi. 2 et seq.

6. The statement in v. 25, according to which the period of tribulation, prepared for God's people by the eleventh king of the fourth monarchy, was to cover “a time, and two times, and a half time” (hence according to chap. iv. 13 was to extend over three and a half years and then to be ended by an act of Divine judgment), will likewise admit of no exact and thoroughly

* [So formidable is this difficulty on the Roman theory of interpretation that Kell, its last most noted advocate, takes refuge in a remarkable postponement of the solution. “The kingdoms represented by the ten horns belong still to the future. To be able to judge regarding them with any certainty, we must first make clear to ourselves the place of the Messianic kingdom with reference to the fourth world-kingdom, and then compare the prophecy of the Apocalypse of John regarding the formation of the world-power—a prophecy which rests on the book of Daniel.” This is a virtual abandonment of the field. If all the other parts of this prophecy have their clear counterpart in history, why not this also? If, as Kell claims, these ten horns are found simultaneously on the head of the beast as it first arises, it is obviously inconsistent to refer their identification to the future. But the attempts made to distinguish the horns in question, in their literal application Rome, have signally failed, as the most cursory inspection of the schemes proposed in various commentaries on Daniel and the Apocalypse will abundantly show. The ten kings in Rev. xvii. 12 are there expressly assigned to the indefinite future; but the seven in ver. 10 are clearly characterized as belonging to proximate history, and the first six as having been at the time actually realized.]

* [Kell urges these objections with all their force to disprove any reference here to the time of the Seleucids; but they apply with equal and even greater force to the Roman list of emperors. It does not appear however, that the three horns in question represent actually reigning kings, nor do the terms “plucked up” and “fell” clearly mean dethronement. It is sufficient that they were royal personages who claimed or were entitled to the throne. One of them, at least, Heliodorus, actually occupied it, for a brief period, indeed, but long enough to come within the description. The other two, as being legitimate heirs, may fairly be designated as princes, and this is all that the figure requires. The partial and temporary royalty of all three is evidently denoted by their speedily succumbing to the upstart. It is difficult to imagine a case of four rivals to the same throne that would more accurately answer to the vision.]

false before this Chronological Test.

+ it is not only a see how full of sin it helps the matter. His method is much the same
 + at that of the author - and both of them equally unsatisfactory. The satisfactory comparison with the periods of religious persecution under Antiochus and of the Maccabean revolt. If the introduction of a sacrificial worship and the erection of an altar to the Olympic Zeus by Antiochus (1 Macc. i. 54) be taken as the terminus a quo, and the rededication of the desecrated sanctuary by Judas Maccabeus (1 Macc. iv. 52) as the terminus ad quem of that period of suffering, the result is merely three years and ten days, instead of three and a half years (cf. Josephus, Ant. XII. 7, 8); for the Maccabean books fix the date of the former event on the 15th Chisleu of the year 145 of the era of the Seleucidae (= B. C. 167) and of the latter on the 25th Chisleu 148 a. Sel. (B. C. 164). Hitzig attempts unsuccessfully to recover the five and two third months yet lacking by going back to the arrival in Judaea of Apollonius, the commissioner of tribute (which he asserts must have happened about three months before the 15th Chisleu 145, according to 1 Macc. i. 29 [cf. v. 18]), as the actual commencement of the era of persecution. The result is still only three and a fourth years instead of the requisite three and a half; and a yet more unfortunate feature, which increases the difficulty of settling both the beginning and the end of the epoch of three and a half years in question, appears in the two-fold consideration, that on the one hand the real beginning of the Maccabean persecution may be found in the barbarous attack on the life and religion of the Jews, which, according to 1 Macc. i. 22, took place fully six years prior to the rededication of the temple, while on the other hand it is by no means necessary to regard the dedication of the sanctuary on the 25th Chisleu 148 as marking the cessation of the persecution, which might rather be dated from the great victories of Judas Maccabeus over the Syrian generals Gorgias and Lysias (the one of which was gained during the year 147, and the other in the earlier months of 148 in the era of the Seleucidae), or on the contrary, from some event subsequent to the dedication, as the death of Antiochus Epiphanes (cf. infra, on chap. xii. 11). The theories which are admissible, therefore, vacillate between periods covering from three to six years, without being able, in any case, to demonstrate an era of exactly three and a half years, such as v. 25 requires, and further, without presenting any evidence from the recorded history of the Maccabees of so sudden, complete, and wonderful a conclusion of the period of suffering (without being secured by repeated conflicts and successes), as the same passage and its parallels in chap. viii. 14 and chap. xii. 7 et seq. seem to require.* For this reason

* [In this chronological examination the author does injustice to the data in question, as the following exhibit from Stuart's Commentary (p. 223) will render clear: "Is this expression of time poetical merely and figurative, consisting of round numbers (as they say), and comprising just half of the mystical number seven, which is so often employed in a kind of tropical way? Historical facts seem to speak for the literal interpretation. In the book before us. Yet, considering the nature of the case and of the number usually concerned with such reckonings (i.e., the number seven), we surely need not be solicitous about a day, a week, or even a month, more or less. The convenience of the reckoning, when it is near enough to exactness, for all the purposes of prophecy, is very obvious, and will account for adopting it. "In exhibiting the historical facts, we will begin with an era which is certain, viz., the time when Judas Macc. expurgated the temple, and began the service of God anew. This was on the 25th of Dec. 148 ann. Sel. = 165 B.C., see 1 Macc.

we are sometimes referred to the alleged insufficiency of our information respecting the various events connected with the Maccabean history, which lacks certainty and thoroughness (Hilgenfeld, as above), and at others, the assumption has been adopted that the Maccabean tendency-writer employed a designedly mystical and indefinite mode of indicating time, which cannot be accurately elucidated by a comparison with the facts of history (Von Lengerke). However conceivable and in itself probable the latter view may be, on the opinion that the prophet was drawing an apocalyptic picture of the distant future, which was necessarily ideal and indefinite so far as details were concerned, it is to the same degree improbable and incapable of being demonstrated, when the author is regarded as a conventional inventor of vaticinia ex eventu, who everywhere attempts to introduce allusions to the circumstances of the recent past or of the present. From such a writer we might assuredly have expected a more exact agreement and palpable correspondence between the prophecy and its fulfilling counterpart than results from the relation of the $1+2+\frac{1}{2}$ times to the period of the Antiochian persecution. "The alleged pseudo-composer of our chapter must accordingly have written for a time, with whose historical conditions he was unacquainted, despite the fact that he was its contemporary; and the entire condition of the theocracy, covered with shame and the want of success as it was, during the three and a half years of this chapter—before whose expiration this advocate of the actually victorious but not by him so-designated Maccabean rebellion is said to have written—becomes historically inconceivable in the light of the pseudo-Daniel tendency-hypothesis" (Kranichfeld).

iv. 52. Counting back three and a half years, we come to June in 145 A.S. = 168 B.C. Livy has described the retreat of Antiochus from Egypt, in the early spring (primo vere, Liv. xiv. 11) of that year. While on that retreat, Antiochus detached Apollonius, one of his military chieftains, to lay waste Jerusalem (comp. 2 Macc. v. 11, which makes the time clear), for he had heard that the Jews exulted at his misfortune, in being obliged by the Romans to retreat from Egypt, and he was determined to wreak his vengeance on them. He did so effectually, as 1 Macc. i. 29 seq. fully shows; and vs. 29, 20, of the same chapter, compared together, show that the year was 145 A. S. as above stated. From June, when Jerusalem was probably taken, to December, is six months; and from December in 168 to December, 165, is three years. In the same way, as to time, does Josephus reckon Præm. ad Bell. Jud. § 7. But to avoid perplexity, it should be noted that a different mode of reckoning, viz., three years, is sometimes employed, e.g., in 1 Macc. iv. 54, and 2 Macc. x. 6, such a method seems to be implied; and so in Jos., Ant. Jud. XII. 7, 6. An examination of the context in these cases shows, however, that this period designates only the time that intervened between the profanation of the temple by heathen sacrifices, 1 Macc. i. 54, and the consecration of it by Judas Maccabeus, 1 Macc. iv. 54. Some six months after capture of the city, during which all manner of cruelties and excesses were committed, appear to have elapsed before Antiochus began his scintilla offerings in the temple. The consecration of the temple by Judas introduced regular Hebrew worship there; and the death of Antiochus happening shortly afterward, the period of his oppression was of course at its end. Thus did events correspond very exactly with the time designated in our text. We cannot indeed specify the exact day, because history has not done this; but it is enough, that we come so near to the time designated, as to remove all serious difficulty respecting it."

To this we may add that the period three and a half years may reasonably be taken as a somewhat round number, not only because of its being in itself a general and inexact expression, but more especially as being the fix of the conventional term of seven years. See on ch. ix. § 7.]

c. Intimately connected with this is the discrepancy between the picture of the Messiah drawn in our chapter, and the nature of the Messianic hopes entertained by the Jews of the Maccabean period, as revealed in the books of the Maccabees, and also in the other products of Jewish apocalyptic literature of nearly the same date. These authorities are indeed able to refer to a final deliverance and re-union of the scattered tribes of Israel (see, e.g., Ecclus. xxx. 11; 1. 24; Tob. xiii. 13-18; xiv. 6), and also to a Divine visitation of judgment upon the heathen (Ecclus. xxxii. 18; Judith xvi. 17, etc.); but they nowhere base their theocratic expectations clearly on the appearance of a single Messianic personage, least of all, on one who is so positively characterized by traits belonging to both Divine and human nature as is the "Son of man" in v. 13 of this chapter. The προφήτης πιστός of 1 Macc. (xiv. 41) is a purely human prophet, devoid of all celestial, supernatural character; and the "poor righteous one" of the book of Wisdom (chap. ii. 10-20) can make no claim to recognition as an individual Messianic person, but is rather a mere personification of the class of suffering righteous men. The conception of a Messiah is very dim upon the whole in all the apocryphal literature of the two centuries immediately preceding the Christian era; and in the cases, where the expectation of a personal Messiah, possessed of the Divine-human character to a greater or less degree, actually appears in several productions of this period, as in books II. and III. of the Sibylline Oracles, or in the book of Enoch (which at least some critics admit to have been composed as early as in the second century B. C., and possibly under John Hyrcanus—e.g., Ewald, Dillmann, Jos. Langen), the dependence of such writings on this book must doubtless be assumed (cf. the passage from the Orac. Sibyll. 1. II., cited above, on v. 8, and also Introduct. § 6, note 8). This dependence, however, in no wise compels to the assumption that the prophecies of Daniel originated in the Asmonean period; it is far more readily understood on the opinion that they originated during the captivity, but that they were recognized at their true value and introduced into general use in all the circles of pious Jewish apocalyptists in the Maccabean age and as a result of its afflictions.

4. In support of the opinion that He who "came with the clouds of heaven" in v. 13 is no other than the personal Messiah, it has already been remarked among other things (see on that passage) that Christ preferably and frequently employed the phrase ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, as a testimony in favor of that view. It is now recognized by a majority of expositors and Biblical theologians that this designation, which is found in all eighty-one times in the New Testament, was intended to recall Dan. vii. 13, and to assert the identity of Jesus as the Messiah with the בן אדם who is there described, although several (e.g., Von Hofmann, Delitzsch, Kahnis, etc.) still attempt to advocate the view formerly represented by Huetius, Harduin, Schleiermacher, Neander, Weiss, Baur, etc., on which the phrase was derived from Psa. viii. 5, and designates Jesus, not as being the Messiah, but as "the flower of humanity," as "the ideal and normal man," the "man of history, toward whom all human development tends." The former method of explaining the phrase does not exclude the latter, but is rather to be traced back to both these passages of the Old Testament, inasmuch as Dan. vii. 13 also expresses the sense of the ideal and normally human, of the perfectly human, and even of the Divine human, as will appear with special clearness from the manner in which the Saviour, in Matt. xxvi. 64, replies to the question of the High priest inquiring whether He were "the Christ, the Son of God," when, with an evident allusion to this passage, He declares Himself "the Son of man," who shall thereafter be seen sitting "on the right hand of power and coming in the clouds of heaven;" cf. also John xii. 35, 36, where in answer to the question of the unbelieving people, "Who is this Son of man?" the Lord declares, "Yet a little while is the light with you," and thus again identifies himself most clearly with the Messianic "Son of man" of this passage. Cf. Meyer and Lange on both these passages (and also on Matt. viii. 20); likewise Gess, Lehre von der Person Christi (1856) p. 7 et seq., 257; J. F. Tafel, Leben Jesu, p. 127 et seq., and especially Nebe, Ueber den Begriff des Namens υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου, Herborn, 1860; also Holtzmann, Ueber den neuteamentlichen Ausdruck Menschensohn, in Hilgenfeld's Zeitschr. f. wissenschaftliche Theologie, 1865, p. 212 et seq. (although the latter has so distorted a view of the reference of the name to Dan. vii. 13 that he chooses to entirely exclude that to Psa. viii. 5, thus approaching the opinion advocated by Strauss in his Leben Jesu).—In addition to this reference to our passage in the mouth of our Lord as directly testifying to a personal Messiah, and besides the possibly still more ancient references in the same spirit which are found in the Sibyllines and the book of Enoch (see supra), the substantial agreement of its description of Christ with that of the prophets prior to the captivity affords an important testimony in favor of the correctness of our view. Especially if the description of the "Son of man" in chap. vii. 13 et seq., to whom an eternal and all-embracing dominion over all nations is given, be compared with the designation מָלְכִיּוֹן, "an anointed prince," in chap. ix. 26, which, although primarily applicable to a typical forerunner of Christ (see on that passage), yet clearly indicates the character of the Messianic ruler as being at the same time priest and king, the result will be a demonstration of the close analogy and even identity of Daniel's description of the Messiah with those by which Isaiah (chap. ix. 5; xi. 1 et seq.) and his contemporary, Micah (chap. v. 1 et seq.), characterize the spiritually anointed ruler of the house of David who should introduce the period of the deliverance of Israel and all nations, and also with the Messianic prophecies of Jeremiah (xxiii. 5; xxx. 9) and Ezekiel (xxxiv. 23; xxxvii. 25) and even those of the time of David and Solomon together with the period immediately subsequent, e.g., David himself (Psa. cx.), Nathan (2 Sam. vii.), Amos (ix. 11 et seq.), Hosea (iii. 5), etc. The Messiah of Daniel does not differ from Him to whom all the earlier prophets bore witness; the super-human glory and perfection of power of Him who nevertheless appears in human form, as described in this vision, correspond exactly to the expectations which the prophetism of Israel in general, from the time of David, when the theocracy bloomed and shone in its splendor, had learned to connect with a later offspring of the house of David, as the restorer, endowed with Divine power and majesty, who should renew the glory of that house, and consequently the glory of the theocracy as a whole.
